(1) Theſe Oſtomen were not Iriſhmen, but yet of long continuance in Ireland. Some ſaie they came firſt out of Norwaie, and were called Oſtomen, that is to ſaie Eaſterlings, or Eaſterne men, becauſe that countrie lieth Eaſt in reſpect of England and Ireland. Some thinke they were Saxons and Normans; but what ſoeuer they were, they were merchants and vſed the trade of merchandize, and in peaceable maner they came into Ireland; and there being landed they found ſuch fauour with the Iriſhrie, that they licenced them to build hauen townes wherein they might dwell & vſe their traffike. Theſe men builded the ancienteſt and moſt part of the cities and townes vpon or nére the ſea ſide within that land; as namelie Dublin, Waterford, Corke, Limerike, and others. And albeit they in proceſſe of time grew to be mightie and ſtrong, and for their ſafetie did build townes and caſtels: yet they durſt not to dwell among the Iriſh people, but ſtill continued and kept themſelues within their owne townes and forts, and thereof they are and were called ſince townеſmen. And of them were theſe, being the inhabitants of Dublin, which came to meet the earle, and were thus ſlaine.

The returning of Reimond into Ireland, and how he maried Baſilia the ſiſter vnto the earle.

Chap.3.

THe earle then ſeeing himſelfe to be now in great diſtreſſe, and in a narrow ſtreit, taketh aduiſe with his frends and councellors what were beſt to be done. At length, as vnto his laſt refuge, he ſendeth his letters to Reimond being yet in Wales, to this effect. As ſone as you haue read theſe our letters, make all the haſt you can to come awaie, and bring with you all the helpe and force that you can make: and then according to your owne will and deſire, you ſhall aſſuredlie and immediatlie vpon your comming haue and marrie my ſiſter Baſilia. Reimond, as ſone as he had read theſe letters, he was forthwith in haſt to be gone, and thought it long yer he could be gone; not onlie in reſpect of the faire ladie, whom he had long woed, loued, and deſired; but alſo that he might helpe and ſuccour his lord and maiſter in this diſtreſſe and neceſſitie. Wherefore he maketh preparation accordinglie, and by means of friendſhip and otherwiſe, he had gotten thirtie luſtie yong gentlemen of his owne coſins and kindred, and one hundred horſſemen; as alſo three hundred footmen and bowmen of the beſt and choſen men in all Wales: all which were in a readineſſe to go with him. And as ſone as the ſhipping for them was readie, and the wind ſeruing, he and his coſin Meilerius, with all the ſaid companie tooke the ſeas, and ſhortlie after arriued in twentie barks vnto (1) Waterford.

At the verie ſame time the townеſmen of Waterford, being in a verie great rage and furie againſt the Engliſhmen there, were fullie minded and determined to haue killed them all whereſoeuer they could find them. But when they ſaw theſe barks comming in with their flags, hanging to their top maſts, which to them were vnknowne, they were aſtonied at their ſo ſudden comming, and their deuiſes were daſhed. Reimond forthwith entered the towne with all his companie; and when all things were quieted and appeaſed, he & the earle went from thenſe vnto Werford, with all their force and ſtrength, leauing behind one (2) Prercll or Purcell his lieutenant at Waterford. But he verie ſhortlie minding to follow after the earle, tooke a boat, and as he paſſed ouer the riuer of the Sure, the maiſter of the boat and his companie which were townеſmen of Waterford, ſlue this Purcell, and thoſe few whom he had then attending vpon him. Which murther when they had thus done, they returned to the citie, and there without all pitie or mercie, ſpared neither man, nor woman, nor child; but ſlue as manie as they could find in the ſtreets, houſes, or anie other places. Howbeit the citie it ſelfe was ſafelie kept by ſuch as were then in Reinolds tower, who draue the traitors out of the citie, as alſo in the end compelled them to yeeld and ſubmit themſelues, and to intreat for peace, which they hardlie obteined, both with an euill credit and harder conditions.

But Reimond ſtill mindfull of the promiſe made vnto him, and he languiſhing vntill the ſame were performed, would not depart from out of Werford, vntill meſſengers were ſent to (3) Dublin to fetch and bring his louer Baſilia to (4) Werford to be maried vnto him. Which being done, and he maried, they ſpent all that daie and night in feaſtings & paſtimes. And as they were in their moſt iollitie, newes was brought vnto them, how that Rothorike prince of Connagh had deſtroied, waſted, & ſpoiled all Meth, and was entred into the borders of Dublin. Where-vpon Reimond on the next morrow, ſetting apart and giuing ouer all wedding paſtimes, muſtereth all his ſouldiors, and without anie delaiengs marcheth towards the enimies. But Rothorike who had before tried his valiantneſſe, and experimented his force, hearing of his comming, and not minding to trie or abide the ſame, retireth backe, and getteth him to his owne home and countrie. Then Reimond recouereth againe all thoſe countries, and forthwith cauſeth all the forts and caſtels then before pulled downe and defaced, to be now reedified and repared, as alſo the caſtels of Trim, and of Dunlences in Meth, of which Hugh Tirell was before the conſtable, and for want of reſcue and helpe compelled to leaue and forſake them. And thus by the means of Reimond, all things being recouered and reſtored to their former and priſtine eſtate, the whole land for feare of him continued a good time in peace and reſt.

vpon

(1) There is great varietie in ſuch bookes and examples as I haue, and which I do follow in this point: ſome writing that Reimond did not land at Waterford, but at Werford; and the tumult there being appeaſed, he went from thenſe vnto Waterford, and brought the earle vnto Werford. Some write againe (as is aforeſaid) that he landed at Waterford, and not at Werford: but hauing ſaluted the earle, appeaſed the tumult, and ſet all things in order, he conducted the earle and the whole armie ouer land vnto Werford. Although there be ſome variance in the exemplars, yet concerning the ſubſtance of the hiſtorie it is not materiall.

(2) There is alſo a varietie in the exemplars of this name; ſome write Fricellus, and ſome Pricellus, and ſome Pircellus, or Purcell; it is like to be Purcell, for they of that name were ſeruitors in this conqueſt, and for their good ſeruice they were rewarded with lands and territories, and who are yet remaining about or neere the citie, and in the countie of Waterford.

(3) It is certeine that this Baſilia abode at Dublin, but whether ſhe were there married or at Werford it is doubted. Some hold opinion, that Reimond after that he had met and alſo ſaluted the erle, they forthwith hearing the countries in Leinſter, and eſpeciallie about Dublin to be in an vprore, marched thither ſtraitwaie without anie ſtaie. And there Reimond as a luſtie ſoldior in his armor married the ladie Baſilia, and they iſſued with aduantage vpon the enimie. But the writer of beſt credit ſaith that the marriage was at Werford.

The ſecret practiſe of Herueie againſt Reimond.

Chap. 4.

BVt Herueie ſeeing the honor and credit of Reimond dailie to increaſe more & more, and he much grieued therewith, deuiſeth all the meanes he can how to ſtop and hinder the ſame: and forſomuch as he could not compaſſe the ſame by anie open attempt, he practiſeth it ſecretlie, and by ſecret deuiſes. Wherfore he is now a ſuter to marrie the ladie Neſta, daughter to Maurice Fitzgerald, and couſine germane to Reimond; that vnder the colour of this new affinitie, alliance, and vnfained friendſhip he might take Reimond in a trip. Well, his ſecret deuiſes being to himſelfe, and no ſuch thing ſuſpected or miſtruſted as he vnderwent, he by his earneſt ſute obteineth this gentlewoman, and marrieth hir. And Reimond alſo to make friendſhip on all ſides to be the more ſtrongly procured that Aline the earls daughter was married to William eldeſt ſon of William Fitzgerald. And to Maurice Fitzgerald himſelfe, who was latlie come out of Wales, there was giuen the halfe cantred of Ophelan, which he had before of the kings gift, as alſo the caſtell of Guindoloke: and Meilerius becauſe he was the better marcher had the other halfe cantred. But the cantred of land which was neareſt towards Dublin, and which the king had once giuen vnto Fitzſtephans, was now beſtowed vpon the two Herfords.

The obteining of the priuilege at Rome.

Chap. 5.

IN this meane time the king, though he were in great troubles, & much vnquieted with the wars, yet was he not vnmindfull of his realme of Ireland, as alſo of the orders made and deuiſed at the councell of Caſhill, for the redreſſe and reformation of the filthie and looſe life of the Iriſhrie. And therevpon ſent his ambaſſadors vnto Rome to pope Alexander the third, of and from whom he obteined certeine priuileges, and vnder his authoritie; namelie, that he ſhould be lord ouer all the realme of Ireland; and by his power and authoritie they to be reduced and brought to the chriſtian faith, after the maner and order of the church of England. This priuilege the king ſent ouer into Ireland by one Nicholas Wallingford then prior, but afterwards abbat of Malmeſburie, and William Fitzaldelme. And then being at Waterford, they cauſed an aſſemblie and a ſynod to be had of all the biſhops and clergie within that land; and then in the open audience of them, the ſaid grant and priuilege was openlie read and publiſhed: as alſo one other priuilege before giuen and granted by pope Adrian an Engliſhman borne, at the ſute of one John of Saliſburie, who was made biſhop of Barnoceus at Rome. And by this man alſo he ſent vnto the king for a token, and in ſigne of a poſſeſſion thereof, one gold ring, which togither with the priuilege was laid vp in the kings treaſurie at Wincheſter. The tenure of both which priuileges it ſhall not be amiſſe here to inſert. And concerning the firſt, theſe are the words thereof.

Two priuileges ſent from Rome to the king of England.

Adrian the biſhop, the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, to his moſt deere ſonne in Chriſt the noble king of England ſendeth greeting, and the apoſtolike benediction. Your excellencie hath beene verie carefull and ſtudious how you might inlarge the church of God here in earth, and increaſe the number of his ſaints and elects in heauen: in that as a good catholike king, you haue and do by all meanes labor and trauell to inlarge and increaſe Gods church, by teaching the ignorant people the true and chriſtian religion, and in aboliſhing and rooting vp the weeds of ſin and wickedneſſe: and wherin you haue and do craue for your better aid and furtherance the helpe of the apoſtolike ſee; wherein the more ſpeedilie and diſcreetlie you do proceed, the better ſucceſſe we hope God will ſend. For all they which of a feruent zeale, and loue in religion, do begin ſuch enterpriſe anie ſuch thing, ſhall no doubt in the end haue a good and proſperous ſucceſſe. And as for Ireland and all other Ilands where Chriſt is knowen, and the chriſtian religion receiued, it is out of all doubt, and your excellencie well knoweth, they do all appertaine and belong to the right of ſaint Peter, and of the church of Rome. And we are ſo much the more redie, deſirous, & willing to ſow the acceptable ſeed of Gods word, becauſe we know the time in the latter date ſhall be moſt ſeuerelie required at our hands. You haue (our welbeloued in Chriſt) aduertiſed and ſignified vnto vs, that you will enter into the land and realme of Ireland, to the end to bring them obedient vnto law, and vnder your ſubiection, and to rot out from among them their foule ſins and wickednesſe, as alſo to yéld and paie yérelie out of euerie houſe a yearelie penſion of one penie vnto ſaint Peter: and beſides alſo will defend & kéepe the rites of thoſe churches whole and inuiolate. We therefore well allowing and fauouring this your godlie diſpoſition & commendable affection, do accept, ratifie, and aſſent vnto this your petition: and do grant that you for the dilating of Gods church, the puniſhment of ſin, the reforming of maners, planting of vertue, and the increaſing of chriſtian religion, you do enter to poſſeſſe that land, and there to execute according to your wiſedome whatſoeuer ſhall be for the honor of God, and the ſafetie of the realme. And further alſo we do ſtrictlie charge and require that all the people of that land do with all humbleneſſe, dutifulneſſe, and honor receiue and accept you as their liege lord and ſouereigne, reſeruing and excepting the right of the holie church, which we will be inuiolably preſerued; as alſo the yérelie penſion of the Peter pence out of euerie houſe, which we require to be truelie anſwered to ſaint Peter, and to the church of Rome. Iſ therfore you do mind to bring your godlie purpoſe to effect, indeuor to trauell to reforme the people to ſome better order and trade of life: and that alſo by your ſelfe, and by ſuch others as you ſhall thinke meet, true, and honeſt, in their life, maners and conuerſation, the church of God may be beautified, the true chriſtian religion ſowed and planted, and all other things to be done, that by anie meanes ſhall or may be to Gods honor, and the ſaluation of mens ſoules: whereby you may in the end receiue at Gods hands the reward of an euerlaſting life, as alſo in the meane time, and in this life carrie a glorious fame, and an honorable report among all nations. The tenure and effect of the ſecond priuilege is thus.

vnto

Peter pence.

The ſecond priuilege.

Alexander the biſhop, the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, to his déerelie beloued ſon the noble king of England ſendeth gréeting, grace, and the apoſtolike benediction. Forſomuch as things giuen and granted vpon good reaſons by our predeceſſors, are to be well allowed of, ratified, and confirmed; we well conſidering and pondering the grant and priuilege, for and concerning the dominion of the land of Ireland to vs apertaining, and latelie giuen by Adrian our predeceſſor; we following his ſteps do in like maner confirme, ratifie, and allow the ſame: reſeruing and ſauing to ſaint Peter and to the church of Rome the yérelie penſion of one penie out of euerie houſe as well in England as in Ireland. Prouided alſo, that the barbarous people of Ireland by your meanes be reformed and recouered from their filthie life and abhominable converſation; that as in name ſo in maners and converſation they may be chriſtians: that as that rude and diſordered church by you being reformed, the whole nation alſo may with the profeſſion of the name be in acts and life followers of the ſame.

The titles of the kings of England vnto Ireland. Chap.6.

LEt then the enuious & ignorant ceaſe and giue ouer to quarrell, and auouch that the kings of England haue no right nor title to the realme of Ireland. But let them well vnderſtand that by fiue maner of waies, that is to ſaie, by two ancient titles, and three latter they haue to auouch and defend the ſame, as in our topography is declared. Firſt it is euident and apparent by the hiſtories of England, that Gurguntius the ſonne of Belin king of Britaine, as he returned with great triumph from out of Denmarke, he met at the Iles of the Orchades a nauie (1) of a certeine nation or people, named Baldenſes, now Baions, and thoſe he ſent into Ireland, appointing vnto them certeine guides and leaders to conduct & direct them thither.

Likewiſe the ſame hiſtories do plainlie witneſſe, that king Arthur, the famous king of Britaine, had manie of the Iriſh kings tributarie to him: & he on a time holding & kéeping his court at Weſtchéſter, Gillomarus king or monarch of Ireland, with other the princes thereof, came & preſented themſelues before him. Alſo the Iriſhmen came out of (2) Baion, the chiefe citie in Biſcaie. And forſomuch as men, be they neuer ſo frée, yet they maie renounce their right and libertie, and bring themſelues into ſubiection: ſo it is apparent that the princes of Ireland did frélie, and of their owne accord, ſubmit & yéld themſelues to king Henrie of England, & ſwore vnto him faith and loialtie. And albeit ſuch men of a kind of a naturall lightneſſe and inconſtancie, be not aſhamed nor afraied to denie and renounce their faith: yet that can not ſo releaſe and diſcharge them. Euerie man is at his owne choiſe and libertie how to contract and bargaine with anie one, but the ſame once made he can not fléet nor ſwarue from it. And finallie the holie pope, in whom is the effect of perfection, and who by a certeine prerogatiue and title requireth & claimeth all Ilands, becauſe by him and by his meanes they were firſt reduced and recouered to the chriſtian faith; he I ſaie hath ratified and confirmed this title.

(1) The hiſtorie is this, that Gurguntius the ſon of king Belin made a viage into Denmarke, there to appeaſe the people, who were then vp in rebellion againſt him: and hauing preuailed and ouercommed them, he in his returning homewards by the Iles of the Orchades, there met him a fléet or a nauie of thirtie or (as ſome ſaie) three ſcore ſailes of men and women latelie come and exiled from out of that part of Spaine, called then Baldenſis, whereof Baion was the chiefe citie, but now it is a part of the countrie of Gaſcoigne, whoſe capteine named (as ſome write) Bartholomew, did preſent himſelfe before Gurguntius, and diſcourſing vnto him the cauſe of their trauels, beſought him to conſider of their diſtreſſe, and to grant vnto them ſome dwelling place, and they would become his ſubiects. Which their requeſt the king granted, and taking their oth of allegiance ſent and cauſed them to be conducted into Ireland, where as his ſubiects they remained and continued.

(2) Theſe people were named Iberi, & before that they came to ſéeke vnto Gurguntius for a land to dwell in, they dwelled in that part of Spaine, whereof Baion is the metropole, which is now part of Biſcaie, and this countrie before and long after the time of Gurguntius, was ſtill ſubiect to the kings of Britaine, now called England.

The rebellion of Donald prince of Limerike, and of the taking of the citie of Limerike. Chap.7.

IN the meane while, Donald O Brin prince of Limerike waxed verie inſolent, and nothing regarding his former promiſe and oth made to the king, began & did withdraw his fealtie and ſeruice. Whereupon Reimond muſtering muſtering his armie, gathered and picked out the beſt and luſtieſt men which he had. And hauing twentie and ſix gentlemen, three hundred horſſemen, and three hundred bowmen and footmen in readineſſe and well appointed, about the kalends of October marched towards Limeriſke to aſſaile the ſame. When they came thither, the riuer of the Shenin, which inuironeth and runneth round about the citie, they found the ſame to be ſo deepe and ſtikle, that they could not paſſe ouer the ſame. But the luſtie yong gentlemen who were greedie to haue the preie, but more deſirous to haue the honor, were in a great agonie and greefe, that they were thus abarred from approching to aſſaile the citie. Whereupon one (1) Dauid Welſh ſo named of his familie and kinred, although otherwiſe a Camber or a Welſhman borne, and nephue vnto Reimond, who was a luſtie and valiant yong ſoldior, and a verie tall man aboue all the reſt, was verie hot and impatient, that they ſo long lingered the time about nothing. Whereupon hauing a greater regard to win fame and honor, than fearing of anie perill or death, taking his horſſe and putting his ſpurres to his ſides aduentureth the water, which being verie ſtikle and full of ſtones and rocks was the more dangerous: but yet he ſo wiſelie marked the courſe of the ſtreame, and ſo aduiſed and guided his horſſe, that he paſſed the riuer, and ſafelie recouered the further ſide: and then he cried out alowd to his companie, that he had found a ford: but for all that there was neuer a one that would follow, ſauing one Geffreie.

But they both returning backe againe to conduct ouer the whole companie, the ſaid Geffreie, his horſſe being caried awaie with the violence of the ſtreame, they were both drowned. Which when Peilerius (who was alſo come thither) did ſee, he began to fret with himſelfe, partlie for that his couſine & kinſman of ſo noble an enterpriſe had ſo bad a ſucceſſe: partlie alſo diſdaining that anie ſhould atchiue to honor but himſelfe. Whereupon being mounted vpon a luſtie ſtrong horſſe, ſetteth ſpurre to his ſide, and being neither diſmaied with the ſtikleneſſe and danger of the water, nor afraied with the miſhap fallen to the gentleman, who was then drowned, more rathlie than wiſelie aduentureth the riuer & recouereth the further ſide & banke. The citizens ſome of them watching & meeting him at ỳ waters ſide, & ſome of them ſtanding vpon the towne wals faſt by the riuer ſide, minding and meaning to haue driuen him backe againe, or to haue killed him in the place, hurled ſtones a good pace vnto him. But this noble and luſtie gentleman, being thus ſharpelie and hardlie beſet in the middle of perils and dangers, his enimies on the one ſide hardlie aſſailing, and the riuer on the other ſide ſtopping and cloſing him vp from all reſcue, ſtandeth to his tackle, and as well as he could couering his head with his ſhield, defendeth and ſaueth himſelfe from his enimies. Whileſt they were thus bickering there was great ſhowting and noiſe on both ſides of the water. But Reimond being then the generall of the field, and in the rereward, knowing nothing hereof, as ſoone as he heard of it, came in all haſt through the campe vnto the waters ſide. Where when he ſaw his nephue on the other ſide, to be in the middle of his enimies, and like to be vtterlie caſt awaie and deſtroied vnleſſe he had ſome ſpeedie helpe and ſuccour, was in a marueilous griefe & agonie, & verie ſharplie crieth and calleth out to his men, as followeth.

(1) This Welſh was ſo called, the ſame being the name of his familie and kindred, and not of the countrie of Wales, wherein he was borne. He was a worthie gentleman, and of his race there are yet remaining manie good and worthie gentlemen, who are chieflie abiding in the prouince and citie of Waterford: for there were they firſt planted.

The oration and ſpeech of Reimond vnto his companie, and of the recouerie of the citie of Limerike.

Chap.8.

Ye worthie men, which of nature are valiant, and whoſe proweſſe we haue well tried, come ye awaie. The waie heretofore not knowne, and the riuer hitherto though not paſſable, by our aduentures a ford is now found therein: let vs therefore follow him that is gone before, and helpe him being now in diſtreſſe. Let vs not ſuffer, nor ſee ſo worthie a gentleman, thus for our common cauſe and honor oppreſſed, to periſh and be caſt awaie before our eies and in our ſights for want of our helpe, and by meanes of our ſluggiſhneſſe. It is no time now to vſe manie words, nor leiſure ſerueth to make manie ſpeeches. The ſhortneſſe of the time, the preſent neceſſitie of this noble gentleman, & the ſtate of our owne honors vrgeth expedition, & requireth haſt. And euen with theſe words he put ſpurres to the horſſe, and aduentureth the riuer: after whome followed the whole companie, euerie one ſtriuing who might be formoſt. And as God would they paſſed all ſafe ouer, ſauing two ſouldiors and one gentleman named Guido, who were drowned. They were no ſooner come to land, but that their enimies all fled and ran awaie, whome they purſued, and in the chaſe ſlue a number of them, as alſo entered and tooke the towne. And hauing thus gotten both the citie and the victorie, they recouered their ſmall loſſe with great ſpoiles & riches, as alſo reaped great honor and fame.

Now reader, which of theſe three thinkeſt thou beſt valiant, and beſt worthie of honor? Him who firſt aduentured the riuer, and taught the way? Or him who ſeeing the loſſe of his companion, the perill of the riuer, and the multitude of the enimies, did yet (not fearing death nor perill) aduenture himſelfe in the midle of his enimies? Or him who haſtilie ſetting all feare apart, did hazard himſelfe and all his hoaſt to ſaue the friend, and to aduenture vpon the enimie? And this one thing by the waie is to be noted, that on a tueſdaie Limeriſke was firſt conquered, on a tueſdaie it was againe recouered, on a tueſdaie Waterford was taken, on a tueſdaie Werford was gotten, and on a tueſdaie Dublin was wone. And theſe things came not thus to paſſe, as it were by a ſet match, but euen of a common courſe of fortune, or by Gods ſo appointment. And it is not altogither againſt reaſon, that martiall affaires ſhould haue good ſucceſſe vpon Mars his daie.

A note concerning tueſdaie or the daie of Mars.

The deſcription of Reimond.

Chap.9.

Reimond was a man big bodied and broade ſet, of ſtature ſomwhat more than meane, his haire yellow and curled, his eies big, greie, and round; his noſe ſomwhat high, his countenance well coloured, pleaſant, and merie. And although he were ſomewhat groſſe bellied, yet by reaſon of a certeine liuelineſſe which was in him, he couered that fault: and ſo that which ſeemed to be a blemiſh in his bodie, he couered with the vertue of his mind. He had ſuch a ſpeciall care of his men and ſoldiors, that he would be a ſpie ouer his watchmen, and in his trauell that waie he watched manie whole nights, ranging and walking abroad in the camps. And in this he was verie happie & fortunate, that he would would neuer or verie seldome laie violent hands vpon anie, of whom he had charge or were vnder his gouernement, although he had rashlie or vnaduisedlie ouerthrowne himselfe, & straied out of the waie.

He was verie wise, modest, and warie, being nothing delicat in his fare, nor curious of his apparell. He could awaie with all wethers, both hot and cold; and indure anie paines: he was also verie patient, & could verie well rule his affections. He was more desirous to doo good to such as he gouerned, than to be glorious of his gouernement: for he would shew himselfe more like to be a seruant than a maister. Finallie and to conclude, he was a verie liberall, wise, gentle, and a circumspect man. And albeit he were a verie valiant capteine, and a noble soldior: yet in all martiall affaires, he passed and excelled in wisedome & prouidence. A man doubtles in both respects much to be praised and commended: hauing in him whatsoeuer apertained to a valiant souldior, but excelling in all things belonging to a good capteine.

The description of Meilerius.

Chap. 10.

MEilerius was a man of a browne hew and complexion, his eies blacke, his loke grim, and his countenance sowre & sharpe, and of a meane stature; his bodie for the bignesse verie strong, broad brested, & he was small bellied. His armes and other limbs more sinewous than fleshie, a stout and a valiant gentleman he was and emulous. He neuer refused anie aduenture or enterprise which were either to be done by one alone, or by mo; he would be the first that would enter the field, and the last that would depart from the same. In all seruices he would either haue the garland or die in the place, and so impatient he was in all exploits, that he would either haue his purpose, or lie in the dust: and so ambitious and desirous he was to haue honor, that to atteine therevnto, there was no means nor mild thing but that he would suerlie haue the same either in death or in life: for if he could not haue it and liue, he would suerlie haue it by dieng. And verelie both he and Reimond haue béen worthie of too too much praise and commendation, if they had bæne lesse ambitious of worldlie honors, and more carefull of Christes church, and deuout in christian religion, whereby the ancient rights thereof might haue bæne preserued and kept safe and sound: and also in consideration of their so manie conquests and bloudie victories, and of the spilling of so much innocent blood, and murthering of so manie christian people, they had béene thankefull to God, and liberallie contributed some good portion for the furtherance of his church and religion. But what shall I saie? It is not so strange but much more to be lamented, that this vnthankefulnesse euen from our first comming into this land, vntill these presents, this hath bæne the generall and common fault of all our men.

The commendation and praise of Robert Fitzstephans, and of his cousins.

Chap. 11.

WHat shall we speake or saie, how well Robert Fitzstephans and his sonnes haue deserued? What of Maurice Fitzgerald? What shall I saie of Robert of Barrie, a man verie honest and valiant, whose worthie commendations by the premisses are to be knowne? What shall be said of Miles of Cogan, the nephue vnto Fitzstephans and Maurice, who as he came ouer with the first, so in commendation and for his seruice deserueth to be the chéefe and first? What shall we saie of Robert Fitzhenrie, & the brother vnto Meilerius, who if he had not so soone bæne dead and cut, he would doubtlesse haue béene nothing behind his brother? What shall we speake of Reimond of Bantune & of Robert Barrie the yonger, they both were verie worthie, tall, handsome, and worthie men? What also shall be said of Reimond Fitzhugh, who although he were but of a little stature, yet for his honestie & prudence not to be forgotten? These thrée lastlie spoken of for their valiantnesse and prowesse done in the parties of Desmond, deserue great honor and commendation, and great is the pittie that through too much hardinesse their daies were so shortened, and their time so cut off? What did also a number of our gentlemen of the same their kindred & cousenage deserue, whose noble acts were such, and deserued such a perpetuall fame and memorie, that if I had a hundred tongs, a hundred mouthes, and so manie voices of yron; yet could I not vtter and at full declare their worthinesse and deserts. O kindred, O nation, which in double respects art noble! for of the Troians by a naturall disposition thou art valiant, of the French nation thou art most expert and skilfull of armes and chiualrie. O worthie nation and kindred! which of thy selfe art sufficient and able to haue conquered anie nation, if enuie and malice had not maligned at thy worthinesse. Well then Reimond had taken order for the kéeping of the citie, and had well vittelled the same, he left therein a garison of his owne men, fiftie gentlemen, two hundred horsemen, and two hundred bowmen; ouer whome he appointed Miles of S. Dauids his cosine to be leiutenant: and so as a noble conqueror he safelie returned into the borders of Leinster. But sée the nature of enuie, who neuer ceaseth to persecute vertue. For Heruie of Mount Maurice, notwithstanding by meanes of the late affinitie he were thought to be a good frend, yet could he not forget his old malicious mind and wicked deuises: for still he secretlie from time to time sent his messengers and letters to the king of England, and full vntrulie did aduertise the state, euent, and successe of all things, affirming that Reimond contrarie to the kings honor and his owne allegiance, had determined to haue assumed and chalenged vnto himselfe not onelie the citie of Limerike, but also the whole land of Ireland. And to make this the more probable, and himselfe of more credit, he aduertiseth that Reimond had placed and appointed garrisons for the purpose; and had sworne the whole armie to obserue certeine articles by him prescribed, to the great prejudice of the king. Which his aduertisment being interlined with manie good words, the king so credited the same, that he beléeued it to be most true: for as it is well séene, a little suspicion of an iniurie done or offered to be done vnto a prince, doth more sticke in his mind, than manie benefits and good seruices before done. The king therefore after the winter following, sent ouer foure of his seruants in message to Ireland; namelie Robert Powre, Osbert of Herloter or Herford, William Bendeger, and Adam of Gernemie: of which, two of them to come awaie and to bring Reimond with them, and the other to tarrie and remaine behind with the earle.

The description of Heruie.

Chap. 12.

AS we haue of others, so let vs also now make and set forth the description of Heruie. He was of stature a tall and a comelie man, his eies graie and somewhat big, amiable of face and pleasant of countenance, an eloquent man, hauing a long and a round necke, his shoulders someſomewhat low, his armes and hands ſomthing long, he was broad breſted, but ſmall in waiſte, though the ſame being big in others is thought to be commendable, his bellie was ſomewhat big and round, his thighes, legs, and feet being well proportionated and anſwerable to his bodie; of ſtature he was indifferent. But as in bodie he was well beſet & compact, ſo on the contrarie, his mind, life, and conuerſation were corrupt & diſordered. For euen from his childhood he was giuen to lecherie, being readie and forward to performe in wanton & filthie actions, whatſoeuer liked him or anie others, who were of the like diſpoſition: and therefore he forbare neither inceſt nor edulteries, nor anie other ſuch like filthineſſe. Beſides, he was a priuie and an enuious accuſer, and a double man, vncerteine, vaine, and altogither vnconſtant, ſauing in inconſtancie; a verie ſubtill man and a deceitfull: vnder his tong he had both milke and honie, but both of them were mixed with poiſon. He was ſometimes in great proſperitie, and all things fell out according to his owne deſire; and ſuddenlie fortune turning hir wheele, he had ſuch a fall, that he did neuer recouer the ſame againe. He was ſometimes a verie good ſoldior, and had good experience in the feats of wars, after the maner vſed in France; but he was ſo ſuddenlie altred & changed, that he became more ſkilfull in malice than valiant in proweſſe, more full of deceit than renowned in honor, more puffed vp in pride than endowed with worthip, more haſtie than happie, and more full of words than abounding in truth.

The ſuccouring of the garriſon at Limerike.

Chap. 13.

KEimond hauing receiued the kings determination by the foreſaid foure meſſengers, prepared all things in a readineſſe for his paſſage ouer accordinglie, and nothing wanted therevnto but onelie a weſt wind. But before the ſame happened, meſſengers came from the garriſon at Limerike, aduertiſing that Donold prince of Thomond had beſieged the citie round about with a great armie, and that their vittels which they had in the towne, aſwell that which they found at their comming thither, as alſo what ſo euer was elſe prouided, were all ſpent and conſumed; and therefore requeſted that they might with all ſpeed be reſcued and holpen. The earle, who was verie ſorie & penſife for theſe newes, and deuiſing all the waies he could to helpe them, cauſed a muſter to be taken of all his ſouldiers; who were ſo greeued for the going awaie and departure of Keimond, that they vtterlie denied and refuſed to go and to ſerue that waie, vnles Keimond were their capteine and lieutenant. Whereupon they toke aduiſe with the kings meſſengers what were beſt to be done in this diſtreſſe. At length it was thought beſt, that Keimond ſhould take the enterpriſe in hand; and he though verie loth, yet at the requeſt of the earle and the foreſaid gentlemen, yeelded himſelfe to that ſeruice, and marched forth toward Limerike, hauing with him foure ſcore gentlemen of ſeruice, two hundred horſmen, & three hundred archers, beſides Morogh of Kencile, and Donold of Oſſorie, and certeine other Iriſhmen, who ſerued and attended him. And as he was marching and comming toward Caſhill, tidings was brought him that the prince of Thomond had raiſed his ſiege and was comming towards him to meet him, and was now come to the paſſe of Caſhill: which paſſe although naturallie of it ſelfe it were verie ſtrong, yet by meanes of new trenching, plaſhing of trees, and making of hedges, it was made ſo ſtrong, that no horſmen could either enter or paſſe through the ſame.

The oration of Donold to his ſoldiers, the recouerie of the citie of Limerike.

Chap. 14.

KEimond being now almoſt come to the place where his enimies laie, diuided his hoaſt or armie into three parts or companies, and determined to giue the onſet or aduenture. Whereupon Donold prince of Oſſorie, who was a mortall enimie to the prince of Thomond, and now verie deſirous that ſome good exploit ſhuld be done; and beholding the Engliſhmen now alſo ſet in good araie, for though they were but few in number in reſpect of the others, yet they were piked men, valiant and couragious: he alſo to incourage them, to ſhew themſelues like valiant men, vſeth and maketh theſe ſpeeches vnto them. Yee worthie, noble, and valiant conquerors of this land, you are this daie valiantlie to giue the onſet vpon your enimies, which if you do after your old and accuſtomed maner, no doubt the victorie will be yours; for we with our ſpars, and you with your ſwords, will ſo ſharplie them purſue, as they ſhall verie hardlie eſcape our hands, and auoid our force. But if it ſo fall out, which God forbid, that you be ouerthrowne and haue the worſſe ſide: be you aſſured that we will leaue you and turne to our enimies, and take part with them. Wherefore be of good courages, and looke well to your ſelues, and conſider that you are now far from anie fort or place of refuge, and therefore if you ſhould be driuen to flee, the ſame will be long and dangerous to you: as for vs yee may not truſt vnto vs, for we are determined to ſticke to them who ſhall haue the victorie, and will purſue and be on the backs of them who ſhall flee and run awaie; and therefore be no longer aſſured of vs than whileſt yee be conquerors. Meilerius who had the fore ward, hearing theſe words, being warmed with the ſame, ſuddenlie like a hurling and a bluſtering wind entered into the paſſe, pulled downe the faſtneſſe, and brake downe the hedges, and ſo made waie, with no ſmall ſlaughter of the enimies, whereby the paſſe was recouered and the enimies ouercome. And they then marched without perill vnto Limerike, where they entered the third daie in the Eaſter weeke, being on tueſdaie. And as the firſt conqueſt of Limerike was vpon a tueſdaie, ſo was the ſecond alſo, where for a time they ſtaied, and reſtored all things by the enimies before ſpoiled, & ſet the ſame in good order. The enimies finding themſelues to be too weake, and that it was better to bow than to breake, practiſe to haue a parlee and a communication with Keimond: & in the end the meſſengers of Rothorike king of Connagh, and of Donold of Thomond, did obteine the ſame; and a parlee was appointed for them both, which was in one daie, but not in one place; for Rothorike of Connagh came by boates vpon the riuer of Shenin, as far as the great logh of Dirigid, & there ſtaied. And Donold not far from thenſe kept himſelfe and his companie in a certeine wood. But Keimond choſe a place not far from Killalo, which is about ſeauentéene miles from Limerike, and in the midle betweene them both. The parlee betweene theſe continued a prettie while, but in the end both kings ſubmitted & yelded themſelues, gaue hoſtages, made fealtie, and were ſworne to be true from thenſe forth for euer, to the king of England and to his heires.

Theſe things thus done and concluded, Keimond returneth in great triumph and ſolitie vnto Limerike. And by and by there came meſſengers vnto him from Dermon Mac Artie prince of Deſmond, praieng and requeſting him to aid and helpe him, being the king of Englands faithfull and leige man against his eldest sonne Cormon Mechan, who went about to driue and expell him out of his land and dominion: & promised him good interteinment both for himselfe and for his souldiors for the same. Reimond nothing refusing the offer, and verie desirous of honor, taketh aduise of his frends and companions; and by all their consents, the iorneie towards Corke was liked. Whereupon Reimond displaieth his banner, and marcheth thitherwards, and taketh by the waie great preies and boties of neat, cattell, and other things: of the cattels he sent a good portion backe vnto Limerike for vittelling of that citie; & in the end he conquered the whole countrie, subdued the rebellious sonne, and restored Dermon the prince to his estate and right. And thus by reason of Reimond Mac Artie, he was restored and recouered, who otherwise had beene in vtter despaire, and out of all remedie. And now to recompense his son Kormach, who before this, by waie of a peace and an intreatie, both vniustlie & guilefullie had taken and imprisoned him, he to acquite guile with guile, and the like with the like, toke his sonne and cast him into prison, and not long after smote off his head.

The death of the earle Strangbow.

Chap.15.

WHilest these things were thus adoing in Desmond, there came a messenger in all hast from Dublin, with letters to Reimond from his wife Basilia, the effect whereof the messenger knew not. These letters Reimond forthwith deliuered to a familiar frend of his to read them vnto him secretlie, and apart from all others, the tenure of them was as followeth. To Reimond hir most louing lord and husband, his owne Basilia wisheth health as to hir selfe. Know yee my deere lord that my great chæketoth, which was wont to ake so much, is now fallen out; wherefore if yee haue anie care or regard of me, or of your selfe, come awaie with all speed. Reimond hauing considered of this letter, did by the falling of the toth sullie coniecture the death of the earle, for he laie verie sicke at Dublin before his comming awaie from thense. But he being thus deceased, which was about the kalends of June, they at Dublin did what they could to keepe the same secret, for feare and in doubt of the Irishmen, vntill that Reimond were come with his band of souldiers vnto them. Reimond himselfe forthwith returned vnto Limerike: and notwithstanding he were verie sorrie and much greeued with this newes, yet dissembling the same, and bearing it out with a good countenance, would not nor did vtter or disclose it to anie bodie, sauing to a few wise and discreet men of his familiars and trustie councellors. And then vpon good aduise and deliberation had among them, it was concluded and agreed vpon, that forsomuch as the earle was dead, and that Reimond also was to depart awaie ouer into England; that the citie of Limerike which was so farre remoted and in the middle of manie enimies, should for the time be left, and the garrison to be conducted and brought from thense into Leinster, for the defense and safe keeping of the townes and forts vpon the sea coasts. There Reimond full much against his will yelded to this their aduise and counsell, being much greeued that hauing taken paines to recouer the citie of Limerike, he was now neither able to keepe it himselfe, nor yet had any to leaue behind him, who would take charge vpon him. But at length he sent for Donald prince of Thomond, being the kings baron & sworne subiect, and vnto him he committed the custodie and charge of the citie: who forthwith pretending all truth and fidelitie was contented therewith; and did not onelie put in hostages, but also toke a corporall oth, and was solemnlie sworne for the safe keeping and the restitution of the same at the kings will and pleasure, as also in the meane time to keepe the peace.

The ladie Basilias letter to hir husband Reimond.

Then Reimond and all his companie departed and went awaie: but they had not so soone passed ouer the one end of the bridge, but that the other end was forthwith broken downe, euen at their heeles; and the citie which was well walled, defended and vittelled, was set on fire in foure sundrie parts, which they saw and beheld with no small greefe of mind. The false traitor then openlie shewing and teaching what credit was to be giuen thenceforth to the Irish nation, who so wickedlie, impudentlie, and perfidiouslie did periure themselues. The king of England not long after, being aduertised hereof, is said to haue thus said: Noble was the enterprise in the giuing of the first aduenture vpon the citie, but greater was the rescuing and recouering thereof againe: but it was onelie wisedome, when they left and forsoke it. Reimond then returned vnto Dublin with his whole garrison in safetie, and then the erle, whose corps by his commandement was reserued vntill Reimonds comming, was buried in the church of the Trinitie at Dublin, before the rood there, by the apointment of Laurence the archbishop, who did execute all the funerall seruices and obsequies.

The comming of William Fitzaldelme and others ouer into Ireland.

Chap.16.

THese things thus doone, the kings messengers vpon these new changes and chances were to take new aduises; and hauing throughlie debated the state of the countrie, and the necessitie of the time, they thought it best and did conclude that Reimond should tarie behind, and keepe the countrie in good staie and order; but they themselues to returne backe to the king. Who accordinglie prepared themselues, and at the next westerlie wind then following, they toke shipping and passed ouer into England; and being landed, did in post and with all the hast they could, make their repaire vnto the king; vnto whom they declared the death of the earle, & all other things concerning the state of that land. The king then vpon aduise and deliberation had in this matter, sent ouer William Fitzaldelme, with twentie gentlemen of his houshold, to be his lieutenant, & ioined John de Courcie in commission with him, who had attending vpon him ten men. Likewise Robert Fitzstephans and Miles Cogan, who had noblie serued him in his wars two yeares, were also sent with them, hauing twentie men attending vpon them. These assone as they were arriued, and come to land, and Reimond hauing vnderstanding of the same, assembleth his companie and soldiors, which was a companie well beseene, and marcheth towards Wexford, and there in the confines or marches of the same he met Fitzaldelme and the rest of his companie, whom he verie louinglie saluted and imbraced: and forthwith according to the kings pleasure, he yelded and deliuered vp vnto Fitzaldelme, then the kings lieutenant, all the cities and townes, as also all such hostages as he had within that land.

Fitzaldelme when he saw and beheld so iolie and lustie luſtie a companie about Reimond, and well marking alſo Metlerius, and others the nephues of Reimond, about the number of thirtie perſons, mounted vpon their horſſes, verie luſtie and braue, and well beſeene in like armor, with their ſhields about their necks, and their ſtaues in their hands; courſing vp & downe after their maner about the fields. He enuied thereat, and turning backe to his men, ſaid ſecretlie vnto them; I will ſhortlie cut off this pride, and quaile this brauerie. Which in the end it partlie ſo came to paſſe, for both he and all the reſt which followed him in that office, did as it were by a ſecret conſpiracie, enuie and maligne at Reimond, Metlerius, Fitzmaurice, ſonnes to Fitzſtephans, and all other of their race and kindred. For this was alwaies the lucke and fortune of this kindred and familie.

In all ſeruices of warres they were then the foremoſt, and had in beſt price, and in all martiall affaires they were the beſt and moſt valiant men: but when there was no ſuch ſeruice in hand, and no need of them, then were they contemned and no account was made of them; but by a ſecret malice they were abaſed, reiected and refuſed. And albeit great was their malice, yet was their nobilitie ſo honorable and great; that by no meanes, do what they could, was the ſame to be extirpated or rooted out. For euen at this date, ſuch good ſucceſſe hath their noble beginnings had, that their offſpring hath euer ſince (1) continued in that land, in much honor, force and power. And to ſaie the truth, who perſed the force of the enimies in that land? Euen the Geraldines. Who did beſt keepe & prefer the land in ſafetie? The Geraldines. Who made the enimies to go backe & be afraid? The Geraldines. Who be they which for their good deſerts are moſt maligned and enuied at? The Geraldines. Suerlie, if it had pleaſed the prince to haue conſidered of them, according to their deſerts and worthineſſe; no doubt the whole ſtate of Ireland long yer this had béene quieted and eſtabliſhed. But cauſeleſſe were they alwaies had in ſuſpicion, & their worthineſſe ſtill had in gelouſie: and they put in truſt, as in whome was neither valiantneſſe of ſeruice, nor aſſuredneſſe of truſt. But yet ye worthie and noble men, who for to atteine to honor, haue not béene afraid of death; and for to obteine fame and renowme, haue not eſtéemed your ſelues; be not diſmaid, though ye be vncourteouſlie conſidered, and without your deſerts diſdained and maligned at: but go ye onwards, and proceed in your wonted ſteps of vertue. And if my pen can go according to worthineſſe, I ſhall be happie, and receiue the guerdon of vertue & immortall fame: for vertue cannot faile nor die, but either in this life or in the life to come, or in both, ſhall haue his iuſt reward and deſert. And albeit your valiant ſeruice and worthineſſe, either by the ſlackenes of the king, or by meanes of other mens ſecret and enuious practiſes, haue not béene hitherto conſidered nor rewarded: yet ſhall not I faile, with my pen to publiſh, and in my writings to remember the ſame. And therefore ſhrinke not now, neither do you giue ouer to labor and trauell from daie to daie to grow and increaſe in honor, fame and renowme. For the memortall thereof (farre ſurpaſſing all the treaſures in the world) for a time through malice maie be couered, but neuer ſuppreſſed nor extinced: but as fire long hid, ſhall in the end breake out into great flames, and for euer remaine in perpetuall memorie.

A monſtrous man begotten vpon a cow.

About this time was borne in Gwendelocke a monſtrous man, begotten by a wicked man of that countrie vpon a cow, a vice then too common in that wicked nation. It had the bodie of a man, but all the extreame parts of an ore, for from the ankles of the legs and the wriſts of the armes, he had the hoofes of an ore, his head was all bald, ſauing a few ſmall & thin heares héere and there: his eies great, round and blacke, like an ore; noſe he had none but onelie two holes, ſpeake he could not but onelie bellowed like a cow. This monſter did dailie reſort vnto the houſe of Maurice Fitzgerald, about dinner times, and ſuch meate as was giuen him he would take in his hoofes, and put to his mouth, and ſo feed himſelfe, &c: but to returne to the matter. William Fitzaldelme, being now in high authoritie, and hauing the gouernement and charge of the land in his hands, marcheth along the ſea coaſts, and vieweth all the townes, forts and caſtels that wales: but for the inner countrie, the mounteines and hils vpon the maine land, and bordering vpon the Iriſhrie, he neither cared nor paſſed for the ſame: but yet miſliked not the welth and riches thereof. For being a verie grœdie and a couetous man, and eſpeciallie hungrie to haue gold and treaſure, whereof was good ſtore in that land, he grœdilie ſcraped and ſcratched togither whatſoeuer was to be gotten.

About this time, Maurice (2) Fitzgerald in the kalends of September died at Werford, whoſe death was lamented, & his departure bewailed of all the countrie. For whie, he was a verie graue & a valiant man, & who for his conſtancie, truth, courteſie & loue left not his like behind. After his death, William Fitzaldelme ſent for the ſonnes of the ſaid Maurice, and ſo dealt with them, that he neuer left them, vntill by one means or other he had craftilie gotten from them the caſtell of Guendoke. Howbeit afterwards he gaue them Fernes in exchange: which albeit it were in the middle of their enimies, yet like luſtie and couragious gentlemen, they builded there a ſtrong caſtell, which they kept & inhabited maugre all their enimies. Walter Almane, ſo called in name, and not for that he was either in nature or ſtature an Almane, being nephue to William Fitzaldelme, was made ſeneſchall of Werford; who nothing degenerated from the maners & conditions of his vncle, but was one who was a corrupt man in all his actions & doings, being couetous, proud, malicious and enuious. And ſuerlie it is commonlie ſéene, that there is none lightlie worſe, than when a beggerlie raſcall from nothing, and from a baſe eſtate, is aduanced to wealth, credit and eſtimation. For ſuch a one alwaies doubting and miſtruſting all things, ſuppreſſeth all things, & thinking all things to be lawfull for him to do, vſeth all extremities at his will and pleaſure. There cannot be (I ſaie) a worſe beaſt, than when a cruell raſcall and proud begger is raiſed to eſtate, and made a ruler ouer his betters.

This Walter entered into acquaintance with Morogh prince of Kencile, and by him being corrupted with great bribes, did what he could to procure the vtter deſtruction of Reimond, and all his foreſaid couſins and kinſmen. And to begin the execution of their practiſes, the foreſaid William firſt toke awaie from Reimond all his lands about Dublin, and about Werford. And whereas he receiued letters of commandement from the king, to reſtore vnto Fitzſtephans a cantred of land which he had in Dhelan, he being well bribed, detracted and lingered the execution thereof: but yet in the end appointed and aſſigned vnto them other places which were further off and remoted; and the ſame the more perillous, becauſe they were in the middle of the enimies.

(1) It is verie true, that theſe Geraldines euen euer ſince haue continued in this land of Ireland, and did dailie grow and increaſe to much honour: there being at this inſtant two houſes aduanced to the titles of earledoms, and ſundrie to the eſtates of barons. And ſo long as they continued in the ſteps of their anceſtors, they were not ſo honourable as terrible to the Iriſh nation: but when they leauing Engliſh gouernment, liked the looſe life of that vperous nation, then they brought in coine and liuerie, and a number of manie other Iriſh and diueliſh impoſitions, which hath beene the ruine of their honour, the loſſe of their credit, & in the end will be the ouerthrow of all their houſes and families.

(2) This Fitzgerald was buried, and yet lieth in a monaſterie of Greie friers without the walles of the towne of Werford, which houſe is now diſſolued, and the monument of his buriall almoſt deſtroied: there wanting ſome good and worthie man to reſtore the ſame againe. He deſerued well of his prince and countrie: and therefore lamentable it is, that in ſo vnkind a countrie no one good man is to be found, that of ſo worthie a knight will not reſtore ſo worthie a monument.

The deſcription of William Fitzaldelme.

Chap. 17.

THis Fitzaldelme was a groſſe and corpulent man, as well in ſtature as in proportion, but of a reaſonable height; he was verie liberall and courtlike. And albeit he were of great courteſie, and would giue to anie man much honour and reuerence, yet was the ſame altogither with wiles and guiles: for vnder honie he gaue venem, and his ſugred words were mingled with poiſon. And as a venemous ſerpent couered with greene leaues, he with an outward ſhew of courteſie couered his mindfull trecherie. For to the outward ſhew he was liberall and courteous, but inwardlie full of rancor and malice. In countenance pleaſant, but in a ſtinking breaſt was hid a ſtinking vapor: outwardlie as meeke as a lambe, but within as wilie as a fox: carieng vnder ſweet honie moſt bitter venem. His words as ſmoth as oile, and yet indeed they were deadlie ſtrokes: whome he honoured and reuerenced this daie, he would either ſpoile or deſtroie the next daie. A cruell enimie againſt the weake and feeble, and a flatterer vnto the rebell and nightie: gentle to the wild and ſauage, and courteous to the enimie; but extreame to the good ſubiect, and cruell to the humble; and by that means he was not feareſull to the one, nor truſtie to the other. A man full of flatterie, and yet altogither craftie and deceitfull. He was alſo much giuen vnto wine and to women. He was a greedie couetous man, and an ambitious flatterer, being altogither bent to the one and the other.

(1) This William was the ſonne of Aldelme father to Burke erle of Kent (as ſome ſaie) and his ſon Richard was ſent into Ireland, and there greatlie aduanced: and of him (being lord of Connagh) deſcended the burgeſſes called Clanricards, who were the beſt blood of the foreſaid Richard, and theſe do yet remaine in Connagh, of whom is the earle of Clanrike now liuing.

How Iohn de Courcie inuadeth Vlſter.

Chap. 18.

IOhn Courcie, who (as is before ſaid) was ioined in commiſſion with William Fitzaldelme, when he ſaw the courſe and maner of his dealings, who as he was couetous, and did nothing but for monie; ſo was he timerous, and did all things in craft and deceit: as alſo that the enimie feared him not, and the good ſubiect loued him not. And conſidering alſo that the ſouldiers and garriſon at Dublin, by means of their capteins couetouſneſſe were vnpaid of their wages, and by reaſon of his ſlouth and ſluggiſhneſſe the victels ware ſcant, & none went & ſcouted anie more abrode as they were wont to get anie booties or preies, he ſecretlie dealeth with ſome of them, and by his wiſe conference, and wittie perſuaſions, allureth and inticeth vnto him euen ſuch as were the valianteſt, honeſteſt, and choſen men of them all: who were content and verie glad to accompanie and follow him. And hauing ſo gotten into his companie two and twentie gentlemen, and about three hundred others, he boldlie entreth and inuadeth into the prouince of Vlſter, a countrie which hitherto had not tried the force and ſtrength of the Engliſh nation. And then was fulfilled the prophecie of Merlin Colodine (as is ſaid, howbeit I will not ſo affirme it) A white knight ſitting vpon a white horſe, bearing birds in his ſhield, ſhall be the firſt which with force of armes ſhall enter and inuade Vlſter.

A prophecie of Merlin fulfilled.

This John Courcie was ſomewhat of a browne colour, but therewith ſomewhat whitiſh, and at that time he rode vpon a white horſe, as alſo did beare in his ſhield three painted (1) birds. After that he had paſſed three daies iourneie through the countrie of Vriell, he came the fourth daie (being the kalends of Februarie) to the citie of (2) Dowme, without anie reſiſtance of the inhabitants thereof: he being an enimie and a gheſt vnlooked for. And (3) Odonell then the ruler of that countrie, being aſtonied and amazed at their ſo ſudden comming, fled awaie. The ſouldiers which before their comming from Dublin were halfe pined with famine, and hunger ſtarued, hauing now recouered great booties and preies of neat and cattels, were full and well refreſhed.

At this verie preſent time, there was come thither out of Scotland a legat from Rome named Vtutanus, & he toke great pains to intreat & make a peace betweene Odonell & John de Courcie, vſing all the perſuaſions that he could, affirming that if he would depart and go awaie, there ſhould be a yearelie tribute paid to the king of England: but all his words anailed nothing. Odonell ſeeing that words could little anaſle, aſſembleth all the forces of the countrie: and within eight daies hauing gotten about ten thouſand ſouldiors, with force inuadeth, & with great courage commeth to enter & breake into the citie of Dowme. For in Ireland, as it is commonlie alſo in all other lands, they which inhabit in the north, are more warlike and cruell than anie others in other parts. John Courcie ſeeing the courſe and bent of the enimies, who not onelie vpon a hope and confidence of their great multitude againſt ſo few enimies; but alſo their valiant and couragious minds, who were fullie determined to inuade the citie: thought it better with his ſmall companie (which though they were but few in reſpect of their aduerſaries, yet they were ſouldiors valiant, couragious, and of good ſeruice) to iſſue out and aduenture the fight with them, than to be pinned & ſhut vp in a beggerlie ward made with turffes in a corner of the citie, and there for want of victels to be famiſhed. Wherefore he iſſued out and ioined the battell with them, where the fight was hot, the bowes a farre off on the one ſide, and the darts on the other ſide: then lance againſt lance, and the bill againſt the ſpar, and the ſword againſt the ſkeine: who buckled ſo luſtilie the one againſt the other, that manie a man fell that daie to the duſt. And in this terrible fight and buckling, he that had ſeene how valiantlie each man ſhewed ſhewed himſelfe, and ſpecſallie how John Courcie moſt valiantlie with the ſtroke of his ſwoꝛd mangled manie a man, killing ſome, but wounded and maimed manie, would and muſt nèds haue commended him foꝛ a right woꝛthie, noble, and right valiant warꝛioꝛ.

A prophecie of Colon fulfilled.

(1) He glueth thꝛée birds as this authoꝛ ſaith, which by heralds are thus blaſoned. Argent thꝛée griphs oꝛ geires gules crowned gold: this griph oꝛ geire is a kind of an eagle, but ſuch as is rauenous, and fæ-deth moꝛe vpon carren than vpon anie foule of his owne pꝛeieug: & foꝛ his cowardneſſe carieth neither the name noꝛ pꝛaiſe apperteining to the true eagle.

(2) Dowue is a towne lieng in the Ards, which is in Vlſter, a pꝛofitable and a fertile ſeate: it is the ſeé of the biſhop of that dioceſſe, who beareth his name of the ſaid towne, being called the biſhop of Dowue.

(3) The Latine woꝛd is Dunlenus, which I do find to be Engliſhed Dunell, which is the name of a great familie oꝛ nation in the pꝛouince of Vlſter; but whether this Latine be trulie ſo interpꝛeted, I refer it to the reader, oꝛ ſuch as be expert in ſuch Iriſh names.

The commendation of Roger Power, and the victorie of Iohn de Courcie, and of the propheſies of Colodine.

Chap.19.

IN this fight there was manie a woꝛthie man, which valiantlie acquited himſelfe: but if it might be ſaid without offenſe, there was no one man who did moꝛe valiant acts than (1) Roger le Power, who albeit he were but a yoꝛng man and beardleſſe, yet he ſhewed himſelfe a luſtie, valiant, & couragious gentleman; & who grew into ſuch good credit, that afterwards he had the gouernment of the countrie about Leighlin, as alſo in Oſſoꝛie. This fight was verie long & doubtfull, each partie manfullie defending themſelues, and none pælding the one to the other. But as the common pꝛouerbe is, be the daie neuer ſo long, yet at the length it ringeth at euenſong: ſo likewiſe this fierce, long, and cruell fight had his end, and the victoꝛie fell to John de Courcie, and a great multitude of the enimies were ſlaine in the field, as alſo vpon the woars of the ſeas as they were fléeing and running awaie. Then was fulfilled the old pꝛopheſie of Colodine the Iriſh pꝛophet, who foꝛeſpeaking of this battell ſaid, that there ſhould be ſuch a great bloudſhed therein of the Iriſh people, that the enimies perceiuing them ſhould wade vp to the knées in bloud. Which thing came ſo to paſſe; foꝛ the Engliſhmen perceiuing them and killing them vpon the woars, the ſame were ſo ſoft, that with the weight of their bodies they ſunke downe vp to the hard knées oꝛ twiſels, and ſo the bloud fléeting and lieng vpon the woars, they were ſaid to be therein vp to the knées.

A pꝛopheſie of Colon fulfilled.

The ſame man alſo (as is ſaid) did wꝛite that a poꝛe ſtranger, and one come out from other countries, ſhould with a ſmall power come to the citie of Dowue, and againſt the will of the gouernoꝛ thereof ſhould take the ſame. Manie other things alſo he wꝛote of ſundꝛie battels to be waged, and of the euents thereof, which were all fulfilled in John de Courcie. This booke the ſaid John had, and he ſo eſtæmed the ſame, that ſtill he had it about him, and in his hands; and did manie times, yea and foꝛ the moſt part diꝛect his doings by the ſame. It was alſo wꝛitten in the ſame booke, that a yoꝛng man with foꝛce and armes ſhould bꝛeake and enter in thꝛough the wals of Waterfoꝛd, and conquer the ſame with the great ſlaughter of the townſmen: moꝛeouer, that the ſame man ſhould come to Werfoꝛd, & from thenſe to Dublin, where he ſhould enter in without anie great reſiſtance; & all theſe things (as is apparant) were fulfilled in earle Richard. Likewiſe he wꝛote in the ſame booke, that the citie of Limerike ſhould be twiſe left and foꝛſaken by the Engliſhmen: but the third time it ſhould be kept, which thing came ſo to paſſe. Foꝛ firſt (as is beforе wꝛitten) Reimond had it and gaue it ouer: the ſecond was, when the king had giuen the ſame to Philip de Bꝛuſe, foꝛ he being bꝛought thither by Fitzſtephans, and Miles Cogan, to take and enter into the ſame, and being come to the riuer ſide of Shenin foꝛ the ſame purpoſe, was there vtterlie diſcoꝛaged to pꝛoceéd anie further, and ſo without anie thing donе, leaueth the ſame as he found it, and came backe againe; as hereafter in his place it ſhall be ſhewed. And thus (accoꝛding to this vaticine) twiſe it was left, but the third time it ſhall be kept.

But this is to be implied and meant of Hamon de Valognes the iuſticiarie there apointed; in whoſe time the ſaid citie being vnder his gouernment, was by treacherie and treaſon deſtroied, and ſo foꝛſaken and left; but afterwards recouered by Meilerius: euer ſince which time it hath remained and bèene kept in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſhmen. Well then to the battels of John de Courcie, firſt he had the victoꝛie in two notable battels oꝛ fights at Dublin; the one in Feburarie, and the other in Julie: in which he hauing but a ſmall companie of men, fought againſt fiftéene hundꝛed of his enimies, of whome he ſlue and ouerthꝛew a great number, and had the victoꝛie. The third was at Ferlie about the taking of a pꝛeie, where by reaſon of the ſtreits & narrow paſſes, he was too much and euerie eſtſones ouerſet by the enimies, and ſo had the woꝛſe; ſome of his men being killed, and ſome ſcattered and diſperſed abꝛoad in the woods and fields, ſo that he had ſcant eleuen perſons left with him. And notwithſtanding that he had thus loſt his men and hoꝛſſes, yet was he of ſuch a valiant mind and courage, that with thoſe few which were left, he went thꝛough his enimies, and in ſpite of them all trauelled two daies and two nights on foot in their armour without meat oꝛ dꝛinke thirtie long miles, vntill he was paſt danger, & ſo came ſafelie vnto his owne caſtell againe. The fourth battell was at Vriell, where manie of his men were killed and manie fled. The fift was at the bꝛidge of Yuoꝛ, after and vpon his comming from out of England, and yet therein he had the victoꝛie and conqueſt. So in thꝛée battels he had the victoꝛie, but in two he receiued both the loſſe and hurt; and yet in them did moꝛe annoie the enimie, than was hurted himſelfe.

(1) The race & iſſue of the Powers hath euer ſince and yet doth remaine in Ireland, who nothing degenerating from this their anceſtoꝛ, haue foꝛ their part ſhewed themſelues valiant and men of good ſeruice, foꝛ which they haue bèene honoꝛablie rewarded, and are now barons and peeres of the realme. Their habitation and dwelling is in the pꝛouince oꝛ countie of Waterfoꝛd, and not far from the citie of Waterfoꝛd.

The deſcription of Iohn de Courcie.

Chap. 20.

THis Iohn de Courcie was white and pale of colour, but verie fierce and arrogant, he was ſinowous and a verie ſtrong made man, verie tall and mightie, and of a ſingular audacitie: and being from his verie youth bent

bent to the wars proued a verie valiant ſouldior. He would be the firſt in the field and formoſt in the fight; and ſo ambitious and deſirous he was of honor, that were the enterprize neuer ſo perillous, and the ſeruice neuer ſo dangerous, yet he would giue the aduenture. And albeit he were the generall or capteine, yet letting the prioritie thereof apart, he would be as a common ſouldior, and ſerue in the place of a priuat ſeruitor; and manie times being more raſh than wiſe, and more haſtie than circumſpect, he had the worſt ſide and loſt the victorie. And although in ſeruice he were thus forward, earneſt, and vehement; yet in time of peace and reſt he was verie ſober, modeſt, and altogither giuen and diſpoſed to ſerue God, and hauing the victorie of his enimies and good ſucceſſe in his affaires, he would aſcribe the honor vnto God, and be thankefull for the ſame. But as Tullius writeth, nature neuer made anie thing perfect and abſolute in all points. And ſo it appeared in this man; for through his too much pinching and ſparing, and by reaſon he was verie vncerteine and vnconſtant, his vertues (otherwiſe great, and deſeruing great praiſes and commendations) verie much imperiſhed and blemiſhed. He maried the daughter of Gotred king of Maine. And after that he had waged manie battels, and fought ſundrie times with his enimies, he at length had the maſterie and conqueſt ouer them: and then hauing brought the whole countrie to a good peace and reſt, he builded ſundrie and diuerſe caſtels throughout Vlſter, in ſuch meete and conuenient places as he thought beſt. And by the way this one thing me thinketh is verie ſtrange, that theſe three notable & the chiefeſt poſts of Ireland, namelie Herueie, Ketmond, and this John de Courcie, by Gods ſecret (but not vniuſt iudgement) neuer had anie lawfull iſſue. I might alſo ſay the like of Wellerius, who as yet hath no lawfull iſſue by his wife. Thus much hauing breeflie and by the waie ſpoken of the noble acts of Iohn de Courcie, and leauing the ſame vnto others to be more at large ſet forth and deſcribed, we will now returne againe to Dublin.

The three chiefe poſts of Ireland without iſſue lawfull.

The councell or ſynod kept at Dublin; of Viuian the popes legat, and of Miles Cogans iſſuing into Connagh.

Chap. 21.

IN this meane time, Viuianus the popes legat remained ſtill in Ireland, and held a ſynod at Dublin of all the clergie, in which he openlie confirmed and publiſhed the right which the king of England hath to the realme of Ireland, as alſo the popes ratification and confirmation of the ſame; commanding and charging euerie perſon, of what eſtate, degree, or condition ſoeuer he were, that vpon paine of excommunication he ſhould not denie his loialtie, nor breake his allegiance vnto him. And moreouer (1) forſomuch as the manner and cuſtome was among the Iriſhrie, that whenſoeuer anie goods, corne, or victels, were put and kept in anie church, no man would medle or deale to carrie the ſame awaie; yet neuertheleſſe, he gaue licence and libertie to all Engliſhmen, that whenſoeuer they went, or were to go in anie hoſting, and could not elſewhere be prouided of anie victels, that they might lawfullie take what they found in anie church: ſo that they left with the churchwardens, or ſuch as had the charge thereof, the true and iuſt value of ſo much as they tooke awaie. Theſe things thus done, Miles of Cogan, who was lieutenant of the bands of ſouldiors vnder William Fitzaldelme, as alſo conſtable of the citie of Dublin, he with 40 gentlemen, whereof 20 were vnder the conduct of Ralph the ſon of Fitzſtephans, as alſo his lieutenant, and they hauing with them 200 horſſemen & 300 footmen, paſſed ouer the riuer of Shenin, & inuaded Connagh, which hitherto no Engliſhman had aduentured. The Connagh men forthwith ſet on fire and burned all their townes, villages, and churches, as alſo all ſuch corne as they had in their haggards, and in their caues, and could not carrie with them. Likewiſe they toke downe the images and crucifixes, and hurled them abroad in the fields. Neuertheleſſe, the Engliſhmen marched onwards, till they came to the towne of Athomond, where they ſtaied eight daies togither; and finding the countrie forſaken of the people, and barren of victels, they returned backe againe ouer the Shenin: and by the waie they met with Rothorthe prince of Connagh, who laie in a wood neere the Shenin watching for them, and he had three great troops and companies with him of the beſt fighting men of Connagh. Betweene them there was a long and a cruell fight, in which Miles loſt but three of his owne companie, but manie of his enimies were ſlaine. Which done, he recouered ouer the riuer, & ſo came ſafelie to Dublin.

(1) This vſage and cuſtome is yet at this preſent obſerued, and euerie church in the countrie ſtuffed and filled with great cheſts full of corne, which the husbandmen do for ſafetie keepe therein: and this lieth ſafe at all times, euen in the verie warres among themſelues: howbeit the ſame is not ſo religiouſlie kept and obſerued in theſe daies as in times paſt.

How William Fitzaldelme is ſent from home into England, and Hugh de Lacie put in his place: and how Miles Cogan and Robert Fitz*ſtephans haue the kingdome of Corke* giuen vnto them.

Chap. 22.

WIlliam Fitzaldelme, who during his abode and being in this land, had done nothing worthie the commendation, ſauing that he cauſed the ſtaffe called Johns ſtaffe to be fetched from Armach, and brought to Dublin; he (I ſaie) and Miles Cogan, with Robert Fitzſtephans were ſent for by the king to come home. In whoſe roome the king ſent ouer Hugh de Lacie, and made him his deputie ouer the whole land, ioining in commiſſion with him Robert Power then ſeneſchall of Werford and Waterford. The king, after the returne of the aforeſaid Fitzaldelme and others, thinking and conſidering with himſelfe the good ſeruice of Miles Cogan, Robert Fitzſtephans, and others; as alſo how neceſſarie it were, that ſuch noble ſeruitors and valiant men were placed among the Iriſh people, wherby to keepe them in good order and dutifull obeiſance; he gaue to Robert Fitzſtephans, and to Miles Cogan in fee for euer to be equallie diuided betweene them all ſouth Mounſter (1) that is to ſaie, the whole kingdome of Corke, from the weſt part of the riuer at Leiſmore vnto the ſeas, ſauing and reſeruing the citie of Corke, and one cantred of land there vnto adioining. Alſo he gaue vnto Philip de Braoſe all the north Mounſter, that is to ſaie, the kingdome of Limerike, ſauing and excepting the citie of Limerike it ſelfe with one cantred ther vnto adioining, to haue vnto him and to his heires for euer in fee. Theſe men thus rewarded, confederated themſelues togither to ſome and helpe one another, and euerie of them maketh the beſt preparation that he can. Which being in readineſſe they tooke ſhipping and arriued into Ireland in the moneth of Nouember, and landed at Waterford: from thenſe they coaſted ſted along vnto Cozke, where they were receiued with much honoz both by the citizens, and alſo by an Engliſh gentleman named Richard of London, who was deputie there vnder Fitzaldelme.

As ſoone as they had pacified and quieted Dermon (2) Mac Artie prince of Deſmond, and the reſidue of the noble men and gentlemen in thoſe parties, Fitzſtephans and alſo Miles Cogan diuided betweene them the ſeauen cantreds, which were néereſt to the towne: foz theſe they kept and held in beſt peace and reſt. Fitzſtephans had the thzée cantreds which laie in the eaſt part, and Cogan had the foure which laie in the weſt, the one hauing the mozе becauſe they were the woꝛſer, and the other had the fewer cantreds that were the better ſoile and ground. The citie it ſelfe remained in their ioint gouernement, and the reſidue of the cantreds being foure and twentie remained in common, and the pzofits thereof growing they equallie diuided betweene them. A cantred both in Engliſh and in Iriſh is ſo much land as conteineth one hundzed villages, as is in our topographie declared, which is commonlie called an hundzed. Theſe things thus done, they bzing and conduct Philip de Bzuſe vnto Limerike. Fitzſtephans had with him twentie gentlemen & foztie hoꝛſſemen, Miles Cogan had twentie gentlemen & fiftie hoꝛſemen, Philip de Bzuſe had twentie gentlemen & thzée ſcoze hoꝛſſemen, beſides a great number of bowmen & ſotmen, which they all had when they were come to Limerike, which was about foztie miles from Cozke, & onlie the riuer of Shenin was betweene them and the citie: the ſame at their comming was ſet on fire befoze their eies by the citizens themſelues. Neuertheleſſe, Stephans and Miles offered to aduenture ouer the water, and to enter the towne; oz if Philip thought it ſo good, they would there build a caſtell vpon the riuers ſide right ouer againſt the towne. But Philip albeit he were a valiant and a good man, yet conſidering with himſelfe how dangerous the place was, being in the middle of the enimies, and farre remoted from all ſuccoꝛs and helpe, without which he was not able with his ſmall companie to defend and kéepe the ſame, as alſo being partlie perſuaded by the counſell and aduiſe of his companie, thought it better to returne home in ſafetie, than to dwell in the middle of his enimies in continuall perill and danger. And it is not to be much marueiled that in this iourneie he had ſo euill ſucceſſe: foz whie he had gathered & reteined to him the notableſt murtherers, théeues, & ſeditious perſons that were in all Southwales, and the marches of the ſame, and theſe were of beſt credit with him, and he moſt ruled by them.

What a cantred is.

About this time Amere duke Fitzſtephans ſon, a luſtie yong gentleman and a towardlie, died at Cozke in March, to the great ſoꝛrow and gréefe of all his frends. Neere about this time was found and ſeene a great tode at Waterfoꝛd, wherof was made much wondering, as is in our topographie declared.

Thzée eclipſes of the ſun in thzée yeres.

Alſo within the ſpace of thzée yeares there was ſéene thzée eclipſes of the ſun, howbeit theſe were not vniuerſall, but particular eclipſes ſeene onelie in the land. After that Fitzſtephans and Miles Cogan had quietlie and peaceablie gouerned and ruled the kingdome of Deſmond fiue yéres togither, and by their pzudence and modeſtie had reſtrained the haſtie foꝛwardneſſe, and raſh diſpoſition of their yong men, Miles and Rafe the ſonne of Fitzſtephans a luſtie yong gentleman, and who had maried Miles daughter, went toward Liſemoze, there to méet & to haue a parlée with Waterfoꝛd men: as they ſate in the fields waiting and loking foꝛ them, one Machture with whome they ſhould and had appointed to haue lien at his houſe the next night following, ſuddenlie and vnwares came ſtealing vpon them, and there traitoꝛouſlie ſlue them, and ſiue of their companie. By meanes whereof the whole countrie ſoꝛthwith was in an vpzoare, inſomuch that Dermon Mac Artie, and all the Iriſhzie in thoſe parties, as alſo the traitoꝛ Machture, were out: and denieng to be anie longer the kings loiall ſubiects, made wars againſt Fitzſtephans, who now once againe felt the courſe of foꝛtunes diſpoſition. And theſe ſo much annoied him, that he could neuer recouer himſelfe againe, vntill that his nephue Reimond, who ſucceéded him in the gouernement there, came and reſcued him: yet that notwithſtanding, he was neuer his owne man, neither could he be at a perfect peace and reſt.

And by the waie this is to be noted and conſidered, that as the noꝛtherne men be warlike and valiant; ſo are the ſoutherne men craftie and ſubtill, the one ſéeking honoꝛ, the other deliting in craft & deceit; the one valiant, the other wilie; the one of great courage, the other ſet all on treaſon and falſhood. But to the matter. When Reimond hard how foꝛtune frowned vpon his vncle Fitzſtephans, and what diſtreſſe he was in, being ſhut vp in the citie of Cozke, and his enimies aſſailing him round about, ſoꝛthwith aſſembleth his companie, and hauing in readineſſe twentie gentlemen, and one hundzed of ſotmen and bowmen, he taketh ſhipping at Werfoꝛd, and ſailing along the coaſts, maketh towards Cozke with all the haſt he can, that he might reléeue and comfoꝛt his friends, and be a terroꝛ vnto his enimies. And in the end hauing oftimes incountered with the enimies, ſome he killed, ſome he dzoue out of the countrie, and ſome he compelled (which was the greater number) to ſubmit themſelues and to ſue foꝛ peace: and thus in the end after great ſtoꝛmes and tempeſt followed a faire wether and a calme. Verie ſhoꝛtlie after Richard of Cogan, bzother vnto Miles, & nothing inferioꝛ vnto him in valiantneſſe, oꝛ anie other reſpect: came into Ireland with a ſtrong picked companie and choſen men, being ſent to the king to ſupplie his bzothers roome. Alſo in the end of the ſame winter, and in the moneth of Febzuarie (3) Philip Barrie nephue to Fitzſtephans, a verie honeſt and a wiſe gentleman, came ouer with a luſtie companie of choſen men, as well foꝛ the aid of his vncle, as alſo foꝛ the recouerie of his land in Olethan, which was perfoꝛce taken awaie (4) from Fitzſtephans, as alſo afterwards from Rafe Fitzſtephans ſonne. In the ſame paſſage alſo came Gerald an other nephue of Fitzſtephans, and bzother vnto Philip Barrie, who with his good aduiſe and counſell did verie much pleaſure and helpe both his vncle and bzother: foꝛ he was learned and a great traueller, in ſearching to learne the ſite and nature of that land, as alſo the firſt oꝛigine of that nation, and whoſe name the title of the booke beareth. About this time Herrie of Mont Moꝛis pzofeſſed himſelfe a monke in the monaſterie of the Trinitie in Canturburie, and gaue to the ſame in franke and pure almes all his patronages and impzopziations of all his churches, lieng by the ſea coaſts betweene Waterfoꝛd & Werfoꝛd, and ſo became a monke, & liued a ſolitarie life in a religious habit: who as he changed his habit, ſo would God he had changed his mind! & as he hath laid awaie his ſecular wæds, had caſt off his malicious diſpoſition!

(1) The gift which the king gaue vnto theſe two gentlemen of this countrie is yet extant vnder his bzoad ſeale, and was giuen by the name of the kingdome of Cozke, being bounded from the riuer which fléeteth by Liſemoze towards the citie of Limerike, vnto Knocke Bzendon vpon the ſeas on the weſt, to be holden of the king, and of his heires by thzée ſcoze knights fées. The citie it ſelfe without cantred of land land was reſerued to the king, ſauing that they two had the cuſtodie thereof. This kingdome in courſe of time for want of heires male of them, came to two daughters. The one of them was married to Carew and the other to Courcie, & they in the right of their wiues inioied the ſame during their liues; and after them their heires, vntill ſuch time as by a diuiſion growing amongeſt the Engliſhmen, the Iriſhrie expelled them, and recouered the countrie vnto themſelues.

(2) Theſe Mac Arties are yet remaining in the ſaid prouince of Corke, and they be now diſperſed into ſundrie families, but the chiefeſt of them is named Mac Artie More, and he in the time of king Henrie the eight was aduanced to the honor and degrée of an earle, being called the earle Clan Artie, which in common ſpéech by interpoſition of the letter C is pronounced Clancartie.

(3) In this point there is a varietie among the writers, ſome writing that Fitzſtephans ſhould take awaie the land from Philip Barrie, and giue it to his ſon Rafe; and to recouer this out of their hands, the ſaid Philip came ouer with ſuch power and force as he could make. Some write againe that the land after that it was giuen to Philip Barrie, he departing into England left it in the cuſtodie and charge of Robert Fitzſtephans, who when he liſted not or could not kéepe it anie longer, deliuered the cuſtodie thereof to his ſonne Rafe: who as his father ſo was he wearie to kéepe the ſame. And for that cauſe Philip Barrie minding to inioie, and to make the beſt thereof, with ſuch force and helpe as he had gotten, came ouer both to helpe his vncle, & alſo to fortifie & build holds & caſtels vpon his ſaid land, whereby he might be the better able to defend and kéepe the ſame: and this ſéemeth to be the truth of the hiſtorie.

(4) This Philip of Barrie, hauing ſeized vpon lands and poſſeſſions in Ireland, his poſteritie haue euer ſince continued in that land; and nothing degenerating from their firſt anceſtor, haue from age and to age béene noble and valiant gentlemen, and who for their fidelitie and good ſeruices, were aduanced to honour and made vicounts: and in that title of honor do continue ſtill. But would to God they were not ſo nuzled, rooted, and altogither ſeaſoned in Iriſhrie! the name and honor being onelie Engliſh, all the reſt for the moſt part Iriſh.

How Hugh de Lacie builded caſtels, and fortified in Leinſter and Meth.

Chap.23.

WHileſt theſe things were thus a doing in Deſmond, Hugh de Lacie a good and a wiſe man buildeth ſundrie caſtels both in Leinſter and Meth, and fortifieth the ſame verie ſtronglie: and among others he builded one at (1) Leighlin vpon the riuer of (2) Barrow beſids Oſſorie, a place naturallie of it ſelfe verie ſtrong, which place Robert Powre by the kings commandement had the charge of, vntill he gaue the ſame ouer and forſoke it. O what worthie champions and fit marchmen were this Powre & Fitzaldelme, to be ſent to dwell and rule in a nation, which is deſtituted and wanteth noble and valiant men! But a man maie ſée the courſe of fortune, who when ſhe is diſpoſed to ſmile, how ſhe aduanceth and raiſeth vp men from baſe eſtate to high degrées: for why, theſe two had more pleaſure in chambering and plateng the wantons with yong girls, and to plaie vpon a harpe than to beare a ſhield or ſtaffe, or to weare armour. And truelie it was to be maruelled, that ſo noble a prince could ſend ſuch cowards to beare rule, and haue authoritie in places of ſeruice. But to the matter. Hugh de Lacie being a verie wiſe man, all his care was to bring all things to a peace and quietneſſe: and therefore ſuch as were oppreſſed or driuen out of their lands and territories, he reſtored them, and with ſuch courteous behauiour and gentle ſpéeches he dealt with all men, that in a verie ſhort time he drew vnto him the hearts of the people, who deſirous to dwell vnder his gouernment, manured the grounds; which being then waſt and vntilled, was in ſhort ſpace full ſtored and fraughted both with corne and cattell. And then for the ſafetie of the people and defenſe of the countrie, he builded townes and erected caſtels in euerie place, made orders & eſtabliſhed lawes for the gouernment of the people. And by this it came to paſſe, that ech man inioied the labours of his owne hands, and euerie man liued in peace one with the other, and euerie bodie loued him, and he aſſured of all men. But hauing thus by his wiſedome, policie, and good gouernement recouered that nation to good conformitie and obedience, behold enuie (which alwaies maligneth vertue) he was had in a gealouſie and ſuſpicion, that his drift and policie was to appropriat the whole land to himſelfe, and as the lawfull king and monarch would crowne himſelfe king of Ireland. Which opinion was ſo receiued & falſe rumour ſo ſpred, that it was in a ſhort time caried into England; which when it came to the kings eares, you maie not thinke that he at all liked thereof, or could brooke the ſame.

(1) This Leighlin ſtandeth full vpon the riuer of Barrow, and it is a verie old & ancient caſtell called by the name of the Blake caſtell, a fort in thoſe daies verie ſtrong: it ſtandeth in the baronie of Odrone, which is the ancient inheritance of the Carews, who being barons of Carew in Wales, one of them married the daughter and heire of the baron of this Odrone, & ſo the Carews became & were for the courſe of ſundrie yeares, vntill in the troubleſome times, in king Richard the ſeconds time they were expelled, as all others or the moſt part of the Engliſh were. But being dwelling there, ſome one of them builded a religious houſe of Greie friers nære adioining to the ſaid caſtell, which being ſince diſſolued in king Henrie the eights time, the ſame fell into the kings hands, who made thereof a fort, and kept there a perpetuall garriſon, and thus was it diſſeuered from the baronie. There is alſo one other Leighlin diſtant from this about an Engliſh mile, where is the cathedrall church of that dioceſſe, and whereof the biſhop taketh his name being called the biſhop of Leighlin; but for difference ſake the ſame is called old Leighlin, and this other Leighlin bridge, by reaſon of a bridge builded of ſtone ouer the riuer at that place, and whereof the one end butteth vpon the foreſaid Blake caſtell.

(2) The Barrow is a goodlie and a notable riuer, hauing his head or ſpring in the hill called Mons Blandina or Slogh Blome, in which alſo are the heads or ſprings of the two other notable riuers Sure and the other Eoire. This Barrow kéepeth & hath his courſe through the countie of Ler, and paſſeth by the market towne of Athie vnto Carlow, and from thenſe vnto Leighlin, and ſo to Roſſe, a little aboue which towne it méeteth and ioineth with the Eoire, and they togither kéepe their courſe about ſix miles, vntill they méet with the Sure, which is nære vnto the late abbeie of Dunbrattie: and as they all do ſpring and riſe out of one mounteine, ſo after they haue taken their ſeuerall courſes, they meet togither and take one waie into the ſeas. They are all nauigable, and all a like replenished with ſundrie ſorts and kinds of fiſhes.

The

The deſcription of Hugh de Lacie.

Chap.24.

IF you will know what manner of man Hugh de Lacie was, you ſhall vnderſtand his eies were blacke and dæpe, and his noſe ſomewhat flat, and the right ſide of his face from the chin vpwards by a miſchance was ſhrewdlie ſkalled: his necke was ſhort, and his bodie hairie, as alſo not fleſhie but ſinewie and ſtrong compact; his ſtature was but ſmall, and his proportion deformed, but in conditions he was verie ſober, truſtie, and modeſt. He was verie carefull in his owne priuat matters, but in cauſes of gouernment and in all publike affaires he was moſt vigilant and carefull. And albeit he were a verie good ſouldier, and one of great experience in martiall affaires; yet in his ſundrie aduentures wherin he was ſometimes raſh and verie haſtie, he ſped not alwaies beſt nor had the beſt ſucceſſe. After the death of his wife he was ſomewhat loſe of life, being much giuen to women, of whom he made no great choiſe: he was verie greedie and couetous of wealth and poſſeſſions, but ouermuch ambitious of honour and reputation. At this time in Leinſter flouriſhed Robert Fitzhenrie brother vnto (1) Meilerius, who in his youthfull yeares was verie luſtie like the flower of the garden, which when the winter draweth and is cold, doth vade and wither awaie. Likewiſe (2) Alexander and Giraldus the two ſonnes of Maurice. And albeit Girald were a man but of meane ſtature, yet verie wiſe, ſober, and honeſt. Alſo Roger le Powre conſtable of Leighlin, Hugh de Lacie, and William le Powre ſeneſchall of Waterford, Robert Barrie the yonger ſonne of Philip Barrie, and both the Reimonds were of beſt fame and credit in theſe daies. About this time befell and happened the two ſtrange wonders at Fother in Meth, whereof we haue ſpoken in our topographie; namelie, of the woman violentlie and perforce abuſed in a mill by a ſouldier, and of the otes there ſtolen and caried awaie.

(1) Neſſa the daughter of the great Rheſus had three husbands, by the firſt named Henrie ſhe had a ſonne, who being named after his name, was named Fitzhenrie, who was father to Henrie, Robert, and this Meilerius.

(2) This ſame Neſſa had to hir third husband one Gerald of Windſore, and by him had iſſue hir fourth ſon named Maurice, who was father to William Gerald and this Alexander. This Gerald was a baliant and a noble gentleman, and who had wars againſt Rheſus the father of this Neſſa, and kept the towne and caſtell of Penbroke againſt him and all his force: but in the end after a peace concluded betweene them, he maried this ladie, and had worthie iſſue by hir.

How Hugh de Lacie vpon a vaine ſuſpicion was ſent for into England, and of his returne againe from thenſe.

Chap.25.

THe ſuſpicion conceiued of Hugh de Lacie dailie increaſed more & more, and as is before ſaid came to the kings eares, who as princes in ſuch cauſes was verie gelous, and could not like thereof, and therefore forthwith ſent for Hugh de Lacie by John conſtable of Cheſter and Richard Pet, whome he appointed to tarrie and ſerue in his place, & to be the gouernors or lords iuſtices of the land. But before he ſhould depart and go awaie, it was agreed by a common conſent, that there ſhould diuerſe caſtels and ſundrie forts be builded in Leinſter: for Meth was alredie meetlie well and indifferentlie fortified & incaſtelled. Firſt therefore they builded two caſtels in Fotheret of Dnolan, the one for (1) Reimond, and the other for Griffith his brother: the third was at (2) Treſſeldermont neere to Morroghs countrie for Walter of Ridenſford: the fourth for John (3) Clauill vpon the riuer of Barrow not far from Leighlin: the fift at Collach for John Herford. And as for Kildare, which with the countrie adioining was before by the earle in his life time giuen to Meilerius, was taken from him; & in exchange the countrie of (4) Ler was giuen to him, which was a wild and ſauage countrie, full of woods, paſſes, and bogs, and in the middle of the enimies, as alſo from anie ſuccour or reſcue: howbeit not vnfit for this ſuch a champion of Mars and ſo worthie a ſouldier.

These things being thus done in the ſummer time, Hugh de Lacie toke his paſſage ouer to England, and made his ſpeedie repaire to the kings preſence, where he ſo wiſelie and dutifullie behaued himſelfe, that the king not onelie was reſolued of his truth and fidelitie, but alſo putting eſpeciall confidence in him, he ſent him backe againe. And calling home the foreſaid John de conſtable and Richard Pet, made him his generall and deputie of the land, and toke aſſurance of him for his truth in this behalfe: howbeit he ioined in commiſſion with him one Robert of Saliſburie, who ſhould in the kings behalfe be a councellor and a truſtie aſſiſtant vnto him in all his doings. Now Hugh de Lacie being returned backe againe into Ireland, and there ſettled and placed, thinketh vpon his firſt deuiſes, how to fortifie the countrie and to keepe it in good order. And the more caſtels he builded, and the more Engliſhmen he did beſtow and place therein, the ſooner and better did he thinke to bring the ſame to paſſe and effect. Among manie caſtels therfore which he builded, he made one at Tachmeho in Ler, which he gaue to Meilerius, as alſo gaue him his neece to wife; alſo one caſtell neere to Abowie which he gaue to Robert Bigaret, and not farre from thenſe an other caſtell which he deliuered to Thomas Fleming. And not farre from thenſe he builded one other caſtell at the Norach on the riuer of the Barrow, which Robert Fitzrichard had: beſides in Meth he builded the caſtels of Dunach and of Kilaire, as alſo Adam Fuceport and Gilbert Nigents caſtels, and manie others, which were now too long to be particularlie repeted and recited.

Talke betweene a prieſt and a wolfe.

And about this time was that ſtrange talke and communication in a wood in Meth, betweene a prieſt and a wolfe, whereof we haue ſpoken in our topographie: which thing though it may ſeeme verie ſtrange & moſt incredible, yet the ſame is not to be diſcredited. For as S. Jerome ſaith, you ſhall find in ſcripture manie ſtrange things, & which to a mans iudgement ſhall ſeeme to be nothing true at all: and yet neuertheles they are moſt true. For nature cannot preuaile nor do anie thing againſt the Lord of nature: neither ought anie creature to contemne or ſcorne, but rather with great reuerence and honour to conſider the workes of God his creator. Not long after this king Henrie the yonger, the ſon of king Henrie the elder, being ſeduced & caried (the more was the pitie) by lewd and naughtie counſels, rebelled the ſecond time againſt his father, and had gotten vnto him the moſt part of the beſt noble men in all Poitiers, & the luſtieſt gentlemen in all France: beſides his brother Geffreie the earle of Britaine the chiefe author and cauſe of this rebellion, and manie others of his confederates. But in the end, by

Gods

Gods iust iudgement and vengeance for his vnnaturall ingratitude against his father, who though he were a verie valiant and a lustie gentleman, yet against death nothing can helpe, and so died about June at Marels to the great sorrow of manie. And verie shortlie after also the foresaid Geffrete, a noble and a valiant gentleman, & who for his worthinesse and prowesse might haue bene the sonne of Ulysses or Achilles, who now revolting the third time from his father, and rebelling against him, was by Gods iust iudgement about the kalends of August taken out of his life, and so died.

(1) Nesta the daughter of the great Rhesus prince of Wales had three husbands, the third of them was Gerald of Windsore, and these had to their first sonne William Fitzgerald the father vnto this Reimond, and Griffith.

(2) Tresseldermont is a castell about a fiue miles from Catherlough, & somtimes a verie faire towne and walled round about, and bordering nere to the baronie of Odrone. The English writers do saie that this castell was not builded in this Tresseldermont, but at Kilken, a castell about three miles from this, and both now belonging to the earle of Kildare. But the Latine bookes, which are of eldest writing and credit, and whom I do herein follow, do write it by expresse words, Tresseldermont.

(3) This castell of Clauill not far from Leighlin, is supposed to be that which is now called Carlough or Catherlough: howbeit the common fame of the countrie doth attribute this castell of Carlough to Eua the earls wife, and the ladie and heire of Leinster, and that she should build the same. But there appeareth no such things of hir doings, for by the course of the historie it is plaine, that the castels builded in Leinster were done by the Englishmen onelie, and for their defense and safetie.

(4) The countrie of Ler is parcell of Leinster, & lieth in the marches and extreame confines of the same by the west: it is verie strong and fast, being full of woods and bogs, and therefore a safe receptacle for rebels and outlawes. It is within the diocesse of Leighlin, and before now of late no shire ground, but inhabited by the Moores, who were alwaies rebels and traitors. But in hope to reforme the same it was made a countie of it selfe, by an act of parlement in the third and fourth yeares of Philip and Marie, and named the Queenes countie.

The death of Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and of Iohn Comin made archbishop in his place.

Chap.26.

In this meane time Laurence archbishop of Dublin died at the castell of Angiers in Normandie, about the kalends of December 1180. He was a (1) iust and a good man, but somwhat in displeasure with the king, who had him in suspicion bicause he was at the councell of (2) Laterane, and there inueighed much against the king of England and his honour; & for that cause in his returne homewards through Normandie was staied, and in the end there died, where he was buried in the high church of our ladie. After him Iohn Comin an Englishman borne, and a monke in the abbeie of Euenham, was by the kings means elected orderlie by the clergie of Dublin archbishop, and afterwards confirmed by pope Lucius at Viterbe, where he was also made a cardinall. A man he was verie well learned and eloquent, and verie zealous in causes of the church, wherein he would haue done verie much good, if that he had not bene too worldlie, & haue sought to haue pleased worldlie princes, and to haue bene in the kings fauour.

(1) This one thing is and was a common obseruation in the Romish church, that if anie one had receiued the charact thereof, that although he were neuer so rebellious, nor so great a traitor against his prince; yet the same was to be interpreted to be in defense of the holie church, and such a one was counted a godlie and a holie man, though by the scriptures he who resisteth his prince is said to resist God himselfe.

(2) The councell of Laterane is said to be one of the greatest synods or generall councels that hath bin, it was kept at Rome vnder pope Innocent the third An. 1204. Manie decrees were there made for the aduancing of the Romish antichrist: but yet the councell could not be brought to his full perfection by reason of the ciuill wars in Italie. But among other decrees this was concluded, that all controuersies betweene kings and princes, the correction thereof should apperteine to the pope: as also no man should be counted emperour, except the pope had admitted him and crowned him.

The comming of Iohn the kings sonne into Ireland.

Chap.27.

The king to aduance his yonger sonne named Iohn had giuen him the dominion ouer Ireland, and he thereupon had taken homage of sundrie persons for the same: and now minding to bring the same to a finall end & perfect order, sendeth ouer into Ireland before his sonne Iohn the new archbishop of Dublin, who as a forerunner vnto his sonne should prepare all things in readinesse against his comming, who forthwith toke his iournie about the kalends of August, and sailed ouer into Ireland. Also in the moneth of September then next following, he sent ouer Philip of Worcester, a valiant souldier, a sumptuous and a liberall man, with fortie gentlemen, who was commanded to send ouer (1) Hugh de Lacie, and he to staie there as gouernour of the land vntill Iohn his sonne came ouer. This Philip being thus placed in authoritie, the first thing he did he resumed and toke into the kings vse the lands in Ochathelie, and diuerse other parcels which Hugh de Lacie had before sold, and these he appointed to serue for the kings prouision and diet. And after the winter was past, he assembled and mustered all his men and companie, & began to trauell from place to place; and in March about the middle of Lent he came to (2) Armagh, where when he had extorted and perforce eracted from the cleargie there a great masse of monie and treasure, he returned vnto the citie of Downe, and from thense to Dublin in safetie: being well laden with gold, siluer, and monie, which he had eracted in euerie place where he came: for other good he did none. In this iournie there happened two strange miracles, the one at Armach concerning the great anguish and griefe of (3) Philip when he departed and went out of the towne, the other was of a (4) fornace which Hugh Tirell toke away from the poore priests at Armagh, as more at large is declared in our topographie.

Two strange miracles.

(1) This Hugh de Lacie albeit he were thus sent for, yet he went not ouer, as it appeareth by the course of the histories of this time: he was about building of a castell at Dernagh, and there being among his labourers, laboꝛers, and ſéeing one not to frame verie well in his woꝛke, taught him what he ſhould doo, taking his pickeax in both his hands and bꝛake the ground. This wicked Iriſhman when he ſaw his loꝛd and maſter thus ſtoping and labouring, ſuddenlie came behind him, and with his ax oꝛ weapon ſtrake him in the head and ſlue him, but his inheritance and poſſeſſions came & deſcended to his two ſonnes Walter and Hugh.

(2) In Ireland there are foure archbiſhopꝛikes, one at Dublin foꝛ the pꝛouince of Leinſter, another at Caſhill foꝛ the pꝛouince of Mounſter, the third at Thomond foꝛ the pꝛouince of Connagh, & the fourth at Armagh foꝛ the pꝛouince of Volſter. The chiefeſt of them is the archbiſhop of this Armagh, foꝛ although euerie one of the others be named a pꝛimat of Ireland, yet this one alone is named pꝛimat of all Ireland; which title he hath partlie bicauſe he is ſucceſſour to S. Patrike, who firſt conuerted Ireland to the chꝛiſtian faith, and had his ſee and church at this Armagh; one other cauſe is bicauſe this archbiſhop was the firſt that receiued a pall from the pope, This pall is a certeine inueſture of cloth, which the pope haloweth and giueth oꝛ ſendeth to euerie archbiſhop, who weareth the ſame vppermoſt vpon his garment. The nature of this pall, of the firſt inuention thereof and the cauſes whie it is giuen to euerie archbiſhop, is not incident noꝛ apperteining to the courſe and nature of this hiſtoꝛie, and therfoꝛe I will omit it. This Armagh was ſomtimes a faire towne, and therein a faire cathedꝛall church, lieng farre and remote from all good neighboꝛs, and in the middle of the Onels and other ſauage people; the ſame hath bæne and ſtill is and lieth waſt: and the archbiſhop remoued to a houſe of his named Terſeekam, which lieth neére the towne of Dꝛogheda, being a place of better ſafetie.

what the biſhops pall is.

(3) The hiſtoꝛie is, that this Philip of Woꝛceſter being well landed with great riches eracted from the cleargie and departed, he was no ſoner out of the towne, but that he was taken with a ſudden pang, which foꝛ the time was ſo vehement, that it was ſuppoſed he would neuer haue recouered it.

(4) This Hugh Tirell among other the ſpoiles which he toke, he had a great bꝛuing foꝛnace oꝛ pan which ſerued foꝛ the whole houſe, foꝛ which his doing the pꝛieſts curſſed him, and he caried this along with him vntill he came to the citie of Downe. And on a night he being in his lodging, the ſame was entred with fire, and the hoꝛſſes which dꝛew the ſaid pan, as alſo much goods which they bꝛought with them, and a great part of the towne was burned. In the moꝛning, when he ſaw the great ſpoile, and yet the ſaid pan as nothing hurt noꝛ periſhed, he began to repent and be ſoꝛie, and ſo reſtoꝛed the pan againe.

The comming of Heraclius the patriarch into England.

Chap.28.

WHile theſe things were doing in Ireland, Heraclius the reuerend patriarch of Jeruſalem, hauing gone a long iourneie from the eaſt to the weſt, came into England about the beginning of Febꝛuarie; who bꝛought with him the keies of the holie citie and ſepulchꝛe, with the kings enſigne and martiall ſigne, in the behoofe of all the ſtates of the holie land, as well of the bꝛethꝛen of th'oꝛder of the temple as hoſpitall: and with the conſent of all the cleargie and laitie, making ſupplication to king Henrie the ſecond, falling at his feet with teares, and humblie deſiring him, that he would be pitifullie moued to the aid of the holie land, and Chꝛiſtes patrimonie, deſperatlie afflicted by the infidels: otherwiſe affirming (which within two yeares happened) that the whole kingdome would fall ſhoꝛtlie into the hands of the Soldane of the Saracens and of Egypt. Oh what a gloꝛie was it to this king and kingdome, that he paſſing ſo manie emperours, kings and pꝛinces, as though there were no helpe in the middle part of the woꝛld, ſhould come into this coꝛner of the earth, & as it were into an other woꝛld to require aid! O how woꝛthie, perpetuall and incomparable had the kings gloꝛie bæne, if he ſetting aſide other buſineſſe, and foꝛſaking his kingdoms, had taken without delaie (at this calling of Chꝛiſt) Chꝛiſtes croſſe, and haue followed him! Merelie, he ſhould haue receiued of him the euerlaſting kingdome, if he had ſerued him in this neceſſitie of whom he receiued his kingdome, and ſo gloꝛious a grace of gouernement on earth. Oh if he would haue defended here (foꝛ his abilitie) the patrimonie of ſo woꝛthie a kingdome in this point of neceſſitie, and this triall of deuotion, he might haue bæne woꝛthilie foꝛtified in earth by ſuch a patrone and tutoꝛ in all his affaires and neceſſities whatſoeuer.

The anſwer of the king to the patriarch.

Chap.29.

A Daie foꝛ anſwer heroꝛ being appointed at laſt by the king at London, manie as well knights as of common ſoꝛt, by the admonithments of the patriarch, as the ſermons of Baldwin the archbiſhop were croiſed to the ſeruice of Chꝛiſt. At the laſt the patriarch receiued this anſwer of the king, that it was not good to leaue his realme without defenſe and gouernement, & leaue open his lands beyond ſea to the rapacitie of the Frenchmen that hated him: but as concerning monie, he would giue both that which he ſent thither, to be reſerued foꝛ him, and moꝛe alſo foꝛ the defenſe of the holie land. To whome the patriarch anſwered by following this aduiſe. O king you doo nothing: and by this meanes you ſhall neither ſaue your ſelfe, noꝛ reſerue Chꝛiſtes patrimonie. We come to ſéeke a pꝛince, and not monie. Euerie part of the woꝛld almoſt ſendeth vs monie, but none ſendeth vs a pꝛince. Therfoꝛe we deſire a man that may want monie, and not monie that may want a man. But, when the patriarch could get no other anſwer of the king, he taketh an other deuiſe: he deſireth him to giue to their aid one of his ſonnes, and if none other, yet his yongeſt ſonne John, that the bloud deſcending from the Aniowes might in a new bꝛanch raiſe vp the kingdome.

This was the ſaieng of Themiſtocles.

John himſelfe, albeit he was readie to paſſe into Ireland giuen him by his father, with a great armie, (pꝛoſtrating himſelfe at his fathers feet) deſired (as they ſaie) that he might be ſent to Jeruſalem, but he obteined it not. So the patriarch ſéeing he could doo nothing, and dꝛaw no oile out of the hard ſtone, hée ſpake thus againſt the king, in th'audience of manie, with a thꝛeatfull and pꝛopheticall ſpirit. O gloꝛious king, thou haſt reigned hitherto among the pꝛinces of the woꝛld with incomparable gloꝛie, and your pꝛincelie honour hath hitherto dailie increaſed to the type of highneſſe. But now doubtleſſe is this triall being foꝛſaken of God, whom you foꝛſake, and deſtitute of all heauenlie grace. From henſefoꝛth ſhall your gloꝛie be turned into ſoꝛrow, and your honoꝛ to repꝛoch ſo long as you liue. I would to God the king had auoided this thꝛeat by penance, like the king of Niniue, and had cauſed this ſentence to be altered!

The holie man ſpake this thing thrise, firſt at London, then at Douer, and laſtlie at Chinon caſtell beyond the ſea. And I would to God the patriarch had beene a man without that prophetical ſpirit, & had rather ſpoken a leſing, that we may for more euidence touch ſuch things briefly as were before ſpoken by that true forеſpeaker, which we ſaw ſhortlie to take effect. Whereas the king reigned thirtie and fiue yeares, thirtie years were granted him for worldlie glorie, expectation of his conuerſion, & triall of his deuotion; but the laſt fiue years fell vpon him, as vpon an vngratefull, reprobate, and abiect ſeruant, in reuengement, ſorrow, & ignominie. For in the two and thirtith yeare of his reigne, immediatlie after the comming of the patriarch, his firſt enterpriſe of ſending his ſonne John into Ireland, both the labour and coſt was fruſtrate and loſt. The three and thirtith yeare, whereas he neuer loſt land before, he loſt to king Philip (being but a child) almoſt all Anjou. The foure and thirtith yeere he loſt the caſtell Kader, and welneere all Berie. The fiue and thirtith yeare of his reigne, and the fourth yeere after the comming of the patriarch, not onelie king Philip of France, but his ſon Richard of Poitiers riſing againſt him, he loſt the cities of Towres and Maine, with manie caſtels, and himſelfe alſo; according to that in ſaint Gregorie: Thoſe that the Lord hath long forborne, that they might be conuerted, if they do not conuert, he condemneth them the more grieuouſlie.

The croiſing of kings.

Chap. 30.

But perchance the king was reſerued by heauenlie diſpoſition to the victorie of deſerued loue. How much greater is it to repare things caſt downe, than to vnderprop things likelie to fall? And who had knowne Hector, if Troie had continued in proſperitie? By ſo much as aduerſitie is more inſtant and vrged, by ſo much the glorie of valiantneſſe will ſhine the brighter. For by the ſecret iudgement of God, within two yeares after the victorie was giuen to the pagans and Parthians, againſt the chriſtians, either to reuenge the cold deuotion of the eaſt church, or to trie the deuout obedience of the weſterne men; the worthie Richard earle of Poitiers hearing this ouerthrow, toke deuoutlie the croiſure vpon him at Towres, giuing an example to other princes in that matter. Wherevpon the king of England, the earles father, and Philip king of France, who had bin before at variance (with Gods grace, and the archbiſhop of Towres perſuaſion) in that place and that houre, at their conference at Gutſors were croiſed, with manie other great men of the clergie and laitie. And as kings followed the example of the erle, ſo after their example the emperour Frederike, through the perſuaſion of the duke of Alba, with manie ſtates of Almane were croiſed in the lords court at Mentz. So as it is thought, the king of England being reſerued more than all other to the reſtoring of the decaied ſtate of the holie land, if he had finiſhed his life in this victorie; doubtleſſe that famous prophecie of Merlin Ambroſius had beene verified in him. His beginning (ſaith he) ſhall wauer with wild affections, and his end ſhall mount to heauen.

A prophecie of Merlin touching the king

The diſcord of the kings.

Chap. 31.

A ſudden diſcord roſe betweene the kings and that (which was worſe) betweene the father and the earle, through the working of the old enimie, & their ſinnes deſeruing the ſame, to the great hinderance of their noble enterpriſe: as though they being vnfit for it, the honor thereof was reſerued for other; or perchance according to the ſentence of Gregorie: Aduerſitie, which is obiected againſt good vowes, is a triall of vertue, and not a ſigne of diſpraiſe. Who is ignorant how haplie a thing it was that Paule was driuen into Italie, and yet he ſuffered ſhipwracke? But the ſhip of his heart was ſafe among the ſurges of the ſea. Likewiſe therfore as vertue is perfected in infirmitie, and gold tried in the fire: ſo the conſtancie of faith that cannot be crazed with tribulations, doth increaſe more as ſinapis; and the courage of the mind is more valiant againe than troublous aſſaults of fortune. O how much rather would I, that theſe kings accompanied with a few men acceptable to God, had taken vpon them this laborious, but yet a glorious iournete, than to war proud for the great wealth that they had gathered of manie people to this end. Read ouer the whole bible, and conſider theſe latter times, and you ſhall find, that victorie hath beene gained, not with force and humane power, but with Gods grace and ſtore of vertues. For as Caſſiodorus ſaith: An armed people without the Lord is vnarmed. And as Seneca ſaith, Not the number of the people, but the vertue of a few get the victorie. Of the foure before named, the emperour Frederike, albeit he was the laſt croiſed, yet in the execution thereof he was the firſt: whome therefore I account ſo much the more worthie of victorie in heauen, and glorie in earth, that he forſaking large kingdomes and his empire, delaied not out the matter.

A viſion and expoſition thereof.

Chap. 32.

Therfore I thought it not inconuenient to ſet downe a viſion, which he that hideth much from wiſemen & reuealeth it to babes viſited me withall, being a moſt ſimple and vile wretch. In the miſerie of this time, in that ciuill and deteſtable diſcord betweene the king and the erle of Poitiers, I being with the king at Chinon caſtell the ſeuenth ides of Maie: at night in my ſléepe about the cocke crowing, me thought I ſaw a great multitude of men loking vp into heauen, and as it were wondering at ſomewhat. So I lifting vp mine eies to ſée what the ſame was, I ſaw a bright light breake out betweene the thickeneſſe of the clouds, and the clouds being incontinentlie ſeuered aſunder, and the lower heauen as it were being opened, and the ſight of mine eies pearſing through that window to the empireall heauen, there appered the court thereof in great multitude, wide open as it were to be ſpoiled, all kinds of munition being bent againſt it. You might haue ſéene there a head cut from one, an arme from another, and ſome ſtriken through with arrowes, ſome with lances, and ſome with ſwords. And when manie of the beholders either for the brightnes, or terror, or pitie, had fallen flat on their faces: me thought that I (to ſée the end of the matter) did viewe it longer than the reſt. So they hauing gotten the victorie ouer all the other, the bloudie ſlaues fell vpon the prince of the heauenlie orders, ſitting in his throne as he was wont to be pictured, and drawing him from the throne on the right hand, hauing his breaſt naked, they thruſt him through the right ſide with their lances, and immediatlie there followed a terrible voice in this maner, Woch, woch, O Holi-ghoſt! But whether it came frō heauen, or was vttered by the people beneath, I can not tell; and ſo the terror of this voice & the viſion awakened me.

A ſtrange viſion.

I call him here to witnesse, to whome all things are apparant and manifest, that immediatlie as I sat in my bed, & reuolued these things in my mind, I was in so great an horror both of bodie and mind, for halfe an houre and more, that I feared least I should haue fallen besides my selfe. But recoursing deuoutlie to the onlie refuge of humane saluation, & blessing my forehead with the crosse effsones, & fortifieng my mind thereby, I passed the rest of the night without slèepe, & so through Gods grace returned fullie to my selfe: yet to this daie I can neuer remember that vision without horror. What may be more terrible to a creature than to sée his creator smitten through with weapons? What man without grèefe can abide to sée the seruants of God, & patrons of men to be murthered? Who can behold the Lord of nature to suffer, & doth not suffer therewith? What this vision portendeth, without prejudice to anie I will shew briefli.

The meaning of the foresaid vision.

He that suffered once in his owne person for all, giueth vs to vnderstand, that he now suffereth againe, but that in his flocke. And he that by triumphing ouer the crosse, and ascending to the right hand of his father, hath victoriouslie entered his kingdome; his enimies now go about to depriue him of his kingdome, and subuert his church, which he gathered vnto him by the shedding of his bloud. Therefore, as I do suppose, this passion did not appeare vpon the crosse, but his maiestie; as though the crosse now being taken awaie, his enimies go about to take that glorie from him, which he got on the crosse. Or else that his faithfull had suffered, not in the crosse, but with weapons in that holie land, which he after so manie miracles had consecrated with his bloud. So likewise he declared this his passion which he for his sustained, not in the crosse, but in his maiestie: so he signified, that all the court of heauen suffered with the like compassion, mouing his to reuengement with the shewing of so great grèefe. As concerning that voice beginning in a barbarous language and ending in Latine, what I thinke I will shew. Woch, woch, in the Germane tong, is a signe of grèefe doubled. And where that wofull mourning voice began in the Germane tong, and ended in Latine, it maie be signified thereby, that onelie the Almans and the Italians take this the affliction of their Lord more grieuouslie than other nations, as their hasting declareth. God forbid that the passion or lamentation be here vnderstood by anie slaughter of the christians and people in this expedition.

A strange vision.

The memorable euents of our time.

Chap. 33.

I Thinke it not impertinent to set downe here (by occasion) the aduentures and notable euents in England: and first of all, the sudden death of the deteiners of the kingdome of England against the lawfull heire, the nephue of Henrie by his daughter Matild: as well the death of the worthie knight Eustathius the son of king Stephan, and son in law to Lewes the French king: as of his mother quèene Matild the countesse of Bullogne. Then the concord adoption made betwèene king Stephan, and Henrie duke of Normandie. And then after the death of king Stephan, the marlage of quèene Elianor, and the translation from crowne to crowne. Immediatlie, the aduancement of the duke to the kingdome, and the coronation of king Henrie the second. The siege of the castell of Bridgenorth vpon Seuerne, and the compulsion of the worthie knight Hugh Mortimer to dedition, to the terrible example of all. What nédeth manie words? To confound the mightie, and to make euen the rugged, there were prosperous successes. And as destruction fell vpon the deteiners of the kingdome, so likewise it fell vpon the peacebreakers of the same, as well of the brethren, as also of the sons.

The subduing of prince Dene at Colchull in Northwales in a woddie streict, not without the losse of manie knights. A sumptuous expedition to Tholouse, albeit it was vnprofitable. An altercation & warre betwéene the king of England and Lewes of France, through the doting of both parts. The yéelding vp of prince Rhese by the means of his vncle Dene at Pencador in Southwales, the king of England comming thither. The vnwilling & wrested confession onelie by word & by writing (as some say) of Thomas of Canturburie, and his suffragans at Clarendon, as concerning annates: when that prophesie of Merlin Ambrosius séemed to be fulfilled; The buls tongs shall be cut out. The iniurious crieng out of all the court at Northampton against the father, bearing the crosse, & maintening the rights of the crucifix, and the priuie departure of him to exile that night. The ambassage of Reinold archbishop of Cullen, & chancellor to the emperor, from the said emperor to the king of England: who was an effectuous persuader of marlage to be had betwéene Henrie the emperors nephue duke of Saronie and Banier, and Matild the kings eldest daughter: he moued also, but in vaine, to set cleare the Almains schisme. Not long after the publike periurie through out all the realme, by the kings proclamation against the sée of saint Peter, and the archbishop of Canturburie. And incontinentlie the countie Gunceline, and other states of Saronie came from the duke into England for the kings daughter.

A prophesie of Merlin fulfilled.

The coronation of king Henrie the third, son to king Henrie, solemnized in London by the archbishop of Yorke, to the prejudice of the church of Canturburie. Ambassadors came from Spaine, and obteined the kings daughter Elianor, to be maried vnto Anfolfo, king of Toledo and Castile. The comming of Dernicius (being expelled) to the king, and the sailing ouer into Ireland of Fitzstephans, & earle Richard. The expedition of the lord of *Olwalstre in Powes, and his returne by occasion of raine: not without his hurtfull dismembring of the pledges, and great slaughter of his enimies. The martyrdome of Thomas. The often shining miracles. The departure of the noble Henrie bishop of Winchester, descended of the kings bloud at Winchester. The viage of the king into Ireland. The conspiracie of the states against their prince, and the children against their father. The comming of two cardinals into Normandie, to make inquirie of the death of the martyr. The sudden returne of the king out of Ireland into Wales, and so into England, thense into Normandie; with an appeasing of the said cardinals, and the French king. The first departure of the yong king with his two brethren from his father into France. The victorie of the ciuill and two yeares warre, and the kings mercie towards the vanquished, as we haue shewed before. The comming of Huguntio Petie Leon cardinall of the title of saint Angelo into England, and the celebration of a councell vnder him of all the clergie of England, at London, as concerning the contention of supremasie betwéene Richard archbishop of Canturburie, and Roger of Yorke: but the allegations on both sides with fists and staues brake it off. The bishop of Capua, and Diaferus elect of Croia, and earle Florius, came from William king of Sicill, to haue marlage betwéene him and Joane the kings yonger daughter.

*Albi monasterij.

The ambaſſadors of the kings of Spaine, Caſtile, and Nauar, came into England: who as concerning lands and caſtels (whereof they contended) promiſed altogither to ſtand vnto the king of Englands arbitrement. Wherefore the king aſſembling at London all the lawyers & wiſe men in the land of both orders; when the cauſe was propoſed, and the allegations heard on both ſides, by famous aduocats; among whome, Peter of Cardon, that came in the behalfe of the king of Nauar, excelled in eloquence: the king vſing wiſe counſell, and intending to end the contention by tranſaction, that giuing ſomewhat from one, and keeping ſomewhat from an other, he would hurt neither partie much. But as he was appointed iudge by both, ſo he was carefull for the commoditie of both as much as could be. So making a tranſaction, and ingroſſing it in writing, he writ the iudiciall examination for a prouiſo; That if either part refuſed to ſtand to his arbitrement, the definitiue ſtrife might be diſcrypted by ſentence. The comming of Lewes king of France into England, who went on pilgrimage to Canturburie, to the martyr Thomas, to require his helpe deuoutlie, whome he in the time of his exile had helped: and offering a cup pretious both for matter & ſubſtance in the place where the holie bodie was buried, when he had declined a while proſtrat on his face, and had laid his bare head a while in the right ſide hole of the marble ſtone that ſtandeth therby; at laſt, riſing from his praier (that he might confirme the memorie of his pilgrimage with euerlaſting record) in the preſence of the king of England, the earle of Flanders, the archbiſhop of the ſee, the prior of the couent, and other men of ſtate, he gaue yearelie vnto Canturburie abbete an hundred tuns of wine.

The ſecond defection of king Henrie the third, and earle Geffreie, with the ſudden death of the yonger king at Marcels. The comming on pilgrimage of Godfrie archbiſhop of Cullen, and Philip earle of Flanders vnto Canturburie. The death of earle Geffreie. The comming of Heraclius the patriarch, and the ſailing of earle John into Ireland. Almoſt all things as they be here ſet in order, chanced in our time, in no great diſtance betweene, in and about the ſpace of three and thirtie yeares. O how glorious had all theſe things beene, if they had ſorted to a good end! Which ſurelie would haue hapned, if he ſetting other things aſide, had followed Chriſt, when he was called, of whome he receiued all theſe benefits; and had ſpent the laſt fiue yeares reigne in his ſeruice. But theſe things being before rehearſed by the way, let vs returne to the hiſtorie.

The recapitulation of ſundrie acts, and of the commming of Iohn the kings ſonne to Ireland, with his ſucceſſe there.

Chap. 34.

NOw omitting the building of three caſtels, one at Tipperarie, the other at Archyhin, & the third at Liſmore, after the comming of earle John, & ſpeaking nothing of the euill fortune of three worthie yong men; Robert Barrie at Liſmore, Reimond Fitzhugh at Olethan, and Reimond Cantitinenſis at Odrona. Of part of the garriſon of Archyhin ſlaine in the wood there, by the prince of Limerike on Midſummer daie, & foure knights there killed, not without manfull defenſe. Of them of Limerike, and the noble man Ograine ſlaine at Tipperarie. Of them of Archyhin ſlaine againe by thoſe of Limerike in taking of a preie. Of Dermucius Mac Arthie prince of Deſmond, with others ſlaine in a parlée neere Corke by them of Corke, and the garriſon of Theobald brother to Walter. Of the ſlaughter of them of Kencolon, with their prince inuading Meth by the men thereof, & William Litle, and one hundred of their heads ſent to Dublin. Of the finding out of the bodies of Patrike, Brigid, & Columbe at Dundalke, & their tranſlation from thenſe by the procurement of John de Curcie.

Of the heading of Hugh Lacie at Dornach, through the treaſon of his owne Iriſhmen. Of the killing of twelue noble knights vnder John de Curcie, in the returne from Connagh. Of the traitorous and lamentable ſlaughter of Roger Powre, and manie others in Offerie: and thorough that occaſion, the priuie conſpiracie of all Ireland againſt the Engliſhmen, manie caſtels being therwith deſtroied. All which things are not vnworthie to be recorded, when the dominion was tranſlated to the kings ſon. But aſſigning theſe doings to other writers, we will proceed to more profitable matters. How and wherefore this firſt enterprize of the kings ſon had no good ſucceſſe I thought good to declare briefle: that this finall addition (albeit it can not be a cure to that which is paſt) yet it may be a caueat for things to come. ¶ This recapitulation followeth in a more abſolute forme, pag. 53. which being deliuered out of ſundrie copies, do perfect one another.] Note.

When all things meete and neceſſarie for ſo great a iournie or voiage were at the king his commandement and charges made readie; then John the kings yonger ſonne a little before made lord of Ireland, was ſent ouer; and in the Lent time (1) he toke leaue of his father, and as he trauelled towards ſaint Dauids to take ſhipping, he paſſed and rode along by the ſea coaſts of Southwals, and ſo came to (2) Penbroke. There brought and accompanied him vnto the ſhip a noble and a worthie man named Reinulfe Glanuile, one of the K. his moſt priuie councell in all weightie matters, as alſo cheefe iuſtice of England. And on wedneſdaie in the Eaſter weeke, the wind being at eaſt and blowing a good gale, he toke ſhip in Milford hauen, but for haſt he left to do his deuotion and oblation at ſaint Dauids, which was but an euill halſoning: neuertheleſſe on the nert morrow about nonetide he arriued in ſafetie vnto Waterford with all his companie, which were about three hundred gentlemen, and of bowmen, footmen, horſſemen, and others a great number. Then was fulfilled the vaticine or prophecie of old Merlin: A burning globe ſhall riſe out of the eaſt, & ſhall compaſſe about the land of Ireland, and all the foules of that Iland ſhall flée round about the fire. And hauing ſpoken theſe words of the father, he continueth his ſpeech, and thus ſpeaketh of his ſonne: And of this fire ſhall riſe a ſparkle, for feare of which all the inhabiters of the land ſhall tremble and be afraid: and yet he that is abſent ſhall be more eſteemed than he that is preſent, and better ſhall be the ſucceſſe of the firſt than of the ſecond. Prophecies of Merlin fulfilled.

John at this his firſt arriuall into Ireland was of the age of 12 yeres, which was from the firſt arriuall of his father thirteene yeares, of the landing of the earle Strangbow foureteene yeares, and from the firſt entrance of Robert Fitzſtephans fifteene yeares, and the yeare of our Lord one thouſand one hundred eightie and fiue, Lucius then Romane biſhop, Frederike the emperor, and Philip the French king. There paſſed ouer with the king in the ſame fleet manie good clerks, among whome (3) one was ſpeciallie commended vnto this yong lord by his father, for that he was a diligent ſearcher of naturall hiſtories, hiſtories, as alſo had béene before two yeares in the ſame land, and there collected ſundrie notes, and ſufficient matter as well for his hiſtorie, as for his topographie: and which after that he was returned home, and attending in the court, did (as leiſure ſerued him) digeſt and ſet in good order of a booke, the ſame being his labor of three yéeres. A trauell to him painefull, but to his poſteritie profitable, although much miſliked and enuied at by ſuch as then were liuing: the one liked it well, but the other diſpraiſed it; the one reaped a benefit and commoditie, but the other of a ſecret malice maligning the ſame, fretted in his humor, and was grauelled in his owne follie.

(1) The firſt voiage of the king his ſonne, being then but a child of twelue yéeres of age: the Engliſh chronicles do make ſmall mention therof. But ſuch as do write thereof, do report that the king brought his ſonne as farre as Gloceſter on this iornie: and there dubbing and honoring him with the degrée of knighthod, ſent him on his iornie.

(2) Penbroke is an old and an ancient towne, builded by a noble man named Arnulph Montgomerie the anceſtor of the Carews, whoſe names are Montgomeries, & lieth in Weſtwales named Demetia, but now of this towne is called Penbrokeſhire. It ſtandeth vpon a créeke of Milford hauen, about two miles from the caſtell Carew: of which caſtell the Montgomeries builded, and there dwelling toke the name thereof, & were called Carews, which name that familie doth yet reteine. In this towne of Penbroke ſtandeth a goodlie and a ſtrong caſtell, which hath béene in times paſt the ſeat and houſe of manie a noble man bearing the name of the earles of Penbroke. In this was king Henrie the ſeuenth borne. It is now in great ruine and in decaie.

The ancient houſe of the Carews.

(3) This man ment here is Giraldus Cambrenſis the author of this booke, who (as it appeareth by this and other his works) was learned and much giuen to ſtudie. He was archdeacon of ſaint Dauids, and deſcended from Girald of Windſore, and the ladie Neſta his wife, for he was the ſon of Maurice, and the ſonne of the foreſaid Girald and Neſta: and ſo this Girald of Windſore was his Proauus or great grandfather.

The praiſe and commendation as alſo the excuſe of Robert Fitzſtephans and the earle Strangbow.

Chap. 35.

RObert Fitzſtephans was the firſt who taught and ſhewed the waie to the earle, the earle to the king, and the king to his ſonne. Great praiſe-worthie was he that gaue the firſt aduenture, and much was he to be commended who nert followed and increaſed the ſame: but aboue all others he deſerued beſt, who fulfilled, abſolued, and ended the ſame. And here is to be noted, that albeit both Fitzſtephans and the earle did helpe Dermon Mac Morogh to recouer his countrie of Leinſter, as alſo defended and kept the ſame from robbers, théeues, & enimies: yet they did it in diuerſe reſpects. The one in reſpect of his faith and promiſe, the other for loue of Eua, & of the (1) inheritance, which by hir ſhould grow and come vnto him. But as concerning the intruding vpon Waterford, and the conqueſts of ſundrie territories as well in Deſmond as in Meth, I can not excuſe them. The earle, who in right of his wife was lord of Leinſter, the firſt part or portion of Ireland, ſurrendred and yéelded vp all his right and title there vnto the king himſelfe, and toke it againe to hold of him. The like alſo did all the princes of the land. Whereby as alſo by other old and ancient records it is apparant, that the Engliſh nation entred not into this land by wrong and iniurie, (as ſome men ſuppoſe and dreame) but vpon a good ground, right, and title.

(1) The courſe of this hiſtorie in the beginning doth plainelie declare, how that Dermon after his departure from the king came to the citie of Briſtow, and there hauing conference with Richard Strangbow erle of Chepſtow, did offer vnto him his onelie daughter and heire in marriage, with the inheritance of all Leinſter: conditionallie that he would paſſe ouer into Ireland, and to helpe him to recouer his land, which conditions were accepted and afterwards performed. Afterwards he lieng at ſaint Dauids for paſſage, there he met with Robert Fitzſtephans, & did condition with him, that if he would paſſe ouer into Ireland to helpe him, he would giue him the towne of Werford with certeine cantreds therevnto adioining, which conditions were then accepted and afterwards performed. Thus it appeareth that the one for loue of the gentlewoman, and the other in reſpect of his promiſe did paſſe ouer into that land and realme.

The cauſes of lets whie this conqueſt could not nor had his full perfection.

Chap. 36.

HAppie and for euer happie had Ireland béene, which being valiantlie conquered, well repleniſhed with townes, and fortified with caſtels from ſea to ſea of the firſt (1) aduenturers, who were then minded to haue eſtabliſhed a good order and gouernment, had not they through the ſecret malice and treacherie of ſome men béene called awaie and ſent from home. Yea happie had it béene, if the firſt conquerors (being noble and valiant men) might according to their deſerts haue had the charge of gouernment committed vnto them. For whie, a nation which at the firſt comming ouer of our men, when they were galled with our arrowes, and afraid of our force, they were then eaſie to be reclamed. But partlie by meanes of trifling and delaieng of time, which is alwaies dangerous, and partlie by reaſon that the beſt ſeruitors being called home from thenſe, new rulers toke to much eaſe, and liued in to much ſecuritie; nothing was done to anie purpoſe: and thereupon the people of that countrie toke hart of grace, and practiſed our manners in ſhoting and the vſe of our weapons: and by little and little they became ſo well expert and skilfull therein, that whereas at the firſt they were eaſie to be ouercommed, were now ſtrong and hardie, and not onlie able to reſiſt, but alſo readie to put vs in danger and hazard. And the cauſes herof whoſo liſteth to ſearch, ſhall eaſilie find out the ſame: for if you will read ouer the bookes of the kings & prophets, examine the courſe of the old teſtament, and well conſider the examples of theſe our latter daies; you ſhall find it moſt certeine and true, that no nation, no ſtate, no citie, nor common-wealth was euer ouerthrowne by the enimie, nor ouercome by the aduerſarie but onelie for ſinne and wickednelle. And alſo the Iriſh people and nation for their ſinfull and abhominable life did well deſerue to be ouerthrowne and ouerrun by ſtrangers; yet was it not Gods will and pleſure that they ſhould vtterlie be brought into ſubiection: neither was it his good will & pleaſure that the Engliſhmen, though they had brought ſome of them into ſubiection, yet they should not therefore haue the whole empire and entire souereigntie ouer them: for both were sinfull people and merited not anie fauour at Gods hand, but deserued to be seuerelie punished, and therfore neither the one (albeit he were a conqueror, and had the ouer hand) could yet obteine a seat (2) in Pallas castell, nor yet the other be fullie subdued & brought into perfect subiection. The Irish people are said to haue the foure men whome they account to be great prophets, and whome they haue in great veneration and credit (3) Merlin, Bracton, Patrike, and Columkill, whose bookes and prophesies they haue among themselues in their owne language, and all they intreating and speaking of the conquest of this land, do affirme that the same shall be assailed with often warres, the strifes shall be continuall, and the slaughters great. But yet they do not assure nor warrant anie perfect or full conquest vnto the English nation (4) not much before doms daie. And albeit the whole land of Ireland, from sea to sea, haue for the most part béene in the power of the Englishmen, and by them fortified and replenished with sundrie and manie castels, though sometimes to their perilles and smarts: yet Bracton saith, that the king who shall make the absolute and finall conquest, shall come from out of the deserts and mounteins of saint Patrike, and vpon a sundaie at night shall with force breake into a castell builded in the saltnesse of Dhalie: and vntill that time the English nation shall from time to time be in continuall troubles with the Irishrie, sauing that they shall hold and inioie the whole land bordering vpon the east coasts of the seas.

Sin the cauſe of ouerthrows by the enimie.

The foure Irish prophets.

(1) The course of this historie doth at full declare in particulars, how the first aduenturers were maligned, & as much as might be discredited. First Robert Fitzstephans, whose seruice was counted notable, and his fidelitie to his prince and king trustie and assured: yet fell he into the kings displeasure, was cast into prison, and albeit deliuered out againe, yet the king conceiuing some gelousie of him, had him ouer into Normandie, where he serued two yeares in his warres: and although he were againe afterward sent ouer into Ireland, yet was he not in anie authoritie or office. The earle Strangbow although he came ouer with the king his speciall licence, yet his good successe was so enuied at, that the king made proclamation, that all his subiects being in Ireland with the earle, should returne & come home; and that no vittels, no munition, nor anie reléese should be transported out of anie of his dominions into Ireland. And albeit the earle afterwards were reconciled to the king, yet was he faine to yéeld vnto him all his land and dominion of Leinster vnto the kings deuotion, & to receiue the same againe to be holden of the king. Reimond who could not be charged, nor spotted with anie vntruth: yet the treacherous Heruie with his false informations so inueigled and falselie informed the king against him, that he was sent for home, and not trusted with anie gouernement. Hugh de Lacie, who (as the historie saith) was the first that made waie into Vlster, who fortified the prouince of Leinster and Meth with manie strong holds & castels, and brought all the countrie to a peaceable state; he was suspected to haue meant the imporpriation of the whole land to his owne vse, and was dismissed of his charge and gouernement, and sent for home: and in place and lieu of these were sent ouer William Fitzaldelme, Philip of Chester, and others, in whome was no value at all, but onelie to pill and poll the people, and to heape vp treasure and riches.

(2) Pallas was the daughter of Iupiter, who for her excellent gift in inuention, is said and fained by the poets to be borne of the braine of Iupiter without anie mother, she inuented the order of warres, and deuised the maner of fightings, she maketh men to be bold, and giueth the victorie. And bicause Englishmen could not obteine a full and a perfect victorie: therefore they were said not to sit in Pallas castell.

(2) There were two Merlins, and both were prophesiers: the one was named Merlinus Calidonius, or Syluestris, bicause his dwelling and habitation was néere or by a wood called Calidonia, he was borne in the marches of Scotland, but a man verie excellentlie well learned in philosophie, and in knowledge of all naturall causes; and by diligent obseruations he would gesse maruellouslie at the euents of manie things. Whereupon he was taken for a prophesier, and reputed for a magician or a diuinor. He was in the time of king Arthur, about the yeare fiue hundred and threescore, and of this Merlin it is spoken in this historie. The other Merlin was before this man and in the time of Vortiger: about the yeare of our Lord foure hundred and threescore, and he was named Ambrosius Merlinus, who was also excellentlie well learned, both in philosophie and the art magike; but his sentences were so darkelie couched, that nothing could be conceiued nor vnderstood by them before the euent.

(4) Much adoo there hath béene, and manie bookes written, concerning the full conquest of this land: so manie heads, so manie reasons. But if men would haue the truth plainelie told, it is some to be séene how the verie cause procéedeth and is continued for want of a generall reformation. But Pluto hath so blinded mens eies, that séeing they can not nor will not see: but hereof I shall more at large write in an other place.

A breefe repetition of certeine things done within the course of the historie that are omitted.

Chap. 37.

HEre by the waie it were not amisse briefelie to touch & declare of certeine things which happened, & which (for certeine causes) are not at full discoursed in this storie, as we wished that we might haue had the opportunitie so to haue done. First therfore you shall vnderstand, that John the kings sonne at his first comming ouer builded three castels, one at Tibrach, an other at Archephinan, and the third at Lisemore. Likewise three worthie gentlemen were lost and killed: namelie, Robert Barrie at Lisemore, Reimond Fitzhugh at Olithan, and Reimond Bantune at Ossorie. Also how Donald the prince of Limerike secretlie stole vpon the earles armie in Ossorie, as they were comming from Dublin towards Limerike, and slue foure hundred Ossomans, and foure noble gentlemen, which were their capteines; among whom was Ogranie an Irishman. And also Dermond Mac Artie prince of Desmond, being at parlee with certeine men of Corke not farre from the said towne, was there set vpon by the said Corkemen & (1) Theobald Fitzwalter, and there was he and the most part of his companie slaine. The like happened in Meth, where they of Kencole & their capteine made a rode, and being set vpon by one William the iustice of that countrie, they were all slaine and a hundred of their heads sent vnto Dublin. Moreouer John de Courcie found the bodies of saint Patrike, saint Brigid, and saint Colome at Downe, and remoued them from thense. Hugh de Lacie builded his castell at Dernach, was there traiterouſlie ſlaine. John de Courcie at his returne from out of Connagh loſt fiftéene of his beſt gentlemen. Roger le Powre a valiant, and a luſtie yong gentleman, was by treaſon taken and murthered in Oſſorie, whereupon the Iriſhmen forthwith brake out from their due obeiſance to the king of England, and rebelled againſt the Engliſhmen, deſtroied manie caſtels, and ſet the whole realme in a great ſturre and vnquietneſſe. Other ſundrie things happened which were to long to recite: and therefore leauing the ſame, we will returne to our hiſtorie.

at

(1) This Theobald Fitzwalter, who by his nation was named Becket but by his office Butler, was the ſonne of Walter the ſonne of Gilbert: & was the firſt Butler that came into Ireland, who being a wiſe and an expert man, was firſt ſent with William Fitzaldelme. Afterwards he was ſent ouer by king John to view and ſerch the countrie; and in the end he grew into ſuch credit, that he was infeoffed with great liuings there, as alſo aduanced (and his poſteritie after him) to great honors & promotions, which now are named earles of Ormond and Oſſorie.

The cauſes why England could not make the full and finall conqueſt of Ireland.

Chap. 38.

IT were not amiſſe, that we now did conſider the cauſes, and declare the impediments, why the kings ſonne had not the beſt ſucceſſe in this his ſo honourable a iournie, and therefore his ſo famous attempt toke not effect: that albeit the ſame can not reuoke and remedie that which is paſt and done, yet that it maie be a forewarning to that which maie follow and inſue. The principall and chiefe cauſe I ſuppoſe and thinke to be, bicauſe that whereas the patriarch of Ieruſalem named Heraclius came in an ambaſſage vnto him, in the name and behalfe of all the whole land of Paleſtine called the holie land, requeſting that he would take vpon him to be their helpe, and defending the ſame againſt the Saladine then king of Egypt and of Damaſco: who hauing bent his whole force againſt them, was like within two yeares following vtterlie to be ouerrun, the ſaid holie land, vnleſſe ſome reſcue in the meane time and with expedition were prouided: he vtterlie denied and refuſed the ſame. And being further vrged to ſend one of his ſonnes, although it were the yongeſt: he denied that alſo: making no account neither of the cauſe it ſelfe, which was Chriſt; nor of the people, which were chriſtians: neither yet of the perſon, which was a reuerend and honourable perſonage.

And yet neuertheleſſe he ſent forth his yonger ſonne in a iournie or hoſting, more ſumptuous than néedfull or profitable: And whither I praie you? Was it into the eaſt and againſt the Saracens and miſcreants? No, no, it was into the weſt, & againſt his euen chriſtian, nothing ſéeking the aduancing of Gods glorie, nor promoting of his cauſe, but onelie for his owne priuat lucre and ſingular commoditie. An other cauſe was this. At the firſt landing and entrie of the kings ſonne at Waterford, a great manie of the chiefeſt of the Iriſhmen in thoſe parties, and who ſince their firſt ſubmiſſion to king Henrie had continued faithfull and true, they being aduertiſed of this his arriuall, did come and reſort vnto him in peaceable maner, and after their beſt order to ſalute him, and congratulate his comming. But our new men & Normans, who had not before béene in thoſe parties, making ſmall account of them, did not onelie mocke them, and laugh them to ſcorne for the manner of their apparell, as alſo for their long beards and great glibs, which they did then weare and vſe according to the vſage of their countrie: but alſo they did hardlie deale and ill intreat manie of them. Theſe men nothing liking ſuch interteinment ſhifted themſelues out of the towne, & with all haſt ſped themſelues home: euerie one into his owne houſe; & from thenſe they with their wiues, children, and houſhold, departed and went ſome to the prince of Limerike, ſome to the prince of Corke, ſome to Rothorike prince of Connagh, and ſome to one lord, and ſome to an other: and to theſe they declared orderlie how they had béene at Waterford, and what they had ſéene there, and how they were intreated; and how that a yong man was come thither garded with yong men, and guided by the counſels of yong men: in whom there was no ſtaie, no ſobrietie, no ſtedfaſtneſſe, no aſſuredneſſe, whereby they and their countrie might be aſſured of anie ſafetie.

Theſe princes and namelie they three of Connagh, Corke, and Limerike, who were the chéefeſt, and who were then preparing themſelues in a readineſſe to haue come and ſaluted the kings ſonne, and to haue yéelded vnto him the dutifull obeiſance of faithfull ſubiects: when they heard theſe newes, they began ſtreightwaies to imagine, that of ſuch euill beginnings worſe endings would inſue: and reaſoning the matter among themſelues, did conclude, that if they thus at the firſt did deale ſo diſcourteouſlie with the humble, quiet, and peaceable men: what would they do to ſuch as were mightie and ſtout, and who would be loth to receiue ſuch diſcourteſies at their hands? Wherefore with one conſent they concluded to ſtand and ioine togither againſt the Engliſh nation, and to their vttermoſt to aduenture their liues, and to ſtand to the defenſe of their countrie and libertie. And for the performance thereof, they enter into a new league among themſelues, and ſwore each one to the other, and by that means enimies before are now made frends and reconciled. This we know to be true, and therefore we ſpeake it, and that which we ſaw we do boldlie witneſſe. And for ſo much as we thus fondlie and in our pride did abuſe them, who in humbleneſſe came vnto vs: therefore did we well deſerue by Gods iuſt iudgement (who hateth the proud and high minded) to loſe the others, for by this example they were vtterlie diſcouraged to like of vs. And this people and nation though it be barbarous and rude, not knowing what apperteineth vnto honour: yet moſt and aboue all others do they deſire to be exalted and honoured. And although they be not aſhamed to be found falſe of their word, and vniuſt in their dealings: yet will they greatlie diſcommend lieng and commend truth, louing that in others, which is not to be found in themſelues. But to the matter. What great euils and inconueniences do grow by ſuch follies and inſolencies, a wiſe man may ſone learne by the example of Rehoboam the ſonne of Salomon, & ſo by an other mans harme learne to beware of his owne. (2) For he being lead and carried by yong mens councels, gaue a yong mans anſwer vnto his people, ſaieng vnto them; My finger is greater than was my fathers loins, and whereas he beat you with rods, I will ſcourge you with ſcorpions, by reaſon whereof ten tribes forſooke him for euer, and followed after Jeroboam. Another cauſe is this, when Robert Fitzſtephans came firſt ouer, and alſo the earle; there were certeine Iriſhmen which toke part with them, and faithfullie ſerued vnder them: and theſe were rewarded and had giuen vnto them for recompenſe certeine lands, which they quietlie held and inioied, vntill this time of the comming ouer of the king his ſonne: for now the ſame were taken from them, and giuen to ſuch as were new come ouer, contrarie to the promiſe & grant to them before made. Wherevpon they forſoke vs and fled to our enimies, and became not onelie ſpies vpon vs, but were alſo guiders and conductors of them againſt vs: they being ſo much the more able to hurt and annoie vs, becauſe they were before our familiars, and knew all our orders and ſecrets. Beſides this, the cities and townes vpon and nére the ſeacoaſts, with all ſuch lands, reuenues, tributes, and commodities as to the ſame did belong and apperteine, and which before was imploied and ſpent for the defenſe of the commonwealth & countrie, and in the ſeruice againſt the enimies, were now all aſſigned and beſtowed vpon ſuch as were giuen to pilling and polling, and who laie ſtill within the townes, ſpending their whole time, and all that they had in drunkennelle and ſurfetting, to the loſſe and damage of the good citizens and inhabitants, and not to the annoiance of the enimies. And beſides ſundrie other commodities, this was one, and a ſpeciall one; that at the verie firſt entrie of the king his ſonne into this vnrulie and rebellious land, the people being barbarous, and not knowing what it was to be a ſubiect, nor what apperteineth to gouernment, ſuch men were appointed to haue the charge, rule and gouernement, as who were more met to talke in a parlor than to fight in the fields, better ſkill to be clad in a warme gowne than to be ſhrowded in armor, and who knew better how to pill and poll the good ſubiects than to reſiſt and incounter the enimie: yea for their valiantneſſe and prowelſe they might well be reſembled vnto William Fitzaldelme, vnder whoſe gouernement both Ireland and Wales were almoſt vtterlie deſtroied & loſt. For whie, they were neither faithfull to their owne people nor dreadfull to their enimies; yea they were vtterlie void of that affect, which is naturallie ingraffed in man, which is to be pittifull to the humble and proſtrate, and to reſiſt the proud and obſtinat; but rather of the contrarie, they ſpoiled their owne citizens, and winked at their enimies: for to reſiſt and withſtand them nothing was done, no caſtels nor fortreſſes builded, no paſſes for ſafetie made, no waies for ſeruice opened, but althings went to ruine, and the common ſtate to wracke. Moreouer, the ſeruingmen and the ſoldiers which were in garriſon, they liking well of their capteins and maſters maners and loſe life, gaue themſelues to the like, ſpending their whole time in rioting, banketing, whoredome, and all other diſſolute and wanton orders, tarrieng ſtill within the townes and places far off from the enimies. For as for the marches (ſo called becauſe the ſame bordered vpon their enimies; or rather of Mars, becauſe in thoſe places martiall affaires were and are wont to be moſt exerciſed) they would not come nére the light thereof, and by that means the people there dwelling and ſeated, the ſoiles there manured, the caſtels there builded, were altogether deſtroied, waſted, ſpoiled, and burned. And thus the prowelſe of the old capteins, the good ſeruices of the veterans & well experimented ſoldiers by the inſolent, diſtemperat, and lewd life of theſe new comes was diſcredited: whereof was nothing elſe to be awaited for but after ſuch calmes muſt néeds inſue ſtormes and tempeſts. And albeit they thus lieng in the townes in ſecuritie and at reſt, wallowing in loſe and wanton life, euerie daie being a holie daie to Bacchus and Venus: yet the ſtate of the land at large was moſt miſerable and lamentable. For euerie where was howling and wéeping, the manured fields became waſte, the caſtels deſtroied, and the people murthered, and no newes but that the vtter deſtruction of the whole land was at hand. And in this diſtreſſe and neceſſitie it had béene verie requiſit and néedfull that the ſouldiers ſhould haue taken vp their weapons, ſerued againſt the enimie, and haue defended the common ſtate: but it was farre otherwiſe, for there was ſuch lawing & veration in the townes, one dailie ſuing and troubling another, that the veterane was more troubled with lawing within the towne, than he was in perill at large with the enimie. And thus our men, giuen ouer to this trade and kind of life, became faintharted, and afraid to loke vpon the enimie: and on the contrarie the enimie moſt ſtrong, ſtout, and bold. Thus was the land then gouerned, and thus the ſame poſted towards the deſtruction of the Engliſh nation and gouernment, which had doubtleſſe verie ſhortlie followed and inſued, had not the king prouided a ſpéedie remedie for the ſame. For the king being aduertiſed how diſorderlie things framed, and conſidering with himſelfe in what perill the ſtate of his realme and people ſtood, he with all ſpéed ſendeth for all theſe new come ſouldiors, in whome (other than the name of a ſouldior was nothing of ante value and commendation) and commandeth them to repaire and come home, and ſendeth ouer in their places theſe old beaten and well tried ſoldiors, by whoſe ſeruice the land before had béene conquered and kept among whome one and the cheefeſt was John de Courcie, who was made lord deputie, and had the gouernement of the land committed vnto him: who, according to his office and dutie, ſetteth in hand the reformation of all things méet and requiſit to be redreſſed: who the more valiant and forward he was in his ſaid affaires and ſeruices, the more the land grew to good order, and inioied peace & quietneſſe. For whie, he would not be idle himſelfe, neither would he ſuffer his ſouldiers to lie idle like lotterers and ſluggards: but was alwaies labouring and trauelling abroad, and marching ſtill towards the enimies, whome he followed and purſued euen through the whole land, to the vttermoſt parts thereof, as well in Corke, Thomond, Connagh, and elſewhere; and if by any means he could haue ante aduantage of them, he would ſuerlie giue the onſet and aduenture vpon them: which for the moſt part was to their ouerthrowe, though he and his ſometimes were galled, and felt the ſmart. And would to God he had bene as prudent a capteine as he was a valiant ſouldior; and as prouident in the one as ſkilfull and hardie in the other! But to my former purpoſe. Among the manie and ſundrie inconueniences happened by euill gouernment of theſe new officers (as is before ſaid) there was none greater, nor more to be lamented than was this: that notwithſtanding God of his goodneſſe did giue the victorie, and ſend the happie ſucceſſe in this noble conqueſt: yet was there neither due thanks attributed vnto God, nor anie remembrance giuen vnto his church; but to increaſe a further ingratitude, they toke and ſpoiled awaie from the ſame their lands and poſſeſſions, as alſo minded to abridge them of their old and ancient priuileges & liberties. Too great a note of ingratitude, and an argument of too much vnthankfulnes: wherof what vnquietneſſe and troubles did inſue, the ſequele therof (for the courſe of ſundrie years) did ſhew and declare.

lands

So manie outrages & diſorders, which did crépe in by the diſordred gouernement vnder the king his ſonne, were not ſo much to be imputed to his young and tender yeares, as vnto the euill counſels and directions of ſuch as were about him, and had the ſpeciall charge thereof: for ſuch a ſauage, rude, and barbarous nation was by good counſels, diſcréet directions

The inconueniences following euill gouernment.

Lawing worſe than warring.

Iha Giraldus! could you ſée that curſſed fault and abuſe?

ctions and prudent gouernement to haue bene gouerned and reduced to good order and conformitie. For whie, if a realme which by wise and prudent gouernement is brought and reduced to a perfect state, yet being committed to the gouernement of a child is cursed and brought to manifold distresses, troubles and miseries (5) how much more then is it to be so thought of that land, which of it selfe being rude and barbarous, is committed to the gouernement of such as be not onelie rude and barbarous, but also lewd and euill disposed. And that this did so happen and come to passe in Ireland, all wisemen do know it, and the elder sort do confesse it to be true; although yong men to couer their follies, would reiect it to some other causes & impediments. For whie, such of them as had procured vnto themselues great liuings, lordships and territories, they pretended at the first that they would be readie to serue the king his sonne, to defend the countrie, to resist the enimie, and that they would do this and that with manie good morowes. But when they had gotten what they would, and had that they sought for, then it manifestlie appeared that it was singular gaine & priuat profit which they shot at: for hauing obteined that, they neuer remembred their oth to their lord, nor cared for the common state, nor passed for the safetie and defense of the countrie, which in dutie they ought chiefelie to haue considered.

(1) The Irish nation and people euen from the beginning haue bene alwaies of a hard bringing vp, & are not onelie rude in apparell but also rough & ouglie in their bodies: their beards and heads they neuer wash, cleanse, nor cut, especiallie their heads; the haire whereof they suffer to grow, sauing that some do vse to round it: and by reason the same is neuer kembed, it groweth fast togither, and in processe of time it matteth so thicke and fast togither, that it is in stéd of a hat, and kéepeth the head verie warme, & also will beare off a great blow or stroke, and this head of haire they call a glibe, and therein they haue a great pleasure.

(2) The historie is written in the first booke of the kings the twelfe chapter, and in the second of the chronicles the tenth chapter: the effect therof is, that after the death of Salomon the people of Israell requested Rehoboam his sonne, to ease them of the grieuous burdens and heauie yoke which his father laied vpon them, who leauing the counsell of the old counsellors, gaue them answer by the aduise of yong heads, as in this place is recited.

(3) What these Irishmen were, there are diuerse opinions. Some thinke that they were such as did inhabit about Werford, some thinke that they were they of Kencelo, for they faithfullie serued the Englishmen vnder their capteine named Morogh at Limerike, when the earle of Reimond recouered the same. But I find it to be noted of the Ostans, who are now dwelling within the baronie of Odzon, and had a seat there by the gift of the Kauenaughs, but since resisting against them and denieng to paie their accustomable cheuerie, yelded themselues vnto the earle of Ormond, paieng vnto him a certeine blacke rent to be their defendor against the said Kauenaughs, but in right they are tenants to the barons of Odzon.

(4) This is meant of that which is before spoken in the twentie chapter in the description of this John de Curcie, where his too much rashnes is noted to be a great fault in him.

(5) It is written by the preacher, or Ecclesiastes; Wo be vnto thee O thou land whose king is but a child. Which is not ment absolutelie of a child, but of such a one who (as a child) hath an euill affection, and is void of that grauitie, wisedome, and maiestie as is required in a prince and gouernour. For Iosias when he was crowned king of Iehuda, was but eight yeares of age; and yet bicause he did that which was right in the sight of God, and ruled the land godlie and vprightlie, he is commended in the scriptures for the same.

Three sorts of people which came and serued in Ireland.

Chap.39.

THere were three sundrie sorts of seruitors which serued in the realme of Ireland, (1) Normans, Englishmen, and the Cambrians, which were the first conquerors of the land: the first were in most credit and estimation, the second were nert, but the last were not accounted nor regarded of. The Normans were verie fine in their apparell, and delicate in their diets, they could not féed but vpon deinties, neither could their meat digest without wine at each meale; yet would they not serue in the marches, or ante remote place against the enimie, neither would they lie in garrison to kéepe ante remote castell or fort, but would be still about their lords side to serue and gard his person; they would be where they might be full and haue plentie, they could talke and brag, sweare and stare, and standing in their owne reputation, disdaine all others. They receiued great interteinement and were liberallie rewarded, and left no meanes vnsought how they might rule the rost, beare the sway, and be aduanced vnto high estate and honour. In these things they were the first and formost, but to serue in hosting, to incounter with the enimie, to defend the publike state, & to follow ante martiall affaires, they were the last and furthest off. And for asmuch as those noble and worthie seruitors, by whose seruice, trauels and industrie, the said land was first entred into and conquered, were thus had in contempt, disdaine, and suspicion, and onelie the new comes called to counsell, and they onelie credited and honored: it came to passe that in all their doings they had small successe, & by whole and little their credit decaied, and nothing came to effect or perfection which they toke in hand.

The Normans fine in their apparell and delicat in their diet.

(1) This king, besides England and Scotland, had in his rule and gouernement the duchie of Normandie, and the earledomes of Gascoine, Guien, Aniou, & Poitiers, beside the losse of that which came to him by the right of his wife. And albeit he trusted the Englishmen well inough, yet being borne on the other side of the seas, he was more affectionated to the people of those prouinces there subiect vnto him: for of them he chose both them which were of his councell in peaceable gouernment, as also his seruitors in martiall affaires. And albeit he had of euerie of these prouinces some, yet bicause Normandie was the chiefest, and he duke thereof, they went all vnder the name of Normans, and so called Normans.

How or by what manner the land of Ireland is throughlie to be conquered.

Chap.40.

IT is an old saieng, that euerie man in his owne art is best of credit & most to be beléeued: & so in this matter they are specialle to be credited, who haue bene the chiefest trauellers and seruitors in and about the first recouerie uerie of this land, doo know and can beſt diſcouer the natures, manners, and conditions of theſe people and nation: for as the matter ſpecially toucheth them, ſo none can doo it better than they. For whie, by reaſon of their continuall warres with them being their moſt mortall enimies, none can better ſaie than they how they are either to be conquered or vanquiſhed. And here by the waie happie had Wales bin, I meane that Wales which the Engliſh people doo inhabit, if the king therof in gouerning the ſame or when he incountred with his enimies had vſed this deuiſe & policie. But to the matter. Theſe Normans although they were verie good ſouldiers and well appointed, yet the manner of the warres in France far differeth from that which is vſed in Ireland and Wales; for the ſoile & countrie in France is plaine, open, & champaine; but in theſe parts it is rough, rockie, full of hils, woods, & bogs. In France they weare complet harneſſe, and are armed at all points, not onelie for their honor, but eſpecially for their defenſe and ſafeties; but to theſe men the ſame are comberſome & a great hinderance. In France they kéepe ſtanding fields & trie the battels, but theſe men are light horſſemen & range alwaies at large. In France they kéepe their priſoners and put them to ranſomes, but theſe chop off their heads and put them to the ſword. And therefore when the battell is to be waged in the plaine, open, & champaine countrie, it behoueth all men to be armed, ſome in complet harneſſe, ſome in iackes, ſome in Almaine riuets, & ſome in brigandines & ſhirts of maile, according to their places of ſeruice. So on the contrarie, where the fight & triall is in narow ſtreicts, rockie places, & where it is full of woods & bogs, & in which footmen are to ſerue and not horſſemen, there light armor and ſlender harneſſe will beſt ſerue. To fight therefore in ſuch places and againſt ſuch men, as be but naked and vnarmed men, and whome at the firſt puſh and aduenture, either the victorie muſt be had or loſt, light and eaſie armor is beſt and conuenient. And againe theſe people are verie nimble & quicke of bodie, and light of foot, and for their ſafetie and aduantage they ſéeke waies through ſtreicts and bogs, and therefore it is not for anie man laden with much armor to follow and purſue them. Moreouer, the Frenchmen and Normans moſt commonlie are horſſemen, and doo ſerue on horſſebacke, & theſe men haue their ſadles ſo great and déepe, that they cannot at eaſe leape vp and downe; and being on foot by reaſon of their armor, they cannot ſerue nor trauell. And you ſhall further vnderſtand, that in all the ſeruices and hoſtings, both in Ireland & in Wales, the Welſh ſeruitors, and eſpecially ſuch as doo dwell in the marches, by reaſon of their continuall wars, they are verie valiant, bold, and of great experiences, they can endure anie paines and trauels, they are vſed to watchings and wardings, they can abide hunger and thirſt, and know how to take aduantage of their enimie; and their ſeruice by horſe is ſuch, that they are readie to take aduantage of the field, being quicke & readie to take and leape to the horſſe, as alſo to leaue the ſame, & to folow the enimie at their beſt aduantage, whether it be on horſſe or on foot. And ſuch kind of ſeruitors and ſouldiers were they, which firſt gaue the aduenture and firſt preuailed in Ireland: and by ſuch alſo in the end muſt the ſame be fullie conquered, that when the battell is to be fought & waged in the plaine and champaine countrie, and againſt ſuch as be throughlie armed and appointed for the ſame, it is reaſon that the aduerſe part be likewiſe armed and appointed. But when the matter is to be waged in ſtéepe places, rough fields, rockie hils, or in marſh and boggie grounds, and againſt ſuch as be quicke of foot, and doo ſéeke others to tops of hils, or to bogs, and woods: then men of the like exerciſe, and hauing light armour, are to be allowed. And in the Iriſh wars this one thing is to be conſidered, that you doo in euerie wing ſome your bowmen with your footmen and horſſemen; that by them they may be defended from the kerns, whoſe nature and conditions are to run in and out, and with their darts are wont ſhrewdlie to annoie their enimies, who by the bowmen are to be kept off. And moreouer, that the hither part of the land lieng on the eaſt ſide, or part of the Shenin which diuideth the three other parts from this, and this being the fourth part muſt be well fortified with caſtels and forts: but as for Connagh & Thomond, which lie in the further ſide of the Shenin, and all thoſe parties (ſauing the citie of Limerike which muſt néeds be recouered and kept in the Engliſh gouernement) muſt for a time be borne withall, and by little and little by fortifieng of the frontiers in meet places be gotten and recouered, and ſo by little and little to grow in vpon them as occaſion ſhall ſerue.

Great odds betweéne the warres in France and Ireland or Wales.

The kernes diſeaſe in battell.

How the Iriſh people being vanquiſhed are to be gouerned.

Chap. 41.

AS there be means and policies to be vſed in conquering this people, who are now more light in their bodies than conſtant in mind: ſo when they are vanquiſhed, they muſt in an order be ruled and gouerned. Firſt and principallie therefore it is to be conſidered, that whoſoeuer ſhall be gouernor ouer them, that he be wiſe, conſtant, diſcreet, and a ſtaied man; that in time of peace, and when they are contented to liue vnder law and in obedience, they maie be gouerned by law, directed by right, and ruled by iuſtice; as alſo to be ſtout and valiant, readie and able with force ſeuerelie to puniſh all ſuch as (contrarie to their dutie and allegiance) ſhall either rebell and breake out, or otherwiſe liue in diſordered maner. Moreouer, when anie haue done amiſſe, and contrarie to dutie haue rebelled, and doo yet afterwards knowledge their follie, and yéelding themſelues haue obteined pardon; that in no wiſe you doo afterwards euill intreat them, neither yet laie their former faults to their charges, neither caſt them in the teeth of their follies: but hauing taken ſuch aſſurance of them as you maie, to intreat them with all courteſies and gentleneſſe, that by ſuch good means they maie the better be induced and incouraged to kéepe themſelues within their dutie, for loue of their good gouernement which they ſée: and yet be afraid to doo euill for feare of puniſhment, which they are to receiue for their euill and lewd doings. And if they will not thus order and gouerne them, but confound their doings, being ſlacke to puniſh the euill, and quicke to oppreſſe the good and obedient, to flatter them in their rebellions and outrages, and to ſpoile them in peace; to fauor them in their treaſons and treacheries, and to oppreſſe them when they liue in loialtie, as we haue ſeene manie ſo to haue done: ſurelie theſe men ſo diſordredlie confounding all things, they in the end ſhall be confounded themſelues. And becauſe harms foreſéene do leaſt annoie & hurt, let them which be wiſe looke well, that in time of peace they doo prepare for the warres. For after the Alcion daies and calme ſeas doo follow ſtormes and tempeſts: and therefore, when they haue vacant times and leiſure, let them build and fortifie caſtels, cut downe and open the paſſes, and doo all ſuch other things as the nature of warres requireth to be preuented. For this people being vncerteine, craftie, and ſubtill, vnder colour of peace, are wont alwaies to be ſtudieng and deuiſing of miſchiefs. And alſo becauſe cauſe it is good to be wiſe by another mans harme, & warie by other mens examples. For nothing doth better teach a man than examples, and the paterns of things done afore time. Let not them forget what became of theſe worthie men, Miles of Cogan, Rafe Fitzſtephans, Hugh de Lacie, Roger Powre, and others, who when they thought of leaſt danger they were in moſt perill: and when they thought themſelues in moſt ſafetie, they were intrapped and deſtroied. For as we haue ſaid in our Topographie; this people is a craftie and a ſubtile people, and more to be feared when it is peace, than when it is open warres: for their peace indeed is but enimitie, their policies but craft, their friendſhips but coloured, and therefore the more to be doubted and feared. And by experience the ſame in ſome part hath beene proued: and therfore, as Euodius ſaith, Let the fall and ruine of things paſt be forewarnings of things to come.

No better teachers than examples.

And becauſe herein a man can not be too wiſe nor warie, it were good that an order were taken (as it is in Sicilia) that none of them ſhould weare anie weapon at all, no not ſo much as a ſtaffe in their hands to walke by. For euen with that weapon, though it be but ſlender, they will (if they can) take the aduantage, and bewreake their malice and cankered ſtomachs. Finallie, forſomuch as the kings of England haue a iuſt title, and a full right to the land of Ireland in ſundrie and diuerſe reſpects; and conſidering alſo that the ſame is chieflie mainteined by the intercourſe and traffike of merchandizes out of England; and without the ſame cannot releeue and helpe it ſelfe; it were verie expedient that for the acknowledging of the one, and for the inioieng of the other, as alſo for the ſupporting of the continuall charges of the king of England there yearelie beſtowed: that there be a yearelie tribute paied and anſwered vnto the kings of England, either in monie, or in ſuch commodities as that land breedeth, aſwell for the continuance of the title in memorie, as alſo for the auoiding of manie inconueniences. And becauſe time weareth awaie, and men do dailie periſh and die, that this order for the perpetuall honour of the king and of his realme, and the memoriall of this conqueſt, the ſame be ingroſſed and regiſtred in a publike inſtrument to indure for euer. And thus hauing ſpoken what we know, and witneſſed what we haue ſeene, we do here end this hiſtorie, leaning vnto others of better knowledge and learning, to continue the ſame as to them ſhall be thought moſt needfull and conuenient.

Thus farre Giraldus Cambrenſis.

The proceſſe of Iriſh affaires (beginning where Giraldus did end) vntill this preſent age, being a witneſſe of ſundrie things as yet freſh in memorie: which proceſſe from henſeforward is intituled the Chronicles of Ireland.

LEauing at the conqueſt of Ireland penned by Giraldus Cambrenſis, we are now to proceed in that which followeth: wherin our authour (as he himſelfe writeth) vſed ſuch notes as were written by one Philip Flatſburie, out of a certeine nameleſſe author, from this place vnto the yeare 1370: and we hauing none other helpe beſides (except onelie Henrie of Marleborow) do ſet downe that which we find in our oft mentioned authour, and in the ſame Marleborow in all the whole diſcourſe that followeth, except in ſome certeine particular places, where we ſhew from whenſe we haue drawne that which we write as occaſion ſerueth.

THE CHRONICLES of Ireland, &c.

HVgh de Lacie (of whom such memorable mention is made hertofore) the rather to meet with such hurlie burlies as were like to put the state of the Irish countrie in danger, if the same were not the sooner brought to quiet, erected and built a number of castels and forts in places conuentientlie seated, well and sufficientlie garnished with men, munitions, and vittels, as one at Derwath, where diuerse of the Irish praied to be set on worke for wages. Lacie came sundrie times thither to further the worke, full glad to see them fall in vse with anie such exercise, wherein might they once begin to haue a delight, and tast the sweetnesse of a true mans life, he thought it no small token of reformation: for which cause he visited them the oftner, and merilie would command his gentlemen to giue the labourers example to take their toles in hand, and to worke a season, whilest the poore soules looking on might rest them. But this pastime grew to a tragicall end. For on a time, as each man was busilie occupied, some lading, some heauing, some plastering, some grauing, the generall also himselfe digging with a pickare: a desperat villaine among them, whose tole the noble man vsed, espieng both his hands occupied, and his bodie inclining downwards, still as he stroke watched when he so stooped, and with an axe cleft his head in sunder, little esteeming the torments that for this traitorous act insued. This Lacie was reputed to be the conqueror of Meth, for that he was the first that brought it to anie due order of obedience vnto the English power. His bodie the two archbishops, John of Dublin, and Matthew of Cashill buried in the monasterie of Bectie, and his head in saint Thomas abbeie at Dublin.

A castell built at Derwath.

1186 Lacie is traitorouslie slaine.

By occasion of this murther committed on the person of Hugh Lacie, John Curcie, and Hugh Lacie the yonger, with their assistants, did streight execution vpon the rebels; and preuenting euerie mischiefe yer it fell, staied the realme from vprores. Thus they knitting themselues togither in friendship, continued in wealth and honor vntill the first yeare of king Johns reigne, who succeeding his brother king Richard, toke his nephue Arthur, son to his brother Geffreie earle of Britaine, and dispatched him (some said) with his owne hands, because he knew what claime he made to the crowne, as descended of the elder brother. And therefore not onelie the French king, but also certeine lords of England and Ireland fauored his title: and when they vnderstood that he was made awaie, they toke it in maruelous euill part. And Curcie either of zeale to the truth, or partialitie, abhorring such barbarous crueltie, whereof all mens eares were full, spake bloudie words against king John, which his lurking aduersaries (that laie readie to vndermine him) caught by the end, and vsed the same as a meane to lift him out of credit: which they did not onelie bring to passe, but also procured a commission to attach his bodie, and to send him ouer into England. Earle Curcie mistrusting his part, and belike getting some inkeling of their drift, kept himselfe aloofe, till Hugh Lacie lord iustice was faine to leuie an armie and to inuade Vlster, from whense he was oftentimes put backe: whereupon he proclaimed Curcie traitor, and hired sundrie gentlemen with promise of great recompense, to bring him in either quicke or dead. They fought once at Downe, in which battell there died no small number on both parts; but Curcie got the vpper hand, and so was the lord iustice foiled at Curcies hands: but yet so long he continued in practising to haue him, that at length Curcies owne capteins were inueigled to betraie their owne maister: insomuch that vpon God fridaie, whilest the earle out of his armour visited barefooted certeine religious houses for deuotion sake, they laid for him, toke him as a rebell, & shipped him ouer into England the next waie, where he was adiudged to perpetuall prison. One Seintleger addeth in his collections (as Campion saith) that Lacie paied the traitors their monie, and forthwith therevpon hanged them.

Curcie bittereth displeasant words against King John.

He is accused.

He is proclaimed traitor.

He is taken.

This Curcie translated the church and prebendaries of the trinitie in Downe, to an abbeie of blacke monks brought thither from Chester, and caused the same to be consecrated vnto saint Patrike: for which alteration, taking the name from God to a creature; he deemed himselfe worthilie punished. Not long after (as saie the Irish) certeine French knights came to king Johns court, and one among them required the combat for triall of the right to the duchie of Normandie. It was not thought expedient to leopard the title vpon one mans lucke, yet the chalenge they determined to answer. Some friend put them in mind of the earle imprisoned, a warrior of notable courage, and in pitch of bodie like a giant. King John demanded Curcie, whether he could be content to fight in his quarrell: Not for thee said the erle, whose person I esteeme vnworthie th'aduenture of my bloud, but for the crowne & dignitie of the realme, in which manie a good man liueth against thy will, I shall be contented to hazard my life.

Translation of prebendaries to monks.

A chalenge for a combat made by certeine French knights.

Curcies answer to king John.

He taketh vpon him to defend the chalenge.

1199. King John slaieth his nephue Arthur.

Curcie and Hugh Lacie the yonger keepe the realme in quiet.

These

These words were not construed in the worst part, as proceeding from an offended mind of him that was therein esteemed moreplaine than wise. Therefore being cherished and much made of, he was fed so wonderfullie (now he came to so large allowance in diet after hard keeping) that the French chalenger tooke him for a monster: and fearing to deale with him, priuilie stole awaie into Spaine. It is further reported, that the French king, being desirous to see Curcie, requested king John that he might come before them, and shew of what strength he was by striking a blow at an helmet. Hereupon forth he was brought, and presented before the kings, where was an helmet set vpon a blocke. Curcie taking a sword in his hand, and with a sterne & frowning countenance cast vpon the kings, gaue such a stroke to the helmet, that cleauing it in sunder, the sword sticked so fast in the log, that no man there was able to plucke it forth, except Curcie himselfe. When he therefore had plucked forth the sword, the kings asked him what he meant to looke vpon them with such a grim & froward countenance before he gaue the blow to the helmet? He answered, that if he had missed in his stroke, he would haue killed all the whole companie, as well the kings as others. Then was he released of bonds, and crossing the seas towards Ireland whither he was bound, was fiftéene times beaten backe againe to the English shore, & going into France to change the coast died there. This Curcie was white of colour, mightie of limbs, with large bones and strong of sinews, tall & broad in proportion of bodie, so as his strength was thought to exceed, of boldnesse incomparable, and a warrior euen from his youth; the formost in the front of euerie battell where he came, and euer readie to hazard himselfe in place of most danger, so forward in fight, that oftentimes forgetting the office of a capteine, he tooke in hand the part of a souldior, pressing forth with the formost, so that with his ouer rash violence, and desire of victorie, he might seeme to put all in danger. But although he was thus hastie and hot in the field against his enimies, yet was he in conuersation modest and sober, and verie religious, hauing churchmen in great reuerence, ascribing all to the goodnesse of God, when he had atchiued anie praise-worthie enterprise, yeelding thankes to his diuine maiestie accordinglie. But as seldome times anie one man is found perfect in all things, so these vertues were spotted with some vices; namelie, too much nigardnesse in sparing, and inconstancie. He maried the daughter of Godred king of Man, and after manie conflicts and battels had against the Irish, he conquered (as before ye haue heard) the countrie of Vlster, and building diuerse strong castels therin, he established the same vnder his quiet rule and gouernment, till he and Lacie fell out, as before is expressed.

Curcie departeth this life.

The description of Curcie.

After Curcies decease, because he left no heires, the earledome of Vlster was giuen vnto Hugh Lacie in recompense of his good seruice. There was one of the Curcies remaining in Ireland that was lord of Rathermie and Kilbarrocke, whome (as an espiall of all their practises and informer thereof to the king) Walter and Hugh the sons of Hugh Lacie slue, by reason whereof great trouble and disquietnesse insued: those Lacies bearing themselues (now after the decease of their father) for gouernors out of checke. To set the realme in quiet, king John was faine to passe thither himselfe in person with a maine armie, banished the Lacies, subdued the residue of the countrie yet not conquered, tooke pledges, punished malefactors, established the execution of English lawes, coined monie of like value currant sterling in both realmes. The two Lacies repenting their misdemeanors, fled into France disguised in poore apparell, and serued there in an abbeie as gardeners, till the abbat by their countenance and behauior began to gesse their estates, and opposed them so farre that they disclosed what they were; beseeching the abbat to keepe their counsels, who commending their repentant humblenes, aduised them yet to make suite for their princes fauor, if it might be had, promising to doo what he could in the matter, and so tooke vpon him to be a suter for them vnto the king that was his godcept and well acquainted with him. He trauelled so earnestlie herein, that at length he obteined their pardons: but yet they were fined, Walter at foure thousand, and Hugh at fiue and twentie hundred markes: and herevpon Walter was restored vnto the lordship of Meth, and Hugh to the earledome of Vlster.

King John went into Ireland.

See more hereof in England.

They fled into France.

They are pardoned, and put to their fines.

King John apointed his lieutenants in Ireland, and returning home, subdued the Welchmen, and soone after with Pandulfus the legat of pope Innocentius the third, who came to release him of the censure, wherin he stood excommunicat, to whom as to the popes legat he made a personall surrender of both realmes in waie of submission; and after he was once absolued, he receiued them againe. Some adde, that he gaue awaie his kingdoms to the see of Rome for him and his successors, recognising to hold the same of the popes in fee, paieng yearelie therefore one thousand markes, as seauen hundred for England, and three hundred for Ireland. Blondus saith, Centum pro vtroque auri marchias. Sir Thomas Moore (as Campion saith) a man both in calling & office likelie to sound the matter to the depth, writeth precíselie, that neither such writing the pope can shew, neither were it effectuall if he could. How farre forth, and with what limitation a prince may or may not addict his realme feodarie to another, Iohn Maior a Scotish chronicler, and a Sorbonist not vnlearned partlie scanneth, who thinketh three hundred markes for Ireland no verie hard pennworth. The instrument (as Campion thinketh) which our English writers rehearse, might haplie be motioned and drawen, and yet not confirmed with anie seale, nor ratified: but though the copie of this writing remaine in record, yet certeine it is, king Johns successors neuer paid it. After John Comin archbishop of Dublin, and founder of saint Patriks church succéeded Henrie Londores in the see, who builded the kings castell there, being lord chéefe iustice of Ireland, him they nicknamed (as the Irish doo commonlie giue additions in respect of some fact or qualitie) Scorchuillein, that is, Burnebill, because he required to peruse the writings of his tenants, colorablie pretending to learne the kind of ech mans seuerall tenure, and burned the same before their faces, causing them either to renew their takings, or to hold at will.

In hundred marks of gold. Blondus.

John Bale in his apologie against vows.

In the yeare one thousand two hundred and sixtéene king John departed this life. In his daies diuerse monasteries were builded in Ireland, as (beside those that before are mentioned) in the fourth yeare of his reigne the abbeie of Dowish was founded; in the first the abbeie of Wetherham in the countie of Limerike, by Theobald le Butler lord of Cacrackie, and in the twelfe yeare Richard Dute builded the monasterie of Grenard. In the daies of Henrie the third that succéeded his father king John great warres were raised in Ireland betwixt Hugh Lacie & William Marshall, so that the countrie of Meth was grieuouslie afflicted. In the yeare of our Lord 1228, after the death of Londores archbishop of Dublin, that was lord chéefe iustice, king Henrie the third vnderstanding the good seruice done by the Giraldines euer since their first comming into Ireland, although by wrong re-

Henrie the third.

Warres betwixt Lacie and Marshall.

1228

The Giraldines.

poꝛts the ſame had bæne to their pꝛeiudice foꝛ a time ſiniſterlie miſconſtrued, ſo as the gentlemen had ſtill bæne kept backe, and not rewarded according to their deſerts. The king now informed of the truth made Moꝛice Fitzgerald the ſonne of Moꝛice aforeſaid loꝛd chæfe iuſtice of Ireland. Lucas ſucceæded Londꝛes in the archbiſhops ſæ, and was conſecrated.

Moꝛice Fitzgirald.
Lucas archbiſhop.

1230 In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed and thirtie, Richard Marſhall was taken pꝛiſoner in battell at Kildare. Some wꝛite that he was wounded there, 1234 and within few daies after died of the hurt at Kilkennie, and was buried there in the quære of the church of the friers pꝛeachers, nære to the place where his bꝛother William was interred, who departed this life in the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed thirtie and one.

1241 In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed foꝛtie and one, Walter Lacie loꝛd of Meth departed this life in England: he left two daughters behind him that were his heires, Margaret married to the loꝛd Uerdon, and Matild the wife of Geffrie Genuill. King Henrie in the ſix & thirtith yeare of his reigne, gaue to Edward his eldeſt ſonne, Gaſcoigne, Ireland, and the countie of Cheſter. In the yeare following,

The loꝛd Uerdon.
Geffreie Genuill.
1252
1253 Hugh Lacie earle of Ulſter departed this life, and was buried at Cragfergus, in the church of the friers minoꝛs, leaning a daughter behind him, that was his heire, whome Walter de Burgh oꝛ Bourke married, and in right of hir was created earle of Ulſter, as after ſhall apeare. Moꝛice Fitzgirald loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland, being requeſted by this pꝛince to come and aſſiſt him with a power of men againſt the Welſh rebels, left a ſufficient garriſon of men in the caſtell of Scligath, which he had latelie builded, and then came ouer with Phelin Ochonher, and a luſtie band of ſouldiers: & mæting the pꝛince at Chepſtow, behaued themſelues ſo valiantlie, that returning with victoꝛie, they greatlie increaſed the fauoꝛ of the king and pꝛince towards them; and vpon their returne into Ireland, they ioined with Coꝛmacke Mac Dermot Mac Koꝛie, and made a notable iournie againſt Odonill the Iriſh enimie, that when Lacie was once dead, inuaded & ſoꝛe annoied the kings ſubiects of Ulſter. Odonill being vanquiſhed, the loꝛd iuſtice foꝛced pledges and tribute of Oneale to kæpe the kings peace, and diuerſe other exploits pꝛaiſe-woꝛthie did he, during the time of his gouernment, as Flatsburie hath gathered in his notes foꝛ the loꝛd Girald Fitzgirald earle of Kildare, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundꝛed and ſeuentæne. After Moꝛice Fitzgirald ſucceæded in office of loꝛd iuſtice, John Fitzgeffrie knight, and after him Alaine de la Zouch, whome the earle of Surrie Fitzwarren ſlue. And after de la Zouch, in the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed fiftie and eight, being the two and foꝛtith of Henrie the third his reigne, was Stephan de long Eſpæ ſent to ſuplie that ꝛome, who ſlue Oneale with thꝛæ hundꝛed fiftie & two of his men in the ſtæts of Dowme, and ſhoꝛtlie after departed this life; then William Dene was made loꝛd iuſtice, and Græne caſtell was deſtroied. Alſo Mac Careie plaid the diuell in Deſmond.

The caſtell of Scligath.
Odonill.
John Fitzgeffrie loꝛd iuſtice.
Alaine de la Zouch loꝛd iuſtice.
Stephan de long Eſpæ.
William Dene loꝛd iuſtice.
Græne caſtell deſtroied.
Mac Careie.

1261 In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſixtie and one, ſir William Dene loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland deceaſed, and ſir Richard Rochell (oꝛ Capell as ſome copies haue) was ſent to be loꝛd iuſtice after him, who greatlie enuied the familie of the Giraldins; during his gouernement the loꝛd John Fitzthomas and the loꝛd Moꝛice his ſon were ſlaine. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſixtie and foure, Walter de Burgh was made earle of Ulſter, and Moꝛice Fitzmoꝛice toke the loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland togither with Theobald Butler, Miles Cogan, and diuerſe other great loꝛds at Triſtildermot, on ſaint Nicholas daie. And ſo was Ireland full of warres, betwixt the Burghs and Giraldins. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſixtie and ſix, there chanced an earthquake in Ireland. In the yeare following, king Henrie toke vp the variance that was in Ireland betwixt the parties, and diſcharging Dene, appointed Dauid Barrie loꝛd iuſtice in his place, who tamed the inſolent dealings of Moꝛice Fitzmoꝛice, couſine germane to Fitzgirald.

Sir Richard Capell loꝛd iuſtice.
Loꝛd John Fitzthomas ſlaine.
The loꝛd iuſtice taken.

1266
1267
Dauid Barrie loꝛd iuſtice.

In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſixtie and eight, Conhur Obꝛen was ſlaine by Dermot Mac Monerd, and Moꝛice Fitzgirald earle of Deſmond was dꝛowned in the ſea, betwixt Wales & Ireland. And Robert Uffoꝛt was ſent ouer to remaine loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland, and Barrie was diſcharged, who continued till the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſixtie and nine, and then was Richard de Erceſter made loꝛd iuſtice. And in the yeare following, was the loꝛd James Audleie made loꝛd iuſtice. Richard Uerdon, and John Uerdon were ſlaine, and Fulke archbiſhop of Dublin deceaſed. Alſo the caſtels of Aldlecke, Roſcoman, & Scheligagh, were deſtroied. The ſame yeare was a great dearth and moꝛtalitie in Ireland. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeuentie & two, the loꝛd James Audleie was ſlaine by a fall from his hoꝛſe in Thomond, and then was Moꝛice Fitzmoꝛice made loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland, and the caſtell of Kandon was deſtroied. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeauentie and two, king Henrie the third departed this life, and the loꝛd Walter Genuill latelie returned home from his iournie into the holie land, was ſent into Ireland, and made loꝛd iuſtice there. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeuentie and fiue, the caſtell of Roſcoman was eſtſoones repared and foꝛtified.

Robert Uffoꝛt.
Richard de Erceſter.
1270
1271
The loꝛd Audleie.
Kandon.
The deceaſe of king Henrie the third.
1272
Walter Genuill.
1275

In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeuentie and ſix, there was an ouerthꝛow giuen at Glenburie, where William Fitzroger, pꝛioꝛ of the knights hoſpitalers, & manie other with him, were taken pꝛiſoners, and a great number of other were ſlaine. The ſame yeare, John de Uerdon departed this woꝛld, and Thomas de Clare maried the daughter of Moꝛice Fitzmoꝛice. In the yeare following, Robert Uffoꝛt was apointed to ſuplie the ꝛome of Genuill, being called home, and ſo was this Uffoꝛt the ſecond time oꝛdeined loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland. He hauing occaſion to paſſe into England, made his ſubſtitute Fulboꝛne biſhop of Waterfoꝛd till his returne, and then reſumed the gouernement into his owne hands againe. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeauentie and ſeauen, Thomas de Clare ſlue Obꝛenroth king of Tholethmond: and yet after this the Iriſh cloſed him vp in Slewbani, togither with Maurice Fitzmaurice, ſo that they gaue hoſtages to eſcape, and the caſtell of Roſcoman was wone. In the yere next inſuing, was John de Derlington conſecrated archbiſhop of Dublin. There was alſo a councell holden at Grenoke, and Mac Dermot ſlue Cathgur Oconchir king of Connagh. In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed ſeuentie and nine, Robert Uffoꝛt vpon occaſion of buſines came ouer into England, and left frier Fulboꝛne biſhop of Waterfoꝛd to ſuplie his ꝛome, and Rafe Pipard and Dhaulan chaſed Oneale in a battell.

In the yeare one thouſand two hundꝛed and foure ſcoꝛe, Robert Uffoꝛt came the third time to occupie the ꝛome of loꝛd chiefe iuſtice in Ireland, reſuming that ꝛome into his hands againe. In the yeare following, the biſhop of Waterfoꝛd was eſtabliſhed by the king of England loꝛd iuſtice of Ireland. Adam Cuſacke the yonger ſlue William Barret, and manie other in Connagh. And in the next yeare, to wit, one thouſand two hundꝛed foure ſcoꝛe and two, Penqueit ſlue Murertagh, & his bꝛother Art Mac Murgh

1276
An ouerthꝛow at Glenburie.
1277
1278
1280
1281

at

at Athlon. Also the lord James de Birmingham, and Piers de Tute departed this life. Also the archbishop Derlington deceased. And about the same time, the citie of Dublin was defaced by fire, and the steeple of Christs church vtterlie destroied. The citizens before they went about to repare their owne priuat buildings, agreed togither to make a collection for reparing the ruines of that ancient building first begun by the Danes, and continued by Citrius prince of Dublin at the instance of Donat sometime bishop of that citie, and dedicated to the blessed trinitie.

Christ church repared.

Donat bishop of Dublin.

At length Strangbow earle of Penbroke, Fitzstephans, & Laurence, that for his vertue was called saint Laurence archbishop of Dublin, and his foure successors, John of Cuesham, Henrie Scortchbill, and Lucas, and last of all John de saint Paule finished it. This notable building, since the time that it was thus defaced by fire, hath beene beautified in diuerse sorts by many zealous citizens. Strangbowes tome defaced, by the fall of the roofe of the church, sir Henrie Sidneie, when he was lord deputie, restored; & likewise did cost vpon the earle of Kildares chappell for an ornament to the quier, ouer the which he left also a monument of capteine Randolfe, late coronell of the English bands of footmen in Ulster that died there valiantlie, fighting in his princes seruice, as after shall appeare. In the yeare one thousand two hundred foure score and three, Furmund chancellor of Ireland, and Richard Tute departed this life, and frier Stephan Fulborne was made lord iustice of Ireland.

Strangbowes tome restored by Henrie Sidneie.

Capteine Randolfe.

1285 In the yeare 1285, the lord Theobald Butler fled from Dubline, and died shortlie after, and the lord Theobald Verdon lost his men and horsses as he went towards Offalie, & the next day Gerald Fitzmaurice was taken, and John Samford was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. Moreouer at Rathod, the lord Geffrete Genuill fled, and sir Gerard Doget, and Rafe Petit were slaine, with a great number of others. The Norwagh and Ardscoll with other townes and villages were burnt by Philip Stanton the sixteenth daie of Nouember, in the yeare 1286. Also Calwagh was taken at Kildare. In the yeare 1287, diuerse nobles in Ireland deceased, as Richard Deceter, Gerald Fitzmaurice, Thomas de Clare, Richard Taffe, & Nicholas Teling knights. The yeare next insuing, deceased frier Fulborne lord iustice of Ireland, and John Samford archbishop of Dublin was aduanced to the roome of lord iustice. Also Richard Burgh earle of Ulster besieged Theobald Verdon in the castell of Athlon, and came with a great power vnto Trim, by the working of Walter Lacie.

John Samford consecrated archbishop of Dublin.

In ouerthrow at Rathod.

Norwagh and Ardscol burnt

1286

1288 Samford archbishop of Dublin lord iustice.

1290 In the yeare 1290, was the chase or discomfiture of Offalie, & diuerse Englishmen slaine. Also Mac Coghlan slue Omolaghelin king of Meth, and William Burgh was discomfited at Deluin by Mac Coghlan. The same yeare 1290, William Vescie was made lord iustice of Ireland, and entered into that office on S. Martins daie. Vnto this iustice, Edward Baliol king of Scotland did homage for an earledome which he held in Ireland, in like maner as he did to king Edward for the crowne of Scotland. In the yeare 1292, a fifteenth was granted to the king, of all the temporall goods in Ireland, whilest Vescie was as yet lord iustice. This Vescie was a sterne man and full of courage, he called John earle of Kildare before him, charging him with foule riots and misdemeanors, for that he ranged abroad, and sought reuenge vpon priuat displeasures out of all order, and not for anie aduancement of the publike wealth or seruice of his souereigne.

William Vescie lord iustice.

1292

The earle of Kildare.

The earle as impatient to heare himselfe tou-ched as the iustice to suffer euill doing, answered thus. By your honor and mine (my lord) and by king Edwards hand (for that was accompted no small oth in those daies among the Irish) you would if you durst apeach me in plaine termes of treason or felonie: for where I haue the title, and you the fleece of Kildare, I wote well how great an eiesore I am in your sight, so that if I might be handsomlie trussed vp for a fellon, then might my master your sonne become a gentleman. A gentleman quoth the iustice, thou proud earle: I tell thee, the Vescies were gentlemen before Kildare was an earledome: and before that Welsh bankrupt thy cousine fethered his nest in Leinster. But seeing thou darest me, I will suerlie breake thy heart. And therwith he called the earle a notorious theefe and a murtherer. Then followed facing and bracing among the souldiers, with high words, and terrible swearing on both sides, vntill either part appeased his owne.

The lord iustice shortlie after, leauing his deputie William Hale, tooke the sea, and hasted ouer to the king. The earle immediatlie followed, and as he nouslie as the lord iustice accused him of felonie, Kildare no lesse appealed him of treason. For triall hereof, the earle asked the combat, and Vescie refused not: but yet when the lists were prouided, Vescie was slipt awaie into France, and so disherited of all his lands in the countie of Kildare, which were bestowed vpon the earle and his heires for euer. The earle waxing lostie of mind in such prosperous successe, squared with diuerse nobles, English and Irish of that land. The same yeare died John Samford archbishop of Dublin, and John Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, and John de la Mare tooke prisoners, Richard Burgh earle of Ulster, and William Burgh within the countrie of Meth, and the castell of Kildare was taken, and all the countrie wasted by the English on the one side, and the Irish on the other, and Calwagh burnt all the rolles and tallies concerning the records & accompts of that countie. Great dearth and death reigned in Ireland this yeare, and the two yeares next insuing. The earle of Kildare detained the earle of Ulster prisoner, vntill by authoritie of a parlement holden at Kilkennie, he was deliuered out of the castell of Lese, for his two sonnes, and for the inuasion which the earle of Kildare had made into Meth, and other his vnrulie and misordred parts, was disseized of the castell of Sligagh, and of all his lands in Connagh.

1294 The death of the archbishop Samford.

The earle of Ulster taken prisoner.

Great dearth and death.

William Dodingsels being this yeare made lord iustice of Ireland, after Vescie died, in the yeare next following, that is 1295, and the three and twentith of king Edward the first. After him succeeded in that roome the lord Thomas Fitzmaurice. In the yeare 1296, frier William de Bothum was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. In the yeare 1298, and six and twentith of Edward the first, the lord Thomas Fitzmaurice departed this life, and an agreement was made betwixt the earle of Ulster and the lord John Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, by John Wogan that was ordeined lord iustice of Ireland. In the yeare 1299 William archbishop of Dublin departed this life, and Richard de Ffingis was consecrated archbishop in his place. The king went vnto John Wogan lord iustice, commanding him to giue summons vnto the nobles of Ireland, to prepare themselues with horsse and armor to come in their best arraie for the warre, to serue him against the Scots: and withall wrote vnto the same nobles, as to Richard de Burgh earle of Ulster, Geffrete de Genuill, John Fitzthomas, Thomas Fitzmaurice, Theobald lord Butler, Theobald lord Verdon, Piers lord Birmingham of Thetemoie, Eustace lord Powre, Hugh lord Purcell, John de Cogan, John William Dodingsels lord iustice.

1295 Thomas Fitzmaurice lord iustice.

1296

1298 Rec. Turris.

1299

de Barrie, William de Barrie, Walter de Laffice, Richard de Ercester, John Pipurd, Walter Lenfant, John of Oxford, Adam de Stanton, Simon de Pheibe, William Cadell, John de Vale, Maurice de Carre, George de la Roch, Maurice de Rochford, and Maurice Fitzthomas de Kerto, commanding them to be with him at Withwelaun the first of March. Such a precept I remember I haue read, registred in a close roll among the records of the tower. But where Marlburrow saith, that the said John Wogan lord iustice of Ireland, and the lord John Fitzthomas, with manie others, came to king Edward into Scotland, in the nine and twentith yeare of king Edwards reigne, Campion noteth it to be in the yere 1299, which fell in the seuen & twentith of the reigne of king Edward: & if my remembrance faile me not, the close roll aforementioned beareth date of the foure and twentith yeare of king Edwards reigne. All which notes may be true, for it is verie like, that in those warres against the Scots, the king sent diuerse times to the Irish lords to come to serue him, as it behoued them to do by their tenures: and not onelie he sent into Ireland to haue the seruices of men, but also for prouision of vittels, as in close rolles I remember I haue also séene recorded of the seauen and twentith and thirtith yeare of the said king Edward the first his reigne. For this we find in a certeine abstract of the Irish chronicles, which should séeme to be collected out of Flatsburie, whom Campion so much followed, that in the yeare 1301, the lord John Wogan lord iustice, John Fitzthomas, Peter Birmingham, & diuerse others went into Scotland in aid of king Edward, in which yeare also a great part of the citie of Dublin, with the church of saint Werburgh was burnt in the night of the feast daie of saint Colme. Also the lord Genuill married the daughter of John de Montfort, and the lord John Mortimer married the daughter and heire of Peter Genuill, also the lord Theobald de Verdon married the daughter of the lord Roger Mortimer. The same yeare in the winter season, the Irish of Leinster raised warre against the townes of Wicklow and Rathdon, doing much hurt by burning in the countrie all about: but they were chastised for their wickednesse, losing the most part of their prouision and cattell. And in the Lent season the more part of them had béene vtterlie destroied, if discord and variance had not risen among the Englishmen, to the impeachment of their purposed enterprises.

Chr. Pembrig.

1301 Irishmen inuade Scotland.

In haruest there were three hundred théeues slaine by the Phelanes. Also Walter le Power wasted a great part of Mounster, burning manie farmes and places in that countrie. In the yeare 1302, pope Boniface demanded a tenth of all the spirituall liuings in England and Ireland, for the space of three yeares, to mainteine wars in defense of the church of Rome, against the king of Arragon. In the yeare 1303, the earle of Ulster, and Richard Burgh, and sir Eustace le Power, with a puissant armie entered Scotland. The earle made three and thirtie knights at Dublin, before he set forwards. The same yeare Girald, sonne and heire to the lord John Fitzthomas departed this life, and likewise the countesse of Ulster. William de Wellisleie, and sir Robert de Perssnall were slaine the two and twentith of October. In the yeare 1304, a great part of the citie of Dublin was burnt by casuall fire. In the yeare next insuing, Jordaine Comin with his complices slue Maritagh Oconhur king of Offalie, and his brother Calwagh, with diuerse others within the court of Piers de Birmingham at Carricke in Carbrie. Also sir Gilbert Sutton steward of Werford was slaine by the Irishmen, neere to the farme of Heimond de Grace, which Heimond bare himselfe right valiantlie in that fight, and in the end through his great manhood escaped.

Walter Power.

1302

1303 The earle of Ulster.

1304

In the yeare 1306 a great slaughter was made in Offalie neere to the castell of Geischill, the thirteenth daie of Aprill vpon Oconhur and his frends by the Odempsies, in the which place were slaine a great number of men. Also Brien king of Thomond was slaine. Moreouer, Donald Oge Mac Arthie slue Donald Kulle king of Desmond. And vpon the twelfe of Maie in the confins of Meth, a great ouerthrow chanced to the side of the lord Piers Butler, and Balimore in Leinster was burnt by the Irish, where Henrie Telse was slaine at that present time. Hereof followed great wars betwixt the English and Irish in Leinster, so that a great armie was called togither forth of diuerse parts of Ireland, to restreine the malice of the Irish in Leinster, in which iournie sir Thomas Mandeuill knight entred into a conflict with the Irish neere to Glensell, in the which he bare himselfe right manfullie, till his horse was slaine vnder him, and yet then to his great praise and high commendation he saued both himselfe and manie of his companie. The lord chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Caucocke, was consecrated bishop of Imaleie within the Trinitie church at Dublin, and kept such a feast as the like had not lightlie bene séene nor heard of before that time in Ireland, first to the rich & after to the poore. Richard Flerings archbishop of Dublin deceased on the euen of saint Luke the euangelist, to whom succéeded Richard de Hauerings, who after he had continued in that sée about a fiue yeares, resigned it ouer by dispensation obteined from Rome, and then his nephue John Lech was admitted archbishop there.

1306 A discomfiture at Offalie.

Balimore burnt.

warres in Leinster.

The lord chancellor consecrated bishop of Imaleie.

The archbishop of Dublin deceased.

In the yeare 1307 the first of Aprill, Murcod Ballagh was beheaded neere to Perton by sir Dauid Caunton knight, and shortlie after was Adam Daune slaine. Also, a great discomfiture and slaughter fell vpon the Englishmen in Connagh by the Oscheles the first daie of Maie, and the robbers that dwelt in the parties of Offalie raised the castell of Geischell, and in the vigill of the translation of Thomas Becket, being the first of Julie, they burnt the towne of Leie and besieged the castell: but they were constreined to depart from thense shortlie after, by John Fitzthomas and Edmund Butler that came to remoue that siege. In the yeare 1308 king Edward the first departed this life the seuenth of Julie.

1307

A discōfiture in Connagh.

1308

Edward the second.

RIchard archbishop of Dublin, after that he had gouerned that sée the space of fiue yeares, by reason of a vision that he saw in his sléepe, féeling himselfe troubled in conscience, with consideration of that dreame, resigned the next morrow all his title to the archbishops dignitie (as before ye haue heard) and contented himselfe with other ecclesiasticall benefices as séemed conuenient to his estate. This yeare by vertue of letters directed from the pope to the king of England, he caused all the Templers as well in England as Ireland to be apprehended, and committed to safe kéeping. The profession of these Templers began at Jerusalem, by certeine gentlemen that remained in an hostell néere to the temple, who till the councell of Trois in France were not increased aboue the number of nine, but from that time forth in little more than fiftie yeares, by the zealous contribution of all christian 1300 The order of the Templers suppressed.

ſtian realmes, they had houſes erected euerie where, with liuings bountifullie aſſigned to the ſame for their maintenance, in ſo much as they were augmented vnto the number of three hundred, that were knights of that order, beſide inferiour brethren innumerable: but now with wealth they ſo forgot themſelues, that they nothing leſſe regarded, than the purpoſe of their foundation: and withall being accuſed of horrible hereſies (whether in all things iuſtlie or otherwiſe, the Lord knoweth) they were in the counſell at Lions in France condemned, and their liuings tranſpoſed to the knights Hoſpitalers, otherwiſe called the knights of the Rhodes, and now of Malta. The manner of their apprehenſion and committing was ſudden, and ſo generall in all places vpon one daie, that they had no time to ſhift for themſelues.

For firſt, the king ſent forth a precept to euerie ſhiriffe within the realme of England, commanding them within each of their roomes to cauſe a preſcribed number of knights, or rather ſuch men of credit, on whoſe fidelities he might aſſure himſelfe to aſſemble at a certeine towne named in the ſame writ, the ſundaie next after the Epiphanie, & that ech of the ſame ſhiriffes failed not to be there the ſame daie, to execute all that ſhould be intoined them by anie other writ, then and there to be deliuered. The ſhiriffe of Yorke was commanded to giue ſummons to foure and twentie ſuch knights, or other ſufficient men to met him at Yorke. The ſhiriffe of Norfolke and Suffolke, to ſummon twentie to meet him at Thetford. The other ſhiriffs were apointed to call to them ſome ten, ſome twelue, or ſome fourteene, to met them at ſuch townes as in their writs were named. The date of this writ was from Weſtminſter the fifteenth of December, in the firſt yeare of this king Edward the ſeconds reigne. The other writ was ſent by a chapleine authorized both to deliuer the ſame writ, and to take an oth of the ſhiriffe, that he ſhould not diſcloſe the contents, till he had put the ſame in execution, which was to attach by aſſiſtance of thoſe aforementioned knights, or as manie of them as he thought expedient to vſe, all the Templers within the precinct of his rome, and to ſeize all their lands, goods, and cattels into the kings hands, and to cauſe an inuentarie of the ſame indented be made in preſence of the warden of the place, whether he were knight of the order or anie other, and in the preſence of other honeſt men neighbours thereabouts, keeping the one counterpane with himſelfe, ſealed with his ſeale that made the ſeizure, and leauing the other in the hands of the ſaid warden: and further to ſee the ſame goods and cattels to be put in ſafe keeping, and to prouide that the quicke goods might be well kept and loked vnto, and the grounds manured to the moſt profit, and to cauſe the bodies of the Templers attached, to be ſo detained in all ſafetie, as that they be not yet committed to irons nor to ſtrict priſon, but to remaine in ſome conuenient place other than their owne houſes, and to be found of the goods ſo ſeized accordinglie as falleth for their eſtates, till he haue other wiſe in commandement from the king: and what is done herein, to certifie into the exchequer the morrow after the purification. The date of this ſecond writ was from Biſlet the twentith of December. There was likewiſe a writ directed to John Wogan lord iuſtice of Ireland, ſignifieng vnto him what ſhould be done in England, touching the apprehenſion of the Templers, and ſeizure of their lands and goods, commanding him to proceed in ſemblable manner againſt them in Ireland: but the daie and place when the ſhiriffes ſhould there aſſemble, was left to the diſcretion of the ſaid iuſtice and treaſuror of the exchequer there, but ſo as the ſame might be done before anie rumour of this thing could be brought ouer out of England thither. Alſo a like commandement was ſent vnto John de Britaine earle of Richmond, lord warden of Scotland, and to Euſtace Coteſbach chamberleine of Scotland, alſo to Walter de Pederton lord iuſtice of weſt Wales, to Hugh Aldigheigh alias Auderleie lord iuſtice of north Wales, and to Robert Holland lord iuſtice of Cheſter. Thus much for the Temples. But now to other doings in Ireland.

In the yeare 1308 the twelfe of Aprill deceaſed Peter de Birmingham a noble warriour, and one that had beene no ſmall ſcourge to the Iriſh. The eleuenth of Maie the caſtell of Kennun was burnt, and diuers of them that had it in keeping were ſlaine by William Macbalther, and other of the Iriſh, and likewiſe the towne of Courcoulie was burnt by the ſame malefactors. And the firſt of June, John lord Wogan lord iuſtice was diſcomfited neere to Glindelorie, where John de S. Hogelin, John Norton, John Breton, and manie other were ſlaine. The ſixteenth of June, Dunlovan, Tobir, and manie other townes were burnt by the Iriſh rebels. About this ſeaſon, John Decer maior of Dublin builded the high pipe there, & the bridge ouer the Liffie towards S. Uliſtons, and a chappell of our ladie at the friers minors, where he was buried, repared the church of the friers preachers, and euerie fridaie tabled the friers at his owne coſts.

1308 This Macbalther was after hanged at Dublin. The lord iuſtice diſcomfited. 1308 John Decer maior of Dublin.

John Wogan hauing occaſion to paſſe into England, William Burgh did ſupplie his rome, vnto whom king Edward recommended Piers de Gaueſton, when (contrarie to the kings mind) he was baniſhed by the lords of England, and about the natiuitie of our ladie he came ouer into Ireland, being ſent thither by the king with manie iewels: and beſide the letters which he brought of recommendation from the king, he had aſſigned to him the commodities roiall of that realme, which bred ſome trouble and bickerings there, betwixt Richard Burgh earle of Ulſter, and the ſaid Gaueſton, who notwithſtanding bought the good willes of the ſouldiers with his liberalitie, ſlue Dermot Odempſie, ſubdued Obren, edified ſundrie caſtels, cauſeies, and bridges, but the next yeare he was reuoked home by the king, as in the hiſtorie of England it maie apeare.

Burgh. Piers Gaueſton ſent into Ireland.

In the vigill of Simon and Jude, the lord Roger Mortimer landed in Ireland with his wife, right heire to the ſeignirie of Meth, as daughter to Piers Genuill, that was ſonne to the lord Geffreie Genuill, which Geffreie became a frier at Trim of the order of the preachers: by reaſon whereof, the lord Mortimer and his wife entered into poſſeſſion of the lands of Meth. In the yeare 1309, on Candlemas day, the lord John Bonneuill was ſlaine neere to the towne of Ardſcoll, by the lord Arnold Powre and his complices, his bodie was buried at Athie in the church of the friers preachers. In the yere following, at a parlement holden at Kildare, the lord Arnold Powre was acquit of that ſlaughter, for that it was proued it was done in his owne defenſe. In the yeare 1311, or (as ſome bookes haue) the yeare 1309, Wogan lord iuſtice ſummoned a parlement at Kilkennie, where diuerſe wholeſome lawes were ordeined, but neuer executed. There fell the biſhops in contention about their iuriſdictions, namelie the biſhop of Dublin forbad the primat of Armagh to raiſe his croiſier within the prouince of Leinſter.

Lord Roger Mortimer. 1309 Lord John Bonneuill ſlaine. 1310 1311 A parlement at Kilkennie. Campion.

Shortlie after, Rowland Joice the primat ſtale by night (in his pontificals) from Howth to the priorie of Grace Dieu, where the biſhops ſeruants met him, & with force chaſed him out of the dioceſſe. This biſhop was named John a Leekes, and was conſecrated not long before he kept this sturre. Richard earle of Ulster with a great armie came to Monrath in Thomond, where as sir Robert or rather sir Richard de Clare discomfited his power, toke sir William de Burgh prisoner, or (as some bookes haue) the earle himselfe. John Lacie the sonne of Walter Lacie, and diuerse others were slaine. The twelfe of November this yere, Richard de Clare slue sir hundred Galloglasses, and John Morgoghedan was slaine by Omolmoie. Also Donat Obren was murthered by his owne men in Thomond.

Sir Richard de Clare.

John Lacie slaine.

1312 Robert Uerdon raiseth a riotous tumult. John Wogan lord iustice.

The one and twentith of Februarie began a riot in Argile by Robert Uerdon, for the appeasing wherof an armie was lead thither by John Wogan lord chiefe iustice in the beginning of Julie, but the same was discomfited, and diuerse men of account slaine, as sir Nicholas Auenell, Patrike de Roch, & others. At length yet the said sir Robert Uerdon, and many of his complices came and submitted themselues to prison within the castell of Dublin, abiding there the kings mercie. The lord Edmund Butler was made deputie iustice vnder the lord John Wogan, who in the Lent next insuing besieged the Obrens in Glindelow, and compelled them to yeld themselues to the kings peace. Also in the yeare aboue said 1312, Maurice Fitzthomas maried the ladie Katharine, daughter to the earle of Ulster at Greene castell, and Thomas Fitziohn maried an other of the said earles daughters in the same place, but not on the same daie: for the first of those two mariages was celebrated the morrow after saint Dominikes daie, and this second mariage was kept the morrow after the feast of the assumption of our ladie. Also Robert de Bruse ouerthrew the castell of Pan, and toke the lord Donegan Odowill on saint Barnabies daie.

1313 Campion.

In the yeare 1313, John a Lekes archbishop of Dublin departed this life: after whose decease were elected in schisme and diuision of sides two successors, Walter Thorneburie lord chancellor, and Alexander Bignor treasuror of Ireland. The chancellor to strengthen his election, hastilie went to sea, and togither with an hundred and fiftie and six persons perished by shipwracke. The other submitting his cause to the processe of law, taried at home and sped. Moreouer, the lord John de Burgh, sonne and heire to the earle of Ulster, deceased at Galbie on the feast daie of saint Marcell & Marcelline. Also the lord Edmund Butler created thirtie knights in the castle of Dublin on saint Michaels daie being sundaie. The knights hospitalers or of saint Johns (as they were called) were inuested in the lands of the Templers in Ireland. The same yeare was the lord Theobald Uerdon sent lord iustice into Ireland.

The earle of Ulsters sonne and heire deceaseth.

1314

1315 Edward Bruse inuadeth Ireland.

In the ninth yeare of king Edwards reigne, Edward Bruse, brother to Robert Bruse king of Scots, entered the north part of Ireland with six thousand men. There were with him diuerse capteins of high renowme among the Scotish nation, of whome the chiefe were these: the earles of Murrie and Mentith, the lord John Steward, the lord John Campbell, the lord Thomas Randolfe, Fergus de Andresan, John Wood, and John Bisset. They landed nere to Cragfergus in Ulster the fiue & twentith of Maie, and ioining with the Irish, conquered the earledome of Ulster, and gaue the English there diuerse great ouerthrowes, toke the towne of Dundalke, spoiled & burnt it, with a great part of Argile: they burnt churches & abbeies, with the people whom they found in the same, sparing neither man, woman nor child. Then was the lord Edmund Butler chosen lord iustice, who made the earle of Ulster and the Giraldines friends, and reconciled himselfe with sir John Mandeuill, thus seeking to preserue the residue of the realme which Edward Bruse meant wholie to conquer, hauing caused himselfe to be crowned king of Ireland. The lord iustice assembled a great power out of Mounster, and Leinster, and other parts thereabouts, and the earle of Ulster with another armie came vnto him nere vnto Dundalke, where they consulted togither how to deale in defending the countrie against the enimies: but hearing the Scots were withdrawne backe, the earle of Ulster folowed them, and fighting with them at Coiners, hee lost the field.

Captens of name with Bruse.

Dundalke taken and burnt

Edmund Butler lord iustice.

There were manie slaine on both parts, and William de Burgh the earls brother, sir John Mandeuill, and sir Alane Fitzalane were taken prisoners. Herewith the Irish of Connagh and Meth began forthwith to rebell against the Englishmen, and burnt the castell of Athlon and Randon. And the Bruse comming forward burnt Kenlis in Meth, and Granard, also Finnagh, and Newcastell, and kept his Christmas at Loghsudie. From thense he went through the countrie vnto Kashimegan and Kildare, and to the parties about Tristeldermot and Athie, then to Raban, Sketlier, & nere to Ardstoll in Leinster: where the lord iustice Butler, the lord John Fitzthomas, the lord Arnold Powre, and other the lords and gentlemen of Leinster and Mounster came to incounter the Bruse: but through discord that rose among them, they left the field vnto the enimies, sir William Pendergast knight, and Heimond le Grace a right valiant esquier were slaine there. And on the Scotish side sir Fergus Andresan and sir Walter Murrete, with diuerse other that were buried in the church of the friers preachers at Athie.

After this the Bruse in his returne towards Meth burnt the castell of Leie, and so passed forth till hee came to Kenlis in Meth. In which meane time Roger lord Mortimer, trusting to win himselfe fame if he might ouerthrow the enimies, called forth fifteene thousand men, and vnderstanding that the Scots were come to Kenlis, made thitherwards, and there incountering with them, was put to the worse, his men (as was supposed) wilfullie thrinking from him, as those that bare him hollow hearts. With the newes of this ouerthrow, vprtart the Irish of Mounster, the Otolies, Obrens, Omores, and with fire and sword wasted all from Arclow to Leix. With them coped the lord iustice, and made of them a great slaughter, fourescore of their heads were sent to the castell of Dublin.

The lord Mortimer discomfited by the Scots.

In time of these troubles and warres in Ireland by the inuasion thus of the Scots, certeine Irish lords, faithfull men and true subiects to the king of England, did not onelie promise to continue in their lotall obeisance towards him, being their souereigne prince; but also for more assurance deliuered hostages to be kept within the castell of Dublin. The names of which lords that were so contented to assure their allegiance were these, John Fitzthomas lord of Offalie, Richard de Clare, Morice Fitzthomas, Thomas Fitziohn le Power baron of Donoille, Arnold le Power, Morice de Rochford, Dauid de la Roch, and Piles de la Roch. These and diuerse other resisted with all their might and maine the iniurious attempts of the Scots, although the Scots had drawne to their side the most part of the wild Irish, and no small number also of the English Irish, as well lords, as others of meaner calling: so that the countrie was miserablie afflicted, what by the Scots on the one part, and the Irish rebels on the other, which rebels notwithstanding were ouerthrowne in diuerse particular conflicts. But yet to the farther scattering of the English forces in Ireland, there rose foure princes of Connagh, but the Assurance giuen by the lords of Ireland for their lotaltie.

Burghes

A great ouerthrow.

The king of Connagh slaine.

Burghes and Birminghams discomfited them, and slue eleuen thousand of them beside Athenrie. Amongst other were slaine in this battell Fedelmicus, Oconhur king of Connagh, Okellie, and diuerse other great lords and capteins of Connagh and Meth. The lord Richard Birmingham had an esquier that belonged to him called John Hulsete, who by the commandement of his maister went forth to take view of the dead bodies, and to bring him word whether Okellie his mortall foe were slaine among the residue. Hulsete comming into the field with one man to turne vp and surueie the dead carcases, was streight espied by Okellie, that late lurking in a brake bush thereby, who hauing had good proofe of Hulsete his valiancie before that time, longed sore to traine him from his capteine, and presuming now vpon his good opportunitie, discouered himselfe, not doubting, but either to win him with courteous persuasions, or by force to worke his will of him, and so comming to him said: Hulsete, thou seest that I am at all points armed, & haue mine esquire here likewise furnished with armour & weapon readie at mine elbow; thou art naked with thy page, a yongling, & not to be accounted of: so that if I loued thee not, and meant to spare thee for thine owne sake, I might now do with thee what I would, and slea thee for thy maisters sake. But come & serue me vpon this request here made to thee, and I promise thee by saint Patrikes staffe to make thee a lord in Connagh, of more possessions than thy maister hath in Ireland. When these words might nothing weie him, his owne man (a great stout lubber) began to reproue him of follie, for not consenting to so large an offer, which was assured with an oth, whereupon he durst gage his soule for performance.

Okellie slaine.

Sir Thomas Mandeuill slaine.

Now had Hulsete three enimies, and first therefore turning to his knaue, he dispatched him. Next he raught vnto Okellies esquier such a knocke vnder the pit of the eare, that downe he came to the ground and there he late. Thirdlie, he laid so about him, that per anie helpe could be looked for, he had also slaine Okellie, and perceiuing the esquire to be but astonied he recouered him, and holpe him vp againe, and after he was somewhat come to himselfe, he forced him vpon a truncheon, to beare his lords head into the high towne before him, who did so; and Hulsete presented it to Birmingham, who after the circumstances declared, he dubbed Hulsete knight, aduancing him to manie preferments. The successors of that familie afterwards were barons of Galtrim. Sir Thomas Mandeuill and others in this meane while made oftentimes enterprises against the Scots, and slue diuerse of them in sundrie conflicts. But howsoeuer it chanced, we find recorded by Henrie Marlburrow, that either the said sir Thomas Mandeuill (that thus valiantlie behaued himselfe against the Scots) or some other bearing the same name, and his brother also called John Mandeuill were both slaine shortlie after at Downe, vpon their comming forth of England, by the Scots that were readie there to assaile them.

Thus may we see, that those lords and knights, which had giuen pledges for their loialtie to the king of England, sought by all waies and meanes how to beat backe the enimies: which they might haue done with more ease, if the Irish had not assisted the Scots, and presuming of their aid, rebelled in sundrie parts of the countrie; who neuertheless were oftentimes well chastised for their disloiall dealings, as partlie we haue touched; although we omit diuerse small ouerthrowes and other particular matters, sith otherwise we should increase this booke further than our first purposed intent would permit.

Whilest the Scots were thus holden vp in Ireland, that they could not in all things worke their wils, Robert le Bruse king of Scots came ouer himselfe, landed at Cragfergus to the aid of his brother, whose souldiors most wickedlie entred into churches, spoiling and defacing the same of all such tombes, monuments, plate, copes, & other ornaments which they found, and might late hands vpon.

Campion.

1316

The king of Scots in Ireland.

Cragfergus deliuered vp to the Scots.

The castell of Cragfergus, after it had béene strictlie besieged a long time, was surrendred to the Scots, by them that had kept it, till they for want of other vittels were driuen to eate leather, and eight Scots (as some write) which they had taken prisoners. The lord Thomas, sonne to the earle of Ulster departed this life. And on the sundaie next after the natiuitie of our ladie, the lord John Fitzthomas deceased at Laragh Brine néere to Mainoth, and was buried at Kildare, in the church of the friers preachers. This John Fitzthomas, a little before his death, was created earle of Kildare; after whome succéeded his sonne Thomas Fitzjohn a right wise and prudent personage. The fourteenth of September, Conhor Mac Kele, & fiue hundred Irishmn were slaine by the lord William de Burgh, and lord Richard Birmingham in Connagh. Also on the mondaie after the feast of All saints, John Loggan and sir Hugh Bisset slue a great number of Scots, among the which were one hundred with double armors, and two hundred with single armors: so that of their men of armes there died three hundred beside footemen.

When eaten.

John Fitzthomas the first earle of Kildare deceaseth.

Scots ouerthrowne.

The fifteenth of Nouember chanced a great tempest of wind and raine, which threw downe manie houses, with the steeple of the Trinitie church in Dublin, and did much other hurt both by land and water. On the first of December, sir Alane Steward that had béene taken prisoner in Ulster by John Loggan, and sir John Sandale, was brought to the castell of Dublin. After Canlemas, the Lacies came to Dublin, & procured an inquest to be impanelled to inquire of their demeanor, for that they were accused to haue procured the Scots to come into Ireland: but by that inquest they were discharged, and therewith toke an oth to kéepe the kings peace, and to destroie the Scots to the vttermost of their power. In the beginning of Lent, the Scots came in secret wise vnto Slane, with twentie thousand armed men: and with them came the armie of Ulster, destroieng all the countrie before them. Moreouer, on mondaie before the feast of S. Matthias the apostle, the earle of Ulster lieng in the abbeie of S. Marie néere to Dublin, Robert Notingham maior of that citie, with the communaltie of the same went thither, toke the earle, and put him in prison within the castell of Dublin, slue seuen of his men, and spoiled the abbeie.

A great tempest.

1317

The earle of Ulster apprehended.

The same wéeke, Edward Bruse marched towards Dublin, but herewith, turning to the castell of Knoke, he entred the same, and toke Hugh Tirrell the lord thereof, togither with his wife, and ransomed them for a summe of monie. The citizens of Dublin burnt all their suburbs for feare of a siege, and made the best puruiance they could to defend their citie, if the Bruse had come to haue besieged them: but he turning another waie, went vnto the towne of Naas, and was guided thither by the Lacies, contrarie to their oth. From thense he passed vnto Trisseldermot, and so to Baliganam, and to Callan, at length he came to Limerike, and there remained till after Easter. They of Ulster sent to the lord iustice lamentable informations of such cruelties as the enimies practised in those parts, beséeching him to take some order for their releefe in that their so miserable estate. The lord iustice deliuered to Hugh Tirrell taken by the Scots.

The kings standard deliuered to therle of Vlster.

to them the kings power with his standard, wherewith vnder pretense to expell the Scots, they got vp in armor, and ranging through the countrie, did more vere and molest the subiects, than did the strangers. The Scots proceeded and spoiled Cashels, & wheresoeuer they lighted vpon the Butlers lands, they burnt and spoiled them vnmercifullie.

In this meane while had the lord iustice and Thomas Fitziohn earle of Kildare, Richard de Clare, and Arnold le Powre baron of Donnoill leuied an armie of thirtie thousand men, readie to go against the enimies, and to giue them battell, but no good was done. For about the same time the lord Roger Mortimer was sent into Ireland as lord iustice, and landing at Poghall, wrote his letters vnto the lord Butler, & to the other capteins, willing them not to fight till he came with such power as he had brought ouer with him. Whereof the Bruse being warned, retired first towards Kildare. But yet after this he came within foure miles of Trim, where he laie in a wood, and lost manie of his men through famine, and so at length about the beginning of Maie he returned into Vlster.

Roger Mortimer iustice of Ireland.

Slaughter of Irishmen.

The lord Edmund Butler made great slaughter of the Irish neere to Trislledermot, and likewise at Balithan he had a good hand of Omorch, and slue manie of his men. The lord Mortimer pacified the displeasure and variance betwixt Richard earle of Vlster, and the nobles that had put the said earle vnder safe keeping within the castell of Dublin, accusing him of certeine riots committed to the prejudice and losse of the kings subiects, whereby the Scots increased in strength and courage, whose spoiling of the countrie caused such horrible scarsitie in Vlster, that the soldiors which the yeare before abused the kings authoritie, to purueie themselues of ouer fine diet, surfetted with flesh and Aqua vitæ all the Lent long, polled and pilled insatiablie wheresoeuer they came without need, and without regard of the poore people, whose onelie prouision they deuoured. These people now liuing in slauerie vnder the Bruse, starued for hunger, hauing first experienced manie lamentable shifts, euen to the eating of dead carcasses.

1317

The earle of Vlster deliuered out of prison.

Scarsitie of victels in Vlster.

The earle of Vlster deliuered.

The earle of Vlster was deliuered by mainprise and vpon his oth, by the which he vndertoke neuer to seeke reuenge of his apprehension otherwise than by order of law, and so had daie giuen him vnto the feast of the natiuitie of saint Iohn baptist: but he kept not his daie, whether for that he mistrusted to stand in triall of his cause, or through some other reasonable let, I cannot tell. A great dearth this yeare afflicted the Irish people: for a measure of wheat called a chronecke was sold at foure and twentie shillings, & a chronecke of otes at sixteene shillings, and all other victels likewise were sold according to the same rate; for all the whole countrie was sore wasted by the Scots and them of Vlster, insomuch that no small number of people perished through famine.

Great dearth.

About the feast of Pentecost the lord iustice Mortimer tooke his iornie towards Drogheda, and sent to the Lacies, commanding them to come vnto him, but they refused so to do. Whervpon he sent sir Hugh Crofts vnto them, to talke with them about some agreement of peace: but they slue the messenger, for whome great lamentation was made, for that he was reputed & knowne to be a right worthie knight. The lord iustice sore offended herewith, gathereth an armie, & goeth against the Lacies, whome he chased out of Connagh, so that Hugh Lacie withdrew to Vlster, & there ioined himselfe with Edward Bruse. Wherevpon, on the thursdaie next before the feast of saint Margaret, the said Hugh Lacie and also Walter Lacie were proclamed traitors. This yeare passed verie troublesome vnto the whole realme of Ireland, as well through slaughter betwixt the parties enimies one to another, as by dearth and other misfortunes. Hugh Canon the kings iustice of his bench was slaine by Andrew Birmingham betwixt the towne of Naas and castell Warten. Also in the feast of the purification, the popes bulles were published, whereby Alexander Bignor was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. About the same time was great slaughter made of Irishmen, through a quarrell betwixt two great lords in Connagh: so that there died in fight to the number of foure thousand men on both parties.

Sir Hugh Crofts slaine.

The Lacies reuolt to the Scots.

1318

Bignor consecrated archbishop of Dublin.

After Easter Walter Islep treasuror of Ireland was sent ouer into that realme, who brought letters to the lord Mortimer, commanding him to returne into England vnto the king: which he did, and departing forth of Ireland, remained indebted to the citizens of Dublin for his prouision of victels in the summe of a thousand pounds, wherof he paid not one farthing, so that manie a bitter curse he carried with him to the sea, leauing William archbishop of Cashell lord chancellor gouernor of the land in his place: and so by this meane was the said archbishop both chancellor and iustice, and so continued till the feast of saint Michaell. At what time Alexander Bignor archbishop of Dublin arriued at Poghall, being constituted lord iustice, and came to Dublin on saint Denise daie, being the seauenth of October. But here is to be remembred, that a little before the departure of the lord Mortimer forth of Ireland, to wit, the fift of Maie, the lord Richard de Clare with foure knights, sir Henrie Capell, sir Thomas de Naas, sir James Caunton, and sir John Caunton; also Adam Aplgard and others (to the number of foure score persons) were slaine by Obren and Mac Arthie. It was said that the enimies in despite caused the lord Richards bodie to be cut in peeces, so to satisfie their malicious stomachs; but the same peeces were yet afterwards buried in the church of the friers minors at Limerike. Also before the lord Mortimers returne into England, John Lacie was had forth of the castell of Dublin, and carried to Trim, where he was arreigned and adiudged to be prested to death, and so he died in prison.

Walter Islep treasuror of Ireland.

The lord Richard de Clare slaine.

But now to returne vnto the doings in time of Bignors gouernment. Immediatlie vpon his arriuall, the lord John Birmingham being generall of the field, and hauing with him diuerse capteins of worthie fame, namelie sir Richard Cute, sir Miles Verdon, sir Hugh Trippetton, sir Herbert Sutton, sir John Cusacke, sir Edmund Birmingham, sir William Birmingham, Walter Birmingham the primat of Armagh, sir Walter de la Pulle, and John Naupas led forth the kings power, to the number of one thousand three hundred foure and twentie able men against Edward Bruse, who being accompanied with the lord Philip Powbrale, the lord Walter de Soules, the lord Alaine Steward, with his three brethren, sir Walter, and sir Hugh, sir Robert, and sir Aimerie Lacies, and others, was incamped not past two miles from Dundalke with three thousand men, there abiding the Englishmen, to fight with them if they came forward: which they did with all conuenient speed, being as desirous to giue battell as the Scots were to receiue it.

The lord Birmingham and other capteins against the Scots.

The primat of Armagh personallie accompanieng the English power, & blessing their enterprise, gaue them such comfortable exhortation, as he thought serued the time yer they began to incounter. And herewith buckling togither, at length the Scots fullie and wholie were vanquished, and two thousand of them slaine, togither with their capteine Edward Bruse. Naupas that pressed into the throng

The primat of Armagh.

The battell of Armagh.

The Scots vanquished.

Edward Bruse slaine.

throng to incounter with Bruse hand to hand, was found in the search dead aloft vpon the slaine bodie of Bruse. The victorie thus obteined vpon saint Calixtus daie, made an end of the Scotish kingdome in Ireland, & lord Birmingham sending the head of Bruse into England, or as Marlburrow hath, being the messenger himselfe, presented it to king Edward, who in recompense gaue to him and his heires males the earledome of Louth, and the baronie of Ardich and Athenrie to him and his heirs generall for euer. Shortlie after sir Richard de Clare with foure other knights of name, and manie other men of warre were slaine in Thomond. The lord Roger Mortimer came againe into Ireland to gouerne as lord iustice there now the second time, and the townes of Athessell and Plebs were burned by the lord Fitzthomas brother to the lord Maurice Fitzthomas. And about this season the bridge of Kilcolin was builded by Maurice Jakis.

Birmingham made earle of Louth.

Sir Richard de Clare slaine.

1319

1320

In the yeare following, to wit, one thousand three hundred and twentie, which was the fourteenth yeare of king Edwards reigne, Thomas Fitzjohn earle of Kildare was made lord iustice of Ireland. Here is to be remembred, that about this time also Alexander Bignor archbishop of Dublin sent to pope John the two and twentith, for a priuilege to institute an vniuersitie within the citie of Dublin, and his suite tooke effect: and the first three doctors of diuinitie did the said archbishop himselfe creat, William Harditie a frier preacher, Henrie Cogie a frier minor, and frier Edmund Bernerden: and beside these one doctor of canon law, to wit, Richard archdeacon of saint Patrikes that was chancellor of the same vniuersitie, who kept their terms and commensements solemnlie: neither was this vniuersitie at anie time since disfranchised, but onlie through change of times discontinued, and now since the dissoluing of monasteries vtterlie decaied.

The earle of Kildare lord iustice.

In vniuersitie erected at Dublin.

A motion was made (as Campion hath noted) in a parlement holden there, whilest sir Henrie Sidneie was the quænes lieutenant, to haue it againe erected, by waie of contributions to be laid togither: the said sir Henrie offering twentie pounds lands, and an hundred pounds in monie. Other there were also, that according to their abilities and deuotions followed with their offers. The name was deuised; A worthie plantation of Plantagenet & Bullogne. But while they disputed of a conuenient place for it, and of other circumstances, they let fall the principall.

1321

In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and one, there was a great slaughter made of the Oconhurs at Balibagan, by the English of Leinster and Meth. And John Birmingham earle of Louth was lord iustice of Ireland. Unto this man, whilest he was lord iustice, the king wrote, commanding him to be with him at Carleill in the octaues of the Trinitie, in the fiftéenth yeare of his reigne, with three hundred men of armes, one thousand hobellars, and six thousand footmen, ech of them armed with an aketon, a sallet, and gloues of maill, which number was to be leuied in that land: besides three hundred men of armes which the earle of Ulster was appointed to serue within that tournie, which the king at that time intended to make against the Scots. The date of the letter was the third of Aprill. In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and two, diuerse nobles in Ireland departed this life, as the lord Richard Birmingham, the lord Edmund Butler, and the lord Thomas Persiuall. Moreouer, the lord Andrew Birmingham, and sir Richard de la Lond were slaine by Onotan. In the eightéenth yéere of king Edward the second his reigne, the lord John Darcie came into Irel and to be lord iustice, and the kings lieutenant there. In these daies liued in the dioceese of Ossorie the ladie Alice Kettle, whome the bishop ascited to purge hir selfe of the same of inchantment and witchcraft imposed vnto hir, and to one Petronill and Basill hir complices. She was charged to haue nightlie conference with a spirit called Robin Artisson, to whome she sacrificed in the high waie nine red cocks, and nine peacocks eies. Also that she swept the streets of Kilkennie betweene compleine and twilight, raking all the filth towards the doores of hir sonne William Outlaw, murmuring & muttering secretlie with hir selfe these words:

1322

John Darcie lord iustice.

Rec. Turris.

1321

1322

1323

The ladie Alice Kettle accused of sorcerie.

To the house of William my sonne,
Hie all the wealth of Kilkennie towne.

At the first conuiction they abiured & did penance, but shortlie after they were found in relapse, & then was Pentronill burnt at Kilkennie, the other twaine might not be heard of. She at the houre of hir death accused the said William as priuie to their sorceries, whome the bishop held in durance nine weeks, forbidding his keepers to eat or to drinke with him, or to speake to him more than once in the daie. But at length, thorough the suite and instance of Arnold le Powre then seneschall of Kilkennie, he was deliuered, and after corrupted with bribes the seneschall to persecute the bishop; so that he thrust him into prison for three moneths. In rifling the closet of the ladie, they found a wafer of sacramentall bread, hauing the diuels name stamped thereon in stéed of Jesus Christ, and a pipe of ointment, wherewith she greased a staffe, vpon the which she ambled and galloped thorough thicke and thin, when and in what maner she listed. This businesse about these witches troubled all the state of Ireland, the more; for that the ladie was supported by certeine of the nobilitie, and lastlie conueied ouer into England, since which time it could neuer be vnderstood what became of hir. In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and six, & last of king Edwards the seconds reigne, Richard Burgh earle of Ulster departed this life.

Edward the third.

1326

VNneth was the businesse about the witches at an end, when it was signified, that a gentleman of the familie of the Otwlies in Leinster, named Adam Duffe, possessed by some wicked spirit of error, denied obstinatelie the incarnation of our sauior, the trinitie of persons in the vnitie of the Godhead, & the resurrection of the flesh; as for the holie scripture, he said it was but a fable: the virgin Marie he affirmed to be a woman of dissolute life, and the apostolike sée erroneous. For such assertions he was burnt in Hogging greene beside Dublin. About the same time, Fitzarke Macmorch, and sir Henrie Traherne were taken prisoners. In the yeare following, the lord Thomas Fitzjohn erle of Kildare, and the lord Arnold Powre & William earle of Ulster were sent ouer into Ireland, & Roger Outlaw prior of saint Johns of Jerusalem in Ireland, commonlie called the prior of Kilmainan, was made lord iustice. This man by reason of variance that chanced to rise betwixt the Giraldins, the Butlers, and Birminghams, on the one side; and the Powres & Burghs on the other, for terming the earle of Kildare a rimer, to pacifie the parties called a parlement, wherein he himselfe was faine to make his purgation of a slander imposed to him, as suspected of heresie.

1327

Adam Duffe an heretike.

The prior of Kilmainan lord iustice.

The bishop of Ossorie had giuen an information against Arnold le Powre, conuented & conuicted in his his consistorie of certeine heretical opinions, but bicause the beginning of Powers accusation concerned the iustices kinsman, and the bishop was mistrusted to prosecute his owne wrong, and the person of the man rather than the fault: a date was limited for the iustifieng of the bill, the partie being apprehended and respited thereunto. This dealing the bishop (who durst not stirre out of Kilkennie to prosecute his accusation) was reputed partiall: and when by meanes hereof the matter hanged in suspense, he infamed the said prior as an abbettor and fauourer of Arnolds heresie. The prior submitted himselfe to the triall, and thereupon were seuerall proclamations made in court, that it should be lawfull to anie man to come into the court, and to inferre, accuse, and declare what euidence he could, against the lord iustice: but none came. Then passed a decrée by the councell, commanding all bishops, abbats, priors, and the maiors of Dublin, Corke, Limerike, Waterford, and Drogheda, the shiriffs, knights, & seneschals of euerie shire, to appeare at Dublin. From amongst all these, they appointed sir inquisitors, which examining the bishops and other persons aforesaid singularlie one by one, found that with an vniuersall consent they deposed for the prior, affirming that (to their iudgements) he was a zelous and a faithfull child of the catholike church. In the meane time, Arnold le Powre the prisoner deceased in the castell, & bicause he stood vnpurged, long he late vnburied.

Arnold Powre accused of heresie.

1329 The earle of Louth slaine.

In the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and nine, John de Birmingham earle of Louth, and his brother Peter, with many other of that surname, and Richard Talbot of Malahide were slaine on Whitsun euen at Balibragan by men of the countrie. Also the lord Thomas Butler, and diuerse other noblemen were slaine by Mac Gogoghdan & other Irishmen nére to Polinger. For the Irish as well in Leinster as in Meth made insurrections in that season, and so likewise did they in Mounster vnder the leading of Obren, whom William earle of Ulster and James earle of Ormond vanquished. So outragious were the Leinster Irish, that in one church they burnt foure score innocent soules, asking no more but the life of their priest then at masse, whome they notwithstanding sticked with their iauelins, spurned the host, and wasted all with fire: neither forced they of the popes interdiction, nor anie ecclesiasticall censures denounced against them (matters of no small consideration among them namelie in those daies) but maliciouslie perseuered in the course of their furious rage, till the citizens of Wexford somewhat tamed them, and slue foure hundred of them in one skirmish, the rest fleing were all drenched in the water of Slane. In the yeare one thousand three hundred and thirtie, the earle of Ulster with a great armie made a iournie against Obren, and the prior of Kilmainan lord iustice put Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond in prison in the marshalsie, out of the which he shortlie escaped, and the lord Hugh Lacie returned into Ireland, and obteined the kings peace and fauour.

1330 The prior of Kilmainan lord iustice.

1331 Anthonie Lucie lord iustice.

In the yeare one thousand three hundred thirtie and one, the earle of Ulster passed ouer into England, and great slaughter was made vpon the Irish in Okenslie. Also the castell of Arclo was taken by the Irishmen, and great slaughter made of the English in the Towlagh by Otothell and others. Also the lord Anthonie Lucie was sent ouer lord iustice into Ireland, and great slaughter was made of the Irish at Thurles by the knights of the countrie, & at Finnath in Meth, there were manie of them slaine by the English; but yet was the castell of Fernis taken and burnt by the Irish. On the feast daie of the assumption of our ladie, which falleth on the fifteenth of August, Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond was apprehended at Limerike by the lord iustice, and sent vnto the castell of Dublin. Moreouer, the lord iustice tooke sir William Birmingham at Clonmell by a wile, whilest he was sicke in his bed, & sent him (together with his sonne Walter Birmingham) vnto the castell of Dublin, the thirtith of April. In the yeare one thousand three hundred thirtie and two the said sir William was hanged at Dublin, but Walter was deliuered by reason he was within orders.

The earle of Desmond apprehended.

1332 William Birmingham executed.

Campion following such notes as he hath séene, writeth that the death of this William Birmingham chanced in time of the gouernement of William Outlaw prior of Kilmainan, being lieutenant vnto John lord Darcie, that was made lord iustice (as the said Campion hath noted) in the yeare one thousand three hundred twentie and nine. Although Marlburrow affirmeth that he came thither to beare that office, in the yeare one thousand three hundred thirtie and two, after the lord Lucie was discharged, as hereafter shall be recited. But whensoeuer, or vnder whome soeuer Birmingham was executed, he was accounted an od knight, and such a one as for his valiancie, his match was not lightlie to be anie where found. The castell of Clonmore was taken the same yeare by the Englishmen, and the castell of Bonrath was destroid by the Irish of Thomond. Also Henrie de Mandenill was taken and sent prisoner to be safelie kept in Dublin. Likewise Walter Burgh with two of his brethren were taken in Connagh by the earle of Ulster, and sent to the castell of Norburgh.

Campion.

This yeare the lord Antonie Lucie was discharged of his rome by the king, and so returned with his wife & children into England, and the lord John Darcie was sent ouer lord iustice in Lucies place, and great slaughter was made vpon Bren Obren, and Mac Arthie in Mounster, by the English of that countrie. This John Darcie (as should appeare by gifts bestowed vpon him by the king) was in singular fauour with him. Amongst other things which he had of the kings gift, we find that he had the manors of Louth, and Baliogarie, and other lands in Ireland which belonged to the earle of Ew. And for that the said earle was a Frenchman, and tooke part with Philip de Valois the kings enimie, they were seized into the kings hand. The earle of Desmond vpon suerties was set at libertie, and by the parlement holden at Dublin in this yeare 1333, was sent ouer into England vnto the king; and William erle of Ulster a yong gentleman of twentie yeares of age, in going towards Knockfergus the seauenth of June, was slaine nére to the fords in Ulster, by his owne people, but his wife and daughter escaped into England: and the daughter was after maried vnto the lord Lionell the kings sonne. She deceased afterwards at Dublin, and left a daughter behind hir that was his heire, maried to Roger Mortimer earle of March, and lord of Trim.

The lord Butler slaine.

The lord Darcie iustice.

The earle of Ew.

1333 Parlement.

This murther was procured by Robert Fitzmartine Mandeuill, who was the first that presumed to giue to the earle anie wound. To reuenge the death of this earle of Ulster (slaine as ye haue heard beside Knockfergus) the lord iustice Darcie with a great power went into Ulster, to pursue those that through Mandeuils seditious tumults had so traitorouslie murthered their lord. At his setting forward, the said iustice Darcie appointed sir Thomas Burgh treasuror, to gouerne as lieutenant to him in his absence. When the lord iustice had punished the traitors in Ulster, he passed ouer into Scotland, there to make warre against the Scots that were enimies

The earle of Ulster slaine.

Sir Thomas Burgh.

The lord iustice inuadeth Scotland.

at

at that present to the king of England, and on the feast daie of saint Margaret, great slaughter was made of the Scots by the Irishmen: and so what by the king in one part, and the lord iustice of Ireland in another, Scotland was in maner wholie conquered, and Edward Baliol was established king of Scotland. The lord iustice might haue possessed the Iles if they had béene worth the kéeping: into the which Iles, except the said Darcie and the earle of Suffer late lieutenant of Ireland, no gouernor at anie time yet aduentured. At Darcies comming backe into Ireland, and exercising the office of lord iustice, he deliuered Walter Birmingham out of the castell of Dublin.

1336 In the yeare 1336, and tenth of Edward the thirds reigne, on S. Laurence daie, the Irish of Connagh were discomfited and put to flight by the Englishmen of the countrie there, with the losse of one Englishman, and ten thousand of the enimies. The lord

1337 Sir John Charleton iustice. John Charleton baron came into Ireland to be lord iustice, and with him his brother Thomas bishop of Hereford lord chancellor, and John Rice lord treasurer, and two hundred Welshmen souldiors. The bi-

1338 The bishop of Hereford lord iustice. shop was ordeined afterward lord iustice, in whose time all the Irish of Ireland were at defiance with the English, and shortlie brought againe into quiet by the earles of Kildare and Desmond. The lord

1340 John Darcie lord iustice during life. John Darcie by the kings letters patents was (during life) ordeined lord iustice of Ireland, in the fourteenth yeare of king Edward the thirds reigne, which king abused by euill counsell and sinister informers, called in vnder his signet roiall, the franchises,

Calling in of liberties. liberties and grants, whatsoeuer had béene deuised, made and ratified to the realme of Ireland, and to euerie each person thereof. This reuoking of liberties was displeasantlie taken. The English of birth and the English of blood falling at words, were diuided into factions about it, for which contention the Irish still waited, so as the realme was euen vpon the point to giue ouer all, and to rebell. For redresse whereof, the lord iustice called a parlement at Dublin, to the which the nobles refused to come, and in quiet wise assembled themselues togither at Kilkennie, where they with the commons agréed vpon certeine questions to be demanded of the king by waie of supplication, signifieng in the same partlie their gréefes. Which questions were in effect as followeth.

Articles or questions. 1 How a realme of warre might be gouerned by one both vnskilfull and vnable in all warlike seruice?

2 How an officer vnder the king, that entered verie poore, might in one yeare grow to more excessiue wealth, than men of great patrimonie and liuelihood in manie yeares?

3 How it chanced, that sith they were all called lords of their owne, that the souereigne lord of them all was not a pennie the richer for them?

The cheefe of them that thus séemed to repine with the present gouernment, was Thomas Fitzmaurice earle of Desmond, through whose maintenance and bearing out of the matter, the countrie was in great trouble; so as it had not lightlie béene séene, that such contrarietie in minds and disliking had appeared amongst those of the English race, in that realme at anie time before. Herewith Rafe

1343 Rafe Vffort lord iustice. Vffort was sent ouer lord iustice, who bringing his wife with him, the countesse of Vlster arriued about the thirteenth of Julie. This man was verie rigorous, and through persuasion (as was said) of his wife, he was more extreame and couetous than otherwise he would haue béene, a matter not to be

The countesse of Vlster. forgotten. For if this ladie had béene as readie to moue hir husband to haue shewed himselfe gentle and mild in his gouernement, as she was bent to pricke him forward vnto sharpe dealings and rigorous proceedings, she had béene now aswell reported of, as she is infamed by their pens that haue registred the doings of those times. But to the purpose. This Vffort lord iustice, in paine of forfeiture of all his lands, commanded the earle of Desmond to make his personall appearance at a parlement, which he called to be holden at Dublin, there to begin the seuenth of June. And bicause the earle refused to come according to the summons, he raised the kings standard, and with an armie marched into Mounster, and there seized the earles possessions into the kings hands, letting them forth to farme for an annuall rent vnto other persons.

The earle of Desmond.

And whilest he yet remained in Mounster, he deuised waies how to haue the earle of Desmond apprehended: which being brought to passe, he afterward deliuered him vpon mainprise of these suerties whose names insue. William de Burgh earle of Vlster, James Butler earle of Ormond, Richard Tute, Nicholas Verdon, Morice Rochford, Eustace le Powre, Gerald de Rochford, John Fitzrobert Powre, Robert Barrie, Maurice Fitzgirald, John Wellesleie, Walter le Fant, Richard Rokelleie, Henrie Traherne, Roger Powre, John Lenfant, Roger Powre, Matthew Fitzhenrie, Richard Walleis, Edmund Burgh sonne to the earle of Vlster, knights: Dauid Barrie, William Fitzgirald, Foulke de Fraxinus, Robert Fitzmaurice, Henrie Fitzberkleie, John Fitzgeorge de Roch, Thomas de Lées de Burgh. These (as yée haue heard) were bound for the earle. And bicause he made default, the lord iustice verelie toke the aduantage of the bond against the mainpernours, foure of them onelie excepted, the two earles and two knights.

Suerties for the earle of Desmond.

The lord iustice is charged with strict dealing by writers in this behalfe, for that the same persons had assisted him in his warres against Desmond. But trulie if we shall consider the matter with indifferencie, he did no more than law and reason required. For if euerie suertie vpon forfeiture of his bond should be forborne, that otherwise doth his duetie, what care would men haue either to procure suerties or to become suerties themselues? But such is the affection of writers, specially when they haue conceiued anie misliking towards those of whome they take occasion to speake, so as manie a worthie man hath béene defamed, and with slander greatlie defaced in things wherein he rather hath deserued singular commendation. But howsoeuer this matter was handled touching the earle of Desmond, vpon the death of the lord iustice, which insued the next yeare, bonfiers were made, and great ioy shewed through all the relme of Ireland. His ladie verelie (as should appeare) was but a miserable woman, procuring him to extortion and briberie. Much he abridged the prerogatiues of the church, and was so hated, that euen in the sight of the countrie he was robbed without rescue by Mac Cartie, notwithstanding he gathered power, and dispersed those rebels of Vlster.

Vffort euill spoken of.

Ioie conceiued for the death of the lord iustice Vffort.

1346 Robert Darcie lord iustice. Robert Darcie was ordeined iustice by the councell till the kings letters came to sir John Fitzmaurice, who released Fitzthomas earle of Kildare left in durance by Vffort at his death. Fitzmaurice continued not long, but was discharged, and the lord Walter Birmingham elected to succeed in that rome, who procured a safe conduct for Desmond to plead his cause before the king, by whom he was liberallie intreated, and allowed towards his expenses there twentie shillings a day at the princes charge. In consideration of which courtesie shewed to his kinsman, the earle of Kildare, accompanied with diuerse lords, knights, and chosen horsemen, serued the king at John Fitzmorice iustice. L. Birmingham iustice.

Calis,

Calis, a towne thought impregnable, & returned after the winning therof in great pompe and follitie.

1347 Record. Tur. We find that Thomas Berkeleie, and Reinold lord Cobham, and sir Morice Berkleie became mainpernours for the said earle of Desmond, that he should come into England, and abide such triall as the law would award. John Archer prior of Kilmainan was substituted lieutenant to the lord iustice. To whom succéded Baron Carew, and after Carew followed sir Thomas Rokesbie knight, vnto whom was assigned aboue his ordinarie retinue of twentie men of armes, a supplie of ten men of armes, and twentie archers on horssebacke, so long as it should be thought néedfull. Great mortalitie chanced this yeare, as in other parts of the world, so especiallie in places about the seacoasts of England and Ireland. In the yeare following departed this life Alexander Bignor archbishop of Dublin. And the same yeare was John de saint Paule consecrated archbishop of that sée. This yeare deceased Kenwrike Shereman somtime maior of Dublin, a great benefactor to euerie church and religious house within twentie miles round about the citie. His legacies to the pore and others, beside his liberalitie shewed in his life time, amounted to thrée thousand marks.

1348 The prior of Kilmainan. Baron Carew iustice. Sir Thomas Rokesbie iustice, Record. Tur.

1349

John de S. Paule archbishop of Dublin.

1350 Kenwrike Shereman.

In this season dwelled in Ulster a welchie knight one sir Robert Sauage, who the rather to preserue his owne, began to wall and fortifie his manor houses with castels and piles against the Irish enimie, exhorting his heire Henrie Sauage to aplie that worke so beneficiall for himselfe & his posteritie. Father (quoth yong Sauage) I remember the prouerbe Better a castell of bones than of stones. Where strength & courage of valiant men are prest to helpe vs, neuer will I (by the grace of God) cumber my selfe with dead walles. My fort shall be where soeuer yong bloods be stirring, & where I find rome to fight. The father in a fume let lie the building, and forsware to go anie further forward in it. But yet the want therof and such like hath bene the decaie as well of the Sauages, as of all the English gentlemen in Ulster: as the lacke also of walled townes is one of the principall occasions of the rude wildnesse in other parts of Ireland.

Sir Robert Sauage.

This Sauage, hauing prepared an armie against the Irish, allowed to euerie souldier before they should buckle with the enimie, a mightie draught of Aqua vitæ, wine, or old ale, and killed in prouision for their returne, béefe, venison, and fowle, great plentie: which doings diuerse of his capteins misliked, bicause they considered the successe of warre to be vncerteine, and therefore estéemed it better policie to poison the cates, or to do them awaie, than to kéepe the same; and hapilie to féed a sort of roges with such princelie food, if ought should happen to themselues in this aduenture of so few against so manie. Herat smiled the gentleman and said, Tush ye are too full of enuie: this world is but an in, to the which ye haue no speciall interest, but are onelie tenants at will of the Lord. If it please him to command vs from it as it were from our lodging, and to set other good fellowes in our romes, what hurt shall it be for vs to leaue them some meat for their supers? Let them hardlie win it & weare it. If they enter our dwellings, good maner would no lesse but to welcome them with such fare as the countrie bréedeth, and with all my heart much good may it do them. Notwithstanding I presume so far vpon your noble courages, that verelie my mind giueth me we shall returne at night, & banket our selues with our owne store. And so did, hauing slain 3000 Irishmen.

1355 The earle of Desmond

In the yeare 1355 deceased Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Desmond lord iustice of Ireland, who had that office of the kings grant for terme of life. After him succéeded in that rome Thomas de Rokesbie, a knight, sincere and vpright of conscience, who being controlled for suffering himselfe to be serued in trécne cups, answered: Those homelie cups & dishes paie trulie for that they conteine: I had rather drinke out of trécne cups & paie gold and siluer, than drinke out of gold & make wodden paiment. This yeare began great variance betwixt Richard Rafe primat of Armagh, & foure orders of begging friers, which ended at length by the deaths of the said Richard Rafe, and Richard Kilminton, in the yeare 1360: Rafe deceasing in the popes court, and Kilminton in England. Almerike de S. Amand, John or (as other haue) James Butler earle of Ormond, and Maurice Fitzthomas earle of Kildare, were appointed lord iustices of Ireland by turnes. In Ormonds time, and in the thrée and twentith yeare of king Edward the thirds reigne, order was taken that the Irish lords should remaine and dwell in their houses on the marches, to defend the subiects from inuasions of enimies. And further, proclamation went forth, that no méere Irish borne should be made maior, bailiffe, porter, officer, or minister in anie towne or place within the English dominions: nor that anie archbishop, abbat, prior, or anie other being of the kings allegiance, vpon forfeiture of all that he might forfeit, should aduance anie that was méere Irish borne to the rome of a canon, or to haue anie other ecclesiasticall benefice that laie among the English subiects.

lord iustice deceased. Thomas Rokesbie lord iustice his saieng.

1357 Dissention betwixt the primat of Armagh, & the foure orders of friers. Thrée lord iustices.

Record. Tur.

To Maurice Thomas earle of Kildare, when he was ordeined lord iustice, the kings letters assigned in yearelie fee for his office 500 pounds, with condition, that the said gouernour should find twentie great horsses to serue in the field, he himselfe to be the twentith man in going against the enimie: which allowance and conditions in those daies (so farre as I can gesse) should séeme to be ordinarie to the office. Lionell duke of Clarence sonne to king Edward the third, came ouer into Ireland to be lord iustice there, and was in right of his wife earle of Ulster. He published an inhibition to all of the Irish birth not once to approch his armie, nor to be in anie wise imploied in seruice of the wars. He vanquished Odwen, but yet sudenlie (no man vnderstanding how) an hundred of his souldiers were wanting as they laie in garrison, the losse of whom was thought to be occasioned by that displeasant decrée afore rehearsed. Wherevpon he toke better aduise, and receiued the Irish into like fauour, as other lieutenants had them in before that present, shewing a tender loue towards them all, and so euer after prospered in his affaires. He created diuerse knights, as Preston, now knowne by the name of the familie of Gormanston, Hollewood, Talbot, Cusac, de la Hide, Patrike, Robert and John de Fraxinis: all these being gentlemen of worthie fame in chiualrie. The ercheker he remoued to Catherlagh, & bestowed in furnishing that towne fiue hundred pounds.

The earle of Kildare lord iustice.

Lionell duke of Clarence.

In the yeare 1362 John de S. Paule archbishop of Dublin departed this life the fift ides of September. And in the yeare following was Thomas Minot consecrated archbishop of that place. Girald Fitzmaurice earle of Desmond was appointed lord iustice, vntil the comming of the lord Windsor, the first lieutenant in Ireland, who came ouer in the yeare 1369. This Windsore called a parlement at Kilkennie, in the which was granted to the king a subsidie of thrée thousand pounds to be leuied of the people, subiects to the king in that land. And in an other parlement holden by him at Balidoill they granted two thousand pounds to be likewise leuied. Which said sums were granted of the méere and frée good wils of the nobles and communaltie of the land land, towards the maintenance of the kings expenses in his warres. Yet the king in the three and fortith yeare of his reigne, directing his letters vnto the said lord Windsor, cõmanded him to surceale from leuieng the foresaid monie, although afterwards he commanded againe that the arrerages should be leuied and paid to his lieutenant the said Windsor.

1362

1367 The lord windsor lieutenant.

1369 Record. Turris A parlement. A subsidie.

Mortalitie of people.

The third pestilence in Ireland made awaie a great number of people. In the yeare 1370 the lord Gerald Fitzmorice earle of Desmond, and the lord John Fitzrichard, and the lord John Fitziohn, and manie other noble men were slaine by Obren, and Mac Conmard of Thomond in the moneth of Julie. In the yeare 1372 sir Richard Ashton was sent ouer to be lord iustice in Ireland. In the yeare following great warre was raised betwixt the English of Meth, and Offeroll, in the which manie vpon both sides were slaine. In Maie, the lord John Husseie baron of Galtrim, John Fitzrichard shiriffe of Meth, and William Dalton were slaine in Kinaleigh. In the yeare 1375 Thomas archbishop of Dublin departed this life, and the same yeare was Robert de Wikeford consecrated archbishop there.

1370 Conhar. 1372 Sir Richard Ashton lord iustice. 1373 Slaughter. 1375

Richard the second.

1381 The earle of March the kings lieutenant.

Edmund Mortimer earle of March & Ulster was made the kings lieutenant in Ireland. In the yeare 1383 a great mortalitie reigned in that countrie. This was called the fourth pestilence. In the yeare 1385 Dublin bridge fell. Beside Edmund Mortimer earle of March, Campion affirmeth, that in this Richard the seconds daies, there are iustices and lieutenants of Ireland specially recorded; Roger Mortimer sonne to the said Edmund, Philip Courtneie the kings cousine, James earle of Ormond, and Robert Vere earle of Orford, marquesse of Dublin lord chamberleine, who was also created duke of Ireland by parlement, and was credited with the whole dominion of the realme by grant for tearme of life, without paieng anie thing therefore, passing all writs, and placing all officers, as chancellor, treasurer, chiefe iustice, admerall, his owne lieutenant, and other inferiour charges vnder his owne Teste. In the yeare 1390, Robert de Wikeford archbishop of Dublin departed this life, and the same yeare was Robert Waldebie translated vnto the archbishop of Dublin an Augustine frier.

1383 1385 1390

In the yeare 1394, king Richard sore afflicted and troubled in mind with sorrow for the decease of his wife quéene Anne, that departed this life at Whitsuntide last past, not able without teares to behold his palaces and chambers of estate, that represented vnto him the solace past, & doubled his sorrow, sought some occasion of businesse: and now about Michaelmas passed ouer into Ireland, where diuerse lords and princes of Ulster renewed their homages, & placing Roger Mortimer erle of March his lieutenant, returned about Shrouetide. In the yeare 1397, Richard de Northalis archbishop of Dublin departed this life, that was the same yeare from another see remoued thither: he was a frier of the order of the Carmelites.

1394 King Richard goeth ouer into Ireland. Roger Mortimer lord lieutenant. Thom. Wals. 1397

The same yeare Thomas de Craulie was chosen and consecrated archbishop of Dublin. Also sir Thomas de Burgh, and sir Walter de Birmingham, slue six hundred Irishmen, with their capteine Macdowne. Moreouer, Edmund earle of March lord deputie of Ireland, with the aid of the erle of Ormond, wasted the countrie of an Irish lord called Obren, and at the winning of his chiefe house he made seuen knights, to wit, sir Christopher Preston, sir John Bedlow, sir Edmund Londores, sir John Londores, sir William Nugent, Walter de la Hide, and Robert Cadell. But after this it chanced, that on the Ascension daie, certeine Irishmen slue fortie Englishmen: and among them these were accounted as principall, John Fitzwilliams, Thomas Talbot, and Thomas Cambzie. But shortlie after Roger Mortimer earle of March and Ulster the kings lieutenant was slaine, with diuerse other, by Obren and other Irishmen of Leinster at Kenlis. Then was Roger Greie elected Lord iustice of Ireland.

Six hundred Irishmen slaine. Roger Greie lord iustice of Ireland.

The same yeare on the feast daie of saint Marke the pope, the duke of Surreie landed in Ireland, and with him came sir Thomas Craulie the archbishop of Dublin. King Richard informed of the vnrulie parts and rebellious sturres of the Irishmen, minded to appease the same, and specially to reuenge the death of the earle of March: wherevpon with a nauie of two hundred sails he passed ouer into Ireland, and landed at Waterford on a sundaie, being the morrow after saint Petronilla the virgins day. The fridaie after his arriuall at Ford in Kenlis within the towne of Kildare, there were slaine two hundred Irishmen by Jenicho de Artois a Gascoigne, and such Englishmen as he had with him: and the morrow after, the citizens of Dublin brake into the countrie of Obren, slue thirtie & three of the enimies, and toke fourescore men with children.

1398 King Richard passeth the second time ouer into Ireland.

The fourth kalends of Julie, king Richard came to Dublin, and remained there for a time; during the which diuerse lords and princes of the countrie came in and submitted themselues vnto him, by whome they were courteouslie vsed, and trained to honourable demeanor and ciuilitie, as much as the shortnes of time would permit, as in the English historie you maie find set forth more at large. Whilest king Richard thus laie in Dublin to reduce Ireland into due subiection, he was aduertised that Henrie duke of Lancaster, that latelie before had bene banished, was returned, & ment to bereaue him of the crowne. The sonne of which duke, togither with the duke of Glocesters sonne, the king shut vp within the castell of Trim, and then taking the seas, he returned and landed in Wales, where he found his defense so weake, and vnsure, that finallie he came into his aduersaries hands, and was deposed by authoritie of parlement, and then was the said duke of Lancaster admitted to reigne in his place.

The king commeth to Dublin. Sée more hereof in England.

Henrie the fourth.

1400

At Whitsuntide in the yeare 1400, which was the first yeare of the reigne of Henrie the fourth, the constable of Dublin castell, and diuerse other at Stanford in Ulster, fought by sea with Scots, where manie Englishmen were slaine and drowned. In the second yeare of king Henrie the fourth, sir John Stanleie the kings lieutenant in Ireland returned into England, leauing his vnder lieutenant there sir William Stanleie. The same yeare on Bartholomew euen, sir Stephan Scrope, deputie vnto the lord Thomas of Lancaster the kings brother, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, arriued there to supplie the roome of Alexander bishop of Meth, that exercised the same office vnder the said lord Thomas of Lancaster, before the comming of this sir Stephan Scrope; which sir Stephan for his violence and extortion before time vsed in the same office vnder king Richard, was sore cried out vpon by the voices of the poꝛe people, insomuch that the ladie his wife hearing of such exclamations, would in no wise continue with him there, except he would receiue a solemne oth on the bible, that wittinglie he should wꝛong no chꝛistian creature in that land, but dulie and trulie he should sée paiment made foꝛ all expenses: and hereof (she said) she had made a vow to Chꝛist so determinatlie, that vnlesse it were on his part firmelie pꝛomised, she could not without perill of soule go with him. Hir husband assented and accomplished hir request effectuallie, recouered a good opinion foꝛ his vpꝛight deling, reformed his caters & puruetoꝛs, inriched the countrie, maintained a plentifull house, remission of great offenses, remedies foꝛ persons indangered to the pꝛince, pardons of lands and liues he granted so charitablie and so discrétlie, that his name was neuer recited among them without manie blessings and pꝛaiers, and so chéerefullie they were readie to serue him against the Irish vpon all necessarie occasions. The loꝛd Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne, and loꝛd lieutenant of Ireland, aꝛriued the same yeare at Dublin, vpon saint Bꝛices daie.

1401 Sir John Stanleie lord lieutenant. Sir Steph. Scrope.

The maioꝛ of Dublin John Dꝛake, with a band of his citizens nœre to Bꝛe, slue foure thousand of the Irish outlawes (as Campion moteth out of the recoꝛds of Chꝛists church) but Marlburrow speaketh onelie of 493, and these being all men of warre. The verie same daie that this victoꝛie was atchiued, to wit, the eleuenth day of Julie, the church of the friers pꝛechers of Dublin was dedicated by the archbishop of that citie. The same yeare in September, a parlement was holden at Dublin, during the which in Vrgile sir Bartholomew Verdon knight, James White, Stephan Gernon, and other their complices, slue the shiriffe of Louth John Dowdall. In the yere 1403, in Maie, sir Walter Vetterlete steward of Vlster, a right valiant knight was slaine, and to the number of thirtie other with him. The same yeare about the feast of saint Martin, the loꝛd Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne returned into England leauing the loꝛd Stephan Scrope his deputie there: who also in the beginning of Lent sailed ouer into England, and then the loꝛds of the land chose the earle of Dꝛmond to be loꝛd iustice.

The Irish ouerthꝛowne by the maioꝛ of Dublin.

1403

Stephan Scrope.

The earle of Dꝛmond loꝛd iustice.

In the fift yere of Henrie the fourth, John Colton archbishop of Armagh the seuen & twentith of Apꝛill departed this life, vnto whom Nicholas Stoning succéeded. The same yeare on the daie of saint Vitale the martyꝛ, the parlement of Dublin began beforе the earle of Dꝛmond then loꝛd iustice of Ireland, where the statutes of Kilkennie and Dublin were confirmed, and likewise the charter of Ireland. In the sixt yeare of Henrie the fourth, in the moneth of Maie, thꝛée Scotish barks were taken, two at Green castell, and one at Alkeie, with capteine Macgolagh. The same yeare the merchants of Bꝛodagh entered Scotland, and toke pꝛeies and pledges. Also on the éeuen of the feast day of the seuen bꝛethꝛen, Oghgard was burnt by the Irish. And in June sir Stephan Scrope that was come againe into Ireland, returned effsones into England, leauing the earle of Dꝛmond loꝛd iustice of Ireland. About the same time they of Dublin entered Scotland at saint Ninian, and valiantlie behaued themselues against the enimies, and after crossing the seas, directed their course into Wales, and did much hurt to the Welshmen, bꝛinging from thense the shꝛine of saint Cubins, & placed it in the church of the Trinitie in Dublin. James Butler earle of Dꝛmond died at Baligam, whilest he was loꝛd iustice, vnto whom succéeded Gerald earle of Kildare.

1404

The archbishop of Armagh deceased.

1405

The citizens of Dublin inuade Scotland.

They inuade wales.

The earle of Dꝛmond deceased.

In the seuenth yeare of king Henrie on Coꝛpus Chꝛisti day, the citizens of Dublin with the countrie people about them, manfullie vanquished the Irish enimies, and slue diuerse of them, and toke two ensignes oꝛ standards, bꝛinging with them to Dublin the heads of those whom they had slaine. The same yeare the pꝛioꝛ of Conall, in the plaine of Kildare, fought manfullie with the Irish, & vanquished two hundꝛed that were well armed, slaieng part of them, and chasing the residue out of the field, and the pꝛioꝛ had not with him past the number of twentie Englishmen: but God (as saith mine authoꝛ) assisted those that put their trust in him. The same yeare after Michaelmas, Stephan Scrope deputie iustice to the loꝛd Thomas of Lancaster the kings sonne, and his lieutenant of Ireland, came againe ouer into Ireland. And in the feast of saint Hilarie was a parlement holden at Dublin, which in Lent after was ended at Trim. And Peter de Birmingham slue Cathole Oconhur about the end of Febꝛuarie. In the yere 1407, a certeine false and heathenish wꝛetch an Irish man, named Mac Adam Mac Gilmoꝛe, that had caused foꝛtie churches to be destroied, as he that was neuer chꝛistened, and therefoꝛe called Coꝛbi, chanced to take pꝛisoner one Patrike Sauage, and receiued foꝛ his ransome two thousand markes, though afterwards he slue him, togither with his bꝛother Richard.

Hen. Marlb.

A parlement at Dublin.

1407

Coꝛbi what it signifieth.

The same yeare in the feast of the exaltation of the crosse, Stephan Scrope deputie to the loꝛd Thomas of Lancaster, with the earles of Dꝛmond and Desmond, and the pꝛioꝛ of Kilmainan, and diuerse other capteins and men of warre of Peth, set from Dublin, and inuaded the land of Mac Murch, where the Irish came into the field and skirmished with them, so as in the foꝛmer part of the daie they put the English power to the woꝛse; but at length the Irish were vanquished and chased, so that Onolan with his son and diuerse others were taken pꝛisoners. But the English capteins aduertised here, that the Burkens and Okeroll in the countie of Kilkennie, had foꝛ the space of two daies togither done much mischiefe, they rode with all spéed vnto the towne of Callan, and there incountering with the aduersaries, manfullie put them to flight, slue Okeroll, and eight hundꝛed others. There went a tale, and beléeued of manie, that the sunne stood still foꝛ a space that daie, till the Englishmen had ridden six miles: so much was it thought that God fauoured the English part in this enterpꝛise, if we shall beléeue it.

Okeroll slaine.

The same yeare the loꝛd Stephan Scrope passed once againe ouer into England, and James Butler earle of Dꝛmond was elected by the countrie loꝛd iustice of Ireland. In the dais of this K. Henrie the fourth, the inhabitants of Coꝛke being soꝛe afflicted with perpetuall oppꝛessions of their Irish neighboꝛs, complained themselues in a generall wꝛiting directed to the loꝛd Rutland and Coꝛke, the kings deputie there, and to the councell of the realme then assembled at Dublin: which letter because it openeth a window to behold the state of those parties, and of the whole realme of Ireland in those daies, we haue thought good to set downe here, as it hath bœne enterd by Campion, according to the copie deliuered to him by Francis Agard esquire, one of the quœnes maiesties pꝛiuie councell in Ireland.

A letter from Corke out of an old record that beareth no date.

IT may please your wisedomes to haue pittie on vs the kings poꝛe subieas within the countie of Coꝛke, oꝛ else we are cast awaie foꝛ euer. Foꝛ where there are in this countie these loꝛds by name, beside knights, knights, esquiers, gentlemen, and yeomen, to a great number that might dispend yearelie eight hundred pounds, fiue hundred pounds, foure hundred pounds, two hundred pounds, one hundred pounds, an hundred markes, twentie markes, twentie pounds, ten pounds, some more, some lesse, to a great numbers, besides these lords. First the lord marques Caro, his yearelie reuenues was beside Dorsete hauen and other creekes, two thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Barneuale of Berhauen, his yearelie reuenue was beside Bodre hauen and other creekes, one thousand six hundred pounds sterling. The lord Wogan of the great castell, his yearelie reuenue beside his hauens and creekes, thirteene thousand pounds. The lord Balram of Enfort, his yearelie reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand three hundred pounds sterling. The lord Curcie of Kelbretton, his yearelie reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Mandeuile of Barenstellie, his yearelie reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand two hundred pounds sterling. The lord Arundell of the Strand, his yearelie reuenue beside hauens and creekes, one thousand fiue hundred pounds sterling. The lord Barod of the gard, his yearelie reuenues beside hauens & creekes one thousand one hundred pounds sterling. The lord Steineie of Baltmore, his yearelie reuenue beside hauens and creekes, eight hundred pounds sterling. The lord Roch of Pole castell, his yearelie reuenues besides hauens and creekes, ten thousand pounds sterling. The kings maiestie hath the lands of the late yong Barrie by forfeiture, the yearelie reuenue whereof, besides two riuers and creekes, and all other casualties, is one thousand eight hundred pounds sterling.

I thinke rather Greene castell.

And that at the end of this parlement, your lordship, with the kings most noble councell may come to Corke, & call before you all these lords, and other Irishmen, and bind them in paine of losse of life, lands and goods, that neuer one of them do make warre vpon an other, without licence or commandement of you my lord deputie, and the kings councell; for the vtter destruction of these parts is that onelie cause. And once all the Irishmen, and the kings enimies were driuen into a great vallie called Clane onight, betwixt two great mounteines called Maccort, or the leprous Iland: and there they liued long and manie yeares with their white meat, till at the last these English lords fell at variance among themselues, and then the weakest part toke certeine Irishmen to take their part, and so vanquished their enimies. And thus fell the English lords at warre among themselues, till the Irishmen were stronger than they, and draue them awaie, and now haue the countrie whole vnder them; but that the lord Roch, the lord Barrie, and the lord Curcie onelie remaine with the least part of their ancestors possessions: and yong Barrie is there vpon the kings portion, paieng his grace neuer a pennie rent. Wherefore we the kings poore subiects of the citie of Corke, Kinsale, and Poghall, desire your lordship to send hither two good iustices to see this matter ordred, and some English capteins with twentie Englishmen that may be capteins ouer vs all: and we will rise with them to redresse these enormities all at our owne costs. And if you will not come nor send, we will send ouer to our liege lord the king, and complaine on you all. Thus far that letter.

The citie of Corke.

And (as saith Campion) at this daie the citie of Corke is so incumbred with vnquiet neighbors of great power, that they are forced to gard their gates continuallie, & to keepe them shut at seruice times, at meales, and from sun setting to sun rising, not suffering anie stranger to enter the towne with his weapon, but to leaue the same at a lodge appointed. They dare vnneth at anie time walke abroad far from the towne for their recreation, except at seasons; and then with strength of men furnished with armor and weapon for their safegard. They match in wedlocke among themselues, so that welnere the whole citie is allied and ioined togither in consanguinitie. But now to returne vnto the doings of the earle of Ormond that was placed lord iustice in Scrops roome. We do find that in the yeare 1408 he called a parlement at Dublin, in which the statutes of Kilkennie and Dublin were eftsones reuiued, and certeine ordinances established vnder the great seale of England against purueiors. The same yeare, the morrow after Lammas daie, the lord Thomas of Lancaster sonne to king Henrie the fourth, lord lieutenant of Ireland, landed at Carlingford, and in the weeke following he came vnto Dublin, and put the earle of Kildare vnder arrest, comming to him with three of his familie. He lost all his goods, being spoiled & rifled by the lord lieutenant his seruants, & himselfe kept still in prison in the castell of Dublin, till he had paid 300 marks fine.

1408
A parlement at Dublin.

The lord Thomas of Lancaster commeth ouer into Ireland.

On the daie of saint Marcell the martyr deceased the lord Stephan Scrope at Trilleldermot. The same yeare also was the lord Thomas of Lancaster at Kilmainan wounded (I know not how) and vnneth escaped with life, and after caused summons to be giuen by proclamation, that all such as ought by their tenures to serue the king, should assemble at Rosse. And after the feast of saint Hilarie, he held a parlement at Kilkennie for a tallage to be granted. And after the thirteenth of March, he returned into England, leauing the prior of Kilmainan for his deputie in Ireland. This yeare also Hugh Macgilmore was slaine in Cragfergus within the church of the friers minors, which church he had before destroied, and broken downe the glasse windowes to haue the iron bars, thorough which his enimies the Sauages entred vpon him. This yeare being in the tenth of Henrie the fourth, in June, Janico de Artois with the Englishmen slue foure score of the Irish in Vlster. This yeare king Henrie gaue the sword to the citie of Dublin, which citie was first gouerned (as appeareth by their ancient seale called Signum præposituræ) by a prouost: and in the thirteenth of Henrie the third by a maior and two bailifes, which were changed into shiriffes, by charter granted by Edward the first, 1547.

The lord Scrope deceaseth.

The lord Thomas returneth into England.

1409
James de Artois.

The sword giuen to the citie of Dublin.

Bailiffes changed into shiriffes.

This maioralitie, both for state and charge of office, and for bountifull hospitalitie, exceedeth anie citie in England, London excepted. In the yeare following, the one and twentith daie of Maie, a parlement began at Dublin, which lasted three weekes, the prior of Kilmainan sitting as lord iustice. The same yeare, the two and twentith of June, the same iustice toke the castels of Wibraclide, Oferoll, and de la Mare. Ireland this yeare was sore afflicted for want of corne. The lord iustice entred into the land of Obren with 1500 Kernes, of which number eight hundred reuolted to the Irish, so that if the power of Dublin had not beene there, it had gon euill with the lord iustice: and yet he escaped not without losse, for John Derpatrike was slaine there. In the yeare 1411, mariages were celebrated among the nobilitie in Ireland. William Preston maried the daughter of Edward Paris, and John Wogan matched with the eldest daughter of Christopher Preston; and Walter de la Hide with the second daughter of the same Christopher. In the yeare 1412, about the feast of Tibertius and Valerianus, which falleth on the tenth of Aprill, Oconthir did much mis-

1410

A iournie made by the lord iustice.

1411
Mariages.

1412
Oconthir.

chiefe in Meth, and toke 160 Englishmen. The same yeare Odoles a knight, and Thomas Fitzmorice sought togither, and either slue other. The foure & twentith of Maie, Robert Mounteine bishop of Meth departed this life, to whome succéeded Edward de Audiseie sometime archdecon of Cornwall. This yeare on saint Cutberts daie king Henrie the fourth departed this life.

The bishop of Meth deceaseth.

The death of king Henrie the fourth.

Henrie the fift.

IN the first yeare of this king, the fiue and twentith of September, landed in Ireland at Clawcarse, John Stanlie the kings lieutenant of that land. He departed this life the 18 of Januarie next insuing at Athird, in Latine called Atrium Dei. After his decease, Thomas Cranleie archbishop of Dublin was chosen lord iustice of Ireland. Janico de Artois led forth a power against Maginors, a great lord of Ireland, but nére to a place called Inor manie Englishmen were slaine. The morrow after saint Matthias daie, a parlement began againe at Dublin, which continued for the spaes of fiftéene daies, in which meane time the Irish did much hurt by inuasions made into the English pale, and burning vp all the houses afore them that stood in their waie, as their vsuall custome was in times of other parlements: whereupon a tallage was demanded, but not granted. In the yeare 1414, the Englishmen fought with the Irish nére to Kilka, and slue an hundred of the enimies, whilest the archbishop being lord iustice in Trisseldermot, went in procession with his clergie, praieng for the good spéed of his men and other of the countrie that were gone forth to fight with the aduersaries. In the feast of saint Gordian and Epimachus, to wit the tenth of Maie, were the English of Meth discomfited by Oconthir and his Irish, where they slue Thomas Maurenar baron of Serin; and there were taken prisoners Christopher Fleming, John Dardis, and diuerse others, beside manie that were slaine.

1413 John Stanleie the kings lieutenant in Ireland.

Thomas Cranleie archbishop of Dublin.

A parlement.

1414

Englishmen slaine.

On saint Martins éeuen sir John Talbot of Holomshire, lord Furniuale landed at Dalkeie, the kings lieutenant in Ireland, a man of great honor. In the yeere one thousand foure hundred and fiftéene in Nouember, Robert Talbot, a right noble man that walled the suburbs of Kilkennie, departed this life. Also Patrike Baret bishop of Fernis deceased, and was buried among the canons at Kenlis. This yeare on the feast daie of Gerualius and Prothasius which falleth on the nineténth of June, the lord lieutenants wife the ladie Furniuall was brought to bed at Finglasse of a sonne named Thomas. About the same time also Stephan Fleming archbishop of Armagh departed this life, after whome succéeded John Suanig. On the daie of saint Laurence the lord Furniuals sonne Thomas Talbot that was borne at Finglasse in Nouember last past, departed this life, and was buried in the quéere of the friers preachers church in Dublin. About the same time the Irish fell vpon the Englishmen, and slue manie of them, among other Thomas Baltimore of Baliquelan was one. The parlement which the last yeare had béene called and holden at Dublin, was this yeare remoued to Trim, & there began the eleuenth of Maie, where it continued for the space of eleuen daies, in the which was granted to the lord lieutenant a subsidie in monie.

John lord Talbot of Sherfield.

1415 Robert Talbot deceaseth.

1416 The archbishop of Armagh deceaseth.

The parlement remoued to Trim.

A subsidie.

1417

In the yeare following, the archbishop of Dublin passed ouer into England, and deceased at Faringdon, but his bodie was buried in the new college at Orford. This man is greatlie praised for his liberalitie, he was a god almesman, a great clerke, a doctor of diuinitie, an excellent preacher, a great builder, beautifull, tall of stature, and sanguine of complexion. He was foure score and ten yeares of age when he died, and had gouerned the church of Dublin in god quiet by the space of twentie yeres. This yeare shortlie after Easter, the lord deputie spoiled the tenants of Henrie Crus, and Henrie Bethat. Also at Midane on the feast date of saint John and saint Paule, the erle of Kildare, sir Christopher Preston, and sir John Bedlow were arrested and committed to ward within the castell of Trim, because they sought to commune with the prior of Kilmainan.

The archbishop of Dublin deceased.

His praise.

1418

The nine and twentith of June Matthew Hulseie baron of Galtrim deceased, & was buried at the friers preachers of Trim. In the yeare one thousand foure hundred & nineténe a roiall councell was holden at Naas, where was granted to the lord lieutenant a subsidie in monie. The same yeare vpon Cenethursdaie Othoell toke foure hundred kine that belonged vnto Ballimore, so breaking the peace contrarie to his oth. The fourth ides of Maie, Mac Murch chéefe capteine of his nation, and of all the Irish in Leinster was taken prisoner, and the same daie was sir Hugh Cokeseie made knight. The last of Maie the lord lieutenant, and the archbishop of Dublin with the maior raised the castell of Kennie. The morrow after the feast daie of Processus and Martinianus, that is the twentith of June, the lord William de Burgh and other Englishmen slue fiue hundred Irishmen, & toke Okellie. On the feast daie of Marie Magdalen the lord lieutenant Talbot returned into England, leauing his deputie there the archbishop of Dublin. This yeare about saint Laurence daie, diuerse went forth of Ireland to serue the king in his warres of Normandie, as Thomas Butler that was prior of Kilmainan, and manie others. John Fitzhenrie succéeded the said Butler in gouernment of the priorie of Kilmainan. The archbishop of Dublin that remained as lord deputie slue thirtie Irishmen nére vnto Rodiston. Also the thirtenth of Februarie John Fitzhenrie prior of Kilmainan departed this life, and William Fitzthomas was chosen to succeed in his place, and was confirmed the morrow after saint Valentines daie.

1419 A councell or parlement holden.

Mac Murch taken prisoner.

Okellie taken.

The prior of Kilmainan went to serue the king in France.

James Butler earle of Ormond appointed the kings lieutenant in Ireland, in place of John lord Talbot and Furniuall, landed at Waterford about the fourth ides of Aprill: and shortlie after his comming ouer, he caused a combat to be fought betwixt two of his cousins, of whom the one was slaine in that place, and the other carried awaie sore wounded. On saint Georges daie, he held a councell in Dublin, & summoned a parlement to begin there the seuenth of June. In the meane while he fetcht great booties out of the countries of the Irish lords, Oralie, Mac Mahun, and Maginois. But first yer we go further to shew what Marlburrow hath noted of the doings, whilest this earle of Ormond gouerned as the kings lieutenant in Ireland, we haue thought good to set downe what Campion also writeth thereof, as thus.

1420 James Butler erle of Ormond lord lieutenant.

A parlement summoned.

In the red more of Athie (the sunne almost lodged in the west, and miraculouslie standing still in his epicicle by the space of three houres, till the feat was accomplished, and no hole nor quakemire in all that bog annoieng either horsse or man of his part) he vanquished Omore and his terrible armie with a few of his owne meinie, and with the like number he Iames Yong an author alleaged by Campion.

The sunne staieth his course.

he ouercame Arthur Mac Morogh, at whose might & puissance all Leinster trembled. To the instruction of this mans worthinesse, the compiler of certeine precepts touching the rule of a common-wealth exciteth his lord the said earle in diuerse places of that worke incidentlie, ofttsons putting him in mind that the Irish are false by kind, that it were expedient, and a worke of charitie to execute vpon them wilfull and malicious transgressors the kings lawes somewhat sharplie, that Odemplie being winked at a while, abused that small time of sufferance to the iniurie of the earle of Kildare, intruding vnlawfullie vpon the castell of Leie, from whense the said deputie had lawfullie expelled him, and put the earle in possession thereof, that notwithstanding their oths and pledges, they are yet no longer true than they feele themselues the weaker. This deputie tamed the Byens, the Burghs, Mac Banons, Oghaghucaght, Morris Mac Mahun, all the capteins of Thomond: & all this he did in three months; the clergie twise euerie weeke in solemne procession praieng for his good succes against those disordered persons, which now in euerie part of Ireland degenerated from the English ciuilitie, to their old trade of life vsed in that countrie, repined at the English maner of gouernment. So far Campion.]

Diuerse parlements vpon prorogations were holden in time that this earle of Ormond was gouernor. The first began at Dublin the seauenth of June in this yeare one thousand foure hundred and twentie, which continued about sixteen daies. At this parlement was granted to the lord lieutenant a subsidie of seauen hundred marks. At the sixteene daies end this parlement was adiorned till the mondaie after saint Andrews daie. In the same parlement the debts of the lord John Talbot, which were due to certeine persons for vittels and other things, taken vp whilest he was lord lieutenant there, were reckoned vp; which lord Talbot verelie, for that he saw not the creditors satisfied before his comming awaie, was partlie euill spoken of in the countrie. The morrow after the feast of Simon and Jude, the castell of Colmolin was taken by Thomas Fitzgirald. And on saint Katharins eeuen, the sonne and heire of the earle of Ormond lord lieutenant was borne, for the which there was great reioising. In the parlement begun againe at Dublin the mondaie after saint Andrews daie, another subsidie of three hundred marks was granted vnto the lord lieutenant. And after they had sat thirteene daies, it was ofttsons adiorned vntill the mondaie after saint Ambrose daie. Then rumors were spred abrode, that Thomas Fitz-John earle of Desmond was departed this life at Paris vpon saint Laurence daie, after whome succeeded his vncle James Fitzgirald, whome he had three seuerall times renounced, as one that was a waster of his patrimonie both in England and Ireland, and not like to come to anie good proofe.

1420 The parlement began.

The castell of Colmolin.

The earle of Ormonds sonne and heire borne.

In the yeare one thousand foure hundred twentie and one, the parlement began againe vpon the last prorogation, the mondaie after saint Ambrose daie: in which parlement it was ordeined that certeine persons should be sent to the king, to sue that a reformation might be had in matters touching the state of the land. The chiefe of those that were thus sent, were the archbishop of Armagh, and sir Christopher Preston knight. Moreouer Richard Ohedian bishop of Cashill was accused by John Gese bishop of Lismore and Waterford, who laid thirtie articles vnto his charge. Amongst other, one was for that he loued none of the English nation, and that he bestowed not one benefice vpon anie Englishman, and counselled other bishops that they should not bestow anie within their diocesse vpon anie Englishman. Moreouer, another article was for counterfeting the kings seale. And another, for that he went about to make himselfe king of Mounster, and had taken a ring from the image of saint Patrike (which the earle of Desmond had offered) and giuen it to his lemman. Manie other crimes were laid to him by the said bishop of Lismore and Waterford, which he exhibited in writing. Also in the same parlement there rose contention betwixt Adam Paine bishop of Clone, and another prelat, whose church he would haue annexed vnto his see. At length, after the parlement had continued for the space of eightéene daies, it brake vp. Herewith came news of the slaughter of the lord Thomas of Lancaster duke of Clarence, that had béene lord lieutenant of Ireland. And vpon the seuenth of Maie certeine of the erle of Ormonds men were ouerthrowen by the Irish, nére to the abbete of Leis, and seuen and twentie Englishmen were slaine there: of whom the chéefe were two gentlemen, the one named Purcell, & the other Grant. Also ten were taken prisoners, and two hundred escaped to the forsaid abbete, so sauing themselues. About the same time Mac Mahun an Irish lord did much hurt within the countrie of Argile, by burning & wasting all afore him. Also vpon the morrow after Midsummer daie, the earle of Ormond lord lieutenant entred into the countrie about Leis vpon Omorris, and for the space of foure daies togither did much hurt, in slaieng and spoiling the people, till the Irish were glad to sue for peace.

The duke of Clarence slaine in France.

Mac Mahun

Henrie the sixt.

LIeutenants to Henrie the first ouer the relme of Ireland were these, Edmund earle of March, and James earle of Ormond his deputie; John Sutton lord Dudleie, and sir Thomas Strange knight his deputie; sir Thomas Stanleie, and sir Christopher Plunket his deputie. This sir Thomas Stanleie on Michaelmasse daie, in the twelfe yeare of king Henrie the first, with all the knights of Meth & Irrell, fought against the Irish, slue a great number, & toke Neill Odonell prisoner.]

Here endeth Marlburrow, and all that followeth is taken out of Campion.

Lion lord Wels, and the earle of Ormond his deputie. James earle of Ormond by himselfe, John earle of Shrewesburie, and the archbishop of Dublin lord iustice in his absence. Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, father to king Edward the fourth & earle of Ulster, had the office of lieutenant by the kings letters patents during the terme of tenne yeares, who apointed to rule vnder him as his deputies at sundrie times the baron of Deluin, Richard Fitzeustace knight, James earle of Ormond, and Thomas Fitzmorice earle of Kildare. To this Richard duke of Yorke and Ulster then resident in Dublin, was borne within the castell there his second sonne the lord George that was after duke of Clarence. His godfathers at the fontstone were the earles of Ormond and Desmond. Whether the commotion of Jacke Cade an Irishman borne, naming himselfe Mortimer, and so pretending cousinage to diuerse noble houses in this land, proceeded from some intelligence with the dukes frends here in Ireland, it is vncerteine: but surelie the duke was vehementlie suspected, and immediatlie after began the troubles, which through him were raised. Which broiles being couched for a time, the duke held himselfe in Ireland, being latelie by parlement ordeined protector of the realme of England: he left his agent in the court, his brother the earle of Salisburie, lord chancellor, to whom he declared the truth of the troubles then toward in Ireland: which letter exemplified by ſir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie, a great ſearcher and preſeruer of antiquities, as it came to Campions hands, and by him ſet downe we haue thought good likewiſe to preſent it here to your view.

Campion out of the records of Christs church.

George duke of Clarence borne at Dublin.

Jacke Cade.

To the right worſhipfull, and with all mine heart entierelie beloued brother, the earle of Salisburie.

The copie of a letter.

RIght worſhipfull, & with all my hart entierelie beloued brother, I recommend me vnto you as heartilie as I can. And like it you to wit, ſith I wrote laſt vnto the king our ſouereigne lord his highneſſe, the Iriſh enimie, that is to ſaie Magoghigam, and with him three or foure Iriſh capteins, aſſociat with a great fellowſhip of Engliſh rebels, notwithſtanding that they were within the king our ſouereigne lord his peace, of great malice, and againſt all truth haue maligned againſt their legiance, and vengeablie haue brent a great towne of mine inheritance in Meth, called Ramore, and other villages thereabouts, and murthered and brent both men, women, and children, without mercie: the which enimies be yet aſſembled in woods and forts, awaighting to do the hurt and grieuance to the kings ſubiects, that they can thinke or imagine. For which cauſe I write at this time vnto the kings highneſſe, and beſeech his good grace for to haſten my paiment for this land, according vnto his letters of warrant now late directed vnto the treaſuror of England, to the intent I may wage men in ſufficient number for to reſiſt the malice of the ſame enimies, & puniſh them in ſuch wiſe, that other which would do the ſame for lacke of reſiſtance, in time maie take example. For doubtleſſe, but if my paiment be had in all haſt, for to haue men of warre in defenſe and ſafegard of this land; my power can not ſtretch to keepe it in the kings obeiſance: and verie neceſſitie will compell me to come into England to liue there vpon my poore liuelihood. For I had leauer be dead than anie inconuenience ſhould fall thervnto by my default: for it ſhall neuer be chronicled nor remaine in ſcripture (by the grace of God) that Ireland was loſt by my negligence. And therefore I beſeech you right worſhipfull brother, that you will hold to your hands inſtantlie, that my paiment maie be had at this time in eſchewing all inconueniences. For I haue example in other places (more pitie it is) for to dread ſhame, and for to acquit my troth vnto the kings highneſſe, as my dutie is. And this I praie and exhort you good brother, to ſhew vnto his good grace, and that you will be ſo good, that this language maie be inacted at this preſent parlement for mine excuſe in time to come, and that you will be good to my ſeruant Roger Ro the bearer of theſe, and to my other ſeruants, in ſuch things as they ſhall purſue vnto the kings highnes, and to giue full faith and credence vnto the report of the ſaid Roger, touching the ſaid matters. Right worſhipfull, and with all my heart intierlie beloued brother, our bleſſed Lord God preſerue and keepe you in all honour, proſperous eſtate, and felicitie, & grant you right good life and long. Written at Dublin the fiftéenth date of June.

Your faithfull true brother
Richard Yorke.

Roger Ro.

Magoghigam his power.

Of ſuch power was Magoghigam in thoſe daies, who as he wan and kept it by the ſword, ſo now his ſucceſſors in that ſtate liue but as meane capteins, yéelding their winnings to the ſtronger. This is the miſerie of lawleſſe people, reſembling the rudeneſſe of the rude world, wherein euerie man was richer and power than other, as he was in might and violence more or leſſe inabled. Here began factions of the nobilitie in Ireland, fauouring diuerſe ſides that ſtroue for the crowne of England. For the duke of Yorke, in thoſe ten yeares of his gouernement, exceedinglie wan the hearts of the noblemen and gentlemen of that land, of the which diuerſe were ſlaine with him at Wakefield; as the contrarie part was the nert yeare by his ſonne Edward earle of March at Mortimers croſſe in Wales. In which meane time the Iriſh grew hardie, & vſurped the Engliſh countries in ſufficientlie defended, as they had done by like opportunitie in the latter end of Richard the ſecond. Theſe two ſeaſons ſet them ſo aſlote, that henſeforward they could neuer be caſt out from their forcible poſſeſſions, holding by plaine wrong all Vlſter, and by certeine Iriſh tenures no ſmall portions of Mounſter and Connagh, leaſt in Meth and Leinſter, where the ciuill ſubiects of the Engliſh blood did euer moſt preuaile.

Edward the fourth and Edward the fift.

Lieutenants and deputies in king Edward the fourth his daies.

THomas Fitzmorice earle of Kildare, lord iuſtice till the third yeare of Edward the fourth, after which time the duke of Clarence, brother to the king, had the office of lieutenant while he liued, & made his deputies by ſundry turnes, Thomas earle of Deſmond, John Tiptoft earle of Worceſter the kings couſine, Thomas earle of Kildare, and Henrie lord Greie of Ruthin. Great was the credit of the Giraldins euer when the houſe of Yorke proſpered, and likewiſe the Butlers thriued vnder the blood of the Lancaſters: for which cauſe the earle of Deſmond remained manie yeres deputie to George duke of Clarence his good brother: but when he had ſpoken certeine diſdainefull words againſt the late marriage of king Edward with the ladie Elizabeth Greie, the ſaid ladie being now queene, cauſed his trade of life after the Iriſh maner, contrarie to ſundrie old ſtatutes inacted in that behalfe, to be ſifted and examined by John earle of Worceſter his ſucceſſor; ſo that he was atteinted of treaſon, condemned, and for the ſame beheaded at Drogheda.

The Butlers.

The earle of Worceſter. 1467

James the father of this Thomas earle of Deſmond, being ſuffered and not controlled, during the gouernment of Richard duke of Yorke his godcept, and of Thomas earle of Kildare his kinſman, put vpon the kings ſubiects within the countries of Waterford, Corke, Kerrie, and Limerike, the Iriſh impoſitions of quinto and liuerie, cartings, carriages, lodgings, cocherings, bonnaght, and ſuch like, which cuſtomes are the verie breeders, mainteiners, and vpholders of all Iriſh enormities, wringing from the poore tenants euerlaſting teſſe, allowance of meat and monie, whereby their bodies and goods were brought in ſeruice and thraldome, ſo that the men of warre, horſſes, and their Galloglaſſes lie ſtill vpon the farmers, eat them out, begger the countrie, foſter a ſort of idle vagabonds, readie to rebell if their lord command them, euer nuzled in ſtealth and robberies.

Campion out of Hentiegen in his collections.

Iriſh impoſitions.

Theſe euill preſidents giuen by the father, the ſon did exerciſe, being lord deputie, to whome the reformation of that diſorder ſpeciallie belonged. Notwithſtanding the ſame fault being winked at in other, and with ſuch rigor auenged in him, was manifeſtlie taken for a quarrell ſought and procured. Two yeares after, the ſaid earle of Worceſter 1469 lost his head, whilest Henrie the first taken out of the tower was set vp againe, and king Edward proclamed vsurper, and then was Kildare inlarged, whom likewise atteinted, they thought also to haue rid, and shortlie both the earles of Kildare & Desmond were restored to their bloud by parlement. Sir Rowland Eustace, sometime treasuror and lord chancellor, was lastlie also lord deputie of Ireland. He founded saint Francis abbeis beside Kilcollen bridge. King Edward a yeare before his death honored his yonger sonne (Richard duke of Yorke) with the title of lieutenant ouer this land, which he inioied till his vnnaturall vncle bereft both him and his brother king Edward the fift of their naturall liues.

loſt

Restitution to bloud. 1470 Flatsburie.

Richard the third.

Richard the third.

WHen this monster of nature & cruell tyrant Richard the third had killed his two yong nephues, and taken vpon him the crowne & gouernement of England, he preferred his owne sonne Edward to the dignitie of lord lieutenant of Ireland, whose deputie was Girald earle of Kildare that bare that office all the reigne of king Richard, and a while in Henrie the seuenth his daies.

Henrie the seuenth.

Henrie the seuenth. Sir Richard Simon priest. Lambert counterfeit to be the earle of Warwike.

TO which earle came the wilie priest sir Richard Simon, bringing with him a lad that was his scholer, named Lambert, whome he feined to be the sonne of George earle of Clarence, latelie escaped forth of the tower of London. And the boie could reckon vp his pedegrée so readilie, & had learned of the priest such princelie behauiour, that he lightlie moued the said earle, and manie others the nobles of Ireland (tendering as well the linage roiall of Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, and his sonne George their countrieman borne, as also maligning the aduancement of the house of Lancaster in Henrie the seuenth) either to thinke or to faine, that the world might beléeue they thought verelie this child to be Edward earle of Warwike, the duke of Clarence his lawfull sonne.

And although king Henrie more than halfe marred their sport, in shewing the right earle through all the streets of London, yet the ladie Margaret duches of Burgongne, sister to Edward the fourth, hir nephue John de la Pole, the lord Louell, sir Thomas Broughton knight, and diuers other capteins of this conspiracie, deuised to abuse the colour of this yong earles name, for preferring their purpose: which if it came to good, they agréed to depose Lambert, and to erect the verie earle indéed, now prisoner in the tower, for whose quarrell had they pretended to fight, they déemed it likelie he should haue béene made awaie. Wherefore it was blazed in Ireland, that the king to mocke his subiects, had scholed a boie to take vpon him the earle of Warwikes name, and had shewed him about London, to blind the eies of the simple folke, and to defeat the lawfull inheritour of the good duke of Clarence their countriman and protector during his life, vnto whose linage they also deriued title in right to the crowne.

The lord Louell. Sir Thomas Broughton.

In all hast they assembled at Dublin, and there in Christs church they crowned this idoll, honoring him with titles imperiall, feasting and triumphing, raising mightie shouts and cries, carrieng him from thense to the castell vpon tall mens shoulders, that he might be séene and noted, as he was sure an honorable child to looke vpon. Herewith assembling their forces togither, they prouided themselues of ships, and imbarking therein, they tooke the sea, and landing in Lancashire, passed forwards, till they came to Newarke vpon Trent. Thereupon insued the battell of Stoke, commonlie called Martin Swarts field, wherein Lambert and his maister were taken, but yet pardoned of life, and were not executed. The erle of Lincolne, the lord Louell, Martin Swart, the Almaine capteine, and Maurice Fitzthomas capteine of the Irish, were slaine, and all their power discomfited, as in the English histo-rie it may further appeare. Jasper duke of Bedford, and earle of Penbroke lieutenant, and Walter archbishop of Dublin his deputie.

Lambert crowned.

1486 Jasper duke of Bedford lieutenant.

In this time befell another like Irish illusion, procured by the duchesse aforesaid, and certeine nobles in England, whereby was exalted as rightfull king of England, and vndoubted earle of Ulster, the counterfeit Richard duke of Yorke, preserued from king Richards crueltie (as the adherents faced the matter downe) and with this maigame lord, named indéed Peter (in scorne Perkin) Warbecke, they flattered themselues manie yeares after. Then was sir Edward Poinings knight sent ouer lord deputie, with commission to apprehend Warbecks principall parteners in Ireland: amongst whom was named Girald Fitzgirald, whose purgation the king (notwithstanding diuerse surmising and auouching the contrarie) did accept. After much adoo, Perkin being taken, confessed by his owne writting the course of his whole life, and all his procéedings in this enterprise, whereof in the English historie, as we haue borowed the same forth of Halles chronicles, ye may read more, and therefore héere we haue omitted to speake further of that matter.

Perkin warbecke.

1494 Sir Edward Poinings lord deputie.

Perkin warbecke taken.

In the yeare 1501, king Henrie made lieutenant of Ireland his second sonne Henrie, as then duke of Yorke, who after reigned by the name of Henrie the eight. To him was appointed deputie the foresaid Girald erle of Kildare, who accompanied with John Blake maior of Dublin, warred vpon William le Burgh, Obren, and Mac Nemarre, Mcarroull, and fought with the greatest power of Irishmen that had béene togither since the conquest, vnder the hill of Knocktow, in English the hill of the ares, six miles from Galowaie, and two miles from Belliclare Burghes manour towne. Mac William and his complices were there taken, his souldiers that escaped the sword were pursued fleeing, for the space of fiue miles: great slaughter was made of them, and manie capteins caught, without the losse of one Englishman. The earle of Kildare at his returne was made knight of the noble order of the garter, and liued in worthie estimation all his life long, as well for this seruice, as diuerse other his famous exploits.

1501 Henrie duke of Yorke, after king Henrie the eight, lord lieutenant.

The field of Knocktow.

The earle of Kildare, knight of the garter.

Thus farre the Irish Chronicles continued and ended at Henrie the seauenth.

TO THE RIGHT HOnorable ſir Henrie Sidneie
knight, lord deputie of Ireland, lord preſident of Wales, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, and one of hir maieſties priuie councell within hir realme of England.

How cumberſome (right honorable) and dangerous a taske it is, to ingroſſe & divulge the doings of others, eſpeciallie when the parties regiſtred or their iſſue are liuing: both common reaſon ſufficientlie acknowledgeth, and dailie experience infalliblie prœueth. For man by courſe of nature is ſo parciallie affected to himſelfe and his bloud, as he will be more agreeued with the chronicler for recording a peeuiſh treſpaſſe, than he will be offended with his friend for committing an heinous treaſon. Ouer this, if the hiſtorian be long, he is accompted a trifler: if he be ſhort, he is taken for a ſummiſter: if he commend, he is twighted for a flatterer: if he reprœue, he is holden for a carper: if he be pleaſant, he is noted for a ieſter: if he be graue, he is reckoned for a drœper: if he miſdate, he is named a falſifier: if he once but trip, he is tearmed a ſtumbler: ſo that let him beare himſelfe in his chronicle as vprightlie and as conſcionablie as he may poſſible, yet he ſhall be ſure to find them that will be more preſt to blab foorth his pelfiſh faults, than they will be readie to blaze out his good deſerts. Others there be, that although they are not able to reprœue what is written, yet they will be ſure to caſt in his diſh what is forgotten. Heere, ſaie they, this exploit is omitted: there that policie is not detected: heere this ſaieng would haue beene interlaced: there that trecherie ſhould haue beene diſplaied. Theſe & the like diſcommodities, with which hiſtoriographers are vſuallie cloid, haue borne backe diuers and ſundrie willing minds, who taking the waie to be thornie, the credit ſlipperie, the carpers to be manie, would in no caſe be medlers, chooſing rather to ſit by their owne fire obſcurelie at home, than to be baited with enuious toongs openlie abroad.

Others on the contrarie ſide, being reſolute fellowes, and trampling vnder foot theſe curious faultfinders, would not ſticke to put themſelues foorth in preſſe, and maugre all their hearts, to buskle forward, and ruſh through the pikes of their quipping nips, and biting frumps. But I taking the meane betweene both theſe extremities, held it for better, not to be ſo faint and peeuiſh a meacocke, as to ſhrinke and couch mine head for euerie mizeling ſhoure, nor yet to beare my ſelfe ſo high in heart, as to pranſe and iet like a proud gennet through the ſtreet, not weighing the barking of curriſh bandogs. And therefore, if I ſhall be found in mine hiſtorie ſometime too tedious, ſometime too ſpare, ſometime too fawning in commending the liuing, ſometime too flat in reproouing the dead: I take God to witneſſe, that mine offenſe therein proceedeth of ignorance, and not of ſet wilfulneſſe. But as for the paſſing ouer in ſilence of diuerſe euents (albeit the law or rather the libertie of an hiſtorie requireth that all ſhould be related, and nothing whuſted) yet I muſt confeſſe, that as I was not able, vpon ſo little leaſure, to know all that was ſaid or doone; ſo I was not willing for ſundrie reſpects, to write euerie trim tram that I knew to be ſaid or doone. And if anie be ouerthwartlie waiwarded, as he will ſooner long for that I haue omitted, than he will be contented with that I haue chronicled; I cannot deuiſe in my iudgement a better waie to ſatiſfie his appetite, than with one Dolie, a peintor of Oxford, his anſwer: who being appointed to tricke out the ten commandements, omitted one, and pourtraied but nine. Which fault eſpied by his maiſter that hired him, Dolie anſwered, that in verie deed he peinted but nine: howbeit, when he vnderſtood that his maſter had well obſerued and kept the nine commandements that alreadie were drawne, he gaue his word at better leiſure throughlie to finiſh the tenth. And truelie ſo muſt I ſaie: I haue laid downe heere to the reader his view, a breefe diſcourſe, wherof I truſt he ſhall take no great ſurfet. And when I am aduertiſed, that he will digeſt the thin fare that heere is diſht before him: it may be (God willing) heereafter, that he ſhall find my booke with ſtore of more licorous deinties farſed and furniſhed; leauing to his choiſe, either nicelie to pickle, or greedilie to ſwallow, as much as to his contentation ſhall beſt beſeeme him. Wherefore my good lord, ſith I may not denie, but that the worke is painfull, and I doo forecaſt that the miſconſtruction may be perilous: the toileſomneſſe of the paine I refer to my priuat knowledge, the abandoning of the perill, I commit to your honorable patronage, not doubting thereby to be ſheelded againſt the ſiniſter gloſing of malicious interpretors. Thus betaking your lordſhip to God, I craue your attentiuenes, in peruſing a cantell or parcell of the Iriſh hiſtorie that heere inſueth.

in

RICHARD STANIHVRST.

A continuation of the Chronicles of Ireland, comprising the reigne of king Henrie the eight.

GErald Fitzgirald earle of Kildare, son to Thomas Fitzgirald, of whō mention hath bēne made in the latter end of the former storie, a mightie man of stature, full of honor & courage, who had bēne deputie & lord iustice of Ireland first & last 33 yéeres, deceased at Kildare the third of September, & lieth intombed in the quære of Christes church at Dublin, in a chappell by him founded. Betweēn him & James Butler earle of Ormond (their owne gelousies fed with enuie & ambition, kindled with certeine lewd factious abettors of either side) as generallie to all noblemen, so especiallie to both these houses verie incident, euer since the ninth yeare of Henrie the seuenth, bred some trouble in Ireland. The plot of which mutuall grudge was grounded vpon the factious dissention, that was raised in England betweene the houses of Yorke & Lancaster, Kildare cleauing to Yorke, and Ormond relieng to Lancaster. To the vpholding of which discord, both these noble men laboured with toth and naile to ouercrow, and consequentlie to ouerthrow one the other. And for somuch as they were in honour peeres, they wrought by hooke and by crooke to be in authoritie superiours. The gouernement therfore in the reigne of Henrie the seuenth, being cast on the house of Kildare; James earle of Ormond a deepe and a farre reaching man, giuing backe like a butting ram to strike the harder push, deuised to inueigle his aduersarie by submission & courtesie, being not then able to ouermatch him with stoutnesse or preheminence. Wherevpon Ormond addressed his letters to the deputie, specifieng a slander raised on him and his, that he purposed to deface his gouernement, and to withstand his authoritie. And for the clearing of himselfe and of his adherents, so it stood with the deputie his pleasure, he would make his spéedie repaire to Dublin, & there in an open audience would purge himselfe of all such odious crimes, of which he was wrongfullie suspected.

1514

The occasion of the dissention betweene Kildare and Ormond.

To this reasonable request had the lord deputie no sooner condescended, than Ormond with a puissant armie marched towards Dublin, incamping in an abbeie in the suburbs of the citie, named saint Thomas court. The approching of so great an armie of the citizens suspected, and also of Kildares councellors greatlie disliked, lastlie the extortion that the lawlesse souldiers vsed in the pale by seuerall complaints detected: these three points, with diuerse other suspicious circumstances laid and put togither, did minister occasion rather of further discord, than of anie present agreement. Ormond persisting still in his humble sute, sent his messenger to the lord deputie, declaring that he was prest and readie to accomplish the tenour of his letters, and there did attend (as became him) his lordship his pleasure. And as for the companie, he brought with him from Mounster, albeit suspicious braines did rather of a malicious craftinesse surmise the worst, than of charitable wisedome did iudge the best; yet notwithstanding, vpon conference had with his lordship, he would not doubt to satisfie him at full in all points, wherewith he could be with anie colour charged, and so to stop vp the spring, from whense all the enuious suspicions gushed. Kildare with this mild message intreated, appointed the méeting to be at saint Patrike his church: where they were ripping vp one to another their mutuall quarrels, rather recounting the damages they susteined, than acknowledging the iniuries they offered: the citizens and Ormond his armie fell at some iar, for the oppression and exaction with which the souldiers surcharged them. With whom as part of the citizens bickered, so a round knot of archers rushed into the church, meaning to haue murthered Ormond, as the capteine and belwedder of all these lawlesse rabble. The earle of Ormond suspecting that he had bēne betraied, fled to the chapiter house, put to the doore, sparring it with might and maine. The citizens in their rage, imagining that euerie post in the church had bēne one of the souldiers, shot hab or nab at random vp to the rodloft and to the chancell, leauing some of their arrowes sticking in the images.

The citie in an vproare.

Ormond marcheth to Dublin.

Kildare pursuing Ormond to the chapiter house doore, vndertooke on his honor that he should receiue no villanie. Wherevpon the recluse craning his lordships hand to assure him his life, there was a clift in the chapiter house doore, pearsed at a trise, to the end both the earles should haue shaken hands and be reconciled. But Ormond surmising that this drift was intended for some further treacherie, that if he would stretch out his hand, it had bēne percase chopt off, refused that proffer; vntill Kildare stretcht in his hand to him, and so the doore was opened, they both imbraced the storme appeased, and all their quarrels for that present rather discontinued than ended. In this garboile, one of the citizens, surnamed Blanchfield was slaine. This latter quarrell being like a greene wound, rather bungerlie botcht than soundlie cured, in that Kildare suspected that so great an armie (which the other alledged to be brought for the gard gard of his person) to haue bene of purpose assembled, to outface him & his power in his owne countrie. And Ormond mistrusted, that this treacherous practise of the Dublinians was by Kildare deuised. These and the like surmises lightlie by both the noble men misdeemed, and by the continuall twatling of tiring clawbacks in their eares whispered, bred and fostered a malice betwixt them and their posteritie, manie yeares incurable, which caused much stur and vnquietnesse in the realme, vntill the confusion of the one house and the nonage of the other ended and buried their mutuall quarrels.

The earles reconciled.

Blanchfield slaine.

The description of Ormond. The description of Kildare.

Ormond was nothing inferiour to the other in stomach, and in reach of policie far beyond him. Kildare was in gouernement mild, to his enimies sterne, to the Irish such a scourge, that rather for despite of him than for fauor of anie part, they relied for a time to Ormond, came vnder his protection, serued at his call, performed by starts (as their manner is) the dutie of good subiects. Ormond was secret and of great forecast, verie staied in speech, dangerous of euerie trifle that touched his reputation. Kildare was open and plaine, hardlie able to rule himselfe when he were moued to anger, not so sharpe as short, being easilie displeased and soner appeased. Being in a rage with certeine of his seruants for faults they committed, one of his horsemen offered master Boice (a gentleman that reteined to him) an Irish hobbie, on condition, that he would plucke an haire from the earle his beard. Boice taking the proffer at rebound, stept to the earle (with whose good nature he was throughlie acquainted) parching in the heat of his choler, and said: So it is, and if it like your good lordship, one of your horsemen promised me a choise horse, if I snip one haire from your beard. Well quoth the earle, I agree thereto, but if thou plucke anie more than one, I promise thee to bring my fist from thine eare.

Boice.

The branch of this good nature hath bene deriued from him to an earle of his posteritie, who being in a chase for the wrong sawcing of a patridge, arose suddenlie from the table, meaning to haue reasoned the matter with his cooke. Hauing entred the kitchen, drowning in oblivion his chalenge, he began to commend the building of the roome, wherein he was at no time before, & so leauing the cooke vncontrold, he returned to his ghests merilie. This old earle being (as is aforesaid) some hot and some cold, was of the English well beloued, a good iusticier, a suppressor of the rebels, a warriour incomparable, towards the nobles that he fansied not somewhat headlong and vnrulie. Being charged before Henrie the seuenth, for burning the church of Cashell, and manie witnesses prepared to auouch against him the truth of that article, he suddenlie confessed the fact, to the great wondering and detestation of the councell. When it was loked how he wold iustifie the matter; By Jesus (quoth he) I would neuer haue done it, had it not been told me that the archbishop was within. And bicause the same archbishop was one of his busiest accusers there present, the king merilie laughed at the plainnesse of the noble man, to see him alledge that thing for excuse, which most of all did aggrauate his offense.

The last article against him they conceiued in these tearmes; Finallie all Ireland can not rule this earle. Nor quoth the king: then in good faith shall this earle rule all Ireland. Thus was that accusation turned to a iest. The earle returned to his countrie lord deputie, who (notwithstanding his simplicitie in peace) was of that valour and policie in war, as his name bred a greater terror to the Irish, than other mens armies. In his warres he vsed for policie a retchlesse kind of diligence, or a headie carelesnesse, to the end his souldiors should not faint in their attempts, were th' enimie of neuer so great power. Being generall in the field of Knocktow, where in effect all the Irish rebels of Ireland were gathered against the English pale, one of the earle his capteins presented him a band of Kerns, euen as they were readie to ioine battell, and withall demanded of the erle in what seruice he would haue them imploied. Parte (quoth he) let them stand by and giue vs the gaze. Such was his courage, that notwithstanding his enimies were two to one: yet would he set so good a face on the matter, as his souldiors should not once suspect, that he either needed, or longed for anie further helpe.

Kildare returneth lord deputie.

Kildares policie in warre.

Hauing triumphantlie vanquished the Irish in that conflict, he was shortlie after, as well for that, as other his valiant exploits, made knight of the garter: and in the fift yeare of Henrie the eight in that renowme & honour he died, wherein for the space of manie yeares he liued. No maruell if this successe were a cosie to the aduerse part, which the longer it held aloofe, and bit the bridle, the more egerlie it followed the course, hauing once got scope and roome at will, as shall be hereafter at full declared. Ormond bearing in mind the treacherie of the Dublinians, procured such as were the grauest prelats of his clergie, to intimate to the court of Rome the heathenish riot of the citizens of Dublin, in rushing into the church armed, polluting with slaughter the consecrated place, defacing the images, prostrating the reliks, rasing downe altars, with barbarous outeries, more like miscreant Saracens, than christian catholikes. Whereupon a legat was posted to Ireland, bending his course to Dublin, where some after hee was solemnelie receiued by Walter Fitzsimons, archbishop of Dublin, a graue prelat, for his lerning and wisedome chosen to be one of king Henrie the seuenth his chapleins, in which vocation he continued twelue yeares, and after was aduanced to be archbishop of Dublin.

1514

The Dublinians accused.

A legat sent from Rome.

Walter Fitzsimons.

The legat vpon his arriuall indicted the citie for his execrable offense: but at length, by the procurement as well of the archbishop as of all the cleargie, he was weighed to giue the citizens absolution with this caueat, that in detestation of so horrible a fact, and Ad perpetuam rei memoriam, the maior of Dublin should go barefoted thorough out the citie in open procession before the sacrament, on Corpus Christi daie: which penitent satisfaction was after in euerie such procession dulie accomplished. Girald Fitzgirald, sonne and heire to the aforesaid erle of Kildare, was shortlie after his fathers decease constituted lord deputie of Ireland, before whome in the seuenth yeare of Henrie the eight, there was a parlement holden at Dublin, wherein it was established, that all such as bring out of England the kings letters of priuat seale, for particular causes against anie of the king his subiects in Ireland, should find sufficient suerties in the king his chancerie in Ireland; to bee bound by recognisance, that the plaintife shall satisfie the defendant, that purgeth or acquiteth himselfe of the matter to him alledged, for his costs and damages susteined by such wrongfull veration. This noble man being valiant and well spoken, was nothing inferior to his father in martiall prowesse, chasing in the time of his gouernment the familie of the Toles, battering Ocarrell his castels, and bringing in awe all the Irish of the land.

Penance inioined to the citizens of Dublin.

The earle of Kildare lord deputie.

A parlement holden at Dublin.

This earle of good meaning, to vnite the houses in friendship, matched his sister Margaret Fitzgirald with Piers Butler earle of Ossorie, whome he also helped to recouer the earldome of Ormond, into the which, after the decease of the earle James, a bastard Butler had by abatement intruded. Great and manifold manifold were the miseries the ladie Margaret susteined, hir husband Piers Butler being so egerlie pursued by the vsurper, as he durst not beare vp hed, but was forced to houer and lurke in woods and forrests. The noble woman being great with child, and vpon necessitie constreined to vse a spare diet (for hir onelie sustenance was milke) she longed sore for wine, and calling hir lord, and a trustie seruant of James White his, James White vnto hir, she requested them both to helpe hir to some wine, for she was not able anie longer to indure so strict a life. Trulie Margaret, quoth the earle of Ossorie, thou shalt haue store of wine within this foure and twentie houres, or else thou shalt feed alone on milke for me.

Piers Butler and Margaret Fitzgirald espoused.

The Nert daie following, Piers hauing intelligence that his enimie the base Butler would haue trauelled from Donmore to Kilkennie, notwithstanding he were accompanied with six horsemen: yet Piers hauing none but his lackie, did forestall him in the waie, and with a couragious charge gored the baskard through with his speare. This prosperous calme succeeding the former boisterous storme, the ladie Margaret began to take heart, hir naturall stoutnesse stoted, as well by the remembrance of hir noble birth, as by the intelligence of hir honorable match. Kildare all this while kept in authoritie, notwithstanding the pushes giuen against him by secret heauers that enuied his fortune, and sought to nourish the old grudge, was at length by their priuie packing fetched vp to the court of England by commission, and caused him to be examined vpon diuerse interrogatories touching the affaires of Ireland.

The baskard Butler slaine.

Kildare sent for into England.

He left in his rome Maurice Fitzthomas of Lackragh lord iustice: and shortlie after came ouer lord lieutenant Thomas Howard earle of Surreie, who was after duke of Norffolke, grandfather to the last duke, accompanied with two hundred yeomen of the crowne: before whome, shortlie after his repaire thither, there was a parlement holden at Dublin, in which there past an act, that all wilfull burning of corne, as well in rekes in the fields, as also in villages and townes, should be high treason. Item, an act against loding of woolles & flor, vpon paine of forfeiture of the double value of the same, the one halfe to the king, and the other halfe to him that will sue therefore. Item, that anie person seized of lands, rents, or tenements in possession or in vse, vnto the yearelie value of ten markes aboue the charges, in fee simple, fee taile, or for terme of life, copie hold, or ancient demeane, shall passe in euerie atteint. While the lord lieutenant sat at dinner in the castell, of Dublin, he heard news that the Mores with a maine armie were euen at the entrie of the borders, readie to inuade the English pale. Immediatlie men were leuied by John Fitzsimons then maior of Dublin, and the next morrow ioining them vnto his band, the lieutenant marched towards the frontiers of Leir.

Maurice Fitzthomas lord iustice. Surrie lord lieutenant of Ireland.

1521 A parlement holden at Dublin.

The Mores in rebellion.

John Fitzsimons.

The Mores vpon the lieutenant his approch, seuered themselues into sundrie companies, and vnderstanding that the cariage was dragging after the armie, and slenderlie manned, certeine of them charged the lieutenant his seruants, and such of the citizens as were appointed to gard the cariage. Patrike Fitzsimons, a strong sturdie yonker, kept the enimies such tacke, as he chased part of them awaie, rescued the cariage, slue two of the rebels, and brought the heads with him to maister maior his tent. The nert morning, two of the lieutenant his men, that slunke awaie from Fitzsimons, thinking that the cariage had beene lost, aduertised their lord that Fitzsimons fled awaie; and the Mores were so manie in companie, as it had beene but follie for two to bicker with so great a number. The lieutenant posted in a rage to the maior his pauilion, telling him that his man Fitzsimons was a cowardlie traitor in running awaie, when he should haue defended the cariage.

Patrike Fitzsimons.

What am I, my lord (quoth Patrike Fitzsimons) skipping in his shirt out of the tent, with both the heads in his hands? My lord, I am no coward, I stood to my tacklings when your men gaue me the slip, I rescued the cariage, and haue here sufficient tokens of my manhod, tumbling downe both the heads. Saist thou so Fitzsimons, quoth the lieutenant? I crie thee mercie, and by this George, I would to God it had beene my good hap to haue beene in thy companie in that skirmish. So drinking to Fitzsimons in a boll of wine, and honourablie rewarding him for his good seruice, he returned to his pauilion, where hauing knowledge of Mores his recule, he pursued him with a troope of horsmen. The lieutenant thus passing forwards, was espied a gunner of Mores, who lodged close in a wood side, and watching his time, he discharged his peece at the verie face of the lieutenant, strake the visor off his helmet, and pearsed no further, as God would.

A valiant saieng.

The earle of Surreie in danger to haue beene slaine.

This did he (retchlesse in maner what became of himselfe, so he might amaze the armie for a time) and surelie hereby he brake the swiftnesse of their following, & aduantaged the flight of his capteine, which thing he wan with the price of his owne bloud. For the souldiors would no further, till they had ransacked all the nookes of this wood, verelie suspecting some ambush thereabout, and in seuerall knots serretted out this gunner, whome Fitzwilliams and Bedlow of the Roch were faine to mangle and to hew in peeces, because the wretch would neuer yeeld. In the meane while, defiance was proclamed with France and Scotland both at once, which moued the king to call home Surreie out of Ireland, that he might imploie him in those wars. His prowesse, integritie, good nature, and course of gouernment, the countrie much commended. Piers Butler earle of Ossorie was appointed lord deputie. In the meane time, Kildare attending the king his pleasure for his dispatch, recouered fauour through the instance of the marques Dorset, whose daughter dame Elizabeth Greie he espoused, and so departed home. Now was partaker of all the deputies counsell one Robert Talbot of Belgard, whome the Giraldines deadlie hated: him they procured to keepe a kalendar of all their doings, who incensed brother against brother. In which rage, James Fitz-Girald meeting the said gentleman beside Wallmore, slue him euen then vpon his iourneie toward the deputie to keepe his Christmas with him.

Fitzwilliams Bedlow.

1523 Surreie sent for home.

Piers Butler earle of Ossorie lord deputie.

1524 Robert Talbot of Belgard.

With this despitefull murther both sides brake out into open enimitie, and especiallie the countesse of Ossorie, Kildare his sister, a rare woman, and able for wisedome to rule a realme, had not hir stomach ouerruled hir knowledge. Here began informations of new treasons, palling to and fro, with complaints and replies. But the marques Dorset had wrought so for his sonne in law, that he was suffered to rest at home, and onelie commissioners directed into Ireland, with authoritie to examine the rot of their griefes: wherein if they found Kildare anie thing at all purged, their instructions were to depose the plaintiffe, and to sweare the other lord deputie. Commissioners were these, sir Rafe Egerton, a knight of Chelhire, Anthonie Fitzherbert, second iustice of the common plees, and James Denton, deane of Litchfield; who hauing examined these accusations, suddenlie toke the sword from the earle of Ossorie, sware Kildare lord deputie, before whome Con Oneale bare the sword that daie.

Margaret countesse of Ossorie.

Commissioners sent to Ireland.

Kildare sworne lord deputie.

Con-

Concerning the murtherer whom they might haue hanged, they brought him prisoner into England, presented him to the cardinall Wolsele, who was said to hate Kildare his bloud: and the cardinall intending to haue put him to execution, with more reproch and dishonor to the name, caused him to be led about the streets of London haltered, and hauing a taper in his hand: which asked so long time, that the deane of Lichfield stepped to the king, and begged his pardon. The cardinall was sore inflamed herewith, & the malice not hitherto so ranke, was throughlie ripened, & therfore henseforward Ossorie brought forth diuerse proofes of the deputie his disorder, for that (as he alledged) the deputie should winke at the earle of Desmond, whome by vertue of the king his letters he ought to haue attached. Also, that he sought for acquaintance and affinitie with meere Irish enimies, that he had armed them against him, then being the king his deputie; he hanged and headed good subiects, whome he mistrusted to leane to the Butlers friendship. Kildare was therfore presentlie commanded to appeare, which he did, leauing in his rome his brother Fitzgirald of Lerlip, whom they shortlie deposed, and chose the baron of Deluin, whome Oconor tooke prisoner, & then the earle of Ossorie (to shew his abilitie of seruice) brought to Dublin an armie of Irishmen, hauing capteins ouer them Oconor, Omore, & Ocarroll, & at S. Marie abbeie was chosen deputie by the kings councell.

Cardinall Wolseie enimie to the Giraldines.

Pardon granted.

Kildare accused.

The articles.

Fitzgirald lord iustice.

The earle of Ossorie chosen lord deputie.

In which office, being himselfe (saue onelie in feats of armes) a simple gentleman, he bare out his honor, and the charge of gouernement verie worthilie, through the singular wisedome of his countesse, a ladie of such a port, that all estates of the realme crouched vnto hir; so politike, that nothing was thought substantiallie debated without hir aduise: manlike and tall of stature, verie liberall and bountifull; a sure friend, a bitter enimie, hardlie disliking where she fansied, not easilie fansieng where she disliked: the onelie meane at those daies whereby hir husband his countrie was reclamed from sluttishnesse and slouenrie, to cleane bedding and ciuilitie. But to these vertues was linked such a selfe liking, such an ouerweening, and such a maiestie aboue the tenure of a subiect, that for assurance thereof, she sticked not to abuse hir husbands honor against hir brothers follie. Notwithstanding, I learne not that shee practised his vndoing (which insued, and was to hir vndoubtedlie great heauinesse, as vpon whome both the blemish thereof, and the substance of the greater part of that familie depended after) but that she by indirect meanes lifted hir brother out of credit to aduance hir husband, the common voice, and the thing it selfe speaketh. All this while abode the earle of Kildare at the court, and with much adoo found shift to be called before the lords to answer suddenlie. They sat vpon him diuerslie affected, and namelie the cardinall lord chancellor misliking the earle his cause, comforted his accusers, and inforced the articles obiected, in these words.

The countesse of Ossorie.

Kildare conuented before the councell.

The cardinall lord chancellor chargeth Kildare.

I wot well (my lord) that I am not the meetest at this bord to charge you with these treasons, because it hath pleased some of your fellowes to report that I am a professed enimie to all nobilitie, & namelie to the Giraldines: but seeing euerie curst boy can say as much when he is controlled, and seeing these points are so weightie, that they should not be dissembled of vs; and so apparant, that they can not be denied of you; I must haue leaue (notwithstanding your stale slander) to be the mouth of these honorable at this present, and to trumpe your treasons in your waie, howsoeuer you take me

First you remember, how the lewd earle of Desmond your kinsman (who passeth not whome he serueth, might he change his maister) sent his confederats with letters of credence vnto Francis the French king: and hauing but cold comfort there, went to Charles the emperor, proffering the helpe of Mounster and Connagh towards the conquest of Ireland, if either of them would helpe to win it from our king. How manie letters, what precepts, what messages, what threats haue bin sent you to apprehend him, and yet not done? Why so? Forsooth I could not catch him. Nay nay earle, forsooth you would not watch him. If he be suslie suspected, why are you partiall in so great a charge? If not, why are you fearefull to haue him tried? Yea, for it will be sworne and deposed to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you haue winked wilfullie, shunned his sight, altered your course, warned his friends, stopped both eares and eies against his detectors, and when soeuer you toke vpon you to hunt him out, then was he sure afore hand to be out of your walke.

Surelie, this iugling and false plaie little became either an honest man called to such honor, or a noble man put in so great trust. Had you lost but a cow or a horsse of your owne, two hundred of your reteiners would haue come at your whistle to rescue the preie from the vttermost edge of Ulster: all the Irish in Ireland must haue giuen you the way. But in pursuing so needfull a matter as this was, merciefull God, how nice, how dangerous, how waiteward haue you beene? One while he is from home, another while he keepeth home, sometimes fled, sometimes in the borders, where you dare not venture. Iwis my lord, there be shrewd bugs in the borders for the earle of Kildare to feare: the earle nay the king of Kildare; for when you are disposed, you reigne more like than rule in the land: where you are malicious, the truest subiects stand for Irish enimies: where you are pleased, the Irish foe standeth for a iust subiect: hearts & hands liues & lands are all at your courtesie: who fauneth not thereon cannot rest within your smell, and your smell is so ranke that you take them out at pleasure. ¶ Whilest the cardinall was speaking, the earle chafed and changed colour, and at last brake out, and interrupted him thus.

Kildare interrupteth the cardinals tale.

My lord chancellor, I beseech you pardon me, I am short witted, and you I perceiue intend a long tale: if you proceed in this order, halfe my purgation will be lost for lacke of carriage. I haue no schole trickes, nor art of memorie: except you heare me while I remember your words, your second processe will hammer out the former. The lords associat, who for the most part tenderlie loued him, and knew the cardinall his manner of tawnts so lothsome, as wherewith they were inured manie yeares ago, humblie besought his grace to charge him directlie with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter, vntill it were examined throughlie.

The lords tender Kildare.

That granted, it is good reason (quoth the earle) that your grace beare the mouth of this bord: but my lord, those mouths that put these things into your mouth, are verie wide mouths, such in deed as haue gaped long for my wracke; and now at length, for want of better stuffe, are faine to fill their mouths with smoke. What my cousine Desmond hath compassed, as I know not, so I beshrew his naked heart, for holding out so long. If he can be taken by mine agents that presentlie wait for him, then haue mine aduersaries bewraied their malice; and this heape of heinous words shall resemble a scarecrow, or a man of straw that seemeth at a blush to carrie some proportion, but when it is felt and pressed, discouereth a vanitie, seruing onelie to feare crowes: and I

He answereth the cardinals obiection.

" verelie trust, your honors shall see the prose by the " thing it selfe, within these few dates. But go to: " suppose he neuer be had: What is Kildare to blame " for it, more than my good brother of Ossorie: who " notwithstanding his high promises, hauing also the " kings power, is yet content to bring him in at lea- " sure: Can not the erle of Desmond shift but I must " be of counsell: Cannot he hide him except I winke: " If he be close, am I his mate: If he be frended am " I a traitor: This is a doubtie kind of accusation, " which they vrge against me, wherein they are stabled " and mired at my first dentall. You would not see him " (saie they.) Who made them so familiar with mine " eiesight: Or when was the erle within my view: Or " who stood by when I let him slip: Or where are the " tokens of my wilfull hudwinke: But you sent him " word to beware of you. Who was the messenger: " Where are the letters: Conuince my negatiues, " see how lose this idle geare hangeth togither. Des- " mond is not taken. Well, you are in fault. Whie: " Because you are. Who proueth it: No bodie. What " coniectures: So it seemeth. To whome: To your " enimies. Who told it them: They will sweare it. " What other ground: None. Will they sweare it " my lord: Whie then of like they know it, either they " haue mine hand to shew, or can bring forth the mes- " senger, or were present at a conference, or priuie to " Desmond, or some bodie bewraied it to them, or they " themselues were my carriers or vicegerents there- " in: which of these parts will they chose, for I know " them too well. To reckon my selfe conuict by their " bare words or headlesse saiengs, or frantike othes, " were but mere mockerie. My letter were some read, " were any such writing ertant, myne ruants & frends " are readie to be sifted: of my cousine of Desmond " they may lie lowdly, since no man here can well con- " trarie them! Touching my selfe, I neuer noted in " them much wit, or so fast faith, that I would haue ga- " ged on their silence the life of a good hound, much lesse " mine owne. I doubt not, may it like your honors to " appose them, how they came to the knowlege of those " matters, which they are so readie to depose: but you " shall find their tongs chained to another man his " trencher, and as it were knights of the post, suborned " to saie, sweare and stare the vttermost they can, as " those that passe not what they saie, nor with what face " they saie it, so they saie no truth. But of another " side it greeueth me that your good grace whom I take " to be wise and sharpe, and who of your blessed disposi- " tion wisheth me well, should be so farre gone in cre- " diting these corrupt informers that abuse the igno- " rance of your state and countrie to my perill. Little " know you (my lord) how necessarie it is, not onelie " for the gouernor, but also for euerie noble man in " Ireland to hamper his vnciuill neighbors at discre- " tion, wherein if they waited for processe of law, and " had not those liues and lands you speake of within " their reach, they might hap to lose their owne liues " and lands without iaw. You heare of a case as it " were in a dreame, and feele not the smart that vereth " vs. In England there is not a meane subiect that " dare extend his hand to fillip a peere of the realme. " In Ireland except the lord haue cunning to his " strength, and strength to saue his crowne, and suffi- " cient authoritie to take theeues & varlets when they " stir, he shall find them swarme so fast, that it will be " too late to call for iustice. If you will haue our seruice " take effect, you must not tie vs alwaies to these " iudiciall procedings, wherewith your realme (thank- " ed be God) is inured. Touching my kingdome, I " know not what your lordship should meane thereby. " If your grace imagine that a kingdome consisteth " in seruing God, in obeieng the prince, in gouerning " with loue the common-wealth, in shouldering subiects, in suppressing rebels, in executing iustice, in " bridling blind affections, I would be willing to be " inuested with so vertuous and rotall a name. But if " therefore you terme me a king, in that you are per- " suaded that I repine at the gouernment of my soue- " reigne, or winke at malefactors, or oppresse ciuill li- " uers, I vtterlie disclame in that odious terme, mar- " ueling greatlie that one of your grace his profound " wisedome, would seeme to appropriat so sacred a " name to so wicked a thing. But howsoeuer it be " (my lord) I would you and I had changed kingdoms " but for one moneth, I would trust to gather vp more " crummes in that space, than twise the reuenues of " my poore earledome: but you are well and warme, " and so hold you, and vpbraid not me with such an odi- " ous terme. I slumber in an hard cabin, when you " sleepe in a soft bed of downe: I serue vnder the king " his cope of heauen, when you are serued vnder a ca- " nopie: I drinke water out of my skull, when you " drinke wine out of golden cups: my course for is trai- " ned to the field, when your genet is taught to amble: " when you are begraced and belorded, and crouched & " kneeled vnto, then find I small grace with our Irish " borderers, except I cut them off by the knees. "

In what case stand the noble men of Ireland with rebels.

At these girds the councell would haue smiled, if they durst, but ech man bit his lip, & held his counte- nance: for howsoeuer some of them leaned to the erle of Ossorie, they all hated the cardinall, who perce- uing that Kildare was no babe, rose in a fume from the councell table, committed the erle, & deferred the matter till more direct probations came out of Ire- land. The duke of Norffolke, who was late lieutenant in Ireland, perceiuing the cardinall to be sore bent against the nobleman, rather for the deadlie hatred he bare his house, than for anie great matter he had wherewith to charge his person, stept to the king, and craued Kildare to be his prisoner, offering to be bound for his forth comming, ouer and aboue all his lands, bodie for bodie. Whereupon, to the cardinall his great griefe, the prisoner was bailed, and hono- rablie by the duke interteined. During his abode in the duke his house, Oneale and Oconor, and all their frends and alies, watching their time to an- noie the pale, made open insurrection against the earle of Ossorie then lord deputie of Ireland, in so- much that the noble man mistrusting the fickleneſſe of Desmond on the one side, & the force of these new start vp rebels on the other side, stood halfe amazed, as it were betweene fire & water. For remedie where- of, letters thicke and threefold were addressed to the councell of England, purporting that all these late hurlie burlies were of purpose raised by the meanes of Kildare, to the blemishing and staining of his bro- ther Ossorie his gouernment. And to put the mat- ter out of doubt, it was further added, that Kildare commanded his daughter Elice Fitzgirald, wife to the baron of Slane, to excite in his name the afore- said traitors to this open rebellion.

The cardinall not beloued.

The duke of Norffolke bound for Kil- dare.

1528 The Irish in rebellion.

Kildare a- fresh impea- ched.

The cardinall herevpon caused Kildare to be examined before the councell, where he pressed him so deepelie with this late disloialtie, that the presumpti- on being (as the cardinall did force it) vehement, the treason odious, the king suspicious, the enimie eger, the frends faint (which were sufficient grounds to o- uerthrow an innocent person) the earle was repri- ued to the tower. The nobleman betooke himselfe to God & the king, he was hartilie beloued of the lieu- tenant, pitied in all the court, and standing in so hard a case, altered little of his accustomed hue, comfor- ted other noble men prisoners with him, dissembling his owne sorrow. On a night when the lieutenant and he for their disport were playeng at slidegrote or shoueboord, sodenlie commeth from the cardinall a

The earle of Kildare com- mitted.

A mandatum to execute Kildare.

mandatum

mandatum to execute Kildare on the morrow. The earle marking the lieutenants deepe sigh: By saint Bride lieutenant (quoth he) there is some mad game in that scroll; but fall how it will, this throw is for an huddle. When the worst was told him: Now I praie thee (quoth he) doo no more but learne assuredlie from the king his owne mouth, whether his highnesse be witting thereto or not? Sore doubted the lieutenant to displease the cardinall: yet of verie pure loue to his freend, he posteth to the king at midnight, and deliuered his errand: for at all houres of the night the lieutenant hath accesse to the prince vpon occasions. The king controlling the saucinesse of the priest (for those were his termes) deliuered to the lieutenant his signet in token of countermand, which when the cardinall had seene, he began to breath out vnseasoned language, which the lieutenant was loth to heare, & so left him pattring & chanting the diuell his Pater noster. Thus brake vp the storme for that time, & the nert yeare Wolsele was cast out of fauour, and within few yeares sir William Skeffington was sent ouer lord deputie, and brought with him the erle pardoned and rid from all his troubles.

The cardinall his presumptuousnes blamed of the king.

1529 Sir william Skeffington deputie of Ireland.

When it was bruted, that Skeffington, the earle of Kildare, and Edward Staples bishop of Meth landed nere Dublin, the maior and citizens met him with a solemne procession on saint Marie abbets greene, where maister Thomas Fitzsimons recorder of Dublin made a pithie oration to congratulate the gouernor and the earle his prosperous arriuall, to whome Skeffington shaped an answere in this wise: Maister maior and maister recorder, you haue at length this noble man here present, for whom you sore longed, whilest he was absent. And after manie stormes by him susteined, he hath now to the comfort of his freends, to the confusion of his foes, subdued violence with patience, iniuries with sufferance, and malice with obedience: and such butchers as of hatred thirsted after his bloud, are now taken for outcast mastiues, littered in currish bloud. How well my master the king hath beene of his gratious inclination affected to the earle of Kildare (his backe freend, being by his iust desert from his maiestie withdrawen) the credit wherein this noble man at this present abideth, manifestlie declareth. Wherefore it resteth, that you thanke God and the king for his safe arriuall. As for his welcome, maister recorder his courteous discourse, your great assemblies, your chearefull countenances, your willing meetings, your solemne processions do so far shew it, as you minister me occasion on his lordship his behalfe, rather to thanke you for your courtesie, than to exhort you to anie further ceremonie.

Edward Staples bishop of Meth.

Thomas Fitzsimons.

Skeffington his answere.

He glanseth at the cardinall who was taken to be a butcher his sonne.

Having ended his oration, they rode all into the citie, where shortlie after the earle of Offorie surrendred the sword to sir William Skeffington. During the time that Kildare was in England, the sept of the Toles making his absence their haruest, ceased not to molest and spoile his tenants, and therefore the erle meaning not to wrap vp so lightlie their manifold iniuries, was determined presentlie vpon his arriuall to crie them quittance: to the speedinesse of which seruice he requested the aid of the citizens of Dublin: & expecting in Christs church their answere touching this motion, the maior & his brethren promised to assist him with two hundred archers. The late come bishop of Meth being then present, mooued question, whether the citizens were pardoned for crowning Lambert contrarie to their dutie of allegiance; and if they were not pardoned, he thought they might aduantage the king thereby. Whereat one of their sagest and expertest aldermen, named John Fitzsimons, stept forth and said: My lord of Meth, may I be so bold as to craue what countrie, Kildare inuadeth the Toles.

Meth his question.

John Fitzsimons answereth Meth.

man you are? Marie sir (quoth the bishop) I would you should know it, I am a gentleman and an Englishman. My lord (quoth Fitzsimons) my meaning is to learne, in what shire of England you were borne? In Lincolnshire good sir (quoth Staples.) Whie then my lord (quoth Fitzsimons) we are no traitors, because it was the earle of Lincolne and the lord Louell that crowned him: and therefore if you be a gentleman of Lincolnshire, see that you be pardoned, for God and our king be thanked we haue need of none. At this answer Meth was set, and such as were present were forced to smile, to see what a round fall he caught in his owne turne.

In the second yeare of Skeffington his gouernement, it happened that one Henrie White, seruant to Benet a merchant of Dublin, was pitching of a cart of haie in the high street; and hauing offered boies plate to passengers that walked to and fro, he let a bottle of his haie fall on a souldiors bonet, as he passed by his cart. The souldior taking this knauish knacke in dudgeon, hurled his dagger at him, and hauing narrowlie miss the princocks, he sticked it in a post not farre off. White leapt downe from the cart, and thrust the souldior through the shoulder with his pike. Whereupon there was a great vprore in the citie betweene the souldiors and the apprentises, insomuch as Thomas Barbie being the maior, hauing the king his sword drawne, was hardlie able to appease the fraie, in which diuerse were wounded, and none slaine. The lord deputie issued out of the castell, and came as farre as the pillorie, to whome the maior posted thorough the prease with the sword naked vnder his arme, & presented White that was the brewer of all this garboile to his lordship, whome the gouernour pardoned, as well for his courage in bickering as for his retchlesse simplicitie and pleasantnesse in telling the whole discourse. Whereby a man maie see how manie bloudie quarels a brailing swashbuckler maie picke out of a bottle of haie, namelie when his braines are forebitten with a bottle of nappie ale.

Henrie white raised an vprore in Dublin.

Thomas Barbie maior.

white pardoned.

About this time there was a great sturre raised in England, about the king his diuorse, who thinking it expedient in so fickle a world to haue a sure post in Ireland, made Kildare lord deputie, Cromer the primat of Armagh lord chancellor, and sir James Butler lord treasurer. Skeffington, supposing that he was put beside the cushin by the secret canualsing of Kildare his friends, conceiued therof a great gelousie, being therein the deeper drenched, because that Kildare hauing receiued the sword, would permit Skeffington, who was late gouernour, now like a meane priuat person, to danse attendance among other suters in his house at Dublin, named the Carbrie. Skeffington plaieng thus on the bit, shortlie after sailed into England, vpon whose departure the lord deputie summoned a parlement at Dublin, where there past an act against leasers of corne: also for the vniting and appropriation of the parsonage of Galtrim to the priorie of saint Peters by Trim. In the parlement time, Oneale on a sudden inuaded the countrie of Vriell, rifling and spoiling the king his subiects, at which time also was the earle of Offorie greatlie vered by the Giraldins, by reason of the old quarrels of either side afresh reuiued.

Kildare lord Deputie.
Cromer.
Butler.
Skeffington offended with Kildare.

He saileth into England.

1532 A parlement summoned at Dublin.

Vriell inuaded by Oneale.

The nert yeare, the lord deputie going against Mcarroll, was pitifullie hurt in the side with a gun, at the castell of Birre; so that he neuer after inioied his limbs, nor deliuered his words in good plight, otherwise like inough to haue beene longer forborne in consideration of his manie noble qualities, great good seruices, and the state of those times. Straightwaies complaints were addressed to the king of these enormities, and that in most heinous maner that could be deuised, boulting out his doings as it were to the last brake of sniffler surmises, turning euerie priuat iniurie to be the king his quarrell, & making euerie puddings pricke as huge in shew as Samson his piller. Whereupon Kildare was commanded by sharpe letters to repaire into England, leauing such a person for the furniture of that realme, and the gouernance of the land in his absence, for whose doings he would answer. Being vpon the sight of this letter prepared to saile into England, he sat in councell at Dublin, and hauing sent for his sonne & heire the lord Thomas Fitzgirald (a yong stripling of one and twentie yeares of age, borne in England, sonne to the lord Zouch his daughter, the earle of Kildare his first wife) in the hearing of the whole bord thus he spake.

Kildare hurt.

Kildare accused.

He is sent for to England.

Thomas Fitzgirald.

The earle of Kildare his exhortation to his sonne the lord Thomas.

SOnne Thomas, I doubt not, but you know that my souereigne lord the king hath sent for me into England, and what shall betide me God knoweth, for I know not. But howsoeuer it falleth, both you and I know that I am well stept in yeares: and as I maie shortlie die, for that I am mortall, so I must in hast decease, bicause I am old. Wherefore insomuch as my winter is welneere ended, and the spring of your age now buddeth, my will is that you behaue your selfe so wiselie in these your greene yeares, as that to the comfort of your friends you maie inioie the pleasure of summer, gleane and reape the fruits of your haruest, that with honour you maie grow to the catching of that hoarie winter, on which you see me your father fast pricking. And whereas it pleaseth the king his maiestie, that vpon my departure here hense, I should substitute in my roome such one, for whose gouernement I would answer: albeit I know, that your yeares are tender, your wit not setled, your iudgement not fullie rectified, and therefore I might be with good cause reclamed from putting a naked sword in a yong mans hand: yet notwithstanding, forsomuch as I am your father, and you my sonne, I am well assured to beare that stroke with you in steering your ship, as that vpon anie information I maie command you as your father, and correct you as my sonne for the wrong handling of your helme.

There be here that sit at this bord, far more sufficient personages for so great charge than you are. But what then? If I should cast this burthen on their shoulders, it might be that hereafter they would be so farre with enuie carried, as they would percase hazzard the losse of one of their owne eies, to be assured that I should be depriued of both mine eies. But forsomuch as the case toucheth your skin as neere as mine, and in one respect nigher than mine, bicause (as I said before) I rest in the winter, and you in the spring of your yeares, and now I am resolued daie by daie to learne rather how to die in the feare of God, than to liue in the pompe of the world, I thinke you will not be so brainesicke, as to stab your selfe thorough the bodie, onelie to scarifie my skin with the point of your blade. Wherefore (my sonne) consider, that it is easie to raze, and hard to build, and in all your affaires be schooled by this bord, that for wisedome is able, and for the entier affection it beareth your house, will be found willing, to lesson you with sound and sage aduise. For albeit in authoritie you rule them, yet in councell they must rule you. My sonne, you know that my late maimes stifleth my talke: otherwise I would haue grated longer on this matter. For a good tale maie be twise told, and a sound aduise (eftsones iterated) taketh the deeper impression in the attentiue hearer his mind. But although my fatherlie affection requireth my discourse to be longer, yet I trust your good inclination asketh it to be shorter; and vpon that assurance, here in the presence of this honourable assemblie, I deliuer you this sword. ¶ Thus he spake for his last farewell with trickling teares, and hauing ended, he stood, imbraced the councell, committed them to God, and immediatlie after he was imbarked.

Kildare saileth into England.

But although with his graue exhortation the frosen hearts of his aduersaries for a short spirt thawed, yet notwithstanding they turned sone after all this gaie Gloria patri vnto a further fetch; saieng that this was nothing else but to dazell their eies with some iugling knacke, to the end they should aduertise the king of his lotall speeches: adding further, that he was to too euill that could not speake well. And to force the prepensed treasons they laied to his charge, with further surmises they certified the councell of England, that the earle before his departure furnished his owne piles and forts with the king his artillerie and munition taken forth of the castell of Dublin. The earle being examined vpon that article before the councell, although he answered that the few potguns and chambers he toke from thense, were placed in his castell to strengthen the borders against the inrodes of the Irish enimie; and that if he intended anie treason, he was not so foolish, as to fortifie walles and stones, and to commit his naked bones into their hands: yet notwithstanding he deliuered his speeches by reason of his palsie, in such staggering and masling wise, that such of the councell as were not his friends, persuading the rest that he had sunke in his owne tale, by imputing his lisping and dragging answer rather to the gilt of conscience, than to the infirmitie of his late maime, had him committed, vntill the king his pleasure were further knowne.

His oration misconstrued.

He is accused for taking the king his artillerie.

Kildare committed.

But before we wade anie further in this matter, for the better opening of the whole ground, it would be noted, that the earle of Kildare, among diuerse hidden aduersaries, had in these his later troubles foure principall enimies that were the chiefe means & causes of his ouerthrow, as in those daies it was commonlie bruted. The first was John Alen archbishop of Dublin, a gentleman of a good house, chapleine to cardinall Wolsele, & after by the cardinall his means constituted archbishop of Dublin, a learned prelat, a good housholder, of the people indifferentlie beloued, and more would haue beene, had he not ouerbusied himselfe in supplanting the house of Kildare. And although it were knowne, that his first grudge towards the Giraldins proceeded from the great affection he bare his lord and master the cardinall, insomuch as he would not sticke, were he able, for the pleasuring of the one to vndo the other; yet such occasions of greater hatred after insued (namelie for that he was displaced from being lord chancellor, & Cromer the primat of Armagh by Kildare his drifts setled in the office) as notwithstanding the cardinall his combe was cut in England, yet did he persist in pursuing his wonted malice toward that see.

Kildare his chiefe enimies.

John Alen archbishop of Dublin.

The second that was linked to this confederacie, was sir John Alen knight, first secretarie to this archbishop, after became maister of the rolles, lastlie lord chancellor. And although sir John Alen were not of kin to the archbishop, but onelie of the name; yet notwithstanding the archbishop made so great reckoning of him, as well for his forecast in matters of weight, as for his faithfulnesse in affaires of trust, as whatsoeuer exploit were executed by the one, was forth-

Sir John Alen knight.

Thomas Canon.

Robert Cowlie.

The lord Thomas inkindleth the Iriens against him.

The propertie of the marmoset.

The archbishop his taunt

The enimies conspire the overthrow of the Giraldins forthwith deemed to haue béene deuised by the other. The third of this crew was Thomas Canon, secretarie to Skeffington, who thinking to be reuenged on Kildare for putting his lord and maister beside the cushin, as he surmised, was verie willing to haue an oze in that bote. The fourth that was suspected to make the muller, was Robert Cowlie, first bailiffe in Dublin, after seruant to the ladie Margaret Fitzgirald, countesse of Ormond and Ossorie, lastlie maister of the rolles in Ireland, and finallie he deceased at London.

This gentleman for his wisdome and policie was well estéemed of the ladie Margaret countesse of Ossorie, as one by whose aduise she was in all hir affaires directed. Whereupon some suspicious persons were perswaded and brought in mind, that he was the lower of all the discord that rested betwéene the two brethren Kildare and Ossorie: as though he could not be voted in the fauour of the one, but that he must haue professed open hatred vnto the other. These foure, as birds of one feather, were supposed to be open enimies to the house of Kildare, bearing that swaie in the commonwealth, as they were not occasioned (as they thought) either to craue frendship of the Giraldines, or greatlie to feare their hatred and enimitie. There were beside them diuerse other secret vndermíners, who wrought so cunninglie vnder the thumbe, by holding with the hare, and running with the hound, as if Kildare had prospered, they were assured, their malice would not haue béene in manner suspected: but if he had béene in his affaires stabled, then their fine deuises for their further credit should haue bene apparented. Wherefore the heauing of his backe frends not onelie surmised, but also manifested by Kildare, the lord Thomas being iustice or vicedeputie in his fathers absence, fetcht both the Aliens so roundlie ouer the hips, as well by secret drifts as open taunts, as they were the more egerlie spurd to compasse his confusion.

For the lord iustice and the councell, with diuerse of the nobilitie, at a solemne banket discoursing of the ancientie of houses, and of their armes, sir John Alen spake to the lord iustice these words.

Thy lord, your house giueth the marmoset, whose propertie is to eat his owne taile. Meaning thereby (as the lord Thomas supposed) that Kildare did vse to pill and poll his frends, tenants & reteiners. These words were no soner spoken, than the lord Thomas striking the ball to Alen againe, answered, as one that was somewhat slipper tonged, in this wise. You saie truth sir, indéed I heard some saie, that the marmoset eateth his owne taile. But although you haue béene fed by your taile, yet I would aduise you to beware, that your taile eat not you. Shortlie after this quipping gamegall, the lord iustice and the councell rode to Drogheda, where hauing for the space of three or foure daies soiourned, it happened that the councellors awaited in the councell chamber the gouernour his comming, vntill it was hard vpon the stroke of twelue. The archbishop of Dublin rawlie digesting the vicedeputie his long absence, said: My lords, is it not a prettie matter, that all we shall staie thus long for a boie? As he vttered these speches, the lord iustice vnluckilie was comming vp the staires, and at his entrie taking the words hot from the bishop his mouth, and iterating them verie coldlie, he said: My lords, I am heartilie sorie, that you staied thus long for a boie. Whereat the prelat was appalled, to see how vnhaplie he was gald with his owne caltrop. These & the like cutting speeches inkindled such coles in both their stomachs, as the flame could not anie longer be smouldered, but at one cliff or other must haue fumed. The enimies therefore hauing welnigh knedded the dough that should haue béene baked for the Giraldines bane, deuised that secret rumors should sprinkle to and fro, that the earle of Kildare his execution was intended in England; and that vpon his death the Lord Thomas and all his blood should haue bene apprehended in Ireland. As this false muttering flue abroad, it was holpen forward by Thomas Canon, and others of Skeffington his seruants, who sticked not to write to certeine of their frends, as it were, verie secret letters, how that the earle of Kildare their maister his secret enimie (so they toke him, bicause he got the gouernement ouer his head) was alreadie cut shorter, as his issue presentlie should be: and now they trusted to see their maister in his gouernment, after which they sore longed, as for a preferment that would in short space aduantage them. Such a letter came vnto the hands of a simple preest, no perfect Englishman, who for hast hurled it amongest other papers in the chimnies end of his chamber, meaning to peruse it better at more leisure. The same verie night, a gentleman reteining to the lord Thomas, the lord iustice or vicedeputie, as is before specified, toke vp his lodging with the preest, and sought in the morning when he rose for some paper, to draw on his strait stockings; and as the diuell would, he hit vpon the letter, bare it awaie in the hæle of his stocke, no earthlie thing misdéeming. At night againe he found the paper vnstretted, and musing thereat he began to pore on the writing, which notified the earle his death, and the apprehension of the lord Thomas. To horsse goeth he in all hast, brought the letter to James de la Hide, who was principall councellor to the lord Thomas in all his doings. De la Hide hauing scantlie ouerread the letter, making more hast than good spéed, posted to the lord Thomas, imparted him that letter, and withall putting fire to flax, before he diued to the bottome of this trecherie, he was contented to swim on the skum and froth thereof, as well by sowing vp the tenor of the letter, as by inciting the lord Thomas to open rebellion, cloking the odious name of treason with the zealous reuengement of his fathers wrongfull execution, and with the warie defense of his owne person.

The occasion of Thomas Fitzgirald his rebellion.

James de la Hide.

The lord Thomas being youthfull, rash, and headlong, and assuring himselfe that the knot of all the force of Ireland was twisted vnder his girdle, was by de la Hide his counsell so far caried, as he was resolued to cast all on sir and seauen. Wherefore hauing confedered with Oneale, Oconor, and other Irish potentats, he rode on saint Barnabies date, accompanied with seauen score horsemen in their shirts of maile, through the citie of Dublin, to the Dam his gate, crost ouer the water to saint Marie abbeie, where the councell according to appointment waited his comming, not being priuie to his intent: onelie Cromer the lord chancellour excepted, who was secretlie aduertised of his reuolt, and therefore was verie well prouided for him, as hereafter shall be declared. This Cromer was a graue prelat, and a learned, well spoken, mild of nature, nothing wedded to factions, yet a welwiller of the Giraldines, as those by whose means he was aduanced to dignitie. When the lord Thomas was set in councell, his horsemen and seruants rusht into the councell chamber armed and weaponed, turning their secret conference to an open parlée. The councell hereat amazed, and silence with securitie commanded, the lord Thomas in this wise spake.

Cromer lord chancellor.

Thomas Fitzgirald his rebellious oration.

HOwsoeuer iniuriouslie we be handled, and forced to defend our selues in armes, when neither our seruice nor our good meaning towards our prince his crowne auaileth: yet fate not hereafter, but in this open hostilitie which here we professe and proclame, we haue shewed our selues no villaines nor churles, but warriours and gentlemen. This sword of estate is yours, and not mine; I receiued it with an oth, and haue vsed it to your benefit. I should staine mine honour, if I turned the same to your annoiance. Now haue I need of mine owne sword, which I dare trust. As for the common sword, it flattereth me with a painted scabberd, but hath indeed a pestilent edge, alreadie bathed in the Giraldines bloud, and now is newlie whetted in hope of a further destruction. Therefore saue your selues from vs, as from open enimies, I am none of Henrie his deputie, I am his foe, I haue more mind to conquer than to gouerne, to meet him in the field than to serue him in office. If all the hearts of England and Ireland, that haue cause thereto, would ioine in this quarrell (as I hope they will) then should he soone abie (as I trust he shall) for his crueltie and tyrannie, for which the age to come may lawfullie score him vp among the ancient tyrants of most abhominable and hatefull memorie.

Hauing added to this shamefull oration manie other slanderous and foule tearmes, which for diuerse respects I spare to pen, he would haue surrendered the sword to the lord chancellor, who (as I said before) being armed for the lord Thomas his comming, and also being loath that his slacknesse should seeme disloiall in refusing the sword, or his frowardnesse ouer cruell in snatching it vpon the first proffer, toke the lord Thomas by the wrist of the hand, and requested him for the loue of God, the teares trilling downe his cheekes, to giue him for two or three words the hearing, which granted, the reuerend father spake as insueth.

The chancellor his oration.

My lord, although hatred be commonlie the handmaiden of truth, bicause we see him that plainelie expresseth his mind, to be for the more part of most men disliked: yet notwithstanding I am so well assured of your lordship his good inclination towards me, and your lordship so certeine of mine entire affection towards you, as I am imboldned, notwithstanding this companie of armed men, freelie and frankelie to vtter that, which by me declared, and by your lordship followed, will turne (God willing) to the auaile of you, your friends, allies, and this countrie. I doubt not (my lord) but you know, that it is wisedome for anie man to loke before he leape, and to sowne the water before his ship hull thereon, & namelie where the matter is of weight, there it behoueth to follow sound, sage, and mature aduise. Wherefore (my lord) sith it is no maigame for a subiect to leuie an armie against his prince: it lieth your lordship in hand to breath longer on the matter, as well by foresalling the hurt whereby you may fall, as by reuoluing the hope wherwith you are fed. What should moue your lordship to this sudden attempt, I know not. If it be the death of your father, it is as yet but secretlie muttered, not manifestlie published. And if I should grant you, that your zeale in reuenging your father his execution were in some respect to be commended: yet reason would you should suspend the reuenge vntill the certeintie were knowne. And were it, that the report were true, yet it standeth with the dutie and allegiance of a good subiect (from whom I hope in God you meane not to disseuer your selfe) not to spurne and kicke against his prince, but contrariwise, if his souereigne be mightie, to feare him: if he be profitable to his subiects, to honour him: if he command, to obeie him: if he be kind, to loue him: if he be vicious, to pitie him: if he be a tyrant, to beare with him: considering that in such case it is better with patience to bow, than with stubburnnesse to breake. For sacred is the name of a king, and odious is the name of a rebellion: the one from heauen deriued, and by God shielded; the other in hell forged, and by the diuell executed. And therefore who so will obserue the course of histories, or weigh the iustice of God in punishing malefactors, shall easilie see, that albeit the sunne shineth for a time on them that are in rebellion: yet such sweet beginnings are at length clasped vp with sharpe & sowre ends.

The name of a king sacred.

Rebellion from whense it springeth.

Now that it appeareth, that you ought not to beare armour against your king, it resteth to discusse whether you be able (though you were willing) to annoie your king. For if among meane and priuat foes it be reckoned for folie, in a secret grudge to professe open hatred, and where he is not able to hinder, there to shew a willing mind to hurt: much more ought your lordship in so generall a quarell as this, that concerneth the king, that toucheth the nobilitie, that apperteineth to the whole commonwelth, to foresee the king his power on the one side, & your force on the other, and then to iudge if you be able to cocke with him, and to put him beside the cushion; and not whilest you striue to sit in the saddle, to lose to your owne vndoing both the horsse and the saddle.

King Henrie is knowne to be in these our daies so puissant a prince, and so victorious a worthie, that he is able to conquer forren dominions: and thinke you that he cannot defend his owne? He tameth kings, and iudge you that he may not rule his owne subiects? Suppose you conquer the land, do you imagine that he will not recouer it? Therefore (my lord) flatter not your selfe ouermuch, repose not so great affiance either in your troope of horssemen, or in your band of footmen, or in the multitude of your partakers: What face soeuer they put now on the matter, or what successe soeuer for a season they haue, bicause it is easie for an armie to vanquish them that do not resist: yet hereafter when the king shall send his power into this countrie, you shall see your adherents like sliper changelings plucke in their hornes, and such as were content to beare you vp by the chin as long as you could swim, when they espie you sinke, they will by little and little shrinke from you, and percase will ducke you ouer head and eares. As long as the gale puffeth full in your sailes, doubt not but diuerse will anerre vnto you and feed on you as crowes on carion: but if anie storme happen to bluster, then will they be sure to leaue you post alone sticking in the mire or sands, hauing least helpe when you haue most need. And what will then insue of this. The branches will be pardoned, the rot apprehended, your honour disdained, your house atteinted, your armes reuersed, your manours razed, your doings examined; at which time God knoweth what an hartburning it will be, when that with no colour may be denied, which without shame cannot be confessed. My lord, I powre not out oracles as a soothsater, for I am neither a prophet, nor the sonne of a prophet. But it may be, that I am some frantike Cassandra being partener of hir spirit in foretelling the truth, and partaker of hir misfortune in that I am not (when I tell the truth) beleeued of your lordship, whom God defend from being Priamus.

Cassandras prophesie.

The subiects dutie towards his king.

Weigh therefore (my lord) the nobilitie of your ancestors, remember your father his late exhortation, forget not your dutie vnto your prince, consider the estate of this poore countrie, with what heaps of curses you shall be loden, when your soul-

diers

diers shall rifle the poore subiects, & so far indamage the whole relme, as they are not yet borne that shall hereafter feele the smart of this vproare. You haue not gone so far but you may turne home, the king is mercifull, your offense as yet not ouer heinous, cleane to his clemencie, abandon this headlong follie. Which I craue in most humble wise of your lordship, for the loue of God, for the dutie you owe your prince, for the affection you beare the countrie, and for the respect you haue to your owne safetie, whom God defend from all traitorous & wicked attempts.

Hauing ended his oration, which he set forth with such a lamentable action, as his cheekes were all beblubbered with teares, the horsemen, namelie such as vnderstood not English, began to diuine what the lord chancellor ment with all this long circumstance; some of them reporting that he was preaching a sermon, others said that he stood making of some heroicall poetrie in the praise of the lord Thomas. And thus as euerie idiot shot his foolish bolt at the wise councellor his discourse, who in effect did nought else but drop pretious stones before hogs, one Ward de Nelan, an Irish rithmour, and a rotten sheepe able to infect an whole flocke, was chatting of Irish verses, as though his tong had run on pattens, in commendation of the lord Thomas, inuesting him with the title of Silken Thomas, bicause his horsemens tacks were gorgeouslie imbrodered with silke: and in the end he told him that he lingred there ouerlong. Whereat the lord Thomas being quickned, did cast his eie towards the lord chancellor, & said thus.

Ward de Nelan.

Silken Thomas.

The replie of Silken Thomas.

MY lord chancellor, I come not hither to take aduise what I should do, but to giue you to vnderstand what I mind to do. It is easie for the sound to counsell the sicke: but if the sore had smarted you as much as it festereth me, you would be percase as impatient as I am. As you would wish me to honour my prince, so dutie willeth me to reuerence my father. Wherefore he that will with such tyrannie execute mine innocent parent, and withall threaten my destruction, I may not, nor will not hold him for my king. And yet in truth he was neuer our king, but our lord, as his progenitors haue beene before him. But if it be my hap to miscarie, as you seeme to prognosticat, catch that catch may, I will take the market as it riseth, and will chose rather to die with valiantnesse and libertie, than to liue vnder king Henrie in bondage and villanie. And yet it may be, that as strong as he is, and as weake as I am, I shall be able like a fleshworme to itch the bodie of his kingdome, and force him to scratch deepelie before he be able to pike me out of my seame. Wherefore my lord, I thanke you for your good counsell, and were it not that I am too crabbed a note in descant to be now tuned, it might be that I would haue warbled sweeter harmonie than at this instant I meane to sing. ¶ With these words he rendered vp the sword, and flung awaie like a bedlem, being garded with his brutish droue of brainesicke rebels.

Henrie lord of Ireland.

Thomas rendereth vp the sword.

The councell sent secretlie vpon his departure to master maior and his brethren, to apprehend (if they conuenientlie might) Thomas Fitzgirald and his confederats. But the warning was so Skarborrow, the enimie so strong, the citie (by reason of the plage that ranged in towne and in countrie) so dispeopled, as their attempt therein would seeme but vaine and friuolous. Ouer this, the weaker part of the rebels would not pen vp themselues within the citie wals, but stood houering aloofe off toward Oxmantowne greene, on the top of the hill where the gallowes stood (a fit centre for such a circle) till time they were aduertised of their capteine Thomas his returne. This open rebellion in this wise denounced; part of the councell, namelie Alen archbishop of Dublin & Finglasse chiefe baron hied with bag and baggage to the castell of Dublin, whereof John White was constable, who after was dubbed knight by the king in England, for his worthie seruice done in that vproare.

Alen. Finglasse. John walter.

Thomas & his crew, supposing that in ouerruning the whole land, they should find no blocke to stumble at sauing the earle of Ossorie, agreed to trie if by anie allurements he could be traind to their confederacie. And forsomuch as the lord James Butler was linked with Thomas Fitzgirald in great amitie and friendship, it was thought best to giue him the onset, who if he were won to swaie with them, they would not weigh two chips the force of his father the earle of Ossorie. Thomas forthwith sent his messengers and letters to his cousine the lord Butler, couenanting to diuide with him halfe the kingdome, would he associat him in this enterprise. Whereupon the lord Butler returned Thomas his brokers with this letter.

The lord Butler his letter to Thomas Fitzgirald.

TAking pen in hand to write you my resolute answer, I muse in the verie first line by what name to call you, my lord, or my cousine: seeing your notorious treason hath distained your honour, and your desperate lewdnesse shamed your kindred. You are so liberall in parting stakes with me, that a man would weene you had no right vnto the game: so importunat in craning my companie, as if you would persuade me to hang with you for good fellowship. Do you thinke that James was so mad, as to gape for gogions; or so vngratious, as to sell his truth for a peece of Ireland? Were it so (as it cannot be) that the chickens you reckon, were both hatched and feathered: yet be thou sure, I had rather in this quarell die thine enimie, than liue thy partener. For the kindnesse you proffer me, and good loue in the end of your letter, the best waie I can I purpose to requite, that is, in aduising you, though you haue fetcht your feaze, yet to loke well yer ye leape. Ignorance and errour, with a certeine opinion of dutie, haue caried you vnawares to this follie, not yet so ranke but it maie be cured. The king is a vessell of bountie & mercie, your words against his maiestie shall not be accounted malicious, but rather belched out for heat and impotencie, except your selfe by heaping offenses discouer a mischeefous and wilfull meaning. Farewell.

Thomas Fitzgirald netled with this round answer, was determined to inuade the countrie of Kilkennie, first forcing an oth vpon the gentlemen of the pale: and such as would not agree thereto he toke prisoners. Fingall, which was not before acquainted with the recourse of the Irish enimie, was left open to be preied and spoiled by the Toles, who were therein assisted by John Barnell of Balgriffin, a gentleman of a faire liuing, setled in a good battle soile of Fingall, taken for one not deuoid of wit, were it not that he was ouertaken with this treason. The Dublinians hauing notice that the enimie made hauocke of their neighbors of Fingall, issued out of the citie, meaning to haue intercepted them at the bridge of Kilmainan. And hauing incounte-

Fingall spoiled.

John Barnel of Belgriffin.

red

The Dublinians discomfited.

red with the Irish nére the wood Salcocke, what for the number of the rebels, and the lacke of an expert capteine to lead the armie of Dublin in battell raie, there were fourescore of the citizens slaine, and the preide not rescued. In this conflict, Patrike Fitzsimons, with diverse other good houholders, miscaried.

Patrike Fitzsimons slaine.

Messengers sent from Thomas to Dublin.

This victorie bred so great an insolencie in Thomas Fitzgirald, as he sent his messengers to the citie, declaring that albeit they offred him that iniurie, as that he could not haue free passage with his compante to & fro in the pale, & therefore would he vse the benefit of his late skirmish, or be answerable in iust reuenge to their due desert, he might by law of armes put their citie to fire and sword: yet this notwithstanding, if they would but permit his men to laie siege to the castell of Dublin, he would enter in league with them, and would undertake to backe them in such favourable wise, as the stoutest champion in his armie should not be so hardie, as to offer the basest in their citie so much as a fillip. The citizens considering that the towne by reason of the sickenesse was weakened, and by this late overthrow greatlie discouraged, were forced to make a vertue of necessitie, by lighting a candle before the divell, till time the kings pleasure were knowne; to whom with letters they posted one of their aldermen named Francis Herbert, whom shortlie after, the king for his service dubbed knight, infeoffing him with part of Christopher Eustace of Balicutlan his lands, who had unadvisedlie a fot in this rebellion. But before the citizens would returne answer to Thomas as touching this message, they secretlie advertised maister John White constable of the castell of this unlawfull demand.

Francis Herbert sent into England Eustace of Balicutlan.

The constable weighing the securitie of the citie, little regarding the force of the enimie, agreed willinglie therto, so that he might be sufficientlie stored with men and vittels. John Alen archbishop of Dublin, fearing that all would haue gone to wracke in Ireland, being then in the castell, brake his mind touching his sailing into England, to one of his servants named Bartholomew Fitzgirald, whom notwithstanding he were a Giraldine, he held for his trustiest and inwardest councellor. Bartholomew undertaking to be the archbishop his pilot, until hée were past the barre, incouraged his maister to imbarke himselfe hard by the Dams gate. And as they were hulling in the channell that euening, they were not ware, until the barke strake on the sands nére Clontarfe.

The archbishop of Dublin meaneth to saile into England.

Bartholmew Fitzgirald.

The archbishop with his man stale secretlie to Tartaine, there meaning to lurke until the wind had served to saile into England, where he scarselie sir houres solourned, when Thomas Fitzgirald knew of his arriuall, and accompanied with James de la Hide, sir John Fitzgirald, Oliuer Fitzgirald his uncles, timelie in the morning, being the eight and twentith of Julie, he posted to Tartaine, beset the house, commanded John Teling and Nicholas Walker to apprehend the archbishop, whome they haled out of his bed, brought him naked in his shirt, barefoted, and bareheaded, to their capteine. Whom when the archbishop espied, incontinentlie he knéeled and with a pitifull countenance & lamentable voice, he besought him for the loue of God not to remember former iniuries, but to weigh his present calamitie, and what malice soeuer he bare his person, yet to respect his calling and vocation, in that his enimie was a christian, and he amongst christians an archbishop.

1534 Teling. Walker.

As he spake thus, bequeathing his soule to God, his bodie to the enimies mercie, Thomas being striken with some compassion, & withall inflamed with desire of reuenge, turned his horsse aside, saieng in Irish (Bir wem è boddeagh) which is as much to saie in English, as Away with the churle, or Take the churle from me: which doubtles he spake, as after he declared, meaning the archbishop should be deteined as prisoner. But the caitifs that were present, rather of malice than of ignorance, misconstruing his words, murthered the archbishop without further delate, brained and hacked him in gobbets, his blood with Abell crieng to God for reuenge, which after befell to all such as were principals in this horrible murther. The place is euer since hedged and imbaied on euerie side, ouergrowne and unfrequented for detestation of the fact. This Alen (as before is declared) was in seruice with cardinall Woolsete, of dæpe iugement in the law canon, the onelie match of Stephan Gardiner, an other of Woolsetes chapleins, for auoiding of which emulation he was preferred in Ireland, rough and rigorous in iustice, deadlie hated of the Giraldines for his maisters sake & his owne, as he that crossed them diuerse times, and much brideled both father and son in their gouernements, not unlike to haue promoted their accusations, and to haue bene a forger of the letter before mentioned, which turned to his finall destruction.

Alen archbishop of Dublin murthered at Tartaine.

The rebels hauing in this execrable wise imbrued their hands in the archbishop his blood, they rode to Houth, take sir Christopher lord of Houth prisoner, & upon their returne from thense, they apprehended maister Luttrell chiefe iustice of the common pléas, conueieng him with them as their prisoner. The Dublinians during this space, having respit to pause sent into the castell by night sufficient store of vittels, at which time, John Fitzsimons, one of their aldermen, sent to maister constable twentie tun of wine, foure & twentie tun of béere, two thousand drie ling, fiftéene hogsheads of pondered bæfe, and twentie chambers, with an iron chaine for the draw bridge of the castell that was newlie forged in his owne house for the auoiding of all suspicion. The castell being with men, munition, and vittels abundantlie furnished, answer was returned to Thomas Fitzgirald, purporting a consent for the receiuing of his souldiors. Which granted, he sent thither James Field of Luske, Nicholas Walker, John Teling, Edward Rouks (who was likewise a pirat scowring the coast, and greatlie annoieng all passengers) Broad and Pursell, with an hundred souldiors attendant on them, as on their capteins. These valiant Rutterkins planted nére Preston his innes, right ouer against the castell gate two or three falcons, hauing with such strong rampiers intrenched their companie, as they little weighed the shot of the castle. And to withdraw the constable from discharging the ordinance, they threatened to take the youth of the citie, and place them on the top of their trenches for maister constable to shot at, as at a marke he would be loth to hit.

The lord of Houth taken prisoner.

Justice Luttrell taken.

John Fitzsimons.

The castell of Dublin besieged.

Field. Walker. Teling. Rouks.

The English pale in this wise weakened, the citizens apeased, and the castell besieged, Thomas Fitzgirald and his confederats were resolued to trie if the lord Butler would stand to his doughtie letter; and sith he would not by faire means be allured, hée should be (maugre his head) by foule means compelled to assist them in this their generall attempt. Thomas upon this determination, being accompanied with Oneale, diuerse Scots, James de la Hide, his principall councellour, John de la Hide, Edward Fitzgirald his uncle, sir Richard Walsh parson of Loughsewdie, John Burnell of Balgriffin, James Gernon, Walter Walsh, Robert Walsh, Maurice Walsh, with a maine armie, inuaded the erle of Ossorie and the lord Butler his lands, burnt and wasted the countrie of Kilkennie to Thomas towne, the Thomas Fitzgirald inuadeth the countrie of Kilkennie.

poore

poꝛe inhabitants being conſtreined to ſhunne his foꝛce, rather than to withſtand his power.

Fitzgirald his appꝛoch towards theſe confines hꝛuted, the earle of Oſſoꝛie, and his ſon the loꝛd Butler, with all the gentlemen of the countrie of Kilkennie, aſſembled néere Jeripon, to determine what oꝛder they might take, in withſtanding the inuaſion of the rebels. And as they were thus in parlee, a gentleman of the Butlers accompanied with ſixtéene hoꝛſmen, departed ſecretlie from the folkemote, & made towards Thomas Fitzgirald and his armie, who was then readie to incampe himſelfe at Thomas towne. When the chalenger was eſcried, and the certeine number knowne, ſixtéene of Fitzgirald his hoꝛſſemen did charge him, and pꝛeſentlie followed them ſeuen ſcoꝛe hoꝛſſemen, with two oꝛ thꝛee banners diſplaied, purſuing them vntill they came to the hill where all the gentlemen were aſſembled, who being ſo ſuddenlie taken, could not ſtand to bicker; but ſome fled this waie, ſome that waie, the earle was ſcattered from his companie, and the loꝛd Butler vnwares was hurt: whom when ſuch of the rebels knew as fauoured him, they purſued him but coldlie, and let him eſcape on hoꝛſſebacke, taking his waie to Dowmemoꝛe (néere Kilkennie) where he laie at ſurgerie.

The earle of Oſſoꝛie fléeth.
The loꝛd Butler wounded.

During the time that Thomas with his armie was ranſacking the erle of Oſſoꝛie his lands, Francis Herebert returned from England to Dublin with the king and councels letters to maiſter Shillingfoꝛth then maioꝛ, and his bꝛethꝛen, with letters likewiſe to maiſter White the conſtable, to withſtand (as their dutie of allegiance bound them) the trattoꝛous pꝛactiſes of Thomas and his complices, and that with all ſpéd they ſhould be ſuccoꝛed vpon the ſight of theſe letters. Maiſter Thomas Fitzſimons recoꝛder of the citie, a gentleman that ſhewed himſelfe a politike and a comfoꝛtable councelloꝛ in theſe troubles, paraphꝛaſing the king his gratious letters, with diuerſe good and ſound conſtructions, imboldened the citizens to bꝛeake their new made league, which with no traitoꝛ was to be kept. The aldermen and communaltie, with this pithie perſuaſion eaſilie weighed, gaue foꝛthwith oꝛder, that the gates ſhould be ſhut, their percullices diſmounted, the traitoꝛs that beſieged the caſtell appꝛehended, flags of defiance vpon their wals placed, and an open bꝛeach of truce pꝛoclamed.

Francis Herebert returneth from England.
Shillingfoꝛth.
Thomas Fitzſimons.
No league to be kept with traitoꝛs.
The Dublinians bꝛeake with Thomas Fitzgerald.

Field and his companie taken.

Field and his companie (who did not all this while batter aught of the caſtell, but onelie one hole that was boꝛed thꝛough the gate with a pellet, which lighted in the mouth of a demie canon, planted within the caſtell) vnderſtanding that they were betraied, began to ſhꝛinke their heads, truſting moꝛe to their hæles than to their weapons: ſome ran one way, ſome another, diuerſe thought to haue béene houſed and ſo to lurke in Lozels den, who were thꝛuſt out by the head and ſhoulders: few of them ſwam ouer the Liffie, the greater number taken and impꝛiſoned. Foꝛthwith poſt vpon poſt rode to Thomas Fitzgirald, who then was rifling the countrie of Kilkennie, certifieng him that all was mard, the fat was in the fire, he bꝛought an old houſe about his owne eares, the Paltocks of Dublin kept not touch with him, the Engliſh armie was readie to be ſhipt, Herebert with the king his letters returned; now it ſtood him vpon to ſhew himſelfe a man oꝛ a mouſe. Thomas with theſe tidings amazed, made ſpéedie repaire to Dublin, ſending his purſeuants beꝛoꝛe him, to command the gentlemen of the Engliſh pale to méete him with all their power néere Dublin. And in his waie towards the citie, his companie toke diuerſe childꝛen of the Dublinians, that kept in the countrie (by reaſon of the contagion that then was in the towne) namelie Michaell Fitzſimons, Patrike Fitzſimons, William Fitzſimons, all ſons to Walter Fitzſimons late maioꝛ, at which time was alſo taken James Stanihurſt, with diuerſe other younglings of the citie.

The youth of Dublin taken pꝛiſoners.

Hauing marched néere Dublin, he ſent doctoꝛ Trauerſe, Peter Lince of the Knoke, and Oliuer Grace, as meſſengers (foꝛ I maie not rightlie tearme them ambaſſadoꝛs) to the citizens, who croſſing the Liffie from the blacke friers to the keie, expꝛeſſed to the maioꝛ and aldermen their errand, the effect whereof was, either to ſtand to their foꝛmer pꝛomiſe, oꝛ elſe to reſtoꝛe to their capteine his men, whom they wꝛongfullie deteined in goale. The firſt and laſt point of this requeſt flatlie by the citizens denied, the meſſengers returned, declaring what cold interteinment they had in Dublin. Thomas herewith frieng in his greaſe, cauſed part of his armie to burne the barke wherin Herebert ſailed from England: which done without reſiſtance, the veſſell road at ancheoꝛ néere ſaint Marie abbeie, they indeuoꝛed to ſtop all the ſpꝛings that flowed vnto the towne, and to cut the pipes of the conduits, whereby they ſhould be deſtitute of freſh water. Shoꝛtlie after, they laid ſiege to the caſtell in the Shipſtréet, from whenſe they were haſtilie by the oꝛdinance feazed, and all the thatcht houſes of the ſtréet were burnt with wild fire, which maiſter White deuiſed, becauſe the enimie ſhould not be there reſcued.

Meſſengers ſent to Dublin
Trauerſe.
Lince.
Grace.

Dublin beſieged.

The ſhipſtréet fired.

When no butter could ſticke on their bꝛead, in that part of the citie, the greater number of the rebels aſſembled to Thomas his court, and marched to ſaint Thomas his ſtréet, raſing downe the partitions of the roꝛo of houſes beꝛoꝛe them on both ſides of the ſtréet, finding none to withſtand them: foꝛ the inhabitants fled into the citie, ſo that they made a long lane on both the ſides like a gallerie, couered all ouer head, to ſhield as well their hoꝛſſemen as their footmen from gunſhot. This done they burnt the new ſtréet, planted a falcon right againſt the new gate, and it diſcharged, pearſed the gate, and kild an appꝛentiſe of Thomas Stephans alderman, as he went to bꝛing a baſon of water from the high pipe, which by reaſon the ſpꝛings were damd vp, was at that time doꝛie. Richard Stanton, commonlie called Dicke Stanton, then gailoꝛ of the new gate, a good ſeruitoꝛ, an excellent markeman, as his valiant ſeruice that time did appꝛoue. Foꝛ beſides that he gald diuers of the rebels as they would ſkip from houſe to houſe, by cauſing ſome of them with his pœce to carrie their errands in their buttocks; ſo he perceiued one of the enimies, leueling at the window oꝛ ſpike at which he ſtood: but whether it were, that the rebell his pouder failed him, oꝛ ſome gimboll oꝛ other was out of frame, Stanton toke him ſo trulie foꝛ his marke, as he ſtrake him with his bullet full in the foꝛehead vnder the bꝛim of his ſcull, and withall turned vp his hæles.

Richard Stanton.

Stanton not ſatiſfied with his death, iſſued out at the wicket, ſtript the varlot mother-naked, and bꝛought in his pœce and his attire. The deſperatneſſe of this fact diſliked of the citizens, and greatlie ſtomached by the rebels, beꝛoꝛe Stanton returned to his ſtanding, the enimies bꝛought faggots & fiers to the new gate, and incontinentlie fired them. The townelmen perceiuing that if the gate were burnt, the enimies would be incouraged vpon hope of the ſpoile, to venter moꝛe fiercelie, than if they were incountred without the wals, thought it expedient pꝛeſentlie to charge them. To this exploit they were the moꝛe egerlie moued, becauſe that notwithſtanding Thomas his ſouldioꝛs were manie in number; yet they knew that the better part of his companie bare but hollow hearts to the quarrell: foꝛ for the number of the wise gentlemen of the pale did little or nothing incline to his purpose. And therefore when he besieged the citie, the most part of those arrowes, which were shot ouer the walles, were vnheaded, and nothing annoied them: some shot in letters, and foretold them of all the treacherous stratagems that were in hammering.

Faggots laid vnto the new gate.

That espied the citizens, and gathering the faintnesse of his souldiors thereby, blazed abroad vpon the walles triumphant newes, that the king his armie was arriued: and as it had beene so in deed, suddenlie to the number of foure hundred rushed out at the new gate, through flame and fire vpon the rebels, who (at the first sight of armed men) weening no lesse but the truth was so, otherwise assured, that the citie would neuer dare to reincounter them, gaue ground, forsoke their capteins, dispersed and scattered into diuerse corners, their falcon taken, an hundred of their stoutest Galloglasses slaine. Thomas Fitzgirald fled to the graie friers in S. Francis his street, there coucht that night, vnknowen to the citie, vntill the next morning he stale priuilie to his armie not far off, who stood in woonderfull feare that he was apprehended. Thomas his courage by this late ouerthrow somewhat coled, and also being assuredlie told, that a fleete was espied a farre off, bearing full saile towards the coast of Ireland, he was sone intreated, hauing so manie irons in the fire, to take egs for his monie: & withall, hauing no forren succor, either from Paulus tertius, or Charles the fift, which dailie he expected, he was sore quailed, being of himselfe, though strong in number of souldiors, yet vnfurnished of sufficient munition and artillerie, to stand & withstand the king his armie in a pitcht field, or a maine battell. Vpon this & other considerations, to make as faire weather as he could, he sent James de la Hide, Lime of the Knocke, William Bath of Dollarstowne, doctor Trauerse, Thomas Field of Painstowne, as messengers to the citizens, to treat with them of a truce, who being let in at the new gate, repaired to William Kellie his house, where maister maior and his brethren were assembled. The articles propounded by them to the citizens, were these.

The citizens bicker with the rebels.

Thomas Fitzgirald flieth.

De la Hide. Lime. Bath. Trauerse. Field.

The articles propounded to the citizens.

1 That Thomas Fitzgirald his men, who were deteined in prison, should be redelliuered.

2 Item, that the citizens should incontinentlie deliuer him at one paiment, a thousand pounds in monie.

3 Item, that they should deliuer him fiue hundred pounds in wares.

4 Item, to furnish him with munition and artillerie.

5 Item, to addresse their fauorable letters to the king for their capteine his pardon, and all his confederats.

The citizens answer these articles.

The maior and aldermen, hauing ripelie debated the tenour of these articles, agreed, that maister Fitzsimons their recorder should answer vnto the first, that they would not sticke to set his seruants at libertie, so he would redelliuer them the youth of the citie, which was nothing else in effect, but fit for tat. As for the second and the third demand, they were so greatlie by his warres impouerished, as they might hardlie spare monie or wares. And as touching implements for warre, they were neuer such fond niddicockes, as to offer anie man a rod to beat their owne tailes, or to betake their mastiues vnto the custodie of the woolues, maruelling much that their capteine would so farre ouershot himselfe, as to be taken with such apparant repugnancie. For if he intended to submit himselfe to the king his mercie, and to make them humble meanes to his highnesse for the obteining of his pardon, he ought rather to make sute for some good vellam parchment for the ingrossing thereof, than for munition and artillerie to withstand his prince. Wherfore, that three vnlawfull demands reiected, they would willinglie condescend to the first and last: as well requesting him to deliuer them the youth of the citie, as to submit himselfe and his companie to the king his mercie: promising not onelie with their fauourable letters, but also with their personall presences to further, as far as in them laie, his humble sute to the king and councell.

As they parled thus to and fro, William Bath of Dollarstowne a student of the common lawes spake: My maisters, what needeth all this long circumstance? Let vs all drinke of one cup. Which words were shortlie after vpon Skeffington his arriuall so crokedlie glosed, as by drinking of a sowre cup he lost the best ioint of his bodie. For albeit vpon his triall he construed his words to import an vniforme consent towards the obteining of Fitzgirald his pardon; yet all this could not colour his matter in such wise, but that he and Eustace of Balicutlan were executed at the castell of Dublin. The messengers knowing their capteine to be at a low eb, were agreed to take the offers of the first & last conditions, and that to the accomplishing of these articles hostages should be giuen of either part. The messengers deliuered to the citizens doctor Trauers & others, the citizens deliuered them Richard Talbot, Alderman, Rochford, & Kerrie. These were committed to the custodie of Dauid Sutton of Rathide, who redelliuered them to the citizens immediatlie after vpon the certeine rumor of Skeffington his repaire.

William Bath.

Eustace of Balicutlan.

Hostages taken. Doctor Trauerse. Talbot. Rochford. Kerrie. Dauid Sutton.

Thomas growne to this point with the Dublinians raised his siege, caused his artillerie to be conueied to Houth, marching after with his armie, to the end he might as well bulch the English ships if they durst anerre the coast, as to bicker with the soldiors vpon their arriuall. But before he toke his iornie vnto Houth, he rode to Drinoth, to see that the castell should be of all sides fortified, where being done to vnderstand, that a companie of white cotes with red crosses landed at Dublin secretlie in the dead of the night, and also that another band arriued at Houth, and were readie to march towards Dublin, he posted incontinentlie with two hundred horsemen towards the water side, incountred neere Clontarfe, the Hamertons, two valiant and courageous gentlemen, having in their companie foure score souldiors, where they fought so valiantlie for their liues, as so few footmen could haue done against so great a troope of horsemen: for they did not onlie mangle and hacke diuerse of the rebels, but also one of the Hamertons wounded Thomas Fitzgirald in the forehead. Some report that one of the Mulgraues, who was of kin to Fitzgirald, was slaine in this conflict, whose death he is said to haue taken greatlie to hart. The rebelles fleshed with the slaughter of the English, hied with all speed to Houth, shot at the ships that rode at anchor, caused them to flee from the rode, & to make towards Skerrith, where landed both the Eglebees, and the Dacres, with their horsemen. Rouks, Fitzgirald his pirat, was sent to scowre the coast, who toke an English barke laden with verie faire geldings, and sent them to his capteine. After that Thomas had returned with this bootie, and the spoile of such as were slaine to Drinoth, sir William Brereton knight, with his sonne John Brereton, was inshored at Houth with two hundred & fiftie soldiors verie well appointed, and maister Salisburie with two hundred archers.

The white cotes landed at Dublin.

The Hamertons slaine.

Thomas Fitzgirald wounded.

Mulgraue.

Eglebees. Dacres.

English geldings taken.

Sir william Brereton. John Brereton.

Salisburie.

Lastlie landed at the slip, neare the bridge of Dublin, sir William Skeffington knight lord deputie, Sir William Skeffington.

lord deputie landeth.

putie, whome the Irish call the gunner, because he was preferred from that office of the king his maister gunner to gouerne them, and that they can euill brooke to be ruled of anie that is but meanlie borne. The maior and aldermen receiued the gouernor with shot, and great solemnitie, who yelding them hartie thanks for their true and loiall seruice, deliuered them the king and councell his letters, purporting the same effect in writing that he before expressed in words. Barnwell lord of Trimlestowne, who had the custodie of the sword, did surrender it to sir William Skeffington, according to the meaning of the king his letters patents on that behalfe.

Letters of thanks from the king to the Dublinians.

The lord of Trimlestowne surrendreth the sword.

Thomas Fitzgirald hauing intelligence that the whole armie was arriued, warded the castell of Wainoth so stronglie, as he take it to be impregnable. And to the end he might giue the gouernor battell, he rode towards Connagh, to leuie all such power of the Irish, as either for wages, or for goodwill he could win to assist him. The lord deputie forewarned of his drift, marched with the English armie, and the power of the pale to Wainoth, and laid siege to the castell on the north side towards the parke. But before anie peece was discharged, sir William, Brereton by the deputie his appointment, did summon the castell, offering such as kept it to depart with bag and baggage, and besides their pardon to be liberallie rewarded for their good and loiall seruice. But such as warded the castell, scornefullie scoffing the knight his offer, gaue him hartie thanks for his kindnesse which they said proceeded rather of his gentlenesse, than of their deseruing, wishing him to keepe vp in store such liberall offers for a deere peare, and to write his commendations home to his frends, and withall, to keepe his head warme, for at their hands he was like to haue but a cold sute. Finallie not to take such keepe of their safetie, in that they were assured, that he and his fellowes should be sooner from the siege raised, than they from the hold remoued.

Thomas Fitzgirald goeth toward Connagh.

The castell of Wainoth' besieged.

Sir William Brereton summoneth the castell.

Upon this round answere the ordinances were planted on the north side of the castell, which made no great batterie for the space of a fortnight: yet the castell so warilie on each side inuironed, as the rebelles were imbard from all egresse and regresse. Christopher Parese fosterbrother to Thomas Fitzgirald, to whome of speciall trust the charge of the castell was chieflie committed, profering his voluntarie seruice (which for the more part is so thankelesse and vnsauorie as it stinketh) determined to go an ase beyond his fellows, in betraieng the castell to the gouernor. In this resolution he shot a letter indorsed to the lord deputie, the effect whereof was, that he would deuise means the castell should be taken, so that he might haue a summe of monie for his paines, and a competent staie during his life. This motion by letters to and fro agreed vpon, Parese caused such as kept the ward, to swill and boll so much, as they snorted all the night like grunting hogs, litle misdeeming that whilest they slept, anie Judas had beene waking within the castell.

Christopher Parese betraieth the castell of Wainoth.

Profered seruice stinketh.

The occasion of this extraordinarie exceeding was coloured, for snatching into the castell a field peece the daie before from the armie, for which they kept such pot-reuels, and triumphant carousing, as none of them could discerne his beds head from the beds feet. Parese taking his tide and time, made signe to the armie, betweene the twilight and dawning of the daie, who hauing scaling ladders in a readinesse, would not ouerslip the opportunitie offered. Holland, petit capteine to Salisburie, was one of the forwardest in this exploit, who leaping downe from the wall, fell by mishap into a pipe of feathers, where he was vp to the arme pits, so stiffelie sticking therein, and also vnwealdie in his armor, as there could not helpe himselfe neither in nor out. Sir William Brereton and his band hauing scaled the wals cried on a sudden, saint George, saint George. Three drunken swads that kept the castell thought that this shout was nought else but a dreame, till time they espied the walles full of armed men, and one of them withall perceiuing Holl and thus intangled in the pipe, bestowed an arrow vpon him, which by good hap did misse him. Holland forthwith rescued by his fellows, shot at the other, and strake him so full vnder the skull, as he left him sprawling. The resistance was faint, when the souldiors entered, some yelding themselues, others that withstood them slaine. Sir William Brereton ran vp to the highest turret of the castell, & aduanced his standard on the top thereof, notifieng to the deputie, that the fort was woone. Great and rich was the spoile, such store of beds, so manie goodlie hangings, so rich a wardrobe, such braue furniture, as truelie it was accounted (for household stuffe and vtensiles) one of the richest earle his houses vnder the crowne of England. The lord deputie entred the castell in the after noone, vpon whose repaire, James de la Hide, and Hayward, two singing men of the earle his chapell, that were taken prisoners, prostrated themselues on the ground, pitifullie warbling a song, named Dulcis amica.

Brereton scaleth the wals.

Brereton aduanceth his Standard.

The lord deputie entereth the castell.

James de la Hide.

Hayward.

The gouernour rauished with the sweet and delicat voices, at the instance of Girald Ailmer chiefe iustice, and others of the councell pardoned them. Christopher Parese not misdoubting but that he should haue beene dubd knight for his seruice done that date, presented himselfe before the gouernour, with a cheerefull and familiar countenance: as who should saie, Here is he that did the deed. The deputie verie coldlie & halfe sternelie casting an eie towards him said: Parese, I am to thanke thee on my master the king his behalfe, for this thy proffered seruice which I must acknowledge to haue beene a sparing of great charges, and a sauing of manie valiant soldiors liues to his highnesse: and when his maiestie shall be thereof aduertised, I dare be bold to saie that he will not see thee lacke during thy life. And because I mate be the better instructed how to reward thee during my gouernement, I would gladlie learne, what thy lord and master bestowed on thee. Parese set a gog with these mild speeches, and supposing the more he recited, the better he should be rewarded, left not vntold the meanest good turne that euer he receiued at his lords hands. Why Parese (quoth the deputie) couldest thou find in thine heart to betraie his castell, that hath beene so good lord to thee? Truelie, thou that art so hollow to him, wilt neuer be true to vs. And therewithall, turning his talke to his officers, he gaue them commandement to deliuer Parese the summe of monie that was promised him vpon the surrender of the castell, and after to chop off his head. Parese at this cold salutation of Farewell & be hanged, turning his simpering to wimpering said: My lord, had I wist that you would haue dealt so streictlie with me, your lordship should not haue woone this fort with so little bloudshed as you did.

Girald Ailmer.

Parese commeth before the gouernor.

A notable iudgement.

Whereat master Boise, a gentleman of worship, and one that reteined to that old earle of Kildare, standing in the preasse, said in Irish, Antragh, which is as much in English, as Too late, wherof grew the Irish prouerbe, to this daie in the language vsed, Too late quoth Boise, as we saie, Beware of had I wist, or After meat mustard, or You come a daie after the faire, or Better done than said. The deputie asked them that stood by what was that he spake? Master Boise willing to expound his owne words, stept forth and answered; My lord, I said nothing, but that Parese is seized of a towne neere the Water

Boise.

Antragh.

The prouerbe Too late quoth Boise.

Holland petit capteine to Salisburie.

The castell taken.

for

Baltra. side named Baltra, and I would gladlie know how he will dispose it before he be executed. The gouernour not mistrusting that master Boise had gloséd (for if he vnderstood the true signification of the terme, it was verie like that to late had not beene so sharpe to Parese, but too soone had beene as sowre to him) willed the monie to be told to Parese, and presentlie caused him to be cut shorter by the head: declaring thereby, that although for the time he imbraced the benefit of the treason, yet after he could not digest the treacherie of the traitor.

Parese beheaded.

The deputie returneth to Dublin. Thomas Fitzgirald marcheth towards Mainoth.

The deputie hauing left a garrison in the castell, returned with the armie triumphantlie to Dublin. Thomas Fitzgirald not misdoubting but such as he left in the castell were able to stand to their tackle, leuied a huge armie in Oconhur his countrie, and in Connagh, to the number of seuen thousand, marching with them towards Mainoth, minding to haue remoued the king his armie from the siege: but being certified, that Parese his fosterbrother yelded vp the castell to the deputie, the better part of his companie gaue him the slip. All this notwithstanding he made with such as would sticke to him to Clane. The lord deputie hauing intelligence of his approch, left sir William Brereton at Dublin to defend the citie, & marched with the armie to the Naas, where he toke seuen score of Thomas his Gallogласses, and lead them all vnarmed toward Johnstowne. The scout watch espieng Thomas to march neere, imparted it to the gouernour, who presentlie commanded each man to kill his prisoner before the charge, which was dispatcht: only Edmund Oleine escaping mother naked by flight to Thomas his companie, leauing his shirt in his keepers hands. Both the armies aduanced themselues one against the other, but the horsemen of either side could not charge, by reason of a marish or quakemire that parted them. Wherfore the deputie caused two or three field peeces to be discharged, which scattered Thomas and his rablement, insomuch as he neuer in such open wise durst after beare vp head in the English pale, but rather by starts and sudden stratagems would now and then gall the English. As when the castell of Rathmingan was woone, which was soone after the surrender of Mainoth, he caused a droue of cattell to appeare timelie in the morning hard by the towne. Such as kept the fort, suspecting it to be a bootie, were trained for the more part out of the castell, who were surprised by Thomas, that late hard by in ambush, and the greater number of them slaine.

Wbereton left to defend Dublin.

Gallogласses taken and slaine.

Edmund Oleine escapeth.

Thomas and his companie fleeth.

Fitzgirald his stratagems.

Another time he fired a village hard by Trim, and deuised such of his horsemen that could speake English, being clad and horsed like northerne men, to ride to Trim, where a garrison late with hue and crie, saieng that they were capteine Salisburie his souldiors, and that the traitor Thomas Fitzgirald was burning a village hard by. The souldiors suspecting no cousinage issued out of the towne, who were by his men charged, & a great number of them slaine, some chased to the towne, and forced to take sanctuarie in the churchyard, which in those daies was highlie reuerenced. These and the like knacks vsed Thomas, being for his owne person so well garded, and for defect of a maine armie so naked, as neither he was occasioned to feare the English, nor the English forced to weigh him. During this time, there arriued with a fresh supplie of horsemen & archers, sir William Sentlo knight & his son, sir Rice Panswell knight, sir Edward Griffith knight, who were dispersed to sundrie parts of the pale to defend the countrie from the enimies inuasion. When the heat of this rebellion was in this wise asswaged, the lord deputie finding out no deuise to apprehend the capteine, imploied his industrie to intrap his consederats. Burnell of Balgriffin persuing all go to wracke fled to Mounster, where he was taken by the lord Butler vicount Thurles, and being conueied to England was executed at Tiburne. Doctor Trauers, who was left as hostage with the cittizens, was by them deliuered to the lord deputie, and after with Rouks the pirat executed at the gallows on Dirmantowne greene.

William Sentlo. Rice Panswell. Edward Griffith.

Burnell of Balgriffin taken and executed. Trauers executed. Rouks executed.

Sir Walter de la Hide knight and his wife the ladie Gennet Eustace were apprehended, & brought as prisoners by master Brabson vicetreasurer from their towne of Moiclare to the castell of Dublin, because their sonne and heire James de la Hide was the onelie bruer of all this rebellion: who as the gouernor suspected, was set on by his parents, & namelie by his mother. The knight & his wife, lieng in duresse for the space of twelue moneths, were at seuerall times examined, & notwithstanding all presumptions and surmises that could be gathered, they were in the end found guiltesse of their sonne his follie. But the ladie was had in examination apart, and intised by meanes to charge hir husband with hir sonne his rebellion, who being not woone thereto with all the meanes that could be wrought, was menaced to be put to death, or to be rackt; and so with extremitie to be compelled, whereas with gentlenesse she could not be allured to acknowledge these apparent treasons, that neither hir husband nor she could without great shew of impudencie denie.

Walter de la Hide and his ladie Gennet Eustace apprehended.

The gentlewoman with these continuall storms heartbroken, deceased in the castell: from thense hir bodie was remoued vnto the greie friers with the deputie his commandement, that it should not be interred, vntill his plesure were further knowne; adding withall, that the carcase of one who was the mother of so arrant an archtraitor, ought rather to be cast out on a dunghill to be carrion for rauens and dogs to gnaw vpon, than to be laid in anie christian graue. The corps lieng foure or fiue daies in this plight, at the request of the ladie Gennet Golding, wife to sir John White knight, the gouernor, licenced that it should be buried. Sir William Skeffington a seuere and vpright gouernour died shortlie after at Kilmainan: to whome succeeded lord deputie the lord Leonard Greie, who immediatlie vpon the taking of his oth marched with his power towards the confines of Mounster, where Thomas Fitzgirald at that time remained. With Fitzgirald sir William Brereton skirmished so fiercelie, as both the sides were rather for the great slaughter disaduantaged, than either part by anie great victorie furthered. Master Brereton therefore perceiuing that rough nets were not the fittest to take such peart birds, gaue his aduise to the lord deputie to grow with Fitzgirald by faire means to some reasonable composition. The deputie liking of the motion, craued a parlee, sending certeine of the English as hostages to Thomas his campe with a protection directed vnto him, to come and go at will and pleasure. Being vpon this securitie in conference with the lord Greie, he was persuaded to submit himselfe to the king his mercie, with the gouernours faithfull and vndoubted promise that he should be pardoned vpon his repaire into England. And to the end that no trecherie might haue beene misdeemed of either side, they both receiued the sacrament openlie in the campe, as an infallible seale of the couenants and conditions of either part agreed.

Gennet Eustace dieth.

Skeffington deceased.

Leonard Greie lord deputie.

Brereton skirmisheth with Fitzgirald.

Thomas Fitzgirald submitteth himselfe to the deputie.

The sacrament receiued.

Hereupon Thomas Fitzgirald sore against the willes of his councellors, dismist his armie, & rode with the deputie to Dublin, where he made short abode when he sailed to England with the fauourable letters of the gouernour and the councell. And as he would haue taken his iourneie to Windsore, where the

Thomas Fitzgirald saileth into England. 1535

He is committed to the tower.

the court laie, he was intercepted contrarie to his expectation in London waie, and conueied with hast to the tower. And before his imprisonment was bruted, letters were posted into Ireland, strictlie commanding the deputie vpon sight of them, to apprehend Thomas Fitzgirald his vncles, and to see them with all spæd conuenient shipt into England. Which the lord deputie did not slacke. For hauing feasted three of the gentlemen at Kilmainan, immediatlie after their banket (as it is now and then seen, that sweet meat will haue sowre sauce) he caused them to be manacled, and led as prisoners to the castell of Dublin: and the other two were so roundlie snatcht vp in villages hard by, as they soner felt their owne captiuitie, than they had notice of their brethrens calamitie. The nert wind that serued into England, these fiue brethren were imbarked, to wit James Fitzgirald, Walter Fitzgirald, Oliuer Fitzgirald, John Fitzgirald, and Richard Fitzgirald. Three of these gentlemen, James, Walter, and Richard, were knowne to haue crossed their nephue Thomas to their power in his rebellion, and therfore were not occasioned to misdoubt anie danger. But such as in those daies were enimies to the house, incensed the king so sore against it, persuading him, that he should neuer conquer Ireland, as long as anie Giraldine breathed in the countrie: as for making the pathwaie smoth, he was resolued to lop off as well the good and sound grapes, as the wild and fruitlesse beries. Whereby appeareth how dangerous it is to be a rub, when a king is disposed to sweepe an alleie.

Thomas his vncles taken.

Innocencie a strong fort.

The Cow.

Thus were the fiue brethren sailing into England, among whom Richard Fitzgirald being more bookish than the rest of his brethren, & one that was much giuen to the studies of antiquitie, wailing his inward griefe, with outward mirth comforted them with chearefulnesse of countenance, as well persuading them that offended to repose affiance in God, and the king his mercie, and such as were not of that conspiracie, to relie to their innocencie, which they should hold for a more safe and strong barbican, than anie rampire or castell of brasse. Thus solacing the sillie mourners sometime with smiling, sometime with singing, sometime with graue and pithie apophthegmes, he craued of the owner the name of the barke; who hauing answered, that it was called the Cow, the gentleman sore appalled thereat, said: "Now good brethren I am in vtter despaire of our "returne to Ireland, for I beare in mind an old pro"phesie, that fiue earles brethren should be caried in a "Cowes bellie to England, and from thense neuer to "returne.

Whereat the rest began afresh to howle and lament, which doubtlesse was pitifull, to behold fiue valiant gentlemen, that durst meet in the field fiue as sturdie champions as could be picked out in a realme, to be so suddenlie terrified with the bare name of a woodden cow, or to feare like lions a sillie cocke his combe, being moued (as commonlie the whole countrie is) with a vaine and fabulous old wiues dreame. But what blind prophesie soeuer he read, or heard of anie superstitious beldame touching a cow his bellie, that which he foretold them was found true. For Thomas Fitzgirald the third of Februarie, and these fiue brethren his vncles, were drawne, hanged, and quartered at Tiburne, which was incontinentlie bruted as well in England and Ireland, as in foren soiles. For Dominicke Powre, that was sent from Thomas to Charles the fift, to craue his aid towards the conquest of Ireland (like as Chale in Grauill, otherwise called Charles Retnold, was directed to Paulus tertius) presenting the emperour with twelue great haukes and foureteene faire hobbies, was aduertised by his maiestie that he came too late, for his lord and master and fiue of his vncles were executed at London the third of Februarie: howbeit the emperour procured king Henrie to pardon Dominicke Powre. Which notwithstanding he obteined, yet would he not returne to Ireland, but continued in Portingale, hauing a ducket a date of the emperour during his life, which he ended at Lisborne.

1536 Thomas Fitzgirald & his vncles executed.

Dominicke Powre.

Charles Retnold.

James de la Hyde the chiefe councellor of Thomas Fitzgirald, fled into Scotland and there deceased. To this miserable end grew this lewd rebellion, which turned to the vtter vndoing of diuers ancient gentlemen, who trained with faire words into a soles paradise, were not onelie dispossessed of their lands, but also deprriued of their liues, or else forced to forsake their countries. As for Thomas Fitzgirald, who (as I wrote before) was executed at Tiburne, I would wish the carefull reader to vnderstand that he was neuer earle of Kildare, although some writers, rather of errour than of malice, terme him by that name. For it is knowne that his father liued in the tower, when he was in open rebellion, where for thought of the yong man his follie he died; and therefore Thomas was attainted in a parlement holden at Dublin, as one that was deemed, reputed, and taken for a traitour before his fathers decease, by the bare name of Thomas Fitzgirald. For this hath beene obserued by the Irish historiographers euer since the conquest, that notwithstanding all the presumptions of treason, wherewith anie earle of Kildare could either faintlie be suspected or vehementlie charged; yet there was neuer anie erle of that house read or heard of, that bare armour in the field against his prince. Which I write not as a barrister hired to plead their cause, but as a chronicler moued to declare the truth.

James de la Hyde.

Thomas Fitzgirald was not earle of Kildare.

I.St. pag. 434.

No earle of Kildare bare armour at anie time against his prince.

This Thomas Fitzgirald (as before is specified) was borne in England, vpon whom nature powred beautie, and fortune by birth bestowed nobilitie: which had it beene well employed, & were it not that his rare gifts had beene blemished by his later euill qualities, he would haue proued an impe worthie to be ingrafted in so honorable a stocke. He was of stature tall and personable, in countenance amiable, a white face, and withall somewhat ruddie, delicatlie in each lim featured, a rolling tong & a rich vtterance, of nature flexible and kind, verie soone caried where he fansied, easilie with submission appeased, hardlie with stubbornnesse weied, in matters of importance an headlong hotspur: yet neuertheless taken for a yong man not deuoid of wit, were it not (as it fell out in the end) that a fole had the keeping thereof.

The description of Thomas Fitzgirald.

But to returne to the course of the historie. When Thomas and his vncles were taken, his second brother on the father his side, named Girald Fitzgirald (who was after in the reigne of quéene Marie restored to the earledome of Kildare, in which honour as yet he liueth) being at that time somewhat past twelue, and not full thirteene yeares of age, late sicke of the small pocks in the countie of Kildare, at a towne named Donoare, then in the occupation of Girald Fitzgirald. Thomas Leuruse, who was the child his scholemaster, and after became bishop of Kildare, mistrusting vpon the apprehension of Thomas & his vncles, that all went not currant, wrapt the yong patient as tenderlie as he could, and had him conueied in a cleese with all spæd to Offaly, where sojourning for a short space with his sister the ladie Marie Fitzgirald, vntill he had recouered his perfect health, his scholemaster caried him to Odon his countrie, where making his abood for a quarter of a yeare, he trauelled to Obren his countrie in Mounster, and hauing there remained for halfe a

The aduentures of the yong Fitzgirald son to the ladie Grey countesse of Kildare.

Donoare.

Thomas Leuruse.

Elenor Fitzgirald.

yeare, he repaired to his aunt the ladie Elenor Fitzgirald, who then kept in Mac Cartie Reagh hir late husband his territories.

This noble woman was at that time a widow, alwaies knowne and accounted of each man, that was acquainted with hir conuersation of life, for a paragon of liberalitie and kindnesse, in all hir actions vertuous and godlie, and also in a good quarell rather stout than stiffe. To hir was Odoneil an importunate suiter. And although at sundrie times before she seemed to shake him off, yet considering the distresse of hir yong innocent nephue, how he was forced to wander in pilgrimwise from house to house, eschuing the punishment that others deserued, smarted in his tender yeares with aduersitie, before he was of discretion to inioie anie prosperitie, she began to incline to hir woer his request, to the end hir nephue should haue béene the better by his countenance shouldered, and in fine indented to espouse him; with this caueat or prouiso, that he should safelie shield and protect the said yong gentleman in this calamitie. This condition agréed vpon, she rode with hir nephue to Odoneil his countrie, and there had him safelie kept for the space of a yeare.

The ladie Elenors liberalitie.

But shortlie after the gentlewoman either by some secret friend informed, or of wisedome gathering that hir late maried husband intended some treacherie, had hir nephue disguised, scoring him like a liberall and bountifull aunt with seuen score portegues, not onelie in valour, but also in the selfe same coine, incontinentlie shipped him secretlie in a Britons vessell of saint Malouse, betaking him to God, and to their charge that accompanied him, to wit, maister Leurouse, and Robert Walsh sometime seruant to his father the earle. The ladie Elenor hauing thus to hir contentation bestowed hir nephue, she expostulated verie sharpelie with Odoneil as touching his villanie, protesting that the onlie cause of hir match with him proceeded of an especiall care to haue hir nephue countenanced: and now that he was out of his lash that minded to haue betraied him, he should well vnderstand, that as the feare of his danger moued hir to annere to such a clownish curmudgen: so the assurance of his safetie should cause hir to sequester hirselfe from so butcherlie a cutthrote, that would be like a pelting mercenarie patch hired, to sell or betraie the innocent bloud of his nephue by affinitie, and hirs by consanguinitie. And in this wise trussing vp bag and baggage, she forsoke Odoneil and returned to hir countrie.

Fitzgirald saileth to France.

The passengers with a prosperous gale arriued at saint Malouse, which notified to the gouernour of Britaine, named monsieur de Chasteau Brian, he sent for the yong Fitzgirald, gaue him verie hartie interteinement during one moneths space. In the meane season the gouernour posted a messenger to the court of France, aduertising the king of the arriuall of this gentleman, who presentlie caused him to be sent for, and had him put to the Dolphin named Henrie, who after became king of France. Sir John Wallop (who was then the English ambassadour) vnderstanding the cause of the Irish fugitiue his repaire to France, demanded him of the French king, according to the new made league betweene both the princes: which was, that none should keepe the other his subiect within his dominion, contrarie to either of their willes; adding further, that the boie was brother to one, who of late notorious for his rebellion in Ireland was executed at London.

Chasteau Brian.

Sir John Wallop demeth Fitzgirald.

The king demeth him.

To this answered the king, first that the ambassador had no commission from his Prince to demand him, & vpon his maiestie his letter he should know more of his mind: secondlie that he did not deteine him, but the Dolphin stated him: lastlie, that how grieuouslie soeuer his brother offended, he was well assured, that the sillie boy neither was nor could be a traitor, and therefore there rested no cause whie the ambassador should in such wise craue him; not doubting that although he were deliuered to his king, yet he would not so far swarue from the extreame rigor of iustice, as to imbrue his hands in the innocent his bloud, for the offense that his brother had perpetrated. Maister Wallop hereupon addressed his letters to England, specifieng vnto the councell the French kings answer. And in the meane time the yong Fitzgirald hauing an inkling of the ambassador his motion, fled secretlie to Flanders, scantlie reaching to Valencie, when James Sherelocke, one of maister Wallop his men, did not onelie pursue him, but also did ouertake him as he sojourned in the said towne.

Fitzgirald fleeth to Flanders.

James Sherelocke pursueth Fitzgirald.

Whereupon maister Leurouse, and such as accompanied the child, kept to the gouernor of Valencie, complaining that one Sherelocke a sneaking spie, like a pikethanke promoting varlet, did dog their master from place to place, and presentlie pursued him to the towne: and therefore they be sought the gouernour, not to leaue such apparant villanie vnpunished, in that he was willing to betraie not onelie a guiltlesse child, but also his owne countriman, who rather ought for his innocencie to be pitied, than for the desert of others so egerlie to be pursued. The gouernor vpon this complaint sore incensed, sent in all hast for Sherelocke, had him suddenlie examined, and finding him vnable to color his lewd practise with anie warrantable defense, he laid him vp by the heeles, rewarding his hot pursute with cold interteinment, and so remained in gaole, vntill the yong Fitzgirald requiting the prisoner his vnnaturall crueltie with vndeserued courtesie, humblie besought the gouernor to set him at libertie. This brunt escaped, Fitzgirald trauelled to Bruxels, where the emperour kept his court.

Sherelocke imprisoned.

Crueltie requited with courtesie.

Doctor Pates being ambassador in the low countries, demanded Fitzgirald of the emperour on his maister the king of Englands behalfe. The emperor hauing answered that he had not to deale with the boy, and for ought that he knew was not minded to make anie great abode in that countrie, sent him to the bishop of Liege, allowing him for his pension an hundred crownes monethlie. The bishop interteined him verie honorablie, had him placed in an abbete of monks, & was so carefull of his safetie, that if anie person suspected had trauelled within the circuit of his glæbe, he should be streictlie examined whither he would, or from whense he came, or vpon what occasion he trauelled that waie. Hauing in this wise remained at Liege for halfe a yere, the cardinall Pole (Fitzgirald his kinsman) sent for him to Rome, Whervpon the gentleman as well with the emperor his licence, as with surrendring his pension, trauelled to Italie, where the cardinall would not admit him to his companie, vntill he had atteined to some knowledge in the Italian tong. Wherfore allowing him an annuitie of three hundred crownes, he placed him with the bishop of Verona, and the cardinall of Mantua, and after with the duke of Mantua. Leurouse in the meane while was admitted through the cardinall Pole his procurement, to be one of the English house in Rome, called saint Thomas his hospitall.

Doctor Pates

The emperor bestoweth a pension on Fitzgirald.

Cardinall Pole sendeth for Fitzgirald.

Leurouse placed in the English hospitall.

Robert Walsh, vpon his maisters repaire to Italie, returned to Ireland. Fitzgirald hauing continued with the cardinall, and the duke of Mantua, a yeare and an halfe, was sent for by the cardinall Pole to Rome, at which time the duke of Mantua gaue him for an annuall pension 300 crownes. The cardinall greatlie reioised in his kinsman, had him care-carefullie trained vp in his house, interlacing with such discretion his learning and studies with exercises of actiuitie, as he should not be after accounted of the learned for an ignorant idiot, nor taken of actiue gentlemen for a dead and dumpish meacocke. If he had committed anie fault, the cardinall would secretlie command his tutors to correct him, and all that notwithstanding, he would in presence dandle the boie, as though he were not priuie to his punishment; & vpon his complaint made, he vsed to checke Fitzgirald his maister openlie for chastising so tenderlie his pretie darling.

Robert Walsh returneth to Ireland.

Cardinall Pole his order in training yong Fitzgirald.

In this wise he rested three yeares togither in the cardinall his house, and by that time hauing kept so far in yéers (for he was pricking fast vpon ninténe) as he began to know himselfe, the cardinall put him to his choise, either to continue his learning, or by trauelling to seeke his aduentures abrode. The yong stripling (as vsuallie kind doth créepe) rather of nature addicted to valiantnes, than wedded to bookishnesse, chosed to be a traueller: and presentlie with the cardinall his licence repaired to Naples: where falling in acquaintance with knights of the Rhodes, he accompanied them to Malta, from thense he sailed to Tripolie (a fort apperteining to the aforesaid order, coasting vpon Barbarie) and there he abode six weekes with Mounbrison, a commander of the Rhodes, who had the charge of that hold.

Fitzgirald trauelleth to Naples.

Tripolie.

Mounbrison.

At that time the knights serued valiantlie against the Turks and miscreants, spoiled and sacked their villages and townes that laie neere the water side, tooke diuerse of them prisoners, and after sold them to the christians for bondslaues. The yong Fitzgirald returned with a rich bootie to Malta, from thense to Rome, hauing spent in this votage not fullie one yeare. Proud was the cardinall to heare of his prosperous exploits: and for his further aduancement he inhanced his pension of three hundred crownes, to three hundred pounds, ouer and aboue three hundred crownes that the duke of Mantua allowed him. Shortlie after he preferred him to the seruice of the duke of Florence, named Cosmo, with whom he continued maister of his horsse three yeares, hauing also of the duke three hundred duckets for a yearelie pension during life, or vntill he were restored; in like maner as the cardinall Pole and the duke of Mantua in their annuities had granted him.

Fitzgirald returneth to Rome.

The cardinall inhanseth Fitzgiralds pension.

He is master of the horsse to the duke of Florence.

During the time that he was in seruice with the duke of Florence, he trauelled to Rome a shrouing, of set purpose to be merrie: and as he rode on hunting with cardinall Ferneise the pope his nephue, it happened that in chasing the bucke he fell into a pit nine and twentie fatham déepe, and in the fall forsaking his horsse within two fathams of the bottom, he tooke hold by two or three roots, griping them fast, vntill his armes were so wearie, as he could hang no longer in that paine. Wherefore betaking himselfe to God, he let go his gripe by little and little, and fell softlie on his horsse, that in the bottom of the pit laie starke dead, and there he stood vp to the ancles in water for the space of three houres. When the chase was ended, an exceeding good greihound of his named Gribhound, not finding his maister in the companie, followed his trace vntill he came to the pit, and from thense would not depart, but stood at the brim incessantlie howling. The cardinall Ferneise and his traine missing Fitzgirald, made towards the dog, and surueieng the place, they were verelie persuaded that the gentleman was squised to death.

He falleth into a déepe pit.

His greihound findeth him out.

Trecappan.

Hauing therefore posted his seruants in hast to a village hard by Rome (named Trecappan) for ropes and other necessaries, he caused one of the companie to glide in a basket downe to the bottome of the hole. Fitzgirald reuiued with his presence, and willing to be remoued from so darkesome a dongeon to the open aire, besought the other to lend him his rome, whereupon he was haled vp in the basket: as well to the generall admiration of the whole companie, as to the singular gratulation of the cardinall and all his friends, rendering most hartie thankes vnto God his diuine maiestie, for protecting the gentleman with his gratious guerdon. And thus surceasing to treat anie further of his aduentures, vntill the date of time traine my pen to a longer discourse, I will returne to the inhabitants of the English pale, who after the death of Thomas Fitzgirald, through rigor of iustice and the due execution of lawes were greatlie molested. For ouer this, that such as were knowne for open and apparant traitors in the commotion, were for the more part executed, or with round sums fined, or from the realme exiled: certeine gentlemen of worship were sent from England, with commission to examine each person suspected with Thomas his treason, and so according to their discretion, either with equitie to execute, or with clemencie to pardon all such as they could proue to haue furthered him in his disloiall commotion. Commissioners were these: sir Anthonie Sentleger knight, sir George Paulet knight, maister Pole, and maister Barnes. Much about this time was there a parlement holden at Dublin before the lord Leonard Greie lord deputie, beginning the first of Maie, in the eight and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight.

Commissioners sent to Ireland.

Their names

Parlement. 1539.

In this parlement there past these acts following.

In act {
- For the attaindor of the earle of Kildare, and Thomas Fitzgirald, with others.
- For the succession of the king & quéene Anne.
- Of absenties, wherein was granted to the king the inheritance of such lands in Ireland, whereof the duke of Norfolke & George Talbot earle of Waterford & Salop were seized, with the inheritances of diuerse other corporations and couents demurrant in England.
- For the repeale of Poinings act.
- Authorising the king his heirs and successors to be supreame head of the church of Ireland.
- That no subiects or reliants of Ireland shall pursue or commense, vse or execute anie maner of prouocations, appeales or other processe from the see of Rome, vpon paine of incurring the premunire.
- Against such as slander the king, or his heires apparant.
- For the first fruits.
- Of sir Walter de la Hide knight his lands in Carbeire granted to the king.
- How persons robbed shall be restored to their goods.
- Restreining tributs to be granted to Irishmen.

In act. Against proctors to be any member of the parlement.
Against marieng or fostering with or to Irishmen.
Against the authoritie of the see of Rome.
For the twentith part.
For the English order, habit, and language.
For the suppressing of abbeis.
For the lading of woll & flockes.
For the proofe of testaments.
Of faculties.
Declaring th'effect of Poinings act.
Of penall statutes.
For the weres vpon Barou, and other waters in the countrie of Kilkenne.
For the personage of Dongaran.
For lesers of corne.

As for the old earle of Kildare, who in this parlement was atteinted for diuerse presumptions, in the preamble of the said act rehearsed, certeine it is, that the reuolt of his sonne Thomas Fitzgirald smot him so deepelie to the heart, as vpon the report thereof he deceased in the tower, wishing in his death-bed that either he had died before he had heard of the rebellion, or that his brainelesse boy had neuer liued to raise the like commotion. This earle, of such as did not stomach his proceedings, was taken for one that bare himselfe in all his affaires verie honorablie, a wise, deepe, and far reaching man: in war valiant without rashnesse, and politike without treacherie. Such a suppressor of rebels in his gouernement, as they durst not beare armor to the annoiance of anie subiect, whereby he heaped no small reuenues to the crowne, inriched the king his treasure, garded with securitie the pale, continued the honor of his house, and purchased enuie to his person. His great hospitalitie is to this daie rather of each man commended, than of anie one followed. He was so religiouslie addicted vnto the seruing of God, as what time soeuer he trauelled to anie part of the countrie, such as were of his chappell should be sure to accompanie him. Among other rare gifts, he was with one singular qualitie indued, which were it put in practise by such as are of his calling, might minister great occasion as well to the abandoning of flattering carrie tales, as to the staied quietnesse of noble potentates.

The old earle of Kildare his wish before his death.

His seruice.

His hospitalitie and deuotion.

For if anie whispered, vnder Benedicite, a sinister report or secret practise, that tended to the disdaining of his honor, or to the perill of his person, he would strictlie examine the informer, whether the matter he reported were past, or to come. If it were said or done, he was accustomed to laie sore to his charge, where, and of whome he heard it, or how he could iustifie it. If he found him to halt in the proofe, he would punish him as a pikethanke makebate, for being so maliciouslie caried, as for currieng fauour to himselfe, he would labor to purchase hatred to another. But if the practise were future, and hereafter to be put in execution, then would he suspend the credit, vsing withall such warie secrecie, as vntill the matter came to the pinch, the aduersarie should thinke that he was most ignorant, when he was best prouided. As being in Dublin forewarned, that John Mourkan with certeine desperate varlets conspired his destruction, & that they were determined to assault him vpon his returne to Mainoth, he had one of his seruants named James Grant, that was much of his pitch, and at a blush did somewhat resemble him, attired in his riding apparell, and namelie in a scarlet cloake, wherewith he vsed to be clad. Grant in this wise masking in his lords attire, rode as he was commanded in the beaten high waie towards Mainoth, with sir of the earle his seruants attending vpon him. The conspirators awaiting towards Lucan the comming of the earle, incountered the disguised lord, and not doubting but it had beene Kildare, they began to charge him: but the other amazed therewith, cried that they tooke their marke amisse; for the earle rode to Mainoth on the further side of Liffie. Wherewith the murtherers appalled, fled awaie, but incontinentlie were by the earle apprehended, sustreining the punishment that such caitifes deserued.

The old earle of Kildare his policie when his death was conspired.

John Mourkan.

James Grant.

This noble man was so well affected to his wife the ladie Grete, as he would not at anie time buy a sute of apparell for himselfe, but he would sute hir with the same stuffe. Which gentlenesse she recompensed with equall kindnesse. For after that he deceased in the tower, she did not onelie euer after liue as a chast and honorable widow; but also nightlie before she went to bed, she would resort to his picture, & there with a solemne congée she would bid hir lord goodnight. Whereby may be gathered with how great loue she affected his person, that had in such price his bare picture. An other act that did passe in this parlement touching absenties, proceeded of this occasion. Maister Girald Ailmer, who first was chiefe baron of the exchequer, after chiefe iustice of the common pleas, was occasioned, for certeine his affaires, to repaire vnto the court of England. Where being for his good seruice greatlie countenanced by such as were in those daies taken for the pillers of the weale publike, namelie of the lord Cromwell; it happened that through his lordship his earnest meanes, the king made maister Ailmer chiefe iustice of his bench in Ireland. This aduancement disliked by certeine of Waterford and Wexford, that were not friended to the gentleman, they debased him in such despitefull wise, as the earle of Shrewesburie, who then was likewise earle of Waterford, was by their lewd reports caried to chalenge the king, so far as with his dutie of allegiance he durst, for bestowing so weightie an office vpon so light a person, being such a simple John at Stile as he tearmed him, no wiser than Patch the late lord cardinall his fole.

The ladie Greies kindnesse to hir husband.

Girald Ailmer.

The king herevpon expostulated with the lord Cromwell, who being throughlie acquainted with the gentleman his rare wisedome, answered: that if it would stand with his maiesties pleasure to enter into conference with him, he should be sure to find him no babe, notwithstanding the wrong informations of such as labored to thwart or crosse him. Whereto the king vpon further leasure agréed, and shortlie after (according to his promise) bestowed two or three houres with maister Ailmer: who vpon the lord Cromwell his forewarning, was so well armed for his highnesse, as he shewed himselfe in his discourse, by answering Ad omnia quare, to be a man worthie to suplie an office of so great credit. In this conference the king demanded him, what he tooke to be the chiefe occasion of disorder in Ireland, and how he thought it might best be reformed: Truelie and it like your maiestie (quoth Ailmer) among sundrie reasons that might be probablie alleged for the decaie of that your kingdome, one chiefe occasion is, that certeine of your nobilitie of this your realme of England are seized of the better part of your dominion in Ireland, whereof they haue so little

tle

tle kéepe, as for lacke of their presence, they suffer the said lands to be ouerrun by rebels and traitors. Wherefore if your highnesse would prouide by act of parlement, that all such lands, which by reason of their absence may not be defended, should be to your highnesse by the consent of the nobilitie and communaltie granted, you might thereby inrich your crowne, represse rebels, and defend your subiects from all traitorous inuasion.

The king tickled with this plausible deuise, yéelded maister Ailmer hartie thanks for his good counsell, and in this parlement had the tenure thereof put in effect. Which redounded chéeflie to the lord of Shrewesburie his disaduantage, as one that was possessed of diuerse ancient lordships and manors in that countrie. Soone after this parlement, Oneale imagining that he was able to make his partie good against the English pale, conspired with Odoneale Maggadnesh, Ocaghan, Mac Kwilen, Ohanlan, and other Irish lords, and on a sudden inuaded the pale, came to the Nauan, burnt all the townes of ech side confining, after marched to Taragh, musketring with great pride his armie vpon the top of the hill: and hauing gathered togither the spoile of the pale without resistance, he began to recule northwards, making his full account to haue gone his waie scotfrée.

Oneale rebelleth.

The lord Leonard Greie being then lord deputie, forecasting the worst, certified the king & councell of Oneale his rebellion, and withall humblie besought a fresh supplie of souldiors to assist the pale in resisting the enimie, and that sir William Brereton (who was discharged & returned to England) should be sent into Ireland, as one that for his late seruice was highlie commended of the countrie. The king and councell condescending to the deputie his request, appointed sir William Brereton to hie thither with speed, hauing the charge of two hundred and fiftie souldiors of Cheshiremen. In which seruice the gentleman was found so prest and readie, that notwithstanding in mustering his band he fell by his mishap off his horsse, and therewithall brake his thigh in two places, yet rather than he would retire homewards, he appointed the mariners to hale him vp to their barke by pullies, and in such impotent wise arriued in Ireland, suppressing the feblenesse of his bodie with the contagious valor of his mind.

Sir William Brereton sent for into Ireland.

Sir William Brereton sent into Ireland.

The lord deputie in the meane while marched with the force of the pale, the maior & the citizens of Dublin to Drogheda: from thense likewise accompanied with the maior & townesmen, he marched northward to Bellahoa, where Oneale & his companie on the further side of the water laie incamped with the spoile of the pale. The deputie by spies and secret messengers hereof certified, caused the armie to trauell the better part of the night, insomuch as by the dawning of the daie they were nere to the riuers side: where hauing escried the enimies, namlie Maggadnesh, and the Galloglasses that were placed there to kéepe the streicts (for Oneale with a maine armie lurked not farre off) they began to set themselues in battell arraie, as men that were resolued with all hast and good speed to surprise the enimie with a sudden charge.

The lord of Bellahoa.

At which time James Fleming baron of Slane (commonlie called Blacke James) garded with a round companie, as well of horsemen as of footmen, humblie besought the deputie to grant him that daie the honor of the onset. Whereto when the lord Greie had agréed, the baron of Slane with chérefull countenance imparted the obteining of his suit, as plesant tidings to Robert Halfepennie, who with his ancestors was standardbearer to the house of Slane. But Halfepennie séeing the further side of the water so beset with armed Galloglasses as he tooke it, as likelie an attempt to rase down the strongest fort in Ireland with a fillip, as to rush through such quicke iron walles, flatlie answered the baron, that he would rather disclame in his office, than there to giue the onset where there rested no hope of life, but an assured certeintie of death. And therefore he was not as yet so wearie of the world, as like an headlong hotspur, voluntarlie to run to his vtter and vndoubted destruction. Wherefore he besought his lordship to set his heart at rest, and not to impute his denial to basenesse of corage, but to warinesse of safetie, although he knew none of stated mind, but would soner chose to slépe in an whole shéepe his pelt, than to walke in a torne lion his skin, namelie when all hope of life was abandoned, and the certeintie of death assuredlie promised.

James Fleming baron of Slane.

Robert Halfepennie.

The baron with this answer at his wits end rode to Robert Betoa of Downore, brake with him as touching Halfepennie his determination, & withall requested him (as he did tender his honor) now at a pinch to supplie the rome of that dastardlie coward, as he did terme him. Betoa to this answered, that though it stood with good reason, that such as hertofore tasted the swæt in peace, should now be contented to sip of the sowre in war: yet notwithstanding, rather than the matter should to his honor lie in the dust, he promised to breake through them, or else to lie in the water; & withall being surpassinglie mounted (for the baron gaue him a choise horsse) he tooke the standard, & with a sudden shout, hauing with him in the foreranke Mabe of Mabestowne (who at the first brunt was slaine) he flong into the water, and charged the Irish that stood on the further shore. After followed the gentlemen and yeomen of the pale, that with as great manhood charged the enimies, as the enimies with corage resisted their assault. To this stoutnesse were the enimies more boldlie pricked, in that they had the aduantage of the shore, and the gentlemen of the pale were constreined to bicker in the water.

Robert Betoa.

Mabe of Mabestowns slaine.

But the longer the Irish continued, the more they were disaduantaged, by reason that the English were so assisted with fresh supplies, as their enimies could not anie longer withstand them, but were compelled to beare backe, to forsake the banke, and to giue the armie free passage. The English taking hart vpon their faintnesse, brake through the Galloglasses, slue Maggadnesh their capteine, pursued Oneale with the remnant of his lords, leauing behind them for lacke of safe carriage the spoile of the pale, scantlie able to escape with his owne life, being egerlie pursued by the armie vntill it was sunne set. In this hot conflict Matthew King, Patrike Barnewall of Kilmallocke, sir Edward Basnet priest, who after became deane of saint Patriks in Dublin, and was sworne one of the priuie councell, and Thomas Fitzsimons of Curdaffe, were reported to haue serued verie valiantlie. Moreouer, James Fitzsimons maior of Dublin, Michaell Curseie maior of Drogheda, Girald Ailmer chéefe iustice, and Thomas Talbot of Malahide, were dubbed knights in the field.

The Irish discomfited.

Oneale put to flight.

King.

Barnewall.

Basnet.

Fitzsimons.

The maiors of Dublin and Drogheda dubbed knights.

Ailmer.

Talbot.

But of all others, the lord Greie then lord deputie, as he was in authoritie superior to them all, so in courage and manlinesse he was inferior to none. He was noted by the armie to haue indured great toile and paine before the fairmish, by posting bareheaded from one band to an other, debasing the enimies, inhansing the power of the pale, depressing the reuolt of rebellious traitors, extolling the good quarell of loiall subiects, offring large rewards, which with as great constancie he performed, as with liberalitie he promised. Ouer this, he bare himselfe so affable to his souldiors, in vsing them like frends and fellows, and terming them with courteous names, and mouing laughter with pleasant conceipts, as they were incensed as well for the loue of the person, as for the hatred of the enimie, with resolute minds to bicker with the Irish. In which conflict the deputie was as forward as the most, and bequit himselfe as valiant a seruitor as the best.

The valiantnesse of the lord Greie.

The gouernor, turning the opportunitie of this skirmish to his aduantage, shortlie after rode to the north, preiding & spoiling Oneale with his confederats, who by reason of the late ouerthrow were able to make but little resistance. In this iornie he rased saint Patrike his church in Downe, an old ancient citie of Ulster, and burnt the monuments of Patrike, Brigide, and Colme, who are said to haue beene there intoomed, as before is expressed in the description of Ireland. This fact lost him sundrie harts in that countrie, alwaies after detesting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Whereupon conspiring with such of Mounster as were enimies to his gouernment, they booked vp diuerse complaints against him, which they did exhibit to the king and councell. The articles of greatest importance laid to his charge were these.

The lord Greie accused.

The articles that were laid to his charge.

1 Inprimis, that notwithstanding he were strictlie commanded by the king his maiestie, to apprehend his kinsman the yong Fitzgirald, yet did he not onlie disobeie the kings letters as touching that point by plaieng bopeepe, but also had priuie conference with the said Fitzgirald, and laie with him two or three seuerall nights before he departed into France.

2 Item, that the cheefe cause that moued him to inuegle Thomas Fitzgirald with such faire promises, proceeded of set purpose to haue him cut off, to the end there should be a gap set open for the yong Fitzgirald to aspire to the earledome of Kildare.

3 Item, that he was so greedilie addicted to the pilling and polling of the king his subiects, namelie of such as were resiant in Mounster, as the beds he laie in, the cups he dranke in, the plate with which he was serued in anie gentlemans house, were by his seruants against right and reason packt vp, and carried with great extortion awaie.

4 Item, that without anie warrant from the king or councell, he prophaned the church of saint Patrikes in Downe, turning it to a stable, after plucked it downe, and shipt the notable ring of bels that did hang in the steeple, meaning to haue sent them to England: had not God of his iustice preuented his iniquitie, by sinking the vessell and passengers wherein the said belles should haue beene conueied.

These and the like articles were with such odious presumptions coloured by his accusers, as the king and councell remembring his late faults, and forgetting his former seruices (for commonlie all men are of so hard hap, that they shall be soner for one trespasse condemned, than for a thousand good deserts commended) gaue commandement that the lord Greie should not onelie be remoued from the gouernment of the countrie, but also had him beheaded on the tower hill the eight and twentith of June. But as touching the first article, that brought him most of all out of conceipt with the king, I moued question to the erle of Kildare, whether the tenor therof were true or false: His lordship thereto answered Bona fide, that he neuer spake with the lord Greie, neuer sent messenger to him, nor receiued message or letter from him. Whereby maie be gathered, with how manie dangers they are inwrapped that gouerne prouinces, wherein diligence is thwackt with hatred, negligence is loden with tawnts, seueritie with perils menaced, liberalitie with thankelesse vnkindnesse contemned, conference to vndermining framed, flatterie to destruction forged, each in countenance smiling, diuerse in heart pouting, open fawning, secret grudging, gaping for such as shall succeed in gouernment, honouring magistrates with cap and knee as long as they are present, and carping them with tong and pen as sone as they are absent.

The lord Greie beheaded. 1541

The lord Greie guiltlesse of the first article.

The dangers that happen to gouernors of prouinces.

The lord Leonard Greie (as is aforesaid) discharged, sir William Brereton was constituted lord iustice, whose short gouernement was intangled with no little trouble. For albeit he and Oneale fell to a reasonable composition, yet other of the Irish lordings, namelie Oconhur and his adherents, that are content to liue as subiects, as long as they are not able to hold out as rebels, conspired togither, and determined to assemble their power at the hill of Fowre in west Meth, and so on a sudden to ransacke the pale. The lord iustice forthwith accompanied with the armie, and with two thousand of the pale, of which no small number were ecclesiasticall persons, made towards the rebels, who vpon the approch of so great an armie gaue ground, and dispersed themselues in woods and marishes. The lord iustice this notwithstanding inuaded Oconhur his countrie, burnt his tenements, & made all his trenches with the multitude of pioners so passable, as foure hundred carts, beside light carriage, were led without let thorough the countrie. Oconhur sone after submitted himselfe, & sent his sonne Cormach to the lord iustice as hostage for his future obedience and loialtie to the king his highnesse. After this iournie was ended, sir Anthonie Sentleger knight of the order was constituted lord deputie, and sir William Brereton lord high marshall, who within one halfe yeare after he was preferred to be marshall, trauelling by the lord deputie his appointment to Limerike, to bring in James earle of Desmond, who stood vpon certeine tickle points with the gouernor, ended his life in that iournie, and lieth intoomed at Kilkennie in the quier of saint Kennie his church. In the three and thirtith yeare of the reigne of Henrie the eight, there was a parlement holden at Dublin before sir Anthonie Sentleger, in which there passed these statutes following; namelie.

Sir William Brereton lord iustice.

Oconhur submitteth himselfe to the lord iustice.

Sir Anthonie Sentleger lord deputie.

Sir William Brereton lord high marshall.

He dieth.

1542

An act
- That the king and his successors to be kings of Ireland.
- For graie merchants.
- That the plantife maie abridge his plaint in assise.
- That consanguinitie or affinitie being not within the fift degree, shall be no principall challenge.
- That maketh it felonie to anie man to run awaie with his maister his casket.
- For the annihilating of precontracts in marriage.
- For all lords to distreine vpon the lands of them holden, & to make their auowrie, not naming the tenant, but their land.
- For capacities.
- For seruants wages.
- For ioint-tenants.
- For recouerie in auoiding leases.
- For tithes.
- For attornements.

This parlement was prorogued vntill the fifteenth of Februarie, and after was continued at Limerike before before the said deputie, at which time there passed

An act
- For the adiournment of the parlement, and the place to hold the same, and what persons shall be chosen knights and burgeses.
- For the election of the lord iustice.
- Touching mispleding and ieoyfailes.
- For lands giuen by the king.
- For the suppression of Kilmainan and other religious houses.

1543 This parlement was likewise prorogued, and after was continued and holden before the said gouernour at Dublin, the first daie of Nouember, in the foure and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, wherein there passed these acts; namelie:

An act
- For the diuision of Meth into two shires.
- For persons standing bound in any court for their appearance, and being in seruice, to be discharged by writ.

This parlement was further prorogued vntill the seuentéenth of Aprill, and at that time before the said gouernor it was holden and ended, in which there passed an act touching the manour and castell of Dongaruan to be vnited and annexed to the crowne for euer. To this parlement resorted diuerse of the Irish lords, who submitting themselues to the deputie his mercie, returned peaceablie to their countries.

James earle of Desmond. But James earle of Desmond sailed into England, and before the king and councell purged himselfe of all such articles of treason as were falselie laid to his charge: whose cleare purgation and humble submission the king accepted verie gratefullie.

Oneale earle of Tiron. Shortlie after Desmond his returne homeward, the great Oneale was created earle of Tiron, and his base sonne Matthew Oneale baron of Dongaruan. For in those daies John Oneale, commonlie called Shane Oneale, the onelie sonne lawfullie of his bodie begotten, was little or nothing esteemed.

Oneale hauing returned to Ireland with this honour, and the king his fauor, Obren with certeine other Irish lords sailed into England, submitting their liues and lands to the king his mercie. This Obren was at that time created earle of Clencare, in which honour his posteritie hitherto resteth. Shortlie after the returne of these lords to their countrie, king Henrie being fullie resolued to besiege Bullongne, gaue commandement to sir Anthonie Sentleger deputie, to leuie an armie of Irishmen, and with all expedition to send them to England. To these were appointed capteins the lord Powre, who after was dubd knight, Surlocke & Finglasse, with diuerse others. They mustered in saint James his parke seuen hundred. In the siege of Bullongne they stood the armie in verie good sted. For they were not onelie contented to burne and spoile all the villages thereto adioining; but also they would range twentie or thirtie miles into the maine land: and hauing taken a bull, they vsed to tie him to a stake, and scorching him with faggots, they would force him to rore, so as all the cattell in the countrie would make towards the bull, all which they would lightlie lead awaie, and furnish the campe with store of beefe.

Obren created earle of Clencare.

1544 The Irish sent for to the siege of Bullongne.

Their policie in purueieng for the armie.

If they tooke anie Frenchman prisoner, lest they should be accounted couetous, in snatching with them his entier bodie, his onelie ransome should bee no more but his head. The French with this strange kind of warfaring astonished, sent an ambassador to king Henrie, to learne whether he brought men with him or diuels, that could neither be woone with rewards, nor pacified by pitie: which when the king had turned to a iest, the Frenchmen euer after, if they could take anie of the Irish scatering from the companie, vsed first to cut off their genitals, and after to torment them with as great and as lingering paine as they could deuise.

A French chalenger banquished. After that Bullongne was surrendred to the king, there incamped on the west side of the towne beyond the hauen an armie of Frenchmen, amongst whome there was a thrasonicall Golias that departed from the armie, and came to the brinke of the hauen, and there in ietting and daring wise chalenged anie one of the English armie that durst be so hardie, as to bicker with him hand to hand. And albeit the distance of the place, the depth of the hauen, the nærnesse of his companie imboldened him to this chalenge, more than anie great valour or pith that rested in him to indure a combat; yet all this notwithstanding, an Irishman named Nicholl Welsh, who after retained to the earle of Kildare, loathing and disdaining his proud brags, flung into the water, and swam ouer the riuer, fought with the chalenger, strake him for dead, and returned backe to Bullongne with the Frenchman his head in his mouth, before the armie could ouertake him. For which exploit, as he was of all his companie highlie commended, so by the lieutenant he was bountifullie rewarded.

Nicholl welsh.

1545 Much about this time the earle of Lennor, verie wrongfullie inquieted in Scotland, and forced to forsake his countrie, became humble petitioner to king Henrie, as well to releeue him in his distressed calamitie, as to compasse the means how he might be restored to his lands & liuing. The king his highnesse moued with compassion, posted the earle ouer to Ireland, with letters of especiall trust, commanding sir Anthonie Sentleger then deputie, to assist and further the Scotish outcast, with as puissant an armie as to his contentation should seeme good. The deputie, vpon the receipt of these letters, sent for James Butler earle of Ormond and Osserie, a noble man, no lesse politike in peace, than valiant in warres, made him priuie to the king his pleasure; and withall in his maiesties name did cast the charge hereof vpon the said earle, as one that for his tried lotaltie was willing, and for his honour and valour able to attempt and atchiue so rare and famous an exploit. The lord of Ormond as willing to obeie, as the gouernour was to command, leuied of his tenants and reteiners six hundred Gallowglasses, foure hundred Kearnes, three score horsemen, and foure hundred and fortie shot: so in the whole he mustered on Olmantowne greene neere Dublin, fiftéene hundred souldiours.

The earle of Lennor in danger to be drowned.

The earle of Lennox assisted by king Henrie.

James Butler earle of Ormond.

The lord deputie yéelding his honour such thanks in words, as he deserued indéed, leuied in the pale fiftéene hundred souldiours more, to be annexed to the earle his companie. Ouer them he constituted sir John Trauers capteine, but the erle of Ormond was made generall of the whole armie. When the souldiours were with munition and victuals aboundantlie furnished, the earle of Ormond and the earle of Lennor tooke shipping at Sherise, hauing in their companie twentie and eight ships well rigged, sufficientlie manned, and stronglie appointed. From thense they sailed northwards, and rode at anchor without the hauen of Oldsléet beyond Karregfergus. Where hauing remained bulling without the mouth of the hauen, contrarie to the aduise of the masters of their ships (who prognosticated the spéedie approch of a storme, and therefore did with them to take take a good harbrough) it hapned that the said night there arose so boisterous a tempest, that the whole fleet was like to haue béene ouerthelmed. The mariners betaking their passengers and themselues to the mercie of God, did cut their maine masts, let slip their anchors, and were weather driuen to the hauen of Dunbritaine in Scotland, whereas they were like to run their ships on ground, and consequentlie they all should either haue béene plunged in the water, or else haue béene slaine on the land by a great number of Scots that awaited their approach. God with his gratious clemencie preuenting their imminent calamitie, sent them not onelie a wished calme, but also a prosperous gale of wind, that blew them backe in safetie to the Irish coast, from whense they were scattered.

Sir Iohn Trauers knight.

The earle of Lennor aduertised by certeine of his frends that met with him on the sea, that the Scots (contrarie to their promise) dealt verie doublie with him (for although they gaue their word to surrender vp to him the castell of Dunbritaine, yet they did not onelie fortifie that hold, but also were readie to incounter with his souldiors vpon their arriuals) he concluded to returne to Ireland. The earle of Ormond verie loath that so great an attempt should take so little effect, dealt with him verie earnestlie, notwithstanding his counsell were bewraied to inuade his enimies, and his lordship should be sure to find the armie so forward in assisting him in so famous an enterprise, as they would shew themselues more willing to bicker with his foes in Scotland, than without skirmishing to returne to Ireland. For the earle of Ormond was of this nature, that as he would not begin anie martiall broile rashlie or vnaduisedlie, so he would not séeme to put it vp lightlie or easilie.

The earle of Ormond his propertie.

Further, whereas the earle of Lennor stood in hope, that the lord of the out Iles would aid him, it was thought by Ormond not to be amisse, to expect his comming; and so ioining his companie to the armie, there rested no doubt, but that the Scotish enimies would be forced to plucke in their hornes, although at the first blush they séeme to set a good face on the matter. Lennor somewhat with this persuasion carried, gaue his consent to expect the lord of the out Iles determination, who notwithstanding all the fetth of the enterprise were descried, would not slip from his word, but personallie sailed to the Irish fleet, with three gallies well appointed. The noble man with such martiall triumphs was receiued, as warlike souldiors could on the sea afford him. But of all others, both the earls gaue him heartie interteinment for his true & honorable dealing, that to be as good as his word, would not séeme to shrinke from his frend in this his aduersitie. And shortlie after as they craued his aduise what were best to be done, either to land in Scotland, or else to returne homeward, his flat resolution was at that time to retire, bicause their drift was detected, their feined friends fainted, the castels were fortified, and the shoares on all parts with swarms of Scots peopled. Wherefore he thought it better policie to giue out in open rumors, that they meant not at anie hand to inuade Scotland, but to retire to their countrie.

The lord of the out Iles saileth to the earle of Lennor.

And after that the Scotish souldiors should be dismist, which would be incontinent vpon their returne, by reason of the excessiue charges: then might the earle of Lennor with lesse preparation, and more secrecie giue a fresh onset, that the enimies should sooner féele his force, than heare of his arriuall. Ormond and Lennor vpon this determination landed with the greater part of the armie, and apointed the ships to bend their course to Dublin. The lord of the out Iles and his three gallies sailed with the fleet, for he was not able by reason of the feblenesse of his bodie to trauell by land, or scarcelie further to prolong his life, which he ended at Douth presentlie vpon his arriuall, and was with great solemnitie buried in saint Patrike his church at Dublin, vpon whose death this epitaph following was framed:

Ormond and Lennor land.

The lord of the out Iles dieth.

Pique manuque mea patriæ dum redditur exsul,
Exsul in externa cogor & ipse mori.

His epitaph.

Both the earles marched with the armie on foot to Carregfergus, where they brake companie. For Lennor and sir John Trauers taking as he thought the shorter but not the safer waie, trauelled through the Ardes with the number of fiue hundred souldiers, where the Irish inhabitants skirmished with them, and put them to such streict plunges (for they would gladlie haue séene what a clocke it was in their budgets) as they wished they had not parted from the rest of the armie. The earle of Ormond with his souldiers (which were a thousand fiue hundred, as before is expressed) marched on foot to Belefast, which is an arme of the sea, a quarter of a mile broad or little lesse. And albeit their wether were bitter and ouernipping, and no small parcell of the water were congeled with frost, yet the earle and his armie waded ouer on foot, to the great danger as well of his person, as of the whole companie, which doubtlesse was a valiant enterprise of so honorable a personage. From thense he passed to Strangford, and through Lecale to Dondalke, where he discharged his souldiers, and hauing presented himselfe to the gouernour at Dublin, he rode homewards to the countie of Kilkennie.

The Irish skirmish with the earle of Lennor.

The earle of Ormond his toilsome trauell.

Shortlie after sir Anthonie Sentleger lord deputie and the earle of Ormond fell at debate, insomuch as either of them laid articles of treason one to the others charge. The chiefe occasion of their mutuall grudge proceeded of certeine new and extraordinarie impositions, wherewith the deputie would haue charged the subiects. Whereat the earle of Ormond as a zelous defendor of his countrie began to kicke, & in no sort could be woone to agree to anie such vnreasonable demand. Herevpon Ormond, perceiuing that the gouernour persisted in his purpose, addressed letters of complaint to such as were of the priuie councell in England: which letters were by one of sir Anthonie his friends intercepted at sea, and presented to him to be perused. Sir Anthonie hauing ouer read the writings, sent maister Basnet in post hast with the packet to Kilkennie, where the earle of Ormond kept his Christmasse, requesting his lordship to take in good part the opening of his letters. Which was done rather to learne the effect of his complaint, than in anie sort to imbar his writings from comming to the councels hands.

The deputie and Ormond at debate.

Ormond his letters intercepted.

The earle answered that his quarell was so good, his dealing so open, as he little weighed who tooke a view of his letters. And for his part what he wrote he meant not to vnwrite; but in such sort as they came from the gouernour, they should be sent to the councell: and if their honours would allow anie subiect to be so hardie, as to intercept and open letters that were to them indorsed, he could not but digest anie such iniurie that they would séeme to beare. With this answer Basnet returned, and the earle performed his promise. Whereupon the gouernour and he were commanded to appeare before the priuie councell in England, where they were sundrie times examined, and their accusations ripelie debated. In fine, the councell equallie to both parts in their complaints affected, and weighing withall rather the due desert of both their loiall seruices, than the vaine presumption of their mutuall accusations, wraped vp their quarels & made them both frends, with such indifferencie, as neither part should be either

The lord deputie and Ormond sent for to England.

They are made frends.

either with ante conqueſt exalted, or with ante foile debaſed.

Sir John Alen lord-chancellor cõmitted to the Flæt.

And for ſo much as ſir John Alen knight then lord chancellor of Ireland, was found to limpe in this controuerſie, by plaieng (as it was ſuppoſed) more craftilie than wiſelie, with both the hands, in that he ſeemed to be rather a fofterer of their malice, than an appeaſer of their quarels, he was likewiſe ſent for into England; and being tript by the counſell in his tale, was committed to the Flæt, wherin he remained a long time. In this trouble the earle of Ormond was greatlie aided by ſir William Wiſe knight a worſhipfull gentleman, borne in the citie of Waterford, who deſeruing indeed the praiſe of that vertue, whereof he bare the name, grew to be of great credit in the court, and ſtood highlie in king Henrie his grace, which he wholie vſed to the furtherance of his friends, and neuer abuſed to the annoiance of his foes. This gentleman was verie well ſpoken, mild of nature, with diſcretion ſtout, as one that in an vpright quarell would beare no coles, ſeldome in an intricate matter grauelled, being found at all aſſaies to be of a pleaſant and preſent wit. Hauing lent the king his ſignet to ſeale a letter, who hauing powdred ermines ingrailed in the ſeale; Why how now Wiſe (quoth the king) what, haſt thou lice here? And if it like your maieſtie, quoth ſir William, a louſe is a rich cote, for by giuing the louſe, I part armes with the French king, in that he giueth the floure de lice. Whereat the king hartilie laughed, to heare how pretilie ſo biting a taunt (namelie proceeding from a prince) was ſuddenlie turned to ſo pleaſant a conceipt.

Sir William Wiſe knight.

Anon after the agreement made betweene Ormond and Sentleger, the earle his ſeruants (which he kept at that time in his liuerie to the number of fiftie) beſought his lordſhip to take at the Limehouſe his part of a ſupper, which they prouided for him. The noble man with honour accepting their dutifull offer, ſupped at their requeſt, but not to their contentation at the place appointed. For whether it were that one caitife or other did poiſon the meat, or that ſome other falſe meaſures were vſed (the certeintie with the reuenge whereof to God is to be referred) the noble man with thirtie and fiue of his ſeruants preſentlie that night ſickened: one James White the earle his ſteward, with ſirteene of his fellowes died, the remnant of the ſeruants recouered. But their lord, whoſe health was chieflie to be wiſhed, in the floure of his age deceaſed of that ſickeneſſe at Elie houſe in Holborne, much about the eight and twentith of October, and was buried in ſaint Thomas of Acres his church, whoſe death bred ſorrow to his friends, little comfort to his aduerſaries, great loſſe to his countrie, and no ſmall griefe to all good men.

The earle of Ormond deceaſeth.

1546

His deſcription.

This earle was a goodlie and perſonable noble man, full of honour, which was not onelie lodged inwardlie in his mind, but alſo he bare it outwardlie in countenance: as franke & as liberall as his calling required, a deepe and a farre reaching head. In a good quarell rather ſtout than ſtubborne, bearing himſelfe with no leſſe courage when he reſiſted, than with honorable diſcretion where he yelded. A fauourer of peace, no furtherer of warre, as one that procured vnlawfull quietneſſe before vpright troubles, being notwithſtanding of as great wiſedome in the one, as of valour in the other. An earneſt and a zealous vpholder of his countrie, in all attempts rather reſpecting the publike weale than his priuat gaine. Whereby he bound his countrie ſo greatlie vnto him, that Ireland might with good cauſe wiſh, that either he had neuer beene borne, or elſe that he had neuer deceaſed; ſo it were lawfull to crane him to be immortall, that by courſe of nature was framed mortall. And to giue ſufficient proofe of the entire affection he bare his countrie, and of the zealous care he did caſt thereon, he betoke in his death-bed his ſoule to God, his carcaſe to chriſtian buriall, and his hart to his countrie; declaring therby, that where his mind was ſetled in his life, his hart ſhould be there intombed after his death. Which was according to his will accompliſhed. For his hart was conueied to Ireland, and lieth ingraued in the quére of the cathedrall church in Kilkennie, where his anceſtors for the more part are buried. Vpon which kind & louing legacie this epitaph following was deuiſed:

His epitaph.

Cor patriæ fixum viuens, iam redditur illi
Poſt mortem, patriæ quæ peracerba venit.
Non ſine corde valet mortalis viuere quiſquam,
Vix tua gens vita permanet abſque tua.
Quæ licèt infelix extincto corde fruatur,
Attamen optato viuere corde nequit.
Ergò quid hæc faciat? Quem re non poſſit amorem
Cordi vt tam charo reddere corde velit?

The effect of which ſaid epitaph is thus Engliſhed:

The liuing hart where laie ingrauen
the care of countrie deere,
To countrie liueleſſe is reſtord and lies ingrauen here.
None hartleſſe liues, his countrie then alas what ioie is left, Whoſe hope, whoſe hap, whoſe hart he was till death his life bereft.
And though the ſoile here ſhrowds the hart,
which moſt it wiſht t'enioie,
Yet of the change from nobler ſeat,
the cauſe dooth it annoie.
What honour then is due to him,
for him what worthie rite?
But that ech hart with hartieſt loue, his worthieſt hart may quite?

The kindnes of James erle of Ormond to his friends.

This earle was of ſo noble a diſpoſition, as he would ſooner countenance and ſupport his power well willer in his aduerſitie, than he would make or fawne vpon his wealthie friend in proſperitie. Hauing bid at London (not long before his death) the ladie Grete counteſſe of Kildare to dinner, it happened that a ſouldier, ſurnamed Powre, who latelie returned freſh from the emperour his warres, came to take his repaſt with the earle before the meſſenger. When the earle and the counteſſe were ſet, this roiſting Ruffekin wholie then ſtanding on the ſolado hoigh, placed himſelfe right ouer againſt the counteſſe of Kildare, hard at the earle of Ormond his elbow, as though he were haſle fellow well met. The noble man appalled at the impudent ſaucineſſe of the malapert ſoldier (who notwithſtanding might be borne withall, bicauſe an vnbidden gheſt knoweth not where to ſit) beſought him courteouſlie to giue place. The earle, when the other aroſe, taking vpon him the office of a gentleman vſher, placed in Powre his ſeat, his couſine Edward Fitzgirald, now lieutenant of hir maieſties penſioners, who at that time being a yong ſtripling, attended vpon his mother the counteſſe, and ſo in order he ſet euerie gentleman in his degrée, to the number of fifténe or ſirténe: and laſt of all the companie, he licenced Powre, if he would, to ſit at the lower end of the table, where he had ſcantlie elbow rome.

Edward Fitzgirald.

The counteſſe of Kildare, perceiuing the noble man greatlie to ſtomach the ſouldior his preſumptuous boldneſſe, nipt him at the elbow, and whiſpering ſoftlie, beſought his lordſhip not to take the matter ſo hot, bicauſe the gentleman (ſhe ment Powre) knew that the houſe of Kildare was of late attainted, and that hir children were not in this their calamitie in ſuch wiſe to be regarded. No ladie (quoth the earle

earle with a lowd voice, and the tears trilling downe his lères, saie not so, I trust to sée the daie, when my yong cousin Edward, and the remnant of your children (as little reckoning as he maketh of them) shall disdaine the companie of anie such skipiacke. Which prophesie fell out as trulie as he foretold it, onelie sauing that it stood with God his pleasure to call him to his mercie before he could sée that daie after which doubtlesse he longed and looked, I meane the restitution of the house of Kildare.

Sir Anthonie Sentleger returneth lord deputie.

After this noble earle his vntimelie decease, sir Anthonie Sentleger was returned to Ireland lord deputie, who was a wise and a warie gentleman, a valiant seruitor in war, and a good iusticer in peace, properlie learned, a good maker in the English, hauing grauitie so interlaced with pleasantnesse, as with an exceeding good grace he would atteine the one without pouting dumpishnesse, and exercise the other without loathsome lightnesse. There fell in his time a fat benefice, of which he as lord deputie had the presentation. When diuerse made suit to him for the benefice, and offered with dishonestie to bute that which with safetie of conscience he could not sell, he answered merilie, that he was resolued not to commit simonie: yet notwithstanding he had a nag in his stable that was worth fortie shillings, and he that would giue him fortie pounds for the nag, should be preferred to the benefice. Which he rather of pleasure vttered, than of anie vnconscionable meaning purposed to haue done. Sentleger his simonie.

His gouernement had béene of the countrie verie well liked, were it not that in his time he began to assesse the pale with certeine new impositions, not so profitable (as it was thought) to the gouernors, as it was noisome to the subiects. The debating of which I purpose to referre to them, who are discoursers of publike estates, and the reformers of the commonwealth, praieng to God, that he with his grace direct them so faithfullie to accomplish the duties of good magistrates, that they gouerne that pore battered Iland to his diuine honour, to hir maiesties contentation, to the suppressing of rebels, to the vpholding of subiects, and rather to the publike weale of the whole countrie, than to the priuat gaine of a few persons, which oftentimes falleth out in prose to the ruine and vndoing of the séelier.

Thus farre (gentle reader) as mine instructions directed me, and my leasure serued me, haue I continued a parcell of the Irish historie, and haue stretched it to the reigne of Edward the sixt. Wherevpon I am forced to craue at thine hands pardon and tollerance: pardon for anie error I shall be found to haue commited, which vpon friendlie admonition I am readie to reforme: tollerance, for that part of the historie which is not continued, till time I be so furnished and fraught with matter, as that I maie emploie my trauell to serue thy contentation.

FINIS.

THE SVPPLIE OF THIS Irish Chronicle, continued from the death of king Henrie the eight, 1546, vntill this preſent yeare 1586, in the 28 yeare of hir maieſties reigne, ſir Iohn Perot reſiding deputie in Ireland.

By Iohn Vowell aliàs Hooker of the citie of Exceſter, gentleman.

AS from the time of Giraldus Cambrenſis (the beſt deſerued and exact writer of the conqueſt and ſtate of Ireland in his time, few or none haue followed and continued any perfect courſe of that hiſtorie vntill the death of king Henrie the eight, and the beginning of king Edward the ſixt 1546; and therefore no certeine knowledge nor aſſurance can be yelded, nor ſet downe either of the quiet gouernement in time of peace, or of the troubleſome ſtate in time of warres and rebellions; but that which is collected either out of the records, which were verie ſlenderlie & diſorderlie kept, or out of ſome priuat mens collections and pamphlets, remaining in ſome od and obſcure places: euen ſo the like from that time vnto theſe preſents hath happened and is fallen out, euerie gouernour neglecting, and verie few others for want of due obſeruations willing, to commit vnto writing what was doone, and woorthie the memoriall; ſauing the things ſo latelie doone are not altogither out of remembrance, and ſome yet liuing that can remember ſome things doone in their times. And yet that is ſo vncerteine, and euerie man ſo varieth one from the others reports, that no man can well thereupon ſet downe a perfect and ſo exact a courſe as the nature of an hiſtorie requireth, and as it ought to be doone. He therefore that vpon ſuch vncerteinties ſhall intermedle

and

and vndertake the penning, much more the printing of ſuch an vncerteine, confuſed, and intricate diſcourſe, muſt looke and be aſſured to be ſubiect to manie cauils and reproches: which thing diſcouraged me the writer hereof to intermedle at all in this hiſtorie. Neuertheleſſe, this worke requiring a ſupplie, and my ſelfe being earneſtlie required to doo ſomething herein, haue aduentured the matter, and by all the meanes I could, haue ſearched and collected to ſet downe in this ſhort diſcourſe and rhapſodie, what by writings or reports I could learne and find to be true, and worthie the memoriall: which albeit, it be not ſo full as the worke requireth, nor ſo ſufficient as to the ſatiſfaction of the reader, nor yet ſo anſwerable to the nature of an hiſtorie as is neceſſarie and requiſit: yet let the good will of the writer be his diſcharge from reproch, and be an occaſion to the learned to amend the thing thus in a good affection begun, and to reduce it to a more full meaſure in matter and truth: that this hiſtorie may haue his perfection, the reader ſatiſfied, and this writer acquited.

Iohn Hooker, aliâs Vowell.

THE SVPPLIE OF THE Irish Chronicles extended to this present yeare of our Lord 1586, and the 28 of the reigne of queene Elisabeth.

Sir Anthonie Sentleger reuoked.

After the death of king Henrie the eight, sir Anthonie Sentleger knight, was reuoked; who deliuered vp the sword at his departure vnto sir William Brabston knight; and he was lord iustice, vntill such time as sir Edward Bellingham was sent ouer to be deputie. This man was seruant to king Edward the first, and of his priuie chamber: a man verie well learned, graue and wise, and therewith stout & valiant, and did verie worthilie direct his gouernment. In his time there was a mint kept in the castell of Dublin, which being at his commandement, he was the better able to doo good seruice to the king his maiestie, and to the benefit of that realme. In the ciuill gouernment he was carefull to place learned and wise magistrats, vnto whome he had a speciall eie for the doing of their offices; as he had the like care for good and expert capteins, to serue in the martiall affaires. And for the more spéedie seruice to be doone therein at all times needfull, he kept sundrie stables of horsses: one at Leighlin, one at Ler, and some in one place and some in another, as he thought most méet for seruice. And whatsoeuer he had to doo, or what seruice soeuer he meant to take in hand, he was so secret, and kept the same so priuie, as none should haue anie vnderstanding thereof, before the verie instant of the seruice to be doone; and for the most part, whensoeuer he toke anie iournie in hand, his owne men knew not whither, or to what place he would ride, or what he would doo. It happened that vpon some occasion he sent for the earle of Desmond, who refused to come vnto him. Whereupon calling vnto him his companie as he thought good, and without making them acquainted what he minded to doo, toke horsse & rode to Leighlin bridge. The abbeie there (being suppressed) he caused to be inclosed with a wall, and made there a fort. In that house he had a stable of twentie or thirtie horsses, and there he furnished himselfe and all his men with horsses and other furniture, and forthwith rode into Mounster, vnto the house of the earle, being then Christmas; and being vnlooked and vnthought of, he went in to the earle, whome he found sitting by the fire, and there toke him, and carried him with him to Dublin.

1547 Sir Edward Bellingham made lord deputie.

A mint in Dublin.

Sir Edward Bellinghams carefulnesse in gouernement.

Sundrie stables of horsses kept.

His secrecie in his seruice.

Leighlin abbeie inclosed with a wall and made a fort.

The earle of Desmond taken in his house.

This earle was verie rude both in gesture and in apparell, hauing for want of good nurture as much good maners as his kerns and his followers could teach him. The deputie hauing him at Dublin, did so instruct, schole, and informe him, that he made a new man of him, and reduced him to a conformitie in maners, apparell, and behauiours apperteining to his estate and degrée; as also to the knowledge of his dutie and obedience to his souereigne & prince; and made him to knéele vpon his knées sometimes an houre togither, before he knew his dutie. This though it were verie strange to the earle, who hauing not béene trained vp in anie ciuilitie, knew not what apperteined to his dutie and calling: neither yet of what authoritie and maiestie the king his souereigne was; yet when he had well digested and considered of the matter, he thought himselfe most happie that euer he was acquainted with the said deputie, and did for euer after so much honor him, as that continuallie all his life time at euerie dinner and supper, he would praie for the good sir Edward Bellingham: and at all callings he was so obedient and dutifull, as none more in that land.

The earle is rude without nurture.

The earle instructed in ciuilitie.

The earle praieth for sir Edward Bellingham.

This sir Edward lord deputie, when and where soeuer he trauelled, he would be chargeable to no man; but would be at his owne charge. It happened that trauelling the countrie, he was lodged on a night in vicount Baltinglasses house, where all things were verie plentifullie prouided for him: which the vicount thought to haue giuen and bestowed vpon his lordship: but at his departure, he commanded his steward to paie & discharge all things, thanking the vicount for his courtesie, but refused his interteinement; saieng: The king my maister hath placed me here to serue him, and alloweth me therein for my charges and expenses: wherefore, I neither maie nor will be burdenous nor chargable to anie other man. He was verie exquisit & carefull in the gouernement, as few before him the like; aswell in matters martiall, as politike, magnanimous and courragious: in the one, to the appalling of the enimie; and as seuere & vpright in the other, to the benefit of the commonwelth. For neither by flatterie could he be gained, nor by briberie be corrupted;

The lord deputie would be chargeable to none.

The good gouernement of this deputie.

Sir Edward Bellingham loued.

ted; he was feared for his seueritie, and beloued for his integritie; and no gouernor for the most vniuersallie better reported of than was he. But as vertue hath the contrarie to enimie, so he found it true: for he was so enuied at, and that rebellious nation not brooking so worthie a man, who trauelled all the waies he could to reduce them to the knowledge of themselues, and of their duties; and also to reforme that corrupt state of gouernement, that great practises and deuises were made for his reuocation; and matters of great importance informed and inforced against him. Whereupon, before two yeares ended of his gouernement, he was reuoked, and sir Francis Bzian made lord iustice. At his comming into England, great matters were laid vnto his charge: but he so effectuallie did answer the same, that his maiesties doubtfulnesse was resolued; & he not onelie cléered, but also better liked than euer he was before, & should haue béene sent backe againe, had he not alleged his infirmitie; the which was a fistula, and other good reasons, which were accepted for his excuse. Sir Francis Bzian had maried the countesse of Ormond, and by that meanes he was a dweller in that land: where he died & was buried in the citie of Waterford. His time of iusticeship was but short, & no great matters could in so short a time be done by him. After his death, sir William Brabston had the sword deliuered vnto him, and he continued lord iustice, vntill that sir Anthonie Sentleger came ouer, who was now lord deputie the second time: who notwithstanding by his knowledge & experience he had good skill and did well gouerne: yet there remained some coles of the fire in his first gouernement vnquenched; and within a shorter time than thought of, he was reuoked: and sir James Crofts was sent ouer to supplie the place; his euill successes in good attempts did not answer his valour and good deserts.

1548 Sir Francis Bzian lord iustice.

Sir Francis Bzian maried the countes of Ormond, died and was buried at Waterford.

1549 Sir William Brabston lord iustice.

1550 Sir Anthonie Sentleger lord deputie the second time.

1551 Sir James Crofts lord deputie.

And albeit the time of his gouernement were not long, yet it continued vntill the death of king Edward the first, and then he was called home, and sir Thomas Cusacke and sir Gerard Elmer were appointed lords iustices, who iointlie gouerned the estate, vntill quéene Marie sent ouer sir Anthonie Sentleger; who now the third time was lord deputie. This man ruled and gouerned verie iustlie and vprightlie in a good conscience, and being well acquainted in the courses of that land, knew how to mæte with the enimies, and how to staie all magistrates and others in their duties and offices: for which though he deserued well, and ought to be beloued and commended: yet the old practises were renewed, and manie slanderous informations were made and inueighed against him: which is a fatall destinie, and inevitable to euerie good gouernor in that land. For the more paines they take in tillage, the worse is their harvest; and the better be their seruices, the greater is the malice and enuie against them; being not vnlike to a fruitefull apple trée, which the more apples he beareth, the more cudgels be hurled at him. Well, this man is called home, and the lord Thomas Fitzwaters was made lord deputie. At sir Anthonies comming ouer, great matters were laid to his charge, and manie heauie aduersaries he had, which verie eagerlie pursued the same against him: wherein he so answered, that he was not onelie acquited; but also gained his discharge for euer to passe ouer anie more into so vnthankefull a land.

1552 Sir Anthonie Sentleger lord deputie the third time.

A fatall destinie to euerie good gouernor to be slandered.

1555 The lord Fitzwaters made lord deputie.

The lord Fitzwaters being lord deputie, after a short time of his being there, was sent for into England. And in in his absence, sir Henrie Sidnete then treasuror at warres, and doctor Cozwen, were for a time ioint lords iustices: but verie shortlie after, a commission was sent to sir Henrie Sidneie to be sole lord iustice, and so continued alone vntill the lord Fitzwaters, now earle of Sussex, came againe and resumed his former office of deputie. After that he was come ouer, he had somewhat to do with the Oneile. For the whole north part of Ireland began to be vnquieted, and for preuenting of sundrie inconueniences, which might grow by the Scotish Ilanders in aiding the said Oneile, the lord deputie made a iourneie and voiage into the said Iles, to ioine them into his friendship. In his absence, he constituted sir Henrie Sidneie lord iustice; but after that he had done his businesse, he returned againe to Dublin, where he remained and continued in his office vntill the death of quéene Marie, and then he passed ouer into England, and left sir Henrie Sidneie to be lord iustice now the fourth time. And after some time spent there, and quéene Elisabeth now setled in the imperiall crowne of England, she sent ouer the said earle as lieutenant of Ireland to performe those seruices, which before he had taken in hand: who did verie great good seruice against the Irishrie, and by meanes he tooke the Oneile, and kept him prisoner in the castell of Dublin: but yet before he could or did bring the same to perfection, he was reuoked into England, and left the land in a verie broken state; which was committed to sir Nicholas Arnold, & he was made lord iustice. But his gouernement being not well liked, choise was made by hir maiestie and the councell of sir Henrie Sidneie, now knight of the honorable order of the garter, to supplie that place, who then was lord president of Wales.

The Oneile and all the north be vnquiet.

1556 Sir Henrie Sidneie lord iustice the fourth time.

1557 The earle of Sussex lord lieutenant.

The Oneile taken and kept in prison.

1564 Sir Nicholas Arnold lord iustice.

1565 Sir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie.

This man had béene before a long seruitour in that realme, hauing for sundrie yeares béene treasuror at warres, which is the second office vnder the lord deputie in that land; as also had béene lord iustice solie and iointlie foure times. Great was his knowledge, wisedome, and experience both of that land, and of the nature, manners, and disposition of the people: wherein the more he excelled anie others in those daies, the more apt and fit was he to haue the gouernement of them. He was therefore called from out of Wales, where he then resided in his gouernement vnto the court: and there after conference had with hir highnesse, and with the councell; he was appointed to be lord deputie of Ireland, being the seuenth yeare of hir maiesties reigne, in the yeare of our Lord 1565. And then he receiued of hir maiestie a booke of instructions signed with hir owne hand, dated the fift of October 1565, the seuenth yeare of hir reigne aforesaid, concerning the principall articles for his gouernement & direction, which chiefli consisted in these points.

Sir Henrie Sidneie lord president of Wales.

A booke of articles deliuered to sir Henrie Sidneie for his gouernement.

First, that there should be a bodie of a councell established, to assist him being lord deputie, in the gouernement of the same realme in times of peace and of warre; and whose names were then particularlie set downe: and order giuen, that euerie of them should before their admission be sworne by the said lord deputie, according to the accustomed manner: with an exhortation, that for somuch as hir maiestie had reposed a speciall trust and confidence in their wisedomes, aduises, good counsels, and seruices: he the lord deputie should vse their aduises, assistance, and counsels in all matters of treatie and consultation, concerning the state of that realme.

A councell to be established.

Euerie councellor to be sworne.

And they likewise, considering the place and authoritie whereunto hir maiestie had called the said sir Henrie Sidneie, to hold hir place in that realme: they should yéeld that obedience and reuerence vnto him, as to such a principall officer doth apperteine. And then they both togither, to haue a speciall care and regard to the gouernement, which was comprised

1555 Sir Henrie Sidneie and Cozwen lords iustices.

sed in foure articles that dw ozderlie hereafter follow.

The said foure articles were these.

Gods lawes to be kept, and christian religion to be vsed.

1 FIrst, that they should faithfullie and earnestlie regard the due and reuerend obseruation of all Gods lawes and ordinances, made and established for the maintenance of the true christian faith and religion among hir people; and that all meanes should be vsed, aswell by doctrine and by teaching, as by good examples, that deuotion and godlinesse might increase, and contempt of religion might be restreined, punished, and suppressed. That learning in the scriptures might be mainteined and increased among the cleargie, and that for the releefe of the ecclesiasticall state, no alienations nor wasts of the lands perteining to anie church or college, should be alienated: neither anie impropriations of benefices be put in vre: besides sundrie other articles incident to this effect.

Learning of the scriptures to be mainteined.

The church lands not to be alienated.

The lawes to be dulie administred.

2 The second was, that the administration of law and iustice should dulie and vprightlie be executed, without respect of persons: that inquirie be made what notable faults are in anie of the iudges, or other ministers of the law: that vnfit persons maie be remoued from their places, and some sufficient persons of English birth be chosen to supplie the same. That shiriffes be appointed and renewed in euerie countie, and to execute their offices vprightlie, according to the lawes of England.

Shiriffes to be apointed in euerie shire.

3 The third, that the garrisons and men of warre be well ordered to the benefit of the realme, and repressing of disordered subiects and rebels: that they dw liue according to the orders appointed, without oppression of the good and true subiects. That there shall be once within a moneth at the least a muster made either by the lord deputie, or by such commissioners as he shall appoint meete and indifferent for that purpose; who shall make inquirie of the number of the souldiors vnder euerie captaine; for the sufficiencie of their persons, their horsses, armors, and weapons, and other their necessaries: and how they were paied of their wages, and whether they were Englishmen or not.

The garisons to be looked vnto.

A muster to be kept euerie moneth.

4 The fourth article was, whether there had beene had a due care & regard to the preseruation of the reuenues of the crowne, & for the recouerie of that which is withdrawne. And whether euerie of the officers apointed for the receiuing of anie part of the said reuenues, as namelie the receiuers of rents, shiriffes, escheators, collectors of the subsidies, customors, clerks of the crowne, of the hamper, and of the first fruits, and the farmers of customes and such others, did yearelie make and answer their accounts; and besides sundrie other articles incident to euerie of these principals.

A due regard to be had of hir maiesties reuenues.

That euerie officer of receipts dw yearelie make his account.

After that he had receiued this booke, and his commission, he prepared himselfe with all the expedition he could, to follow the great charge committed vnto him: which being done, he repaired to hir maiestie and toke his leaue: and to his farewell, she gaue him most comfortable speeches and good counsels, promising hir fauor and countenance to all his well dowings, and a consideration for the same when as time should serue. The like leaue he toke also of the lords of the councell, who in like order gaue him the like farewell: and these things done, he departed towards the sea side, where after he had tarried a long time for a good wind and passage, he toke ship, and arriued in Ireland the thirteenth of Ianuarie, about fiue miles from Dublin, and from thense he trauelled to Dublin; where he was most honorablie receiued by sir Nicholas Arnold then lord iustice, and the whole councell; togither with the maior and his brethren of that citie. And the people in great troops came and saluted him, clapping and shooting with all the ioie that they could deuise.

Sir Henrie Sidneie taketh his leaue of the queene and councell.

Sir Henrie Sidneie toke his iourneie towards Ireland.

Iustice receiued into Dublin.

The next sundaie then next following, being the seuenth daie of his arriuall, and the twentith of the moneth, he accompanied with the lord iustice and councell, repaired to the high church in the citie named Christes church; where after that the diuine seruice was done, he toke his oth, receiued the sword, and assumed vpon him the gouernement: and wherwith he made a most pithie, wise, and eloquent oration, which consisted vpon these speciall points. The first, what a pretious thing is good gouernement, and how all realmes, commonwealths, cities, and countries dw flourish and prosper, where the same is orderlie, in equitie, iustice, and wisedome, directed & gouerned. Secondlie, what a continuall care the quæenes highnesse hath had, and yet hath, not onelie for the good guiding & ruling of the realme of England, but also of Ireland; which she so earnestlie desireth, and wisheth to be preserued, as well in peace as in warre: that she hath made great choise from time to time of the most graue, wise, and expert councellors for the one; and the most valiant, skilfull, and expert men of armes for the other: that both in peace and warres, the publike state of the commonwealth, and euerie particular member therein might be conserued, defended, and kept in safetie vnder hir gouernement. And for the performance thereof, hir maiestie ouer and besides the reuenues of the crowne of Ireland, did yearelie far aboue anie of hir progenitors, expend of hir owne cofers out of England, great masses of monie, amounting to manie thousand pounds. All which hir excessiue expenses and continuall cares she made the lesse account of; so that hir realme and subiects of Ireland might be preserued, defended, and gouerned.

The benefit of good gouernment.

The quéenes maiesties continuall care for Ireland.

The queens maiestie expendeth yearelie out of hir owne cofers for Ireland sundrie thousands of pounds.

Lastlie, notwithstanding hir maiestie might haue made better choise of manie others, who were better able to hold hir place in this realme, both for honor, wisedome, and experience: yet hir pleasure was now to call this heauie charge and burden vpon him. Which he was the more vnwilling to take vpon him, because the greater the charge was, the more vnable & weake he was to sustaine the same. Neuertheless, being in good hope, and well promised of hir highnesse fauor and countenance in his well dowings, and hauing his confidence in them hir highnesse councellors associated vnto him, to ioine, aid, and assist him in this gouernement: he was and is the more readie to take the sword in hand; in hope that this his gouernement shall be to the glorie of God, the honor of hir maiestie, the benefit of the commonwelth, and the preseruation of the whole realme and people of the same. And so making his earnest request to the said lords present, for their conioining with him, and the aiding and assisting of him in this hir maiesties seruice, he made an end of his speeches.

The said councellors, hauing well considered the great value and weight of this his graue and wise oration, did most humblie thanke his lordship for the same, and promised in all dutifulnesse, faith, and obedience to performe and attend whatsoeuer to them in anie wise should appertaine. These things done, they all conducted the said lord deputie in all honorable manner vnto the castell of Dublin: the common people in euerie street and corner meeting him, and with great acclamations and ioie did congratulat vnto his lordship his comming among them in that office. Immediatlie after the performance of all the solemnities, perteining to these actions, he called and assembled all those persons which hir highnesse had appointed, admitted, and allowed to be of hir maiesties priuie councell for that realme, and did sweare them according to the accustomed manner. Then from time to time they assembled and met, consulting and deliberating what waie and order were best to be taken for reparing of that broken commonweale and ruinous state, being as it were a man altogither infected with sores and biles, and in whose bodie from the crowne of the head to the sole of the foot there is no health. And surelie if the state of that land was euer miserable and in perill to be ouerthrowne: it was neuer more like than at these presents; for as for the English pale, it was ouerwhelmed with infinite numbers of caterpillers, who dailie by spoiles and robberies haue deuoured and wasted the same: whereby the people vniuersallie were so poore, and the commons in such extreame penurie, that they had not horsses, armor nor weapons to defend them, nor apparell, vittels, nor anie other necessaries to releeue them; the soldiors so beggerlie that they were most intolerable to the people, and so rooted in insolencie, lowsenesse and idleneesse, that vnlesse the remedie were the more spœdie, they would bee past correction: and so much the worsse, bicause manie of them were alied in mariage, and companies of the Irish: who the more they were affected to them, their truth and seruice more doubtfull to hir maiestie. The prouince of Leinster and they altogither most miserable, the Tools, Obrines, Kinshelaghes, Odsiles, Omorroughs, Carenaughs, the Moores, and the residue in their accustomable manners wholie bent to spoiles and all mischiefs, no place of anie safetie remaining for the good subiect; especiallie in the countie of Kilkennie, which being sometimes a fertile rich soile, and well manured and inhabited, became of all others most desart and beggerlie, verie few being left to inhabit the same.

The congratulation of the people.

The broken state of Ireland.

The English pale wasted and spoiled.

The soldiors beggerlie and out of order.

The miserable state of Leinster.

The fertile soile of the countie of Kilkennie made waste.

Mounster, the inhabitants there likewise for the most part being followers to the earle of Desmond, and following his wars against the erle of Ormond, made that prouince, and especiallie the counties of Tipperarie and Kirrie, being wealthie and rich, to become bare and beggerlie; and verie few of whom hir maiestie was or could be assured. Notwithstanding experience had taught them, and they assured, that no waie was for their recouerie and safetie so good and assured, as to humble themselues, and to become hir highnesse loiall and obedient subiects: yet as swine delighting in their dirt and puddles, contented themselues rather with a beggerlie life to be miserable, than in dutifull obedience to be at peace and assured. The prouinces also of Thomond altogither almost wasted by the warres betweene the earle there and sir Donell Obrien. Ormond likewise by reason of dissention betweene the earles of Desmond and Ormond, and by the dailie inuasions and preies of Piers Grace was almost wasted and vnhabited.

Mounster by ciuill war destroied.

Thomond all wasted by ciuill warres.

Connagh, one of the goodliest, pleasantest, and most fertile soiles of that land, & in times past verie rich and wealthie, and well inhabited, is wasted with the wars betweene the erle of Clanrichard and Mac William Enter: the Irish countries all wasted and impouerished, partlie by reason of their dissimulations, societies, and conferences with the rebelles, and partlie by the particular discords among themselues. Finallie, all the gentlemen throughout, wont in times past to be keepers of hospitalitie, were by the dailie preies made vpon them and their tenants so impouerished & distressed, that they were not able to mainteine and releeue themselues nor their families. The prouince of Vlster for wealth and plentie was well stored, not onlie of themselues, but by reason that it was the receptacle and place of receipt of all the preies and spoiles from out of the other prouinces: but as for loialtie, dutifulnesse, and obedience to hir maiestie, they were most disloiall, rebellious, and disordered. For after that Shane Odonelle by blood and murther had gotten the maistertie, he alone then ruled the rost, who in pride exceeded all the men vpon the earth, abiding no superior, nor allowing anie equall. And heere it were not amisse, but verie expedient to set downe the first origin and cause whie the said Shane did first breake out from his due obedience, and did shake off the gouernement of hir maiestie, which (as farre as the writer hereof hath gathered and collected) is as here followeth.

The Connagh deuoured by ciuill warres.

The gentlemen all impouerished.

Vlster wealthie and rich.

Shane Donelle.

The cause of Shane Odonelles rebellion.

Con Oneile, the first earle of Tiron, had two sonnes, Matthew and this Shane or John. And king Henrie the eight hauing good liking of this Con Oneile, and to reteine and keepe him a good subiect, he being a mightie man, and of great power in his countrie, he made and created him earle of Tiron, and his eldest son Matthew he made baron of Dunganon, and the remainder of the said earledome to the said Matthew, and to the heirs male of his bodie. This Shane being the second brother, and of an aspiring mind, enuied his elder brother, and in no wise could he brooke him, but from time to time seeketh occasions to quarell and fall out with him, and in the end most traitorouslie and vnnaturallie murthered him: their father yet liuing, who did not so much lament and bewaile the same, but began much more to distrust of his owne safetie. Neuertheless, it is not knowen that the said Shane did offer him anie violence, but when he was dead, although he had no right to succeed into the earledome, by reason that Matthew his elder brother had left sons behind him, who by the letters patents and course of the common law were to succeed the grandfather: yet Shane vsurped the name of Oneile, and entred into his fathers inheritance according to the Irish manner, among whome the custome is, that the eldest in years of the name of anie house or familie doth succeed his ancestor, vnlesse at the time of his death he had a son of the full age of one and twentie yeers. And thus hauing perforce entred into his fathers inheritance, he scorneth at the English gouernement, and after the Irish manner proclameth himselfe Oneile, and the capteine of his countrie, refuseth likewise all obedience to hir maiestie, and breaketh out into open rebellion.

Con Oneile made earle of Tiron.

Shane vsurpeth the name of Oneile.

The Irish custome in succession.

Shane Oneile breaketh into rebellion.

Sir Henrie Sidnete then lord iustice, in the absence of the erle of Sussex, being aduertised of these stirs, taketh aduise of the councell what was best to be done. And then it was agreed, that the said lord iustice should take his iorneie towards Dundalke, for the fortifieng of the English pale, and should send a messenger to Shane Oneile, who then laie at a lordship of his about sir miles from Dundalke, and to will him come to Dundalke to his lordship: which was done. But Shane returned his answer, praieng pardon, and also most humblie requested his lordship that it would please him to christen a son of his, & be his gossip, & then he would come to his lordship to do all things in seruice for hir maiestie, as his lordship should command and appoint. This answere at the first was not thought good, nor yet honorable to the lord iustice so to do, vntill the said Shane had first come and submitted himselfe. But when it was considered what great inconueniences might insue, if his request were denied; it was agreed that the said lord iustice should condescend vnto his request. And accordinglie vpon the last of Januarie, one thousand fiue hundred fiftie and eight, he went vnto the said,

Shane Oneile praieth sir Henrie Sidnete to be his gossip.

1558

Shanes

Shane excuseth himselfe whie hee came not to the lord iustice.

Matthew was Kellaies sonne.

The obiectiõs of Shane Oneil against the title of Matthew to be Oneile.

The wicked custome of the Irishrie.

Matthew seeketh the seigniorie of Oneile.

Shanes house, and there his lordship and Jaques Wingfield were godfathers, and hauing performed the baptising of the child, they both had conference of the matter: where the said Shane, to excuse his doings, did allege for his defense sundrie articles as followeth.

First, he said that Matthew baron of Dungannon was the sonne of one Kellaie of Dundalke, a smith by occupation, begotten and borne during the spousals of the said Kellaie, and one Alson his wife, and that the said Matthew was alwaies taken and reputed to be the sonne of the said Kellaie, vntill he was of the age of sixtéene yeares or thereabouts: at which time Con Oneile his father, vpon the saieng of the said Alson, that he was the father of the said Matthew, did accept and take the said Matthew to be his sonne, & gaue him the name of Fardarough. And here vnderstand you the wickednesse of this countrie; which is, that if anie woman do mislike hir husband, and will depart from him, he shall haue all such children as were borne of hir bodie during their abode togither, except such as she shall name to be begotten by anie other man: which man so named shall by their custome haue the said child: and so it should seeme to be meant of this point. Also the said Matthew did vpon this the affirmation of his mother séeke to vsurpe the name of a seigniorie of the Oneiles, and the dominions apertéining to that seigniorie and surname. Also that there be aboue a hundred of that name, which will not in anie wise yéeld to this the clame of Matthew, although he for his owne part would be contented therewith. Also he saith that the letters patents (if anie such be) that should intitle the sonne of the said baron to the said lands are vtterlie void, because that Con Oneile father to the said Shane had no other right nor interest to that countrie, but during his owne life: and therefore without the consent of the lords and inhabitants of that countrie, could make no surrender nor conueiance, whereby he might be inabled to take and haue the said lands by force of letters patents.

Also he saith, that by the lawes in the English pale of Ireland, no letters patents, made to anie person, be of anie force or value, vntill that an inquisition be taken of the lands so giuen before that the letters patents do passe: which in this case neither was, nor could be done, sith the countrie of Tiron is no shire ground. Also if the said lands should according to the quéens lawes descend to the right heire, then in right it ought to descend to him, as next heire being multerlie borne; and the other not so borne. Also he saith, that vpon the death of his father lord of the countrie, the whole countrie according to the custome of the countrie did assemble themselues together, and by a common consent did elect and chose (without anie contradiction) him the said Shane to be Oneile, as the most worthie and ablest of that countrie. Which election by the custome of the countrie hath béene alwaies vsed without anie confirmation, asked of the kings and quénes of England. Also he saith that as Oneile he claimeth such authorities, iurisdictions, and duties vpon his men & countrie, as are due time out of mind to his predecessors, and which duties for the most part are recorded, and remaine in writing. When the lord iustice had at full heard these articles, and considered well of them togither with the councell, made answer vnto Shane that the matter was of great weight and importance, & which neither he nor the councell cold determine of themselues, before hir maiestie were made priuie and acquainted therewith; and therefore in the meane time willed and required him to be quiet, and to shew himselfe a dutifull subiect vnto hir maiestie, nothing doubting but that he should haue and receiue at hir hands, what should be found méet, right, and iust.

Shane Oneile promiseth to be quiet.

And so hauing vsed manie good and frendlie spéeches and exhortations vnto him, the said Shane promised to vse and behaue himselfe well and honestlie, & as to his dutie should apperteine: they departed in verie frendlie manner. And thus in such wisedome and politike manner the lord iustice handled the matter, that by temporising and gaining of time all matters were pacified, and so continued vntill the comming ouer of the earle of Sussex lord deputie: who then of a new toke the matter in hand, and he did so stretchlie and seuerelie follow the same, that he ouermatched Shane Oneile. But it so grieued the said Shane, that notwithstanding he dissembled and gaue a good countenance, & promised well, yet in the end being once at libertie, he performed nothing: but as the woolfe which often casteth his haires but neuer changeth his conditions, was one and the same man or rather worse, and thenceforth tyrannized and vsed most crueltie, and of all others most disloiall and disobedient; to the deputie would he not come, nor would he in anie wise confer with him, but at his owne pleasure.

Shane Oneil is become a tyrant and a rebell.

The quénes maiestie in some termes he would honor, but in déeds he denied all obedience, subtill and craftie he was especiallie in the morning: but in the residue of the date verie vncerteine and vnstable, and much giuen to excessiue gulping and surfetting. And albeit he had most commonlie two hundred tunnes of wines in his cellar at Dundrun, and had his full fill therof, yet was he neuer satisfied, till he had swallowed vp maruellous great quantities of Aske bagh or Aqua vite of that countrie: wherof so vnmeasurablie he would drinke and bouse, that for the quenching of the heat of the bodie, which by that meanes was most extremelie inflamed and distempered, he was eftsoones conueied (as the common report was) into a déepe pit, and standing vpright in the same, the earth was cast round about him vp to the hard chin, and there he did remaine vntill such time as his bodie was recouered to some temperature: by which meanes though he came after in some better plight for the time, yet his manners and conditions dailie worse. And in the end his pride ioined with wealth, drunkennesse, and insolencie, he began to be a tyrant, and to tyrannize ouer the whole countrie; greatlie it was feared that his intent was to haue made a conquest ouer the whole land. He pretended to be king of Vlster, euen as he said his ancestors were, and affecting the maner of the great Turke, was continuallie garded with six hundred armed men, as it were his Ianisaries about him, and had in readinesse to bring into the fields a thousand horsemen, and foure thousand footmen. He furnished all the pesants and husbandmen of his countrie with armour and weapons, and trained them vp in the knowledge of the wars: and as a lion hath in awe the beasts of the field, so had he all the people to his becke and commandement, being feared and not beloued.

Shane Oneil a drunkard and a surfetter.

Shane Oneil buried in the ground after his drunkennesse.

Shane Oneils force.

The pesants in Vlster trained vp in warre.

Diuerse meanes and waies were practised and vsed by the lord deputie and councell for the pacifieng and recouerie of him, and commissioners from time to time sent vnto him; for and about the same, who sometimes would be verie flexible, but forthwith as backwards and vntoward. Of all the residue of Ireland there was the lesse doubt to recouer them, by reason that they by their owne ciuill wars had consumed and spoiled the one and the other: but of this man, small or no hope at all, vnlesse he might be chastised, and with force be reduced to conformities. Which in the end it pleased the Lord God to take the matter in hand, and to performe the same by taking of him awaie. And bicause in these troublesome times, it were méet aduertisements should go to and from hir maiestie and councell to the lord deputie, & so likewise from his lordship to them, order was taken for the more spédie conueiance of letters reciprocke, there should be set posts appointed betwéene London and Ireland. This was then the present state of all Ireland, altogethers deuoured with robberies, murders, riots, treasons, ciuill and intestine warres, and few or none assured and faithfull to hir highnesse out of the English pale, and out of cities and townes: and yet the one being gentlemen and liuing by their lands, by continuall spoiles and robberies were decaied; the other by the losse of their traffike being merchants impouerished, and brought to such extremities, as not able to relieue and mainteine themselues.

Posts set betwéene Ireland & London.

The miserable state of Ireland.

And among all other the most intollerable miseries vniuersallie reigning, this one exceeded all the rest, that there was scarse a God knowen; and if knowen, not all honored in the land, for the churches for the most part were all destroied & vncouered, the clergie scattered, the people vntaught, and as shéepe without their pastour wandering without knowledge and instruction. Then where neither God is knowen, the prince obeied, no lawes current, no gouernement accepted, and all things infolded in most extreme miserie; how lamentable and dolefull is that state and kingdome? Wherfore sir Henrie Sidneie now lord deputie, & the councell pondering this distressed state, and the great burden which laie them vpon to helpe and redresse the same, dailie assembled themselues; & deuised the best waie what might be to be taken herein. Wherin his lordships cause so much was the weaker, as that such as were chiefest of the councell, then ioined to assist him in councell and seruice, were for the most part spent and decaied men; and the lord deputie himselfe driuen to deuise, to inuent, to dispose, and in the end to execute all himselfe. Well, neuertheless it was concluded and agréed, that the English pale should be fortified and defended from the inuasion of the Oneile and all his complices; and that the deuises set downe for the state and recouerie of the rest of the land should be followed from time to time, as matter, time, and opportunitie would serue thereunto.

No God nor religion in Ireland.

At this present time the earles of Ormond and Desmond were in England, and the quarrels and controuersies growen betwéene them were dailie examined before the lords of the councell, and their allegations produced in writing by the one against the other. And bicause their assertions were so contrarious and vncertein in denieng and affirming, as no proceeding could be had for a finall end and order, it was thought good and necessarie that their complaints and answers should be examined in the realme of Ireland, where their doings were best knowen, and where their misorders were committed. And then by the aduise of the councell both the said earles submitted themselues to the quénes maiesties order & determination: and for performance thereof, they both by waie of recognisance in the chancerie were bound ech of them in twentie thousand pounds. And then a commission vnder hir highnesse broad seale of England was sent to the lord deputie for taking of the forsaid examinations. But in the meane time whilest these things were in doing in England, sir John of Desmond, in verie outragious and disordered manner, fired & spoiled the tenements of the earle of Ormond, which things were verie shortlie after apeased. In these troublesome daies Mac Artimore an ancient gentleman of the Irish race, and principall man of his sept in Mounster, hauing verie great possessions, and laie still in peace and did nothing at all, neither toke he partie with one whom he liked not, neither holpe he the other whom he feared not, but to the outward appéerance misliked both their doings.

The earles of Ormond and Desmond submit themselues to the quéens order.

Sir John of Desmond spoileth the earle of Ormonds lands.

This man made his humble suite to hir maiestie, that he might surrender all his lands, possessions and territories vnto hir maiesties highnesse, and to recognise his dutie and allegiance to hir, and so to resume and haue a new estate therof from hir againe, according to the orders and laws of England. Which hir maiestie did accept, and forthwith made him a new estate of inheritance: and for the better his state in all obedience and dutie to hir crowne, did for the worthinesse of his bloud & stocke, & for the greatnesse of his gouernement make him a baron of the parlement in that relme; & for his further aduancement created him an earle vnder hir letters patents by the name of the earle of Clancare. These newes being reported to Shane Oneile, he scoffed at it, nothing liking the choise of hir bignesse in aduansing such a one to that honour, and enuied and maligned him that he was so honored. And therefore not long after, when the commissioners were sent to intreat with him vpon sundrie points, they found him most arrogant & out of all good order, braieng out spéeches not méet nor séemelie. For (saith he) you haue made a wise earle of Mac Artimore, I kéepe as good a man as is he. And albeit I confesse the quéene is my souereigne ladie, yet I neuer made peace with hir, but at hir séeking. And where he had required to haue his parlement robes sent vnto him as earle of Tiron, which title he claimed and required (which if it were denied him, then he required a triall to be made in parlement) yet now he cared not for so meane an honour as to be an earle, except he might be better and higher than an erle. For I am (saith he) in bloud and power better than the best, and I will giue place to none of them; for mine ancestors were kings of Vlster. And as Vlster was theirs, so now Vlster is mine and shall be mine: with the sword I wan it, and with the sword I will kéepe it. Which his words fell out true, though long he inioied not the same: and forthwith he fell into most horrible tyrannies and cruelties, wherby he became execrable and hatefull vnto all his people and countrie who were wearie of him.

Mac Artimore surrendereth all his lands to the quéene & taketh it of hir.

Mac Artimore made earle of Clancare.

Shane Oneile scoffeth at the earle of Clancare.

The proud taunts of Shane Oneile.

Shane Oneile for his pride and tyrannie becometh hatefull before God & man.

Now hir maiestie, being gréeued and annoied with his treasons and rebellions of long time, was fullie minded either to haue him clearelie roted out, or chastised: but therein she was staied, being borne in hand that the best waie to bring him to reformation, was to yéeld to him in sundrie things of him desired. But now she séeing him to haue manifested himselfe a notorious traitor, and past all grace; she gaue commandement to the lord deputie to imploie his whole care, consideration, and wisedome, how such a cankred and dangerous rebell might be vtterlie extirped. And séeing the matter also to haue so manie accidents and circumstances belonging vnto it, as which by letters to and fro could not bée well concluded: therefore she sent ouer sir Francis Knolles vicechamberleine, to conferre with the lord deputie, who arriued at Dublin the seuenth of Maie 1566, aswell concerning these matters of warre, as the whole state and gouernment of this realme. Who when he was arriued, and hauing at large conferred with him about the same, the time betwéene them was concluded and appointed, that the seruice should be in the winter; & accordinglie things necessarie, as well monie, men, munitions, and vittels were sent ouer, and Edward Randolph coronell of the footmen, and sundrie other capteins arriued with their souldiers from out of England, and all things were disposed both for the garrison and the campe, as it was conuenient conuenient to be.

Sir Francis Knolles sent into Ireland. 1566

Likewise the archtraitor knowing what preparation was made against him, he doth the like also on his part against hir maiestie; and at a lordship or manour of his, about six miles out of Dundalke, he mustreth all his whole armie, which was of foure thousand footmen, and seuen hundred horssemen. And glorieng much in himselfe of such his great force and puissance, which he thought to suffice to haue conquered all Ireland withall, and that no man durst to aduenture vpon him: he marcheth vnto the towne of Dundalke, where he incampeth himselfe, & besegeth the same. He was no more busie to giue sundrie attempts of inuasion, and to enter the towne, but the souldiers within were as valiant to resist and defend: which in the end turned to his reproch, and hée had the repulse, being with shame driuen to raise his siege, and to depart with the losse.

Shane Oneil besiegeth Dundalke, & is repelled.

The like successe he had at Whites castell, and when he made his rode and inuasion into the English pale, when his great multitude stood him not in so much stead, as a farre smaller companie of the English souldiers deserued commendation: which perforce and maugre of his téeth compelled him to retire with shame, and to returne with losse. About this time in the moneth of Julie 1565, and the first yeare of the deputation of sir Henrie Sidnete, Edward Randolph, a verie expert and a valiant souldier, was sent ouer out of England, and arriued at the Dirrie with seuen hundred men vnder his regiment, and he himselfe by the councell in England appointed to be the coronell. This man as sone as he was landed, intrenched himselfe at the Dirrie, where he remained in garrison without doing of anie thing, vntill the comming of the lord deputie from Dublin, with the residue of hir maiesties forces, appointed to be ioined with the said coronell, for the better seruice against the arrogant traitour Shane Oneile.

1565

Coronell Randolph arriueth at the Dirrie where he intrencheth himselfe.

And after that the said lord deputie was come, and had staid there about six daies, and had set all things in such good order as that seruice required; he returned backe to Dublin through Odonels countrie, and so thorough Connagh, leauing the coronell accompanied with one band of fiftie horssemen vnder the leading of capteine George Herute the elder, and with seuen companies or hundreds of footmen vnder the charges of capteine Robert Cornewall, and capteine John Ward, and others; all well furnished, both with munitions, vittels, and all other necessaries meet and requisit. Shane Oneile who knew well of the garrisons, of their forces & numbers, and he not minding that they should there rest in peace, but standing now vpon his honor and reputation, incamped himselfe about two miles from the garrison, hauing then in his armie two thousand fiue hundred footmen, & three hundred horsmen. And frō daie to daie he would continuallie with his horssemen houer and range the fields, and shew himselfe readie to trie the matter if the Englishmen durst to aduenture the same

The lord deputie cōmeth to the Dirrie and setteth all things in order for the seruice.

Oneil incampeth neere the Dirrie and offereth skirmish.

The coronell disliking these daillie offers, and thinking it to be a verie great dishonour vnto him, and all the English nation, which were come ouer to serue against him, and now would do nothing, but were daillie bearded by the enimie: notwithstanding that his forces when they were at the best, were but small in respect of the enimie; and by reason of the sicknesse in the campe, that his small companie was much weakened and vnable to serue: yet he was determined with a full resolution to take the offer of the enimie, and either he would lose his life, or remoue him from his so neere a seat. Whereupon he drew out of his companie to the number of three hundred men, whome he thought most meet to serue, and being accompanied with fiftie horssemen vnder capteine George Herute, marched toward Oneils campe, who pretending a great ioy to see the forwardnesse of the Englishmen, he with all his forces issued out, and with speed prepared to incounter with them; persuading himselfe that he should that daie be maister of the field, and haue a conquest to his hearts desire.

The coronell preparеth to fight with Oneile.

The coronell made choise of the ground to fight in, and prepared himselfe to stand and abide their charge. Oneile in great furie, and with a great multitude charged the coronels footmen, and his maine battell; but he was so receiued with the English shot and so galled, that he made some staie. Whereupon capteine Herute taking his opportunitie, most valiantlie with his small band of horssemen brake in to the battell of Oneile. Likewise coronell Randolph with his few horssemen gaue the charge vpon the left wing of them. The one of them being well followed and accompanied with his band, did the seruice which he desired: but the coronell verie valiantlie making waie through the enimies, and no man following him, was in fighting wounded to death, and whereof immediatlie he died. The rebels being astonied and amazed at the valour of the Englishmen, fled and turned their backs, whome the souldiers followed, and had the slaughter of them so long as their weapons lasted in this conflict. The rebels were slaine that daie in this chase aboue foure hundred persons, besides the like number of such as were hurt and wounded. The coronell onelie was slaine, but capteine Herute and diuerse of the horssemen were verie sore hurt and wounded.

The valiant seruice of capteine George Herute.

The coronell Randolph is slaine.

Oneile and his companie flie, and are pursued, killed & hurt about 800.

After the death of this valiant coronell, whose funerall the lord deputie did afterwards celebrate with great honour at Dublin, Edward Sentlow was made coronell: vnder whose gouernement the garrison liued verie quietlie. For this last ouerthrow so quailed the spirits and courages of Oneile and his companie, that they had no desire of anie further incountering with the Englishmen. And thus all the winter following little was done: and being determined in the spring to aduenture some peece of seruice, but the lord otherwise appointed it. For about the foure and twentith of Aprill, by a misfortune neuer yet knowne by what means, the fort and towne of the Dirrie was all burned, and the storehouses where the munitions and vittels laie were blowne vp with the gunpowder, and twentie men killed with the same: and so manie of the souldiers as laie sicke there were burned in their beds. Whereupon the coronell calling all his capteins togither, and considering the distresse which they now were in, by the losse of their vittels and munitions, and not knowing where to be furnished otherwise, they all concluded and determined to abandon that place, and to imbarke themselues for Dublin, which immediatlie they all did, sauing capteine George Herute: for he rather did chose to hazard his life to returne by land, than to impouerish his souldiers by killing their horsses (which perforce they must néeds haue done) for want of shipping. And therefore euen almost against all hope he returned towards Dublin through the enimies countrie, who followed and chased him foure daies togither without intermission, both with horssemen and footmen: but at length he recouered Dublin, not without great wonder and admiration. The lord deputie he wanted not his espials, both about Oneile, and in all places throughout Ulster: and thereby knew the forces, bent, and determinations of euerie of them, whereby he knew how to meet with them euerie waie for the best seruice of hir maiestie. And yet considering the great impor-

The lord deputie keepeth the coronell Randolphs funerals.

The Dirrie and all the vittels and munitions are burned.

The coronell abandoneth Dirrie, and returneth to Dublin by seas.

Capteine George Herute returneth by land in great danger.

The lord deputie maketh a iournie into Vlster.

importance of the seruice, he could not be satisfied herein, but that he would make a iournie into Vlster himselfe. And being accompanied with the earle of Kildare, and certeine of the councell, and with such capteins and souldiers as he thought good: he aduanced & set forth out of Drogheda the seuentéenth of September 1566, and incamped that night at Rosse Keagh, & so from thense he trauelled throughout Vlster, and passed thense vnto Athlon in Connagh, where he came the six and twentith of October.

1566

The pusillanimitie of the Oneile.

In this iournie the rebell neuer durst (for all his brags) once to shew his face, nor to offer anie fight at all: sauing once at and néere a wood not far from Glogher, where he offered a skirmish, and gaue the charge with horsemen, footmen, and certeine Scotish shot: which continued a good space, and sundrie hurt on both sides, but none died of his lordships men. He shewed himselfe also once with a great multitude of horsemen and footmen, not farre from the castell of Dirlough Lenough, called the Salmon, but tooke his ease and durst not to giue the aduenture. In this iournie the lord deputie restored Odonell to the possession of his lands and castels, kept by Oneile from him; & sundrie lords and men of the best sort submitted themselues. By which this his lordships iournie he recouered to hir highnesse a countrie of foure score miles in length, and eight and fortie miles in breadth, without losse of anie man sauing Mac Gwier, who being sicke died in this iournie; and sauing a few persons which by the waie vpon an occasion would aduenture the winning of a certeine Iland in the middle of a lough, wherein was supposed to be great store of wealth and vittels of the enimies, and in assailing of it they were drowned.

Odonell restored vnto his possessions.

The lord deputie recouereth a great countrie in Vlster vnto the crowne.

Immediatlie vpon the discharge of the armie at Athlon, the lord deputie fortified all the frontiers of the English pale with garrisons sufficient for the same. And as concerning the troublesome state of Mounster, the earle of Desmond was in the field with two thousand men, and incamped himselfe in places indifferent to annoie at his pleasure the earle of Ormond, the lord Barrie, the lord Roch, and sir Morris Fitzgirald of the Decies; but he did not hurt anie man at all: sauing one Mac Donogh a rebell and a disloiall sauage man. The lord deputie being ouerlaied with the continuall cares to resist Oneile, could not in person trauell into Mounster, nor yet without great perill diuide his armie: wherefore he sent capteine Herne constable of Leighlin vnto the said earle, whereby he might be aduertised of his intendement and meaning: which appeared to be but a méere insolencie and an outrage to be reuenged vpon the earle of Ormond, although the rumor was, that he would conioine with Oneile. Which report when it came to his eares, and being aduertised that the lord deputie was offended with him that he had gathered such a force, and was in the fields. He for his purgation herein, without further delaie, tooke his horsse, and hauing in his companie onelie the baron of Dunboine, and capteine Herne, with their companies, made hast to present himselfe before the lord deputie: where and before whome for purging of himselfe, and to declare his dutie, he offered himselfe to his lordships deuotion, either to go and attend him vnto Vlster in that sort as he then was, or else to follow him with all such force as he could get; the lord deputie finding him vittels: and then to abide & serue in Vlster in despite of Shane Oneile; or else that he would in his lordships absence remaine vpon the borders there, with such a number of horsemen, as should be appointed vnto him; shewing also and pretending such dutifulnesse to hir maiestie, as was méet for a subiect to shew to his soueresgne. The deputie hauing some liking of his offers, and considering the tickle state of these presents, accepteth his last offer, willing him to go backe againe, and to prepare a crew of one hundred horsemen, at the least, and so to returne againe within foure téene daies: which he did, and with him came sir John Desmond, his vncle the baron of Dunboine, the lord Powre and others: who accompanied with the baron of Deluin, sir Warham Sentleger, and capteine Herne, did remaine vpon the borders, vntill his lordships returne from out of his iournie in Vlster.

The earle of Desmond is in campe and doth no hurt.

The earle of Desmond maketh his repaire to the lord deputie.

The earle of Desmond feareth in the English pale.

And as the realme at large was much infested with the cruell warres of Oneile and the troubles in Mounster; so also there wanted no daily complaints of griefs vnto the lord deputie of sundrie persons one against an other. For Oliuer Sutton, a gentleman dwelling in the English pale, did exhibit a certeine booke in writing, conteining an information of sundrie notorious disorders in that realme, hurtfull to the good policie of the same, and contrarie to sundrie good lawes and acts of parlement, whereof a great part did touch the earle of Kildare. The matter was referred by hir maiesties order to the hearing of the lord deputie and councell. Likewise sir Edmund Butler and Piers his brother were græuouslie complained vpon by the ladie of Dunboine, Mac Brian Arra, Oliuer Fitzgirald, sir William Occarell, and others; for their dailie outrages, robberies, murthers, preies, and spoiles taken. For the hearing and appeasing of such matters, and for the better ministration of iustice, the lord deputie had béene a long suitor to hir maiestie and councell for a chancellor to be sent ouer, who at length were resolued vpon doctor Weston, deane of the arches, who arriued at Dublin in Julie 1567, a notable and a singular man, by profession a lawyer, but in life a diuine, a man so bent to the execution of iustice, and so seuere therein, that by no meanes would he be seduced or auerted from the same: and so much good in the end insued of his vpright, diligent, and dutifull seruice, as that the whole realme found themselues most happie and blessed to haue him serue among them. Now he taking vpon him to deale in all matters of complaints, both eased the lord deputie of a great burthen, and did most good to the countrie, and acquited himselfe against hir maiestie.

Oliuer Sutton complaineth against the earle of Kildare.

The ladie of Dunboine complaineth against the Butlers.

1567

Doctor Weston is made lord chancellor of Ireland.

But to returne to the L. deputie, who immediatlie vpon the dismissing of the armie at Athlon, he tooke order (as is aforesaid) for placing of his garrisons in such conuenient places vpon the frontiers, as then apperteined and was most méet & conuenient. The rebell on his part leaueth nothing vndon, which might be for the furtherance of his enterprises: and being in great follitie of himselfe deuised manie things; and to make some shew of his abilitie, entered into the English pale, with sword and fire wasted the countrie, slue manie of hir maiesties subiects, and in the end besieged hir highnesse towne of Dundalke: where his pride and treason were iustlie scourged, who came not with so much glorie to besiege it, as he did returne with shame to leaue and lose it. The lord deputie not abiding the same, nor sleeping his matters, determined to make a new rode vpon him: and in the meane time, he so handled the matter, that he had vnfethered him of his best friends, aids, and helps. For besides the whole countrie, as is before said, gained from him the last iournie, Mac Gwier, a mightie man in his countrie forsoke him, and submitted himselfe to hir maiestie, offering all loiall obedience and faithfull seruice, and to receiue his lands and countrie at hir highnesse hands.

The Oneile entereth the English pale with sword and fire.

The Oneile besiegeth Dundalke the second time, and departed with great dishonor.

The Oneile forsaken of friends.

Mac Gwier forsaketh Oneile, and so do the Scots.

Alexander

Alexander Og and Mac Donell offer to serue hir maiestie, with all the Scots vnder them against the rebell. Con Odonell late deliuered from the rebell, offereth seruice against him. Tirlogh Lenough with the helps of his neighbours dailie backed the said Oneile, that his force was quailed that waie. The lord deputie had continuallie foure regiments residing neere the English pale, who continuallie as it were by turnes were occupied in persecuting of the rebell: & his lordship being at Drogheda did also issue out, and in one morning toke a preie of two thousand kine, 500 garrons, and innumerable other small beasts and cattell. The rebell seeing himselfe thus distressed of his goods, and forsaken of his helps and followers, his men, some by Odonell, and some by others to the number of three or foure thousand persons at times slaine, himselfe discomfited, his passages stoped, and all places of his refuge preuented, and now but one poore castell left wherein he trusted to commit himselfe vnto; he being thus weakened, and beholding his declination and fall towards, was fullie bent and determined to disguise himselfe, and so as not knowne to come with a collar or halter about his necke to the presence of the lord deputie, and in all humble and lowlie maner to submit himselfe: hoping that by this kind of humilitie to find mercie at hir maiesties hands. But his conscience was so cauterised, and his hands so imbrued with infinit and most horrible murthers, bloudsheds, treasons, whoredomes, drunkennesse, robberies, burnings, spoiles, oppressions, and with all kinds of wickednesse, that his heart was ouerlaied and ouerladen with an vtter despaire to obteine ante grace or fauor: and therefore was the more easilie persuaded by those whome he toke to be his friends, to trie first and to intreat the Scots for friendship, and that they would ioine and aid him in his most wicked rebellion. Whereupon he toke his iournie towards Clandeboie, where Alexander Og and his companie, to the number of six hundred persons, were then incamped: and for the better gaining of his purpose, he had a little before inlarged Charleie Boie brother to the said Alexander, and who had beene prisoner with him.

The lord deputie taketh a great preie vpon the Oneile.

The Oneile distressed of all comfort is in doubt what to do.

Oneile his owne conscience condemneth him to seeke submission.

Oneile seeketh for helpe of the Scots.

The Scots doo disguise with Oneile.

The Scots disguised the matter with him, pretending and promising him aid and assistance: which they ment not. For assone as Oneile togither with Odonels wife, whom he kept, & the small companie which he brought with him were come into the tent, and they assured of him; they called to remembrance the manifold iniuries which they had receiued at his hands, and namelie the murthering of one James Mac Conell, & one Mac Guillie their neere cousins and kinsmen: and being inflamed with malicious minds to reuenge their deths, they fell to quarelling with the said Shane Oneile, and with their slaughter swords hewed him to peeces, and slue all those of his companie that were with him: his bodie they wrapped in a Kernes shirt, and so without all honor was carried to a ruinous church not farre off, and there interred; but after a few daies he was taken vp againe by capteine Piers, by whose deuise this stratagem or rather tragedie was practised, and his head was sundred from the bodie, and sent to the lord deputie, who caused the same to be set vpon a stake or pole on the top of the castle of Dublin. A fit end for such a beginning, and a iust reward for such a wicked traitor and sacrileger: who began his tyrannie in bloud, did continue it with bloud, and ended it with bloud. The lord deputie being then at Drogheda, and aduertised of the death of this Shane, and of the iust iudgements of God laid vpon him; for the same prostrated himselfe before the high and eternall God, and gaue his most humble and hartie thanks for the deliuerie of that land from so wicked a tyrant, sacrileger and traitor; and with all the conuenient speed that might be, he dispatched the messengers to hir maiestie and councell, aduertising this hap and good successe. Which done, his lordship with all speed made his repaire into Vlster, and incamped himselfe in the middle and heart of the countrie, vnto whome all the noblemen and gentlemen of Tiron, being glad that they were deliuered from the tyrant, made their repaire vnto his lordship: and especiallie all they which were competitors of the capteinrie of Tiron, who most humblie and obedientlie presented and submitted themselues vnto hir highnesse. And when his lordship had set all things in such order as the time required, he assembled all the gentlemen of the countrie, and most pithilie and effectuallie instructed and persuaded them to obedience, teaching them the great blessings of God which commeth thereby, as also putteth them in mind what inconueniences, miseries and calamities they had felt by the contrarie: and for their greater quietnesse and peace, he promised shortlie to send commissioners amongst them, who should haue authoritie to decide all controuersies betweene partie and partie (title of land and death of man excepted.)

The queene aduertised of Shane Oneils death.

The noblmen of Vlster, being glad of Oneils death, doo submit themselues.

Also he proclamed and commanded hir maiesties peace to be kept, and commanded all churchmen and husbandmen to returne to their accustomed exercises: and that all men of warre should liue vpon their owne, or vpon that which their frends with a good will would giue them: and so publishing peace vniuersallie, euerie man departed home totsullie. The lord deputie likewise returned to Dublin, and commanded the sonne of the late rebell, who laie for an hostage of his father, to be safelie kept in the castell of Dublin, according to hir maiesties letters of commandement in that behalfe, dated the first of Julie 1567. The queenes maiestie being deliuered from this traitorous rebell, and hauing all Vlster at hir commandement and disposition, was verie desirous to haue a true plot of the whole land, whereby she might in some sort see the same, & did send ouer into Ireland one Robert Leeth, skilfull in that art, and that he should make the perfect descriptions of the same. Likewise also she being aduertised of the outragious dealings of the earle of Desmond, in mainteining proclamed rebels, and continuing of warres against the earle of Ormond (whose insolencie to seeke to be reuenged vpon the said earle, was the disturbance of the whole realme, the spoile of the whole countrie, and the onelie cause of great murthers, bloudshed, and vndoing of manie people) she willed the lord deputie by hir letters to apprehend the said Desmond, and to commit him to the castell of Dublin, which was so done. And after both he and his brother sir John of Desmond were sent into England, and there committed to the tower.

Orders giuen by the lord deputie to the noble men of Vlster.

Oneils sonne is committed to safe custodie.

Robert Leeth sent into Ireland to draw a true plot of the whole land.

The earle of Desmond committed to ward, and sent to the tower, togither with his brother sir John Desmond.

After all the foresaid broiles and ciuill wars were appeased, and the realme set in quietnesse and good order, the lord deputie hauing receiued hir maiesties letters for his repaire into England vnto hir presence, he did accordinglie prepare himselfe thereunto, and by a commission vnder hir broode seale of Ireland did appoint doctor Weston then lord chancellor, and sir William Fitzwilliams treasuror at warrs, to be lords iustices in his absence: the one of them being verie well learned, iust, and vpright; the other verie wise, and of great knowledge and experience in the affaires of that land. Both which two being like well minded to doo hir maiestie seruice, did most louinglie and brotherlie agree therein, each one aduising and aduertising the other according to the seuerall gifts which God had bestowed vpon them: by which meanes they passed their gouernment verie well 1567 Doctor Weston and sir William Fitzwilliams made lords iustices.

Sir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie passeth into England, and caried with him the earle of Desmond.

well and quietlie to the great contentation of hir maiestie, the commendation of themselues, and the common peace of the countrie; and so the said sir Henrie hauing placed the said iustices, he passed the seas into England, and carried with him the earle of Desmond and Oconnor Sligo, he was with great honor receiued at the court, and the other was sent to the tower. Hir maiestie lay at this time at Hampton court, and loking out at a window, she saw him to come in with two hundred men attending vpon him, and not knowing at the first sight who it was, it was told hir that it was sir Henrie Sidneie hir deputie in Ireland; Then it is well (quoth she) for he hath two of the best offices in England. So he presented himselfe before hir highnesse, and was welcome to hir. Neuertheless, after his departure, the particular grudges betweene some certeine men brake out into great and outragious disorders, as sir Edmund Butler with great hostilitie maketh inuasion vpon Oliuer Fitzgirald, being accompanied with Piers Grace. The outlawes of the Oconnors and Omores proclamed traitors, and hauing in the field a thousand of Gallowglasses, horssemen, and kernes, threaten to burne the towne of Kilkennie, and spoile Dearell of his countrie. But they as also Oliuer Fitzgirald, a man not apt in times past to complaine, but rather bent to satisfie himselfe with double reuenge, leauing to seeke reuenge by armes, made their recourses to the lords iustices, and by law requested redresse. The erle of Clancart was puffed vp with such insolencie, that he named himselfe king of Mounster, and did confederate with the Mac Swaines, Osullyan More, and others of the Irishrie of that prouince, and in warlike manner and with banners displaied inuadeth the lord Roches countrie, and in burning of his countrie, he destroied all the corne therein, seuen hundred sheepe, and a great number of men, women and children, and carried awaie fiftéene hundred kine, and a hundred garons. Also James Fitzmoris of Desmond maketh cruell warres against the lord Fitzmoris baron of Lixenew, which albeit they were but priuie displeasures, yet troublesome to the whole countrie: and the lords iustices being not prepared to stop the same, they did yet so temporise with them, as they gained time, till further order might be taken vpon aduertisement of hir maiesties pleasure herein. About this time one Morice a runnigate préest, hauing latelie béene at Rome, and there consecrated by the popes bull archbishop of Cashell, arriued into Ireland, and made chalenge to the same see: which being denied vnto him by the archbishop which was there placed by hir maiestie, the said supposed bishop suddenlie with an Irish skaine wounded the bishop, and put him in danger of his life.

Ed. Molineux.

Sir Edmund Butler breaketh out into outrages.

The pride of Mac Artie More earle of Clancart.

The earle of Clancart maketh warres vpon the lord Roch.

James Fitzmoris maketh warre vpon the baron of Lixenew.

The archbishop of Cashell in danger to be killed.

This yeare sir Peter Carew of Mohonesotreie in the countie of Deuon knight, one descended of a noble and high parentage, whose ancestors for sundrie hundred of yeares were not onelie barons of Carew in England; but marquesses of Corke, barons of Dōzon, and lords of Maston Twete; and sundrie other segniories in Ireland. When he had looked into his euidences, and had found how by right these great inheritances were descended vnto him: he made the quéens maiestie and councell acquainted therewith, and praied that with their fauor and furtherance he might haue libertie to follow, and by order of law to recouer the same. Which was granted vnto him, as also he had hir highnesse and their lordships seuerall letters to them, then lords iustices and officers there to that effect; and willing them to aid and assist him with all such hir maiesties euidences remaining in the records of the castell of Dublin, or else where in that land; and by all such other good meanes they might. Whereupon he sent the writer hereof to be his agent: who hauing by search found his title to be good, and confirmed by sundrie records and presidents, found in hir maiesties treasurie and castell of Dublin, answering and agréeing with the euidences of sir Peter Carew: then the said sir Peter passed in person into Ireland, and made title and claime to the lordship of Maston, then in the possession of sir Christopher Chiners knight, and to the baronie of Dozon, then in the occupation of the Cauenaughs.

Sir Peter Carew passeth into Ireland.

The first, when it was found good in law, and sir Christopher Chiners yéelded, and compounded for it: the other was trauersed before the lord deputie and councell, and vpon good and substantiall euidences, records, and praises; a decrée passed by the lords of the councell, in the behalfe of sir Peter Carew, and the same confirmed by the lord deputie, and by that meanes he recouered the possession of the baronie, which was before taken from his ancestors; as the records do impart, about the eightéenth yeare of king Richard the second. But as for the marquesship of Corke, being a matter of great weight and importance, and the prouince of Mounster then not setled in anie quietnesse: he would not as then nor yet thought it good to deale therein. Sir Henrie Sidneie, hauing spent a long time in England, was commanded to returne to his charge in Ireland, where he arriued at Crag Fergus, in September 1568: and toke the sword of gouernement vpon him, and so discharged the lords iustices. And then he and the councell by their letters of the fourth of Nouember 1568, did aduertise hir maiestie of the state that the said realme of Ireland then stood in. Which in briefe consisted in these points immediatlie following.

Sir Peter Carew by a decrée receoureth the baronie of Dozon.

1568

Sir Henrie Sidneie returneth lord deputie.

The state that Ireland stood in.

That sir Edmund Butler had made a preie in Shilelagh vpon Oliuer Fitzgarret, and done sundrie murders, burnings, and great spoiles vpon his countrie: who was forthwith sent for, and refuseth to come, excusing that he had businesse about the execution of certeine seruices in the counties of Kilkennie, and Tipperarie, and that the residue of all Leinster was quiet. That Connagh was in indifferent good order, sauing some contention betwéene the earle of Clanricard, and Mac William Enter; and an old controuersie renewed betwéene Odonell and Oconner Sligo for the title of a rent in Enter, Connaghs countrie. In Thomond great complaints made against the earle thereof, by Oshaghnes, who by reason of the oppression of the said earle, he was compelled with his followers to forsake his countries. As for Mounster, it was all in disorder by the warres of James Fitzmoris of Desmond, against Fitzmoris baron of Lixenew: and of the earle of Clancart, against the baron of Roch: and also by the disorders of Edward Butler, who being combined with Piers Grace and certeine outlawes, did disorderlie spoile and preie the countries to fed their bellies.

Connagh in reasonable peace.

Mounster out of order.

The present state of Ulster the lord deputie being desirous to know the certeintie thereof, immediatlie vpon his landing in Ireland he made a iourneie throughout the same, and found the Irishrie to stand in wauering terms: whereupon he sent for Turlogh Lenogh Oneile, who yéelding himselfe somewhat guiltie, because he somewhat swarued from his dutie, and differed from the articles in his lordships absence before, concluded with him in making a iourneie vpon Fernete, and in combining with the Scots, of whome he had in retinue about one thousand; he desired pardon: which it was long and verie hardlie obteined, and not vntill his lordship had caused the pledges to be executed, which the

Sir Peter Carew maketh sute to hir maiestie for the recouerie of his lands in Ireland.

Turlogh Lenogh breaketh the peace, but submitteth himselfe.

Scots

Scots had put in for their loialtie. Odoneile quietlie possessed the countrie of Trireconell, and continued a dutifull subiect to hir maiestie; saving the old grudge betwæne him and Turlogh did rather increase than decaie. Ochan lord of the land betwæne Loghfoile and the Ban, being for the same sometime molested by Turlogh Lenogh, did beare with all iniuries, and desired to be exempted from Turlogh, and to hold the same of the quænes maiestie. The like did the two principall men, eligible for the capteinrie of Tiron, desire for their parts all the residue of Ulster in good staie and quietnesse.

The lord deputie after this iourneie returned to Dublin, and there, when by the aduise of the councell he had disposed all things in good order concerning the gouernement: he caused the writs for summons of the parlement to be awarded out vnto euerie noble man for his appærance; & to euerie shiriffe for chosing of knights and burgesses for their like appærance at Dublin the seuentænth of Januarie, in the eleuenth yeare of hir maiesties reigne; at which time and daie appærance was then and there made accordinglie. On the first daie of which parlement, the lord deputie, representing hir maiesties person, was conducted and attended in most honorable manner vnto Christes church, and from thense vnto the parlement house: where he sat vnder the cloth of estate, being apparelled in the princelie robes of crimson veluet doubled or lined with ermin. And then & there the lord chancellor made a verie eloquent oration, declaring what law was, of what great effect and value, how the common societie of men was thereby mainteined, and each man in his degrée conserued; as well the inferior as the superior, the subiect as the prince: and how carefull all good common-wealths in the elder ages haue bæne in this respect: who considering the time, state, and necessitie of the common-wealth, did from time to time ordeine and establish most holsome lawes, either of their deuises, or drawen from some other good common-wealth: and by these meanes haue prospered and continued.

Parlemnt summoned at Dublin.

The lord chancellor his oration.

And likewise, how the quænes most excellent maiestie, as a most naturall mother ouer hir children, and as a most vigilant prince ouer hir subiects, hath bæne alwaies, & now presentlie is verie carefull, studious, & diligent in this behalfe: hauing caused this present parlement to be assembled, that by the councell and aduise of you hir nobilitie, & you hir knights and burgesses, such good lawes, orders, and ordinances maie be decréed, as maie be to the honor of almightie God, the preseruation of hir maiestie, and of hir imperiall crowne of this realme, and the safetie of the common-wealth of the whole realme: for which they were not onelie to be most thankefull; but also most carefull to dw their duties in this behalfe. And then he the lord speaker directing his spæches to the knights and burgesses, who were there in the behalfe of the whole commons of the realme, willed them that for the auoiding of confusion, and for an orderlie procéding in this action: they should assemble them selues at and in the house appointed for that assemblie; and there to make choise of some wise and sufficient man to be their mouth & speaker. And then concluding with an exhortation of obedience and dutifulnesse, he ended, and the court adiourned vntill thursdaie next, the twentith of Januarie. In the meane time, the knights and burgesses met in the lower house, and appointed for their speaker one Stanihurst, recorder of the citie of Dublin, a verie graue, wise, and learned man; who vpon thursdaie aforesaid was presented to the lord deputie, and to the lords of the higher house: & then he hauing dwne most humblie his obedience and dutie, made his oration and spæch; first abasing himselfe, being not a man sufficientlie adorned and furnished with such gifts of knowledge and learning, as to such an office and calling doth apperteine: wherein he was so much the more vnfit, as the cause he had in hand was of great weight and importance. And therefore he wished, if it might so séeme good to his lordship, some man of more grauitie, and of better experience, knowledge, and learning might supplie the place. Neuertheless, for somuch as he might not refuse it, he was the more willing, because he did well hope his seruice being dwne with his best good will, and in all dutifulnesse, it would be accepted. And againe his comfort was the more, because he had to deale in such a cause, as was for the establishing of some good and holsome lawes, whereof he was a professor.

Stanihursts oration.

And herevpon he toke an occasion, according to the argument that was before handled by the lord chancellor, speaker in the higher house, to discourse of the nature and good effect of lawes, and what good succesle there insueth to all such realmes, countries, and common-wealths, as by lawes are well ruled & gouerned. And when he had spoken at large hereof, there he declared what great causes that realme of Ireland had, to giue for euer most hartie thanks and praises to God for his goodnesse, in sending such a vertuous, noble, and a most godlie prince, as was hir maiestie; who not onlie was carefull by the sword to stand in their defense against all enimies, traitors, and rebels, in times of wars and rebellions: but also for their conseruation in times of peace would haue such lawes, statutes, and ordinances to be made in a parlement of themselues, as should be most expedient for the common-wealth of the same land. When he had at large discoursed of this matter, then he concluded with an humble petition, that it might please hir maiestie to grant vnto them their liberties and frædoms of old belonging to euerie assemblie of a parlement. The first was, that euerie man being a member of the lower house, should and might haue frée comming and going to and from the parlement: and during their abode at the same without molestation or impeachment of anie person or persons, or for ante matter then to be laid against anie of them. The second, that they and euerie of them might haue libertie to speake their minds frélie to anie bill to be read, & matter to be proposed in that parlement. Thirdlie, that if anie of the said house shuld misorder and misbehaue himselfe in anie vndecent manner, or if anie other person should euill intreat or abuse anie of the said house, that the correction and punishment of euerie such offendor should rest and remaine in the order of the said house. When he had ended his spæch, and in most humble maner dwne his obeisance; the lord deputie hauing paused vpon the matter, made answer to euerie particular point in most eloquent and effectuall manner, which consisted in these points: Nothing misliking with the speaker for so much abasing of himselfe, because he knew him to be both graue, wise, and learned, and verie sufficient for that place, doubting nothing but that he would performe the same in all dutifulnesse, as to him apperteined. And concerning the benefit which groweth to all nations and common-wealths by the vse of the lawes; besides that dailie experience did confirme the same generallie, so no one nation particularlie could better auouch it than this realme of Ireland: and therefore he did well hope that they would accordinglie frame themselues to liue accordinglie, and also to praie for hir maiesties safetie and long life, whereby vnder hir they might inioie a peaceable and a quiet life in all prosperitie. And concerning the priuileges, which they requested

The requests of the speaker for allowance of the liberties of the parlement house.

The lord deputie answereth Stanihurts oration.

Stanihurst chosen to be speaker of the lower house.

requested to be allowed, forsomuch as the same at the first were granted to the end that they might the better and more quietlie serue hir highnesse in that assemblie, to hir honor, and to the benefit of the common-wealth, it pleased hir maiestie so long as she were not impeached, nor hir imperiall state derogated, that they should intoie the same. And so after a long time spent in this oration the court was adiourned.

The nert daie following being fridaie the lower house met; and contrarie to the order of that house, and dutie of that companie, in steed of vnitie there began a diuision, and for concord discord was receiued. For all, or the most part of the knights and burgesses of the English pale, especiallie they who dwelled within the counties of Meth and Dublin, who seeing a great number of Englishmen to haue place in that house began to except against that assemblie as not good, nor warranted by law. Their vantparler was sir Christopher Barnwell knight, who being somewhat learned, his credit was so much the more, and by them thought most meetest and worthie to haue beene the speaker for that house. And he being the spokesman alleged three special causes, whie he and his complices would not yeeld their consents. The first was, because that there were certeine burgesses returned for sundrie townes, which were not corporat, and had no voice in the parlement. The second was, that certeine shiriffes, and certeine maiors of townes corporat had returned themselues. The third and cheefest was that a number of Englishmen were returned to be burgesses of such towns and corporations, as which some of them neuer knew, and none at all were resiant & dwelling in the same, according as by the lawes is required.

A mutinie in the lower house.

Sir Christopher Barnwell excepteth against the choise of the burgesses.

These matters were questioned among themselues in the lower house for foure daies togither, and no agreement: but the more words, the more choler; and the more speeches, the greater broiles; vntill in the end, for appeasing the matter, the same was referred to the lord deputie and iudges of the realme: vnto whom the said speaker was sent to declare the whole matter, and to know their resolutions. And they hauing at large discoursed and conferred of this matter, returned their answer; that concerning the first and second exceptions, that the burgesses returned for townes not corporat, and for such shiriffes, maiors, and souereignes as haue returned themselues, shall be dismissed out of the same: but as for such others as the shiriffes and maiors had returned, they should remaine, and the penaltie to rest vpon the shiriffes for their wrong returnes. The messenger of this answer, howsoeuer he were liked, his message could not be receiued nor allowed: which being aduertised vnto the lord deputie and the iudges, then Lucas Dillon hir maiesties attorneie generall was sent vnto them, to ratifie and confirme their resolutions: and yet could not he be credited, neither would they be satisfied, vnlesse the iudges themselues would come in persons and set downe this to be their resolutions. Upon this answer the speaker commanded a bill to be read, but the foresaid persons would not suffer nor abide the reading thereof: but rose vp in verie disordered manner, farre differing from their duties in that place, and as contrarie to that grauitie and wisedome, which was or should be in them. Wherefore, for pacifieng of the same, the cheefe iustices of the queenes bench, and the cheefe iustice of the common pleas: the quenes sergeant, attorneie generall, and sollicitor, the nert daie following came to the lower house, and there did affirme their former resolutions, which thought it might haue sufficed. Yet certeine lawiers who had place in that house, did not altogither like thereof.

The resolution of the iudges.

The disliking of the iudges opinions.

The selfewill and frowardnesse of the burgesse of the English pale.

And albeit this matter were orderlie compassed, and sufficient to haue contented euerie man: yet the same was so stomached, that the placing of the Englishmen to be knights and burgesses, could not be digested, as did appeare in the sequele of that assemblie, where euerie bill furthered by the English gentlemen was stoped and hindered by them. And especiallie sir Edmund Butler, who in all things which tended to the queenes maiesties profit or common-wealth, he was a principall against it: fearing that their capteinries should be taken awaie, and coine, and liuerie be abolished, and such other like disorders redressed, which he and his complices misliking, it did euen open it selfe of a rebellion then a brewing and towards. Which in deed followed. For immediatlie after the parlement, he returned home with a discontented mind, and gathered his forces, and followed his purpose. But to the purpose.

Sir Edmund Butler misliketh with the parlement.

There were two billes put in of moment & great consequence. The one was concerning the repeale of an act for that sessions, onelie made in the time of sir Edward Poinings lord deputie, in the tenth yere of king Henrie the seuenth, which though it were meant most for their owne benefit and commonwealth of that realme: yet so gelous they were, that they would not in long time enter into the consideration thereof. The other was for the granting of the impost for wines then first read. And in this matter they shewed themselues verie froward & so vnquiet, that it was more like a bearebaiting of disordered persons, than a parlement of wise and graue men. Wherewith a certeine English gentleman (the writer hereof) being a burgesse of the towne of Athenrie in Connagh, who had before kept silence, and still so meant to haue done; when he saw these foule misorders and ouerthwarting, being greeued, stood vp, and praied libertie to speake to the bill, who made a preamble, saieng, that it was an vsage in Pithagoras scholes, that no scholers of his should for certeine yeares reason, dispute, or determine, but giue eare and keepe silence: meaning that when a man is once well instructed, learned, and aduised, and hath well deliberated of the things he hath to do, he should with more discretion and wisdome, speake, order, and direct the same. Notwithstanding, now he being but a man of small experience, and of lesse knowledge in matters of importance, and therefore once minded to haue beene altogither silent, is inforced euen of a verie zeale and conscience, and for the discharge of his dutie, to praie their patience, and to beare with his speeches. And then vpon occasion of the bill read, and matter offered, he entred into the discourse what was the office & authoritie of a prince, and what was the dutie of a subiect: and lastlie, how the quenes maiestie had most honorablie and carefullie performed the one, and how vndutifullie they had considered the other: for that she neither found that obedience in that land, which still liued in rebellion against hir; neither that benevolence of the better sort, which for hir great expenses spent for their defenses and safeties they ought to haue yeelded vnto hir. It appeared manifest in sundrie things, and speciallie in this present assemblie, namelie one bill concerning the repeale of Poinings act, for this time onelie meant for your owne benefit, and for the common-wealth of this realme: and the other concerning the bill now in question, the one by you denied, and the other liketh you not. And yet hir maiestie, of hir owne roiall authoritie, might and may establish the same without anie of your consents, as she hath alreadie done the like in England; sauing of hir courtesie it pleaseth hir to haue it passe with your owne consents by order of law, that she might thereby haue the better triall and assurance of your

The repeale of Poinings act.

The act for imposts of wines.

dutifulnesse

dutifulnesse and goodwill towards hir. But as she hath and doth find your bent farre otherwise, so doth the right honorable the lord deputie find the like. For notwithstanding his long seruices in times past, his continuall and dailie trauels, iorneies, and hostings, with the great perill of his life against the rebels for your sake and safetie; and his endlesse turmoiles and troubles in ciuill matters and priuat suites for your quietnesse, and to you well known, he hath deserued more than well at your hands: yet as the vnthankfull Israelites against Moses, the vnkind Romans against Camillus, Scipio, and others: and as the vngratefull Atheniens against Socrates, Themistocles, Miltiades, and others; you haue and do most vngratfullie requite and recompense this your noble gouernor: against whome and his doings you do kicke and spurne what in you lieth. But in the end it will fall vpon you, as it hath done vnto others to your owne shame, ouerthrow, and confusion. And when he had spent a long time in this matter, and proued the same by sundrie histories of other nations, he proceeded to the bill, which by sundrie reasons and arguments he proued to be most necessarie, and meet to be liked, allowed, and consented vnto.

Now when he had thus ended his speeches, he sat downe, the most part of the house verie well liking and allowing both of the person and of the matter; sauing the persons before named, who did not heare the same so attentiuelie as they did digest it most vnquietlie, supposing themselues to be touched herein. And therfore some one of them rose vp and would haue answered the partie, but the time and daie was so far spent aboue the ordinarie houre, being well neere two of the clocke in the afternoone, that the speker and the court rose vp and departed. Howbeit such was the present murmurings and threatnings breathed out, that the said gentleman for his safetie was by some of the best of that assemblie conducted to the house of sir Peter Carew, where the said gentleman then laie and resided. The lord deputie in the meane time, hearing that the lower house were so close, and continued togither so long aboue the ordinarie time, he doubted that it had béene concerning the questions before proponed, and therefore did secretlie send to the house to learne and know the cause of their long sitting. But by commandement of the speaker, order was giuen to the doore keepers, that the doores should be close kept, & none to be suffered to come in or out, so long as the gentleman was in deliuerie of his speeches; and after the court was ended, it was aduertised to the said lord deputie, who thanked God that had raised vp vnknowen frends vnto him in that place.

The next daie following being fridaie, assone as the court of the lower house was set, sir Christopher Barnewell, and the lawiers of the English pale, who had conferred togither of the former daies speeches, stod vp and desired hearing: who leauing the matter in question, did in most disorderlie manner inueigh against the said gentleman, affirming, auouching, and protesting, that if the words spoken had béene spoken in anie other place than in the said house, they would rather haue died than haue borne withall. Whereupon the speaker by consent of the residue of the house commanded them to silence, and willed that if they had anie matter against the said gentleman, they should present and bring it in writing against mondaie then next following. And for somuch as their dealings then were altogither disordered, being more like to a bearebaiting of lose persons than an assemblie of wise and graue men in parlement; motion and request was made to the speaker, that he should reforme those abuses and disordered behauiours; who not onelie promised so to do, but also praied assistance, aduise, and counsell for his doings therein, of such as were acquainted with the orders of the parlements in England. Which was promised vnto him and performed, and also promised that a booke of the orders of the parlements vsed in England should in time be set forth in print, which the said gentleman did, and presented & bestowed the same among them in forme following.

A booke of the orders of a parlement house imprinted for Ireland.

¶ The order and vsage how to keepe a parlement in England in these daies, collected by Iohn Vowell aliàs Hooker gentleman, one of the citizens for the citie of Excester at the parlement holden at Westminster, Anno Do*mini* 1571, & Elisabethæ Reg. decimo tertio: and the like vsed in hir maiesties realme of Ireland.

And here you must note, that what the kings and queenes of England do in their persons in England, the same is done in Ireland by the lord deputie, and who in the like parlement robes and vnder the like cloth of estate representeth hir maiestie there in all things.

By whom and for what cause a parlement ought to be summoned and called.

The king, who is Gods annointed, being the head and chiefe of the whole realme, and vpon whom the gouernement and estates thereof do wholie and onelie depend, hath the power and authoritie to call and assemble his parlement, and therein to seeke and aske the aduise, counsell, & assistance of his whole realme, and without this his authoritie no parlement can properlie be summoned or assembled. And the king, hauing this authoritie, ought not to summon his parlement but for weightie and great causes, and in which he of necessitie ought to haue the aduise and counsell of all the estates of his realme, which be these and such like as followeth.

First for religion, forsomuch as by the lawes of God and this realme, the king next and immediatlie vnder God is his deputie and vicar in earth, and the chiefest ruler within his realms and dominions: his office, function, and dutie is, aboue all things to seeke and see that God be honored in true religion and vertue, and that he and his people do both in profession and life liue according to the same.

Also that all idolatries, false religions, heresies, schismes, errors, superstitions, & whatsoeuer is contrarie to true religion, all disorders and abuses, either among the cleargie or laitie, be reformed, ordered, and redressed.

Also the assurance of the kings and quæenes persons, and of their children, their aduancement & preferment in mariages, the establishing of succession, the suppression of traitors, the auoiding or eschewing of warres, the attempting or mouing of wars, the subduing of rebels, and pacifieng of ciuill wars and commotions, the leuieng or hauing anie aid or subsidie for the preseruation of the king and publike estate: also the making and establishing of good and wholesome lawes, or the repealing and debarring of former lawes, as whose execution may be hurtfull or preiudiciall to the estates of the prince or commonwealth.

For these and such like causes, being of great weight, charge and importance, the king (by the aduise of his councell) may call and summon his high court of parlement, and by the authoritie therof establish and order such good lawes and orders as then shall be thought most expedient and necessarie.

The order and maner how to ſummon the parlement.

The king ought to ſend out his writs of ſummons to all the eſtates of his realme, at leaſt fortie daies before the beginning of the parlement; firſt to all his lords and barons, that is to wit, archbiſhops, biſhops, dukes, marqueſſes, earls, vicounts and barons; and euerie of theſe muſt haue a ſpeciall writ. Then to the clergie, and the writ of their ſummons muſt be addreſſed to euerie particular biſhop for the clergie of his dioceſſe. All theſe writs which are for the clergie, the king alwaies ſendeth to the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke, and by them they are ſent and diſperſed abroad to euerie particular biſhop within their ſeuerall prouinces, and ſo the biſhops giue ſummons to the clergie.

Laſtlie, for the ſummoning of the commons, he ſendeth his writ to the lord warden of the fiue ports, for the election of the barons thereof, and to euerie ſeuerall ſhiriffe for the choiſe and election of knights, citizens, and burgeſſes within his countie.

How and what perſons ought to be choſen for the clergie, and of their allowances.

The biſhop ought vpon the receipt of the writ ſent vnto him for the ſummoning of his clergie, forthwith to ſummon and warne all deanes and archdeacons within his dioceſſe to appeare in proper perſon at the parlement, vnleſſe they haue ſome ſufficient and reaſonable cauſe of abſence, in which caſe he may appeare by his proctor, hauing a warrant or proxie for the ſame.

Then muſt he alſo ſend the like ſummons to the deane and chapter of his cathedrall church, who ſhall forthwith aſſemble their chapter, and make choiſe of ſome one of themſelues to appeare in their behalfe, and this man thus choſen muſt haue their commiſſion or proxie.

He muſt alſo ſend out his ſummons to euerie archdeaconrie and peculiar, requiring that the whole clergie do appeare before him, his chancellor or officer, at a certeine date, time, and place: who being ſo aſſembled, ſhall make choiſe and election of two men of the ſaid clergie to appeare for them, and theſe ſhall haue their commiſſion or proxie for the ſame.

Theſe proctors thus to be choſen ought to be graue, wiſe, and learned men, being profeſſors either of diuinitie or of the eccleſiaſticall lawes; and that can, will, and be able to diſpute in cauſe of controuerſie, conuincing of hereſies, appeaſing of ſchiſmes, and deuiſing of good and godlie conſtitutions concerning true religion and orders of the church.

Theſe proctors (thus elected) ought to haue reſonable allowances for their charges, according to the ſtate, qualitie, or condition of the perſon, as alſo a reſpect had to the time. The proctors of the deane and chapter are to be paid out of the archeker of the cathedrall church. The proctors of the clergie are to be paid of the clergie, among whom a collection is to be leuied for the ſame, according to an old order vſed among them.

How and what maner of knights, ci- tizens, and burgeſſes ought to be choſen, and of their allowances.

The ſhiriffe of euerie countie, hauing receiued his writs, ought forthwith to ſend his precepts and ſummons to the maiors, bailiffes, and head officers of euerie citie, towne corporate, borough, and ſuch places as haue beene accuſtomed to ſend burgeſſes within his countie, that they do chooſe and elect among themſelues two citizens for euerie citie, and two burgeſſes for euerie borough, according to their old cuſtome and vſage. And theſe head officers ought then to aſſemble themſelues & the aldermen and common councell of euerie citie or towne, and to make choiſe among themſelues of two able and ſufficient men of euerie citie or towne, to ſerue for and in the ſaid parlement.

Likewiſe at the next countie daie to be holden in the ſaid countie after the receipt of this writ, the ſhiriffe ought openlie in the court of his ſhire or countie, betweene the houres of eight and nine of the forenoone, make proclamation; that euerie freholder ſhall come into the court, and chooſe two ſufficient men to be knights for the parlement; & then he muſt cauſe the writ to be openlie & diſtinctlie read. Whereupon the ſaid freholders, then and there preſent, ought to chooſe two knights accordinglie, but he himſelfe cannot giue anie voice, neither be choſen.

Theſe elections aforeſaid ſo paſt and done, there ought to be ſeuerall indentures made betweene the ſhiriffe & the freholders of the choiſe of the knights, and betweene the maior and the head officers of euerie particular citie & towne of the choiſe of their citizens & burgeſſes & of their names, & of their mainperners and ſuerties. Of theſe indentures, the one part being ſealed by the ſhiriffe, ought to be returned to the clerke of the parlement; and the other part of the indentures, ſealed by ſuch as made choiſe of the knights, & ſuch as made choiſe of the citizens & burgeſſes vnder the ſeuerall common ſeales of their cities and townes, ought to remaine with the ſhiriffe, or rather with the parties ſo elected and choſen.

The charges of euerie knight and citizen was wont to be a like, which was thirteene ſhillings and foure pence by the daie: but now by the ſtatute it is but eight ſhillings, that is, to euerie knight and euerie citizen foure ſhillings, and to euerie burgeſſe the old vſage to haue fiue ſhillings: but now it is but three ſhillings and foure pence limited by the ſtatute, which allowance is to be giuen from the firſt daie of their iournete towards the parlement, vntill the laſt daie of their returne from thenſe. Prouided, that euerie ſuch perſon ſhall be allowed for ſo manie daies as by iourneieng ſix and twentie miles euerie daie in the winter, and thirtie miles in the ſummer, he may come & returne to and from the parlement.

In choiſe of theſe knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, good regard is to be had that the lawes and cuſtoms of the realme be herein kept and obſerued: for none ought to be choſen, vnleſſe he be reſiant and dwelling within the ſhire, citie, or towne for which he is choſen. And he ought to be graue, wiſe, learned, ſkilfull, and of great experience in cauſes of policie, and of ſuch audacitie as both can and will boldlie vtter and ſpeake his mind according to dutie, and as occaſion ſhall ſerue; for no man ought to be ſilent or dum in that houſe, but according to his talent he muſt and ought to ſpeake in the furtherance of the king and commonwealth.

And the knights alſo ought to be ſkilfull in martiall affaires, and therfore the words of the writs are that ſuch ſhould be choſen for knights as be Cincti gladio: not becauſe they ſhall come into the parlement houſe in armour, or with their ſwords: but becauſe they ſhould be ſuch as haue good experience and knowledge in feats of warre and martiall affaires, whereby they may in ſuch caſes giue the king and reime good aduiſe and counſell. Likewiſe they ought to be laie men, and of good fame, honeſtie, and credit, being not outlawed, excommunicated, or periured, or otherwiſe infamous: for ſuch perſons ought not to haue place or be admitted into the parlement houſe.

The

The degrees of the parlement.

IN times past there were six degrées or estates of the parlement, which euerie of them had their seuerall officers and ministers of attendance; but now the same are reduced into foure degrées.

The first is the king, who in his personage is a full and whole degrée of himselfe, and without whom nothing can be done.

The second degrée is of the lords of the clergie and of the temporaltie, and are all called by the names of barons.

The third is of knights, cittizons, and burgesses, & these be called by the names of the communaltie.

The fourth is of the clergie, which are called by the name of connocation, & these persons haue no voice in the parlement; neither can they doo anie thing other than to intreat in causes of religion, which from them is to be commended to other estates.

Of the places and houses of the parlement.

AS it lieth in the king to assigne and apoint the time when the parlement shall begin, so that he giue at the least fortie daies summons: so likewise he maie name and apoint the place where it shall be kept. But whersoeuer it be kept, the old vsage and maner was, that all the whole degrees of the parlement sat togither in one house; and euerie man that had there to speake, did it openlie before the king and his whole parlement. But here of did grow manie inconueniences, and therfore to auoid the great confusions which are in such great assemblies, as also to cut off the occasions of displeasures which ofttimes did happen, when a meane man speaking his conscience freelie, either could not be heard, or fell into the displeasure of his betters; and for sundrie other great greefs, did diuide this one house into three houses, that is to wit, the higher house, the lower house, and the connocation house.

In the first sitteth the king, and his lords spirituall and temporall, called by the name of barons, and this house is called the higher house.

The second is where the knights, cittizens and burgesses doo sit, and they be called by the name of commons, and this house is called the lower house.

The third is, where the prelats and the proctors of the cleargie, being called by the name of the cleargie, and this house is called the connocation house. Of euerie of these houses, their orders and officers, we will breeflie subnect and declare particularlie in order as followeth.

Of the higher house.

THe higher house (as is said) is where the king and his barons doo sit in parlement, where the king sitteth highest, and the lords & barons beneath him, each man in his degrée: the order is this. The house is much more in length than in breadth, and the higher end thereof in the middle is the kings seat or throne hanged richlie with cloth of estate, and there the king sitteth alwaies alone. On his right hand there is a long bench next to the wall of the house, which reacheth not so farre vp as the kings seat, and vpon this sit the archbishops and bishops, euerie one in his degrée. On his left hand there are two like benches, vpon the inner sit the dukes, marquesses, earles and vicounts. On the other, which is the hindermost & next to the wall, sit all the barons euerie man in his degree. In the middle of the house, betweene the archbishops seat and the dukes seat, sitteth the speaker, who commonlie is lord chancellor, or keeper of the great seale of England, or the lord chiefe iustice of England, as pleaseth the king, who doth apoint him: and he hath before him his two clerks sitting at a table before them, vpon which they doo write and laie their bookes. In the middle rome beneath them sit the chiefe iustices and iudges of the realme, the barons of the exchekor, the kings sergeants, and all such as be of the kings learned councell, either in the common lawes of the realme, or of the ecclesiasticall laws, and all these sit vpon great woll sacks, couered with red cloth.

At the lower end of all these seats is a barre or raile, betweene which & the lower end of the house is a void rome seruing for the lower house, and for all suters that shall haue cause and occasion to repaire to the king or to the lords. This house as it is distinct from the others, so there be distinct officers to the same belonging and apertening, which all be assigned and appointed by the king, and all haue allowances for their charges at the kings hands, of which officers what they are, what is euerie of their offices, and what allowances they haue, shall be written in order hereafter.

Of the officers of the higher house, and first of the speaker, and of his office.

THe chéefest officer of the higher house is the speaker, who is appointed by the king, and commonlie he is the lord chancelor or keeper of the great seale, or lord chéefe iustice of England, his office consisteth in diuerse points.

First, he must on the first daie of the parlement make his oration in the higher house, before the king, his lords and commons; and then and there declare the causes why the king hath summoned that parlement, exhorting and aduising euerie man to doo his office and dutie, in such sort as maie be to the glorie of God, honor of the king, and benefit of the commonwealth.

Also he must make one other oration, but in waie of answer to the speakers oration, when he is presented to the king.

Likewise he must make the like on the last daie of the parlement. And you shall vnderstand, that vpon these three daies he standeth on the right hand of the king nære to his seat, at a barre there appointed for him; but at all other times he sitteth in the middle of the house, as is before said.

When he hath ended his oration vpon the first day, he must giue order vnto the lower house in the kings behalfe, willing them to repaire vnto their house, and there (according to their ancient orders and customs) make choise of their speaker.

All bils presented vnto the higher house he must receiue, which he hath forthwith to deliuer vnto the clearks to be safelie kept.

All bils he must cause to be read twise before they be ingrossed, and being read three times he must put the same to question.

If anie bill put to question doo passe with their consent, then the same must be sent to the lower house, vnlesse it came first from thense, and in that case it must be kept vntill the end of the parlement.

If anie bill be denied, impugned, and cléere ouerthrowne, the same is no more to be thensefoorth receiued.

If any bill be put to question, & it be doubtfull whether side is the greater, & giueth most voices; then he must cause the house to be diuided, and then iudge of the bill according to the greater number.

If anie bill be vnperfect, or requireth to be amended, he must chose a certeine number of that house, as he shall thinke good, and to them commit that bill to be reformed and amended.

If anie bill or message be to be sent to the lower house, it is his office to make choise of two of the kings learned councell there being, to be the messengers thereof.

If any bill or message be sent from the lower house, he must come from his place to the bar, and there receiue the same; and being returned to his place, and euerie stranger or messenger departed, he must disclose the same to the lords.

Item, if anie disorder be committed or done in the house by anie lord or other person, he ought with the aduise of the lords to reforme the same: but if it be among the lords, and they will not be reformed, then he must forthwith aduertise the king.

Item, he ought at the beginning of the parlement, to call by name all the lords of the parlement, & likewise at other times as he seeth occasion, whose defaults ought to be recorded, & they to paie their fines, vnlesse they be dispensed withall by speciall licence from the king, or haue some iust and reasonable cause of absence.

Item, he must see and cause the clearks to make true entries & true records of all things done there, and to see that the clearks do giue and deliuer the copies of all such bils there read, to such as demand for the same.

Item, he shall keepe the secrets, & cause & command euerie man of ech degree in that house to do the like.

Also he ought not to go anie where, but the gentleman sergeant ought to attend vpon him, going before him with his mace, vnlesse he be the lord chancellor, for then he hath a sergeant of his owne.

His allowance that he hath is at the kings charges.

Also for euerie priuat bill that passeth and is enacted, he hath ten pounds for his part.

Of the chancellor of the higher house.

The chancellor is the principall clearke of the higher house, and his charge is safelie to keepe the records of the parlement, & the acts which be past.

All such statutes as be enacted, he must send to the kings seuerall courts of records to be inrolled, as namelie the Chancerie, the Kings bench, the Common plees, and the Excheker.

All such acts as are to be imprinted, he must send to the printer.

All such priuat acts as are not imprinted, if anie man will haue the same exemplified, he must transmit the same to the lord chancellor to be ingrossed and sealed, and for the same he to take the fees appointed and accustomed.

He hath for his allowance an ordinarie fee for terme of life of the king.

Of the clearks of the parlement.

There be two clearks, the one named the clearke of the parlement, & the other named the clearke of the crowne. The clearke of the parlement his office is to sit before the lord speaker, and to read such bils presented as he shall be commanded.

He must keepe true records, and true entries of all things there done and to be entred.

If anie require a copie of anie bill there, he ought to giue the same, receiuing the ordinarie fees.

If anie bill after his ordinarie readings be to be ingrossed, he must do it.

The councell of the house he maie not disclose.

At the end of the parlement he must deliuer vp vnto the chancellor all the acts and records of that house, sauing he may keepe a transumpt and a copie thereof to himselfe.

He hath his allowance of the king.

Also for euerie priuat bill which is enacted, he hath three pounds.

Also for euerie bill whereof he giueth a copie, he hath for euerie ten lines a penie, according to the custome.

¶ The clearke of the crowne, his office is to suplie the place and rome of the clearke of the parlement in his absence, & hath in all things the like charges and profits as the clearke ought to haue.

He must giue his attendance to the higher house from time to time, & do what shall be inioined him.

All such acts as be not imprinted, if anie man will haue them exemplified vnder the broode seale, he must exemplifie them, and haue for the same his ordinarie fees.

These two clearks, at the end of the parlement, ought to be present in the house, and within the lower bar at a bord before them, their faces towards the king: and there the one must read the bils which are past both houses, and the other must read the consent or disagreement of the king.

Of the sergeants or porters of the higher house.

There is but one sergeant, which hath the charge of keeping of the dores: for though there be diuerse dores, yet the keepers thereof are at his assignment.

He ought to see the house be cleane & kept swet.

He ought not to suffer anie maner of person to be within the house, so long as the lords be there sitting, other than such as be of the learned councell, and of that house; and except also such as come in message from the lower house with bils or otherwise, and except also such as be sent for, and be admitted to haue anie thing there to do.

Also he must attend and go alwaies with his mace before the speaker, vnlesse he be lord chancellor, or keeper of the great seale: for then he hath a sergeant of his owne.

He ought to keepe safelie such prisoners as be commanded to his ward, and to fetch or send for such as he shall be commanded to fetch.

This porter or sergeant hath (besides his ordinarie fee) a standing allowance for euerie date of the parlement.

Also he hath for euerie priuat bill which is enacted, fortie shillings.

Also he hath for euerie prisoner committed to his ward, a certeine allowance for his fees.

Also he hath of euerie baron or lord of that house, a certeine reward.

Of the lower house.

The lower house (as is said) is a place distinct from the others, it is more of length than of breadth, it is made like a theater, hauing foure rowes of seates one abous an other round about the same. At the higher end in the middle of the lower row, is a seat made for the speaker, in which he alwaies sitteth: before it is a table bord, at which sitteth the clarke of the house, and thereupon laieth his bookes, and writeth his records. Vpon the lower row on both sides the speaker, sit such personages as be of the kings priuie councell, or of his chiefe officers; but as for anie other, none claimeth, nor can claime anie place; but sitteth as he commeth, sauing that on the right hand of the speaker, next beneath the said councels, the Londoners, and the citizens of Yorke do sit, and so in order should sit all the citizens accordinglie. Without this house is one other,

in

in which the vnder clearks do sit, as also such as be tutors and attendant to that house. And when soeuer the house is diuided vpon anie bill, then the rome is voided; and the one part of the house commeth downe into this to be numbered.

The office of the speaker of the lower house.

THe chiefe or principall officer of this house is the speaker, and is chosen by the whole house, or the more part of them; he himselfe being one of the same number, and a man for grauitie, wisedome, experience, and learning, chosen to supplie that office, during the time of the parlement; and is to be presented to the king the third date following.

His office is to direct and guide that house in good order; and to see the ordinances, vsages, and customs of the same to be firmelie kept and obserued.

When he is presented vnto the king, sitting in his estate roiall in the parlement house for the purpose, he must then and there make his oration in commendation of the lawes and of the parlement; which done, then he hath (in the name of the house of the commons) to make to the king three requests.

First, that it maie please his maiestie to grant, that the commons assembled in the parlement, may haue and inioie the ancient priuileges, customes, and liberties, as in times past haue apperteined, and bene vsed in that house.

Then, that euerie one of that house maie haue libertie of speech, and freelie to vtter, speake, and declare his mind and opinion to anis bill or question to be proponed.

Also, that euerie knight, citizen, and burgesse, and their seruants, maie haue free comming and going to and from the said parlement; as also during the said time of parlement; & that they, nor anie of their seruants or retinue to be arrested, molested, sued, imprisoned, or troubled by anie person or persons.

And lastlie, that if he or anie other of that companie, being sent or come to him of anie message, and do mistake himselfe in doing thereof; that his maiestie will not take the aduantage thereof, but gratiouslie pardon the same.

He must haue good regard, and see that the clearke do enter and make true records, and safelie to keepe the same, and all such bils as be deliuered into that house.

He must on the first and third date, and when soeuer he else will, call the house by name, and record their defaults.

All bils, to be brought and to be presented into that house, he must receiue & deliuer to the clearke.

He ought to cause and command the clearke to reade the bils brought in, plainelie, and sensiblie; which done, he must breefite recite and repeat the effect and meaning thereof.

Of the bils brought in he hath choise, which and when they shall be read: vnlesse order by the whole house be taken in that behalfe.

Euerie bill must haue three readings, and after the second reading he must cause the clearke to ingrosse the same, vnlesse the same be reiected and dashed.

If anie bill or message be sent from the lords, he ought to cause the messengers to bring the same vnto him, and he to receiue the same openlie; and they being departed and gone, he ought to disclose and open the same to the house.

If when a bill is read, diuerse do rise at one instant to speake to the same, and it cannot be discerned who rose first; then shall he appoint who shall speake: neuertheless, euerie one shall haue his course to speake if he list.

If anie speake to a bill and be out of the matter, he shall put him in remembrance, and will him to come to the matter.

If anie bill be read three times, and euerie man haue spoken his mind; then shall he aske the house whether the bill shall passe or not? saieng thus: As manie as will haue this bill passe in maner & forme as hath beene read; saie Yea: then the affirmatiue part saie Yea. As manie as will not haue this bill passe in maner and forme as hath beene read, saie No. If vpon this question the whole house, or the more part, do affirme and allow the bill: then the same is to be sent to the higher house to the lords. But if the whole house, or the more part do denie the bill; then the same is to be dashed out, and to be retected: but if it be doubtfull vpon giuing voices, whether side is the greater; then must a diuision be made of the house, and the affirmatiue part must arise and depart into the vtter rome, which (by the sergeant) is voided before hand of all persons that were there. And then the speaker must assigne two or foure to number them first which sit within, and then the other which be without, as they do come in, one by one: and as vpon the triall the bill shall be allowed or disallowed by the greater number: so to be accepted as is before said.

If vpon this triall the number of either side be like, then the speaker shall giue his voice, and that onelie in this point; for other wise he hath no voice.

Also if anie of the house do misbehaue himselfe, & breake the order of the house: he hath to reforme, correct, and punish him, but yet with the aduise of the house.

If anie forren person do enter into that house, the assemblie thereof being sitting, or do by arresting anie one person thereof, or by anie other meanes breake the liberties and priuileges of that house, he ought to see him to be punished.

Also during the time of the parlement, he ought to sequester himselfe from dealing or intermedling in anie publike or priuat affaires, and dedicat and bend himselfe wholie to serue his office and function.

Also he ought not to resort to anie noble man, councellor, or other person, to deale in anie of the parlement matters: but must and ought to haue with him a competent number of some of that house, who maie be witnesses of his doings.

Also during the time of parlement, he ought to haue the sergeant of armes with his mace to go before him.

Also he hath libertie to send anie offendor, either to sergeants ward, or to the tower, or to anie other prison at his choise, according to the qualitie and quantitie of the offense.

He hath allowance for his diet one hundred pounds of the king for euerie sessions of parlement.

Also he hath for euerie priuat bill passed both houses, and enacted, fiue pounds.

At the end, and on the last date of the parlement, he maketh his oration before the king in most humble maner, declaring the dutifull seruice and obedience of the commons then assembled to his maiestie: as also most humblie praieng his pardon, if anie thing haue bene done amisse.

Of the clearke of the lower house.

THere is onelie one clearke belonging to this house, his office is to sit nert before the speaker at a table, vpon which he writeth & laieth his bookes.

He must make true entrie of the records and bils of the house, as also of all the orders thereof.

The bils appointed vnto him by the speaker to be read: he must read openlie, plainelie, and sensiblie.

The billes which are to be ingrossed, he must dō it.

If anie of the house aske the sight of anie bill there, or of the boke of the orders of the house; he hath to deliuer the same vnto him.

If anie desire to haue the copie of anie bill, he ought to giue it him, receiuing for his paines after ten lines a pennie.

He maie not be absent at anie time of sitting, without speciall licence.

He ought to haue for euerie priuat bill passed and enacted, fortie shillings.

He hath allowed vnto him for his charges (of the king) for euerie sessions, ten pounds.

Of the sergeant or porter of the lower house.

The sergeant of this house is commonlie one of the kings sergeants at armes, and is appointed to this office by the king. His office is to kéepe the dores of the house: and for the same he hath others vnder him, for he himselfe kéepeth the doore of the inner house, where the commons sit, and séeth the same to be cleane.

Also he maie not suffer anie to enter into this house, during the time of the sitting there; vnlesse he be one of the house, or be sent from the king or the lords, or otherwise licenced to come in.

If anie such person dō come, he ought to bring him in, going before him with his mace vpon his shoulder.

If anie be committed to his ward, he ought to take charge of him, and to kéepe him in safetie vntill he be required for him.

If he be sent for anie person, or to go in anie message, he must leaue a substitute behind him, to dō his office in his absence.

He must alwaies attend the speaker, and go before him, carieng his mace vpon his shoulder.

His allowance (during the time of the parlement) is twelue pence the date of the kings charges.

Also he hath of euerie knight and citizen, two shillings six pence; and of euerie burgesse, two shillings.

If anie be commanded to his ward, he hath of euerie such prisoner, by the date, six shillings and eight pence.

If anie priuat bill dō passe and be enacted, he hath for euerie such bill, twentie shillings.

Of the conuocation house.

The conuocation house is the assemblie of the whole clergie, at and in some peculiar place appointed for the purpose.

But as the barons and lords of the parlement haue their house seuerall and distinct from the commons: euen so the archbishops and bishops dō sequester themselues, and haue a house seuerall from the residue of the clergie. And this their house is called the higher conuocation house, the other being named the lower conuocation house. Both these houses haue their seuerall officers, orders, and vsages; and each officer hath his peculiar charge and function; as also certeine allowances, euen as is vsed in the parlement houses of the lords and commons.

The archbishops and bishops dō sit all at a table, and dō discourse all such causes and matters as are brought in question before them, either of their owne motions, or from the higher court of parlement, or from the lower house of conuocation, or from anie priuat person. Euerie archbishop and bishop sitteth & taketh place according to his estate and degrée, which degrees are knowne by such degrées & offices in the church as to euerie of them is assigned: for one hath the personage of a priest, an other of a deacon, this is a subdeacon, he is a sexton, and so forth, as such officers were wont to be in the church.

The bishops dō not sit at forenoone, but onelie at afternoone, because they, being barons of the higher house of parlement, dō resort and assemble themselues there at the forenoones with the temporall lords.

The conuocation house of the rest of the clergie dō obserue in a manner the like orders as the lower house of the commons dō vse. For being assembled togither on the first daie, with the bishops, are by them willed to make choise of a speaker for them, whom they call the proloquutor: when they haue chosen him, they dō present him vnto the bishops: and he thus presented, maketh his oration, and doth all things as the speaker of the lower house for the commons doth, as well for the ordering of the clergie & of the house, as for the order in sitting, the order in speaking, the order of recording things done among them, and all other such like things.

And this is to be vnderstood, that the whole clergie can deale and intreat but onlie of matters of religion, and orders of the church, which their doings and conclusions can not bind the whole realme, vnlesse they be confirmed by act of parlement: but yet sufficient to bind the whole clergie to the kéeping thereof; so that the king (who is the supreme gouernor of both estates) dō consent and confirme the same. And forsomuch as by knowing the orders of the parlement house, you may also know the orders of both the conuocation houses, which are like & correspondent to the others: these shall suffice for this matter.

Of extraordinarie persons which ought to be summoned to the parlement.

Besides the personages of the former degrées, which ought to be summoned to the parlement: the king also must warne and summon all his councellors both of the one law and of the other; and these haue their places onelie in the higher house, namelie the two chéefe iustices and their associats of the kings bench and the common plées, the barons of the exchéker, the sergeants, the attorneie, the sollicitor, the maister of the rolles, and his fellows of the chancerie.

The offices of these personages are to giue councell to the king and parlement, in euerie doubtfull cause according to the lawes.

Also if anie bill be conceiued and made disorderlie, they ought to amend and reforme the same, vpon order and commandement to them giuen.

Also they must attend to come and go at the commandement of the king and parlement.

Also they may not speake nor giue aduise, but when they be asked and put to question.

Also they haue no voice in parlement, because they are commonlie councellors to the same.

They are all reteined at the kings charges.

Likewise all officers of the parlement are to be summoned, as namelie the chancellor of the parlement, the clerks, the sergeants, the porters, and such others, who likewise are reteined at the kings costs. Of their offices and charges it is alreadie particularlie declared.

Of

Of the daies and houres to sit in parlement.

All daies of the weeke are appointed, sauing and excepted the sundaies and all principall feasts, as namelie the feast of Alhallowes daie, Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and saint John the baptists daie, and also such other daies as the parlement by consent shall appoint and assigne.

The beginning is at eight of the clocke in the morning, and doth continue vntill eleuen of the clocke.

They do not sit at afternoones, for those times are reserued for committees and the conuocation house.

In the morning they beginne with the common praier and the letanie, which are openlie read in the house.

Of the king, his office and authoritie.

Hauing declared of all the estates, degrees, and personages of the parlement, it resteth now to speake also of the king, and of his office, who is all in all, the beginning and ending, and vpon whome resteth and dependeth the effect & substance of the whole parlement. For without him and his authoritie nothing can be done, and with it all things take effect. Neuertheless, when he calleth & assembleth his parlement, there are sundrie orders which of him are to be obserued, and which he ought to see to be kept and executed; or else the parlement ceaseth to be a parlement, and taketh not his effect, of which orders these be the chefe which do insue.

First, the king ought to send out his summons to all the estates of his realme, of a parlement, assigning and appointing the time, daie, and place.

Also his summons must be at the least fortie daies before the beginning of his parlement.

Also he must appoint and prouide all such officers as ought to attend the parlement, who must be found at his charges.

Also the king ought not to make anie choise, or cause anie choise to be made of any knight, citizens, burgesses, proctors of the clergie, speaker of the common house, or proloquutor of the conuocation house: but they must be elected and chosen by the lawes, orders, and customs of the realme, as they were wont and ought to be, and the kings good aduise yet not to be contemned.

Also the king ought to grant, permit, and allow to all and euerie of the estates, and to euerie particular man lawfullie elected, and come to the parlement, all and euerie the ancient fredoms, priuileges, immunities, and customs, during the parlement; as also during the times and daies, comming and going to and from the parlement: but yet the same humblie to be requested of his highnesse by the speaker in his oration at the beginning of the parlement.

Also the king in person ought to be present in the parlement three daies at the least, during the time of the parlement; that is to saie, the first daie, when the whole estates according to the summons make their appearance, which is called the first daie of the parlement. On the second daie, when the speaker of the common house is presented, which is counted the beginning of the parlement. And the third daie, which is the last day, when the parlement is prorogued or dissolued: for vpon these daies he must be present, vnlesse in case of sicknes, or absence out of the realme, for in these cases the king may summon his parlement by commission, and the same is of as good effect as if he were present in person: and as for anie other daies, he is at his choise and libertie to come or not to come to the parlement.

Also the king ought to propone to the parlement house in writing all such things & matters of charge, as for which he calleth the said parlement. And accordinglie as the same shall then by the consent of all estates be aduised, concluded, and agreed: so the king either hath to allow or disallow the same, for he can (of himselfe) neither adde nor diminish anie bill; but accept the same as it is presented vnto him from the estates of the parlement, or else altogither reiect it.

Also the king as he doth prefix and assigne the daie and time when the parlement shall begin; so also he must assigne & appoint the time when the same shall be prorogued or dissolued: which ought not to be as long as anie matters of charge, weight, or importance be in question, and the same not decided nor determined.

Of the dignitie, power, and authoritie of the parlement, and of the orders of the same.

The parlement is the highest, chefest, and greatest court that is or can be within the realme: for it consisteth of the whole realme, which is diuided into three estates; that is to wit, the king, the nobles, and the commons, euerie of which estates are subiect to all such orders as are concluded and established in parlement.

These three estates may iointlie and with one consent or agreement establish and enact anie lawes, orders, and statutes for the common wealth: but being diuided, and one swaruing from the other, they can do nothing. For the king, though he be the head, yet alone can not make anie law; nor yet the king and his lords onelie, nor yet the king and his commons alone; neither yet can the lords and the commons without the king do anie thing of auaile. And yet neuertheless, if the king in due order haue summoned all his lords and barons, and they will not come, or if they come they will not yet appere; or if they come and appere, yet will not do or yeld to any thing, then the king with the consent of his commons (who are represented by the knights, citizens, and burgesses) may ordeine and establish anie act or law, which are as good, sufficient, and effectuall, as if the lords had giuen their consents.

But of the contrarie, if the commons be summoned and will not come, or comming will not appere, or appering will not consent to do anie thing, alleging some iust, weightie, and great cause; the king (in these cases) cannot with his lords deuise, make, or establish anie law, the reasons are these. When parlements were first begun & ordeined, there were no prelats or barons of the parlement, and the temporall lords were verie few or none, and then the king and his commons did make a full parlement, which authoritie was hitherto neuer abridged. Againe, euerie baron in parlement doth represent but his owne person, and speaketh in the behalfe of himselfe alone.

But in the knights, citizens, and burgesses are represented the commons of the whole realme; and euerie of these giueth not consent onlie for himselfe, but for all those also for whome he is sent. And the king with the consent of his commons had euer a sufficient and full authoritie to make, ordeine, and establish good and wholesome lawes for the common wealth of his realme. Wherfore the lords being lawfullie summoned, and yet refusing to come, sit, or consent in parlement, can not by their follie abridge the king and the commons of their lawfull proceeding in parlement.

The lords and commons in times past did sit all in one house, but for the auoiding of confusion they be be now diuided into two seuerall houses, and yet neuertheles they are of like and equall authoritie, euerie person of either of the said houses being named and counted a peere of the realme (for the time of the parlement) that is to saie, equall: for Par is equall. And therefore the opinion, censure, and iudgement of a meane burgesse, is of as great availe as is the best lords, no regard being had to the partie who speaketh, but the matter that is spoken.

They be also called peers, as it were fathers, for Pier is a father, by which is meant that all such as be of the parlement should be ancient, graue, wise, lerned, and expert men of the land: for such were the senators of Rome, and called Patres conscripti, for the wisedome and care that was in them in gouerning of the common-wealth. They are also called councellors, because they are assembled and called to the parlement for their aduise and good councell, in making and deuising of such good orders and lawes as may be for the commonwealth.

They therefore which make choise of knights, citizens and burgesses, ought to be well aduised that they do elect and chuse such as being to be of that assemblie, and thereby equall with the great estates, should be graue, ancient, wise, learned, expert and carefull men for their commonwealth, and who (as faithfull and trustie councellors) should do that which should turne and be for the best commoditie of the commonwealth, otherwise they do great iniurie to their prince and commonwealth.

Also euerie person of the parlement, during the times of the parlement, and at his comming and going from the same, is free from all troubles, arrests and molestations: no action or sute taking effect which during that time is begun, entred, or commensed against him, in what court so euer the same be, except in causes of treason, murther, and fellonie, and except also executions in law, awarded and granted before the beginning of the parlement.

Also euerie person hauing voices in parlement, hath free libertie of speach to speake his mind, opinion, and iudgement, to anie matter proponed; or of himselfe to propone anie matter for the commoditie of the prince and of the commonwealth: but hauing once spoken to anie bill, he may speake no more for that time.

Also euerie person once elected & chosen a knight, citizen or burgesse, and returned, cannot be dismissed out of that house; but being admitted, shall haue his place and voice there, if he be a lateman. But if by errour a man of the cleargie be chosen, then he ought and shall be dismissed; also if he be excommunicated, outlawed, or infamous.

Also euerie one of these houses ought to be incorrupt, no briber nor taker of anie rewards, gifts, or monie, either for deuising of anie bill, or for speaking of his mind; but to do all things vprightlie, and in such sort as best is for the king and commonwealth.

Also euerie one ought to be of a quiet, honest and gentle behauiour; none taunting, checking, or misusing an other in anie vnsemelie words or deeds: but all affections set apart, to do and indeuour in wisedome, sobrietie and knowledge, that which that place requireth.

Also if anie one do offend or misbehaue himselfe, he is to be corrected and punished by the aduise and order of the residue of the house.

Also all the prisons, wards, gaoles, within the realme and the keepers of the same are at the commandement of the parlement, for the custodie and safekeeping or punishment of all and euerie such prisoners, as shall be sent to anie of them by the said parlement houses, or anie of them: howbeit most commonlie the tower of London is the prison which is most vsed.

Also if anie one of the parlement house be serued, sued, arrested, or attached by anie writ, attachment, or minister of the Kings bench, Common pleas, Chancerie, or what court so euer within this realme: the partie so troubled and making complaint thereof to the parlement house: then forthwith a sargeant at armes is sent to the said court, not onelie aduertising that the partie so molested is one of the parlement house; but also inhibiting and commanding the officers of the said court to call in the said processe, and not to deale anie further against the said partie: for the parlement being the hiest court, all other courts as inferior yeeld and giue place to the same.

Also as euerie one of the parlement house is free for his owne person, for all manner of sutes to be commensed against him: so are also his seruants free, and not to be troubled nor molested; but being troubled, haue the like remedie as the maister hath or may haue.

Also no manner of person, being not one of the parlement house, ought to enter or come within the house, as long as the sitting is there, vpon paine of imprisonment, or such other punishment as by the house shall be ordered and adiudged.

Also euerie person of the parlement ought to keepe secret, and not to disclose the secrets and things spoken and done in the parlement house, to anie manner of person, vnlesse he be one of the same house, vpon paine to be sequestred out of the house, or otherwise punished, as by the order of the house shall be appointed.

Also none of the parlement house ought to depart from the parlement, without speciall leaue obteined of the speaker of the house, and the same his licence be also recorded.

Also no person, being not of the parlement house, ought to come into the same, during the time of the sitting: so euerie one comming into the same oweth a dutie and a reuerence, to be giuen when he entreth and commeth in.

If a baron or a lord come and enter into the higher house, he ought to do his obeisance before the cloth of estate, and so to take his place.

Also when he speaketh, he must stand bare headed, and speake his mind plainlie, sensiblie, & in decent order.

If anie come in message or be sent for to the higher house, they must staie at the inner doore vntill they be called in, and then being entred, must first make their obeisance; which done, to go to the lower end of the house, and there to staie vntill they be called: and being called, they must first make one lowe courtesie and obeisance, and going forwards must in the middle waie make one other lowe courtesie; and then being come forth to the barre, must make the third courtesie; the like must be done at the departure.

Also when anie knight, citizen or burgesse doth enter and come into the lower house, he must make his dutifull and humble obeisance at his entrie in: and then take his place. And yon shall vnderstand, that as euerie such person ought to be graue, wise, and expert; so ought he to shew himselfe in his apparell. For in time past, none of the councellors of the parlement came otherwise than in his gowne, and not armed nor girded with weapon. For the parlement house is a place for wise, graue, and good men; to consult, debate, and aduise, how to make lawes and orders for the commonwealth, and not to be armed as men readie to fight, or to trie matters by the sword. And albeit the writ for the election of the knights haue expresse words to chuse such for knights as be girded with the swoꝛd: yet it is not meant thereby that they should come and sit armed, but be such as be skilfull in feats of armes, and besides their good aduises can well serue in martiall affaires. And thus the Romane senatoꝛs vsed, who being men of great knowledge and experience, as well in martiall affaires, as in politike causes, sat alwaies in the senat house and places of councell in their gownes and long robes. The like also was alwaies and hath béene the oꝛder in the parlements of this realme, as long as the ancient lawes, the old customes, and good oꝛders thereof were kept and obserued.

knights

Also if anie other person oꝛ persons, either in message oꝛ being sent foꝛ, do come: he ought to be bꝛought in by the sergeant, and at the first entring must (following the sergeant) make one lowe obeisance, and being past in the middle waie, must make one other; and when he is come befoꝛe the speaker, he must make the third, and then do his message; the like oꝛder he must kéepe in his returne. But if he do come alone, oꝛ with his learned councell, to plead anie matter, oꝛ to answer to anie obiection: he shall enter, and go no further than to the bar within the doꝛe, and there to do his thꝛee obeisances.

Also when anie bill is committed, the committées haue not authoꝛitie to conclude, but onelie to oꝛder, reforme, examine, and amend the thing committed vnto them, and of their doings they must giue repoꝛt to the house againe, by whome the bill is to be considered.

Also euerie bill, which is bꝛought into the house, must be read thꝛee seuerall times, and vpon thꝛée seuerall daies.

Also euerie bill, which vpon anie reading is committed and returned againe, ought to haue his thꝛee readings, vnles the committées haue not altered the bill in anie substance oꝛ foꝛme, but onelie in certeine woꝛds.

Also when anie bill vpon anie reading is altogither by one consent reiected, oꝛ by voices after the third reading ouerthꝛown, it ought not to be bꝛought anie moꝛe to be read, during the sessions of parlement.

Also if anie man do speake vnto a bill, and be out of his matter; he ought to be put in remembꝛance of the matter by the speaker onelie and by none other, and be willed to come to the matter.

Also whensoeuer anie person doth speake to anie bill, he ought to stand vp, and to be bareheaded, and then with all reuerence, grauitie, and sémelie spéech to declare his mind. But whensoeuer anie bill shall be tried either foꝛ allowances, oꝛ to be reiected: then euerie one ought to sit, bicause he is then as a iudge.

Also euerie knight, citizen, and burgesse, befoꝛe he do enter into the parlement, and take his place there, ought to be swoꝛne and to take his oth, acknowledging the king to be the supꝛeme and onelie gouernour of all the estates within this realme, as also to renounce all foꝛren potentates.

The order of the beginning and ending of the parlement.

On the first daie of the summons foꝛ the parlement, the king in pꝛoper person (vnlesse he be sicke oꝛ absent out of the realme) being apparelled in his rotall and parlement robes, ought to be conducted and bꝛought by all his barons of the cleargie and laitie, and the commons summoned to the parlement, vnto the church, where ought a sermon to be made by some archbishop, bishop, oꝛ some other famous learned man. The sermon ended, he must in like oꝛder be bꝛought to the higher house of parlement, and there to take his seat vnder the cloth of estate: likewise euerie loꝛd and baron (in his degrée) ought to take his place.

This done, the loꝛd chancellоꝛ, oꝛ he whom the king appointeth to be the speaker of that house, maketh his oꝛation to the whole assemblie, declaring the causes whie and wherefoꝛe that parlement is called and summoned, exhoꝛting and persuading euerie man to do his best indeuour in all such matters as shall be in the said parlement pꝛoponed, as shall be most expedient foꝛ the gloꝛie of God, the honoꝛ of the king, and the commonwealth of the whole realme. Then he directeth his talke vnto the knights, citizens, and burgesses, aduertising them that the kings pleasure is, that they do repaire to their house; and there acoꝛding to the old and ancient custome, do chose and elect some one, wise, graue, and learned man among themselues to be speaker foꝛ them, and giueth them a daie when they shall pꝛesent him to the king. And these things thus done, the king ariseth, and euerie man departeth. This is accounted foꝛ the first daie of the parlement.

The second oꝛ third daie after, when the speaker is to be pꝛesented: the king with all his nobles (in like oꝛder as befoꝛe) do assemble againe in the higher house, and then come vp all the commons of the lower house, and then and there do pꝛesent their speaker vnto the king. The speaker foꝛthwith maketh his dutifull obeisances; beginneth and maketh his oꝛation befoꝛe the king, and pꝛosecuteth such matters as occasion serueth, and as is befoꝛe recited in the office of the speaker; and this done, euerie man departeth. And this is accounted foꝛ the beginning of the parlement, foꝛ befoꝛe the speaker be pꝛesented, and these things oꝛderlie done, there can no bils be put in, noꝛ matters be intreated of.

Lastlie when all matters of weight be discussed, ended, and determined, the king commandeth an end to be made. And that daie the king, his nobles, and commons do againe assemble in the higher house in their robes, and in like oꝛder as is befoꝛe recited, where the speaker maketh his oꝛation, and is answered by the loꝛd chancellоꝛ oꝛ speaker of the higher house. Then all the bils concluded and past in both houses, that is to saie, in the higher house of the loꝛds, and in the lower house of the commons, are there read by the titles: and then the king giueth his consent oꝛ dissent to euerie of them as he thinketh good. And when the titles of all the bils are read, the loꝛd chancellоꝛ oꝛ loꝛd speaker, by the kings commandement, pꝛonounceth the parlement to be pꝛoroged oꝛ cleane dissolued. And this is called the last daie oꝛ the end of the parlement, and euerie man is at libertie to depart homewards.

The mondaie following, sir Chꝛistopher Barnewell and his complices, hauing better considered of themselues, were quiet and contented, and the parlement begun with some troubles had his continuance and end with better successe. In the time of this parlement, and after the same, sundꝛie grieuous complaints were exhibited to the loꝛd deputie and councell by the late wife of the deceased baron of Dunboin, Mac Bꝛian Arra, Oliuer Fitzgirald, sir William Mcarell, and diuerse others the quéenes good subiects, against sir Edmund Butler and his bꝛethꝛen, foꝛ sundꝛie routs and riots, spoiles and outrages which they were charged to haue done vpon hir maiesties subiects. Wherevpon first letters and then commissioners were sent in to the counties of Kilkennie and Tipoꝛarle foꝛ the hearing and redꝛessing thereof: but they returned without doing of anie thing. Foꝛ sir Edmund, conceiuing some hard dealings to be meant toward him by the loꝛd deputie, Commissioners sent to heare the cõplaints made against the Butlers.

The noblemen & gentlemen in Mounster sent their messengers to the pope.

tie, and minding to stand vpon his defense and gard, did not appere before the said commissioners, but both he and his brethren combined themselues with James Fitzmoris Odesmond, Mac Artie More, Mac Donagh, and the seneschall of Imokillie and others of Mounster, who before (and vnwitting the Butlers) had sent the vsurped bishops of Cashell and Emelie togither with the yongest brother of the erle of Desmond vnto the pope & to the king of Spaine, for reformation of the popish religion, & for freing the land from the possession of hir maiestie and of the imperiall crowne. Which mater in the end brake out into an open and actuall rebellion, and the lord deputie by proclamation published them all to be traitors, and against whom he prepared an hosting. But before the same was fullie prepared, he sent his letters and commandement vnto sir Peter Carew knight then being at Leighlin, to enter into the action of warres against sir Edmund Butler, who being accompanied with capteine Gilbert, capteine Malbie, capteine Basenet, and others, latelie sent vnto him from the lord deputie, followed his commandement, and first assaulted the castell of Cloughgriman in the Dullogh belonging to sir Edmund Butler, and toke it, and gaue the spoile vnto the souldiers.

The noblemen & gentlemen in Mounster proclamed traitors.

Sr Peter Carew is cõmanded to serue against the Butlers.

Cloughgriman taken.

From thense they remoued to Kilkennie towne, where they laie for a time, where a man of the earle of Dzmonds, espieng vpon a certeine date sir Peter Carew to be walking in the garden of the castell of Kilkennie alone, he charged his peece, and leueled the same vnto the said Peter Carew, and minded to haue discharged it vpon him out of a window in the castell. At which verie instant a chapleine of the said earls & his steward, comming by him, & suspecting some euill thing towards, turned vp the mouth of the peece, which therewith was discharged, and so no bodie hurt; and vnderstanding the thing was meant against sir Peter Carew, blamed the fellow, and for a time thrust him out of the house. Whilest these capteins laie at Kilkennie, it was aduertised vnto them, that a great companie of the rebels were incamped about three miles out of the towne, & were there marching in verie good order. Wherevpon sir Peter Carew, being then the generall, assembled all the capteins, and taking their aduise what was best to be done, they concluded that Henrie Dauels a verie honest and a valiant English gentleman, who had serued long in that countrie, and was verie well acquainted, especiallie in those parts, for he had maried his wife out of that towne, and him they sent out to discouer the matter, who about three miles off had the view, and espied a great companie of about two thousand, resting vpon a little hill in the middle of a plaine, being all armed and marching in battell araie. When he returned with this report, then sir Peter Carew appointed the vward to capteine Gilbert, who togither with Henrie Dauels and twelue other persons of his companie galloped before the rest, and finding as it was before aduertised, gaue the charge. The residue of the companie followed with the like hast vnder sir Peter Carew, and then capteine Malbie, and capteine Basenet, seeing and assured that all things were clere behind them, followed so nere, that all the companie euen as it were at one instant gaue the like charge, where they slue foure hundred Gallowglasses at the least, besides others. The residue of the companie were fled into the mounteins fast by, and none or few escaped but the horsemen and Kerns. And of hir maiesties side no one man slaine, but a man of capteine Malbies was hurt.

Henrie Dauels sent to discouer the enimie.

Sir Peter Carew and the English capteins giueth charge vpon the rebels & haue the victorie.

Sir Peter Carew in danger to haue bene killed.

Sir Peter Carew, hauing had and obteined this victorie, and marching in good order, did returne with all his companie to the towne of Kilkennie, euerie capteine and souldier carieng two Gallowglasses in his hand, but left the spoile to their followers. Sir Edmund Butler at this instant was not in the campe, but was at his vncles house at dinner. The townesmen of Kilkennie were verie sorie for this the slaughter of so manie men. And yet neuertheless not long after, James Fitzmoris came to this towne, and besieged it; but the towne being well garnished with certeine soldiers, & they themselues well appointed, did so carefullie and narowlie loke to themselues, that they defended and kept the towne, notwithstanding all his force. But yet the countrie and other small townes did not so escape, for the countie of Waterford, and the lord Powre, the countie of Dublin, and all the countrie were spoiled, preied, and ouerrun; and among all others the old Fulco Quimerford a gentleman, of long time seruant to three earles of Dzmond, was robbed in his house at Callon of two thousand pounds, in monie, plate, and houshold stuffe, besides his corne and cattell. When they had taken their pleasure in this countrie, they went to the countie of Wexford, which thing had not lightlie bene seene before, and at a faire kept then at Enescorth, there the souldiers committed most horrible outrages, lamentable slaughters, filthie rapes, and deflourings of yong women, abusing mens wiues, spoiling the towne, & slaughtering of the men, and such as did escape the sword were caried captiues & prisoners. From hense they went into Osserie and into the quenes countie, and spoiled the countrie, burned townes and villages, murthered the people: and then they met with the earle of Clancare, and James Fitzmoris Desmond, with whom they then combined; and agreed to cause Tirlough Lennough to procure in the Scots, they sent new messengers to the pope, and to the king of Spaine. Finallie, nothing was left vndone, which might ante wales tend to the subuersion of hir maiesties imperiall crowne of Ireland, and to discharge that land from all Englishmen and English gouernement, and by these means (the English pale and the good cities & townes excepted) the most part, if not the whole land, was imbrued & infected with this rebellion.

James Fitzmoris besiegeth Kilkennie.

Fulco Quimerford spoiled & robbed.

A wicked massacre at Enescorth.

A wicked conspiracie & combining of the traitors.

The earle of Dzmond himselfe, a man of great honour and nobilitie, was all this time in England: but from time to time was aduertised of the troublesome state in that land: and whereof no little detriment redounded to his lordship, by reason that a great and most part of all his lordships throughout that land were spoiled and wasted, which did not so much greeue him as the follies of his brethren. For great were his griefs, & verie much was he vnquieted therewith: for when he bethought himselfe of his brethren, nature moued him, and reason persuaded him, that no such outragious parts could proceed from them, which in anie wales should either concerne hir maiestie, or the dishonour of him and his house, which hitherto hath bene alwaies found sound and true. Wherefore, when he heard of anie matter against them herein, he would plead their innocencies, and defend their causes, vntill such time as by credible letters, aduertisements, and reports, he saw apparant matter and manifest proofes of the contrarie. Which reports albeit they greeued him verie much, yet (as I said) nothing greeued him more, than their disloialtie and breach of dutie against hir maiestie, and the dishonour of his owne house. Wherefore to acquite himselfe and his dutie towards hir highnes: he offereth to serue against them & others, by the sword, or by some other means, to recouer and reclaime them.

The earle of Dzmonds lands spoiled.

The good affection of the earle of Dzmond to his brethren.

The earle of Dzmond offereth to serue against his brethren.

Wherevpon hir maiestie, standing assured of his his fidelitie, and hauing a speciall trust in him, sent him ouer into Ireland, who arriued at Wexford the foureteenth of August 1569, at that verie time when that wicked maslaker was committed and donne at the faire at Innescorth. Immediatlie vpon his landing, he aduertiseth vnto the lord deputie his comming, and with all conuenient spéed maketh his repaire vnto him, who then was incamped and laie nére Limerike: and then and there offereth his seruice with all his best power, and brought with him his brother Edmund Butler, who in the open view and sight of the whole campe did yéeld and submit himselfe simplie to hir maiesties mercie, confessing his follie and craning pardon. And then was he deliuered to the earle his brother vpon his bonds, to bee forth comming before the said lord deputie at his comming to Dublin: and also promised to doo the like with his two other brothers, which he did vpon the sixteenth of October 1569. At which time when they all appeared before the lord deputie and councell, they were charged with manie and sundrie things: but sir Edmund Butler for himselfe alledged, that others were the causers whie he did that which he did. And for himselfe he alledged, first that the lord deputie did not broke nor like him, for he could haue no iustice at his hands, nor against sir Peter Carew, who claimed and had entered vpon some part of his lands, nor yet against any other person. Then that the said lord deputie had threatned him that he would lie in his skirts, and would pull downe his lottie lokes. Thirdlie, that the said lord deputie should go about to kill all the Butlers in Ireland, and would then go into England, and there would doo manie things.

The earle of Ormond arriueth at Wexford.

The earle repaireth to the lord deputie.

Edmund Butler submitteth him selfe.

Sir Edmund Butlers excuses.

When all these things were heard at full, and nothing in proofe falling out as was auouched, the three brethren were committed to ward into the castell of Dublin, out of which sir Edmund escaped, and made breach: neuertheless the earle brought him againe. And vpon the last of Februarie 1569 he brought also his two other brethren, for whome he had vndertaken, and presented them before the lord deputie and councell, where the matter being heard at large, the councell conferred hereof among themselues, and in the end they all the three brethren were againe called before the lord deputie and councell, and then and there kneeling vpon their knées, did confesse their follies, and submitted themselues in all dutifulnesse and simplicitie to the quéens mercie: where the earle not onlie naturallie as a brother made humble petition for them: but grauelie as a father recited their errors, reproued them of their outrages, and counselled them to their duties: and in the end condescended in the due consideration of hir maiesties roiall estate. And thereupon they were committed to safe kéeping within hir maiesties castell of Dublin, at hir highnesse disposition; and not long after vpon hope of amendment were pardoned. But to the matter againe.

1569

The loue and prauitie of the earle of Ormond to his brethren.

The lord deputie followed his first begun hosting, who when he was incamped nære Clomnell, where it was thought he should haue béene fought withall, he wrote to the maior and his brethren of the citie of Waterford, to send vnto him the assistance of a few souldiers onelie for three daies; who did verie insolentlie and arrogantlie returne an answer by waie of disputing their liberties with hir maiesties prerogatiue, and so sent him no aid at all. Wherein the more they shewed their affection to the rebels; the more was their ingratitude & disloialtie to hir highnesse, the reward whereof they felt in the end. The camp at this time being within half a mile of Clomnell, the lord deputie before his dislodging from thense went into the towne, where the souereigne and his brethren receiued him with all the honour they could, and gaue him a banket in their townehouse; where, vnto them & the whole multitude then present, he made a verie eloquent speach, teaching them the dutifulnesse and obedience of a subiect, and the great inconuenience which groweth by the contrarie to all commonwealths, and each member of the same: and therefore laieng before them their present estate for example, did moue and persuade them to hold fast the dutie & obedience which they owght to hir maiestie, and not to be dismaid at the doings of the rebels and disobedient: who though for a time they had their will and pleasure, yet God, in whose hand is the heart of the prince, and vnder whome all kings and princes doo rule, hath béene alwaies, is, and will be, a swift reuenger against them for the same: euen as of the contrarie he sendeth his manifold blessings of peace, wealth and prosperitie to the obedient and dutifull subiect. And so hauing vsed sundrie and notable sentences and examples to this effect, he left them and returned to his campe.

The citie of Waterford standing vpon their liberties refuse to send aid to the lord deputie.

The lord deputie went into Clomnell & vseth verie good speeches vnto them.

And from thense he remoued and marched towards Cashell, which lieth in the countie of Tipperarie, nére vnto which place Edmund Butler had warded a castell: who when he saw the armie approching, he set all the out houses on fire, and prepared themselues to defend the pile. The lord deputie taking the same as a defiance, approched thereunto and besieged it: and whilest the assault was in preparing, it was yéelded by composition, and after restored to one Cantrell the owner thereof. From thense by iournies he marched and went to Corke, being met in the waie by the vicounties of Roch and Barrie, and by sir Corman Mac Teege: and being aduertised that Fitzedmund seneschall of Imokillie, a principall rebell, and combined with James Fitzmoris, had spoiled and preied the whole countrie, and had also warded and victualled his castell of Balie martyr, which by his tenure he was of himselfe bound to maintaine and defend it, he marched thither and laid siege to the same, and in the end tooke it full of victuels. But the seneschall in the dead of the night fled out through a hole of the house in a bog, and there escaped.

Balie martyr a castell of the seneschals besieged and taken.

The seneschall escapeth out of his castell.

The spoile was giuen to the souldiers, & the castell with a gard of twentie men was giuen to Jasper Horsete, & so he returned to Corke, and from thense he tooke iourneie to Kilmallocke, and finding that place most necessarie for a fort, he appointed and named Humfrete Gilbert hir maiesties seruant to be coronell, and besides his owne band of an hundred horssemen he appointed foure hundred footmen, and certeine Kernes there to remaine. And there he did knit and conioine vnto him by oth, and vnder good pledges, the vicounties of Roch and Dessis, with the lord Powre, the lord Courcie, sir Corman Mac Teege, sir Donogh Clancartie, and Barrie Oge, and the most part of the freeholders in the counties of Limerike and Corke. And this donne he passed by iourneies to Limerike, and from thense he went to Gallewaie, and there established a president and a councell, and placed sir Edward Fitton to be lord president, the earles of Thomond and Clanricard, and all the noble men & septs of gentlemen of that prouince yéelding to the same.

Humfrete Gilbert made coronell of Mounster.

Sir Edward Fitton made president of Connagh.

Thense he marched to Athlon, taking in the waie the castell of Rosocomen, which he left with the ward of twentie horssemen, to Thomas le Strange, and then dismissed the armie; but himselfe by iourneies trauelled and came to Dublin, and there remained. Capteine Gilbert in the meane time, hauing a speciall respect and regard to his charge, his valiancie and courage was such, and his good hap so well answering his worthie and forward attempts, that he in short time broke the hearts, and appalled the Capteine Gilberts good seruice.

the courages of all the rebels in Mounſter, and no rebell knowne left in effect, which dare to withſtand and make anie reſiſtance againſt him. And to ſuch an obedience he brought that countrie, that none did or would refuſe to come vnto him, if he were ſent for but by a horſſe boy: for all yéelded vnto him, ſome by putting in recogniſances, & ſome by giuing of pledges, and all in ſéeking mercie and pardon.

The earle of Clancare ſubmitteth himſelfe to captaine Gilbert.

And that proud earle of Clancare, which in his glorie not long before vſurped this name to be king of Mounſter; euen he now, and Mac Donagh his chiefe follower, went to Limerike vnto him, and there falling vpon their knées acknowledged their treſons, and moſt humblie deſired hir maieſties pardon: and offered to put in his eldeſt ſonne, and the ſonnes of his chiefeſt freeholders for pledges and hoſtages. Likewiſe the preſident of Connagh in ſuch wiſedome, courage, & vprightneſſe, directed his gouernement, that he was obeied of all the whole people in that prouince, as well the nobilitie as the commons. The wicked he ſpareth not, but being found faultie either in open ſeſſions, or by martiall inquiſition, he cauſeth to be executed: and by theſe meanes hauing rid awaie the moſt notable offendors and their fotterers, the whole prouince reſted in good quietneſſe and in dutifull obedience to hir maieſtie and hir lawes.

The good ſeruice of ſir Edward Fitton lord preſident in Connagh.

The Cauenaghs, the ancient enimies to the Engliſh gouernement, and who in the rebellion were conioined with the Butlers: theſe bordering vpon the frontiers appointed to ſir Peter Carew, were ſo by him chaſed and perſecuted, that finding no place of reſt or quietneſſe, he hath brought them to ſubmit themſelues ſimplie to hir maieſties mercie, and haue put in their pledges to abide ſuch orders and conditions as ſhall be laid vpon them. Turlogh Lennogh in Vlſter, being at ſuper with his now wife, aunt to the earle of Argile, was ſhot through the bodie with two pellets out of a caliuer, by a teaſter or rimer of the Donloghs. Whereupon the Scots whome he reteined were in a maze, and the countrie ſtanding vpon the election of a new captaine: howbeit, he was in hope of recouerie. And thus after long troubles was the ſtate of the whole realme recouered to quietneſſe. Wherupon captaine Gilbert, when he had ſetled Mounſter in outward appéarance in a moſt perfect quietneſſe, and brought it to good conformitie: he made his repaire to Dublin to the lord deputie, where he aduertiſed and recounted all his doings at full.

The Cauenaghs ſubmiſſions.

Turlogh ſhot through with two bullets.

And hauing matters of great importance in England, he deſired licence to depart ouer: whome the ſaid deputie did not onelie moſt courteouſlie receiue; but alſo moſt thankefullie did accept his good ſeruice, and in ſome part of recompenſe, vpon Newyeares daie in the church at Drogheda, he did beſtow vpon him the order of knighthood; which he well deſerued, and at his departure gaue him letters of credit to hir highneſſe, and to the lords of the councell. And now by the waie, if without offenſe a man maie, after the maner of Cambrenſis in his hiſtorie, and after the vſage of noble gouernors and captains in other realmes, who for the increaſe of vertue, and incouraging of worthie perſons, do attribute to ſuch as do deſerue well their due praiſes & commendations, I hope it ſhall not be offenſiue to the reader, nor impertinent to the hiſtorie, to ſet downe ſomewhat of much, what maie be ſaid of theſe two worthie perſonages, ſir Peter Carew, and ſir Humfrie Gilbert: both which were of one countrie and birth, borne in the countie of Deuon, and of nére bloud, kinred, and conſanguinitie.

Drogheda.

Captaine Gilbert dubbed knight.

The deſcription of ſir Humfreie Gilbert, and his deſcent.

Sir Humfreie Gilbert, he was a ſecond brother, and borne of a great parentage, whoſe anceſtors came and deſcended from the earle of Cornewall, a man of a higher ſtature than of the common ſort, & of complexion cholerike; from his childhood of a verie pregnant wit and good diſpoſition: his father died leauing him verie yong, and he conceiuing ſome great good thing to come of his towardneſſe, prouided ſome portion of liuing to mainteine and kéepe him to ſchoole. And after his death, his mother, being no leſſe carefull of him, did cauſe him to be ſent to ſchoole to Eton college; from thenſe, after he had profited in the elements & principall points of grammar, he was ſent to Oxford, & did there proſper & increaſe verie well in learning and knowledge. And being (as his friends thought) verie well furniſhed, they would haue put him to the ins of court. But an aunt of his, named miſtres Katharine Aſhleie, who was attendant to the quœnes maieſtie, after that ſhe ſaw the yong gentleman, and had had ſome conference with him, ſhe fell in ſuch liking with him, that ſhe preferred him vnto hir maieſties ſeruice: and ſuch was his countenance, forwardneſſe, and behauiour, that hir maieſtie had a ſpeciall good liking of him; and verie oftentimes would familiarlie diſcourſe and conferre with him in matters of learning. After a few yeares ſpent in the court, he paſſed ouer into Ireland, being commended by hir highneſſe to ſir Henrie Sidneie then lord deputie: who gaue him interteinement, and made him a captaine ouer an hundred horſſemen; wherein he ſo well acquited himſelfe, that he was alſo made coronell of Mounſter; and had appointed vnto him, beſides his owne band of one hundred horſſemen, foure hundred kotemen, beſides ſuch Geraldines as Thomas of Deſmond, brother to the erle of Deſmond had procured, & vpon his oth of lotaltie and pledges had promiſed his faithfull ſeruice.

The valiantnes in ſeruice, and the wiſedome in gouernement of ſir Humfreis Gilbert.

And albeit he were but yong of yeares, which might ſéeme to hinder his credit: yet ſuch was his deuout mind to ſerue hir maieſtie, and ſo effectuallie to his great praiſe he followed the ſame; that with manie good gifts and excellent vertues he ſo ſupplied euen as much as manie men of elder yeares & greater experience did not commonlie atteine vnto. For in ſeruice vpon the enimie he was as valiant and couragious as no man more; and ſo good was his hap to anſwer the ſame: for he alwaies for the moſt part daunted the enimie, and appalled their courages; as did appéere in the ouerthrow giuen néere Kilkennie in the Butlers warres, when he with twelue perſons gaue the onſet vpon a thouſand men, of which ſir hundred were armed Gallowglaſſes, who then were ouerthrowne: and likewiſe in Mounſter, which was altogither vp in rebellion; and he coronell, did not onelie in martiall affaires ſhew himſelfe moſt valiant; and in ſhort time reduced the whole troope of the rebels, and the proudeſt of them to obedience, hauing vnder him but fiue hundred againſt ſundrie thouſands; and inforced that proud earle of Clancart to follow him to Limerike, and there humblie vpon his knées to aſke pardon and mercie: but alſo, after that he had ſubdued and ouercome them, did moſt vprightlie order and direct his gouernement, and with all indifferencie would heare, decide, & determine the complaints & griefs, and compound all the cauſes of euerie ſuitor. Which was ſo rare a thing in one of his yeares, as ſcarſe was credible, had not eie witneſſes and dailie experience proued and iuſtified the ſame.

After that he had eſtabliſhed peace and tranquillitie in that countrie, he went to Dublin; where when he had recounted all his ſeruices, and the good ſucceſſe thereof; and in what quiet ſtate he left the countrie, he deſired leaue to paſſe ouer into England, for and about certeine matters of great importance, which which he had to follow, which he did obteine: as also in reward of his seruice, and for his good deserts he (as is before said) was honored and dubbed a knight; and with letters in his praise and commendation to hir maiestie, and the lords of the councell, he departed. Assone as he had presented himselfe before hir highnesse, hir good countenance and fauour, in respect of his good seruice to hir maiestie was increased and doubled; and he specially aboue all others magnified and well accepted. Not long after, he was maried to a yong gentlewoman, and an inheritrix: and thensefoorth he gaue himselfe to studies perteining to the state of gouernement, and to nauigations. He had an excellent and readie wit, and therwith a tong at libertie to vtter what he thought. Which being adorned with learning and knowledge, he both did and could notablie discourse anie matter in question concerning either of these, as he made good proofe thereof, as well in familiar conference with the noble, wise, and learned; as also in the open assemblies of the parlements, both in England and in Ireland: in which he shewed the great value of knowledge, wisedome, and learning which was in him, and the great zeale he had to the commonwelth of his countrie. He had a great delight in the studie of cosmographie, and especiallie in nauigations; and finding out by his studies, certeine nations and vnknowne lands, which being found, might redound to the great benefit of his countrie: he made hir maiestie acquainted therewith, and obteined of hir a licence to make a nautigation, which he toke in hand. But before he could compasse the same to effect, he was in a foule storme drowned at the seas. Onelie he of all his brethren had fiue sonnes and one daughter, children by their countenances giuing a hope of a good towardnesse. And albeit he in person be deceassed, yet in their visages, and in the memorall of his great vertues, and a life well spent, he shall liue in fame immortall. Thus much without offense, and not altogither impertinent, concerning this gentleman, and now to the historie.

Sir Humfrete Gilbert is drowned.

Turlogh Lenough thinking to inuade vpon the English pale, for the bending of the lord deputies force against him, he was repressed, and driuen to kéepe himselfe within his owne limits, and by that meanes brought to disperse his power: for being not able to paie and satisfie the Scots, the one was wearie of the other; and his wife and he not agréeing, they were vpon a point to sunder. The earle of Thomond reuolteth from his due obedience, and becommeth a rebell: whome the earle of Ormond so hardlie pursued, that he draue him out of that land, and he fled into France, and from thense into England. For the discouerie of whose treasons and rebellions to hir maiestie & to the lords of the councell, one Rafe Rockeleie chiefe iustice of Connaugh was sent into England, where after long sute made for his submission, he was sent backe into Ireland, there to receiue according to his deserts: hir maiesties pleasure yet being such, that if he were not found culpable of treason against the state, that he should be spared from iudgement of death.

Turlogh Lenough prepareth to inuade the English pale.

The earle of Thomond reuolteth.

The earle of Ormond followeth the earle of Thomond, and driueth him out of the land.

This yéere the quenes maiestie, considering the good seruice of Lucas Dillon hir generall attorneie in Ireland, was vpon the death of baron Bath made chéefe baron of the exchéker there; & capteine Piers for his good seruice at Knockfergus was liberallie considered and countenanced by hir maiestie. And likewise after manie motions, sutes, and requests made to hir maiestie for a president and councell to be established in Mounster; and the same once determined and appointed: but by the sicknesse and vnabilitie of sir John Pollard, appointed to be the president, it was lingered and deferred, is now reuiued and renewed: and sir John Perot knight was made lord president, and a councell of good assistants chosen, as also his diet houses, interteinment, and all other things necessarie ordered, assigned, and appointed. This knight was borne in Penbrokeshire in Southwales, and one of great reuenues and worship, valiant, and of great magnanimitie; and so much the more meet to gouerne and tame so faithlesse and vnrulie a people, as ouer whome he was now made ruler. They heard no sooner of his comming, but as a sort of wasps they fling out, and reuolting from their former feined obedience, became open rebelles and traitors vnder James Fitzmoris an archtraitor, and as dogs they returne to their vomit, and as swine to their durt and puddles.

Lucas Dillon made chéef baron.

Sir John Perot appointed to be lord president of Mounster.

The rebelling of Mounster against the president.

And here may you sée the nature and disposition of this wicked, ekrenated, barbarous, and vnfaithfull nation, who (as Cambrensis writeth of them) they are a wicked and peruerse generation, constant alwaies in that they be alwaies inconstant, faithfull in that they be alwaies vnfaithfull, and trustie in that they be alwaies trecherous and vntrustie. They doo nothing but imagin mischeefe, & haue no delite in anie good thing. They are alwaies working wickednes against the good, and such as be quiet in the land. Their mouths are full of vnrighteousnesse, and their tongs speake nothing but cursednesse. Their feet swift to shed blood, & their hands imbrued in the blood of innocents. The waies of peace they know not, & in the paths of righteousnesse they walke not. God is not knowne in their land, neither is his name called rightlie vpon among them. Their quéene and souereigne they obeie not, and hir gouernment they allow not: but as much as in them lieth doo resist hir imperiall estate, crowne, and dignitie. It was not much aboue a yeare past, that capteine Gilbert with the sword so persecuted them, and in iustice so executed them, that then they in all humblenesse submitted themselues, craued pardon, and swore to be for euer true and obedient: which, so long as he mastered and kept them vnder, so long they performed it; but the cat was no sooner gone, but the mise were at plaie; and he no sooner departed from them, but forthwith they skipped out, and cast from themselues the obedience and dutifulnesse of true subiects. For such a peruerse nature they are of, that they will be no longer honest and obedient, than that they cannot be suffered to be rebelles. Such is their stubbornesse and pride, that with a continuall feare it must be bridled; and such is the hardnesse of their hearts, that with the rod it must be still chastised and subdued: for no longer feare, no longer obedience; and no longer than they be ruled with seueritie, no longer will they be dutifull and in subiection; but will be as they were before, false, trucebreakers & traitorous. Being not much vnlike to Mercurie called quicke siluer, which let it by art be neuer so much altered and transposed, yea and with fire consumed to ashes; yet let it but rest a while vntouched nor medled with, it will returne againe to his owne nature, and be the same as it was at the first. And euen so dailie experience teacheth it to be true in these people. For withdraw the sword, and forbeare correction, deale with them in courtesie, and intreat them gentlie, if they can take anie aduantage, they will surelie skip out; and as the dog to his vomit, and the sow to the durt & puddle they will returne to their old and former insolencie, rebellion, and disobedience. This is to be meant of the Irishrie and sauage people, who the further they are from the prince and court, the further from dutie and obedience; the more they are vnder their Obrian gouernment, the lesse dutifull to their naturall souereigne and prince. But concern-

The nature of quicke siluer.

ting the inhabitants in the English pale, and all cities and townes, the contrarie (God be praised) is dailie seene.

The gouernment of sir John Perot.

Well, this worthie knight knowing that he should haue to doo with a sort of netles, whose nature is, that being handled gentlie, they will sting; but being hard crushed togither, they will doo no harme: euen so he began with them. The sword and the law he made to be the foundation of his gouernement, by the one he persecuted the rebell and disobedient, and by the other he ruled and gouerned in iustice and iudgement. Great troubles he had in both, but little he did preuaile in the latter, before he had ouercome the first: and therefore minding to chastise the rebelles, and to bring them to obedience, he followed and chased them from place to place: in the bogs he pursued them, in the thickets he followed them, in the plaines he fought with them, and in their castels and holds he besæged them, and would neuer suffer them to be at rest and quietnesse, vntill he had tired and wearied them out, and at length inforced James Fitzmoris and his complices to come vnto Killmalocke vnto him, and there simplie to submit himselfe, and vpon his knees in the open sight of all the people to confesse his disloialties, and in all humble manner to craue mercie and pardon. Whome though vntill hir maiesties pleasure knowne he did forbeare, yet the residue he spared not; but after their deserts he executed in infinit numbers. And hauing thus rid the garden from these weeds, and roted vp the fields from these thornes, he entreth into the gouernement by order of law, and from place to place throughout all Mounster he trauelleth and keepeth his sessions and courts, hearing euerie mans complaints, and redressing their greefes, and in short time brought the same to such a quietnesse and peaceable estate, that whereas no man before could passe through the countrie, but was in danger to be murdered and robbed, and no man durst to turne his cattell into the fields without watch, and to keepe them in barnes in the night time: now euerie man with a white sticke onelie in his hands, and with great treasures might and did trauell without feare or danger where he would (as the writer hereof by triall knew it to be true) and the white sheepe did keepe the blacke, and all the beasts laie continuallie in the fields, without anie stealing or preieng.

His seruice against the rebelles.

James Fitzmoris seeketh for peace, and submitteth himselfe.

The ciuill gouernement of sir John Perot.

The quietnes and safetie in Mounster.

Now when he had thus quieted this prouince, and setled all things in good order, then he beginneth to reforme their maners in life and common conuersation and apparell, suffering no glibes nor like vsages of the Irishrie to be vsed among the men, nor the Egyptiacall rolles vpon womens heads to be worne. Whereat though the ladies and gentlewomen were somewhat greeued, yet they yelded: and giuing the same ouer, did weare hats after the English manner. In this his seruice he had two verie good & notable assistants, the one concerning the martiall affaires, and the other for his gouernement by the course and order of the law. Concerning the affaires martiall George Bourchier esquier was ioined with him in commission, and did him notable good seruice, he was the third sonne to John earle of Bath, whose ancestors were descended from out of the loines of kings, and men of great honor and nobilitie; and they were no more noble of bloud than valiant, wise and prudent in all their actions, both in the seruices of chiualrie and matters of policies, and whereof the histories of England in manie places doo make mention and report. And this gentleman, hauing some motion of the value and valiantnesse of his ancestors derived and descended vpon him, was affected and giuen to all feats of chiualrie, and especiallie to the seruice in the warres, wherein he prooued a verie good souldior, and an expert capteine, both as an horseman, and as a foteman, both which waies he serued, as the seruice and time required. If he serued vpon foot, he was apparelled in the manner of a Kerne and a foot souldior, and was so light of foot as no Kerne swifter: for he would pursue them in bogs, in thickets, in woods, in passes, and in streicts whatsoeuer; and neuer leaue them, vntill he did performe the charge and seruice committed vnto him. If he were to serue vpon his horsebacke, his dailie seruice can witnes sufficientlie how much, and how often he preuailed against the enimie, and appalled their courages, and with whome he would incounter if he might by anie meanes.

Sir John Perots assistants.

George Bourchier his birth and seruices.

Notwithstanding, as courageous and circumspect as he was, that he would not be lightlie intrapped in the field, yet was he deceiued in the house. For vnder the colour of a parlée, and vpon a truce taken, he was inuited to a supper: and little thinking that anie breach of the truce should be made, he went into the castell whereas he was bidden. But in his being there, he was taken prisoner, and handfasted, and so kept for a space; but yet not long after he was restored and set at libertie. Concerning his other assistant, his name was George Welsh borne in Waterford, and a gentleman of an ancient familie, he was brought vp in learning, and was a student in the innes of court at London, and prospered verie well therein: and albeit his yeares were but yong, yet his knowledge, grauitie, and sinceritie counteruailed the same with an ouerplus. In deciding of all matters he was vpright and iust, being not affectionated nor knowne to be corrupted for anie mans pleasure. In iudgement vpright, in iustice seuere, and without respect of persons would minister what the law had prescribed, he spared neither partie, nor would be affected to anie; by which meanes he did maruellous much good in that seruice, and happie was that gouernor that had so good a counsellor.

George Bourchier taken prisoner.

George Welsh a lawier, well learned, and vpright.

1571 Sir William Fitzwilliams made lord deputie.

Immediatlie vpon the placing of this gouernement in Mounster, sir Henrie Sidnete had libertie and licence to returne ouer into England, and receiued hir maiesties letters dated the thirteenth of December one thousand fiue hundred seuentie and one, & in the thirteenth yeere of hir maiesties reigne, for the placing of sir William Fitzwilliams to be lord deputie in his place. Which when he had done, he passed ouer the seas, and by iournies came to the court. He was verie honorablie receiued, and by hir highnesse well commended, there being sundrie noblemen and gentlemen of the court, which met him before he came to Whitehall, where hir maestie then laie, who (as time conuenient serued) did recount vnto hir the whole estate in all things of the realme of Ireland, which hir maestie liked verie well.

But this sir John Perot president of Mounster continued still in his office, and there remained for certeine yeares vntill he was reuoked, which was too soone for that countrie. For neuer man was more fit gouernour for that effrenated and hardnecked people than was he, nor was that countrie euer in better estate for wealth, peace and obedience, than he in the time of his gouernement did reduce the same vnto. Happie was that prouince, and happie were those people, which being eaten out, consumed and deuoured with caterpillers, he had brought and reformed to a most happie, peaceable, and quiet estate; and he left it euen in the same maner. Which if it had beene continued by the like, to haue followed him in the gouernement, the same would so haue continued: but the want of the one was in short time the decaie of the other, and that reformed countrie brought to a most miserable estate, as by the consequence may may appere.

Sir William Fitzwilliams, hauing a speciall care and respect to his charge and office, disposeth all things in the best order he could by the aduise of the councell, and finding the state somewhat quiet, sauing Mounster, his care and studie was so to keepe and mainteine it. And he being a wise and a graue man, and of so great experience in that land, he drawe the plot of his gouernement into certeine speciall points and articles. First, that the religion e- The points of sir william Fitzwilliams lord deputies gouernement.
stablished according to Gods holie word, should Religion.
haue a free passage through the whole land, and by e- The common peace.
uerie man aswell of the clergie as of the laitie to be receiued, imbraced and followed. Then that the common peace and quietnesse throughout the whole land might and should be conserued, and all occasions of the breach thereof, and of all mutinies and diuisions to be cut off. Thirdlie, that hir maiesties great and excessiue charges to the consuming of hir treasure The sauing of expenses.
might be shortened, and hir reuenues well husbanded and looked vnto, according to hir sundrie com- Lawes to be executed.
mandements tofore giuen. Lastlie, that the lawes and iustice might haue their due course and be current throughout the whole land, and the iudges and officers should vprightlie minister iustice to each Souldiers to be kept in their discipline.
man according to his desert, and that all the souldiers should be kept in that discipline as to them apperteineth.

These considerations and such like, being ordered and established with the consent and aduise of the whole councell, and well liked of euerie good subiect, bicause the same was grounded vpon verie good reasons: yet it toke not that effect as it was meant and wished it should. For that wicked race of the Irishrie, in whom was no zeale in religion, and lesse obedience to hir maiestie, and least care to liue in an honest conuersation and common societie, but alwaies watching the best opportunitie and time to breake out into their wonted outrages, robberies, and rebellions: these (I saie) in sundrie places be- Brian Mac Kahir his warres in Wexford.
gin to plate their pagents. The first was Brian Mac Kahir of Knocking in the countie of Caterlough Cauenagh, who vpon certeine wrongs which he complained he had receiued by one Robert Browne of Malrenkam, he tyrannized ouer the whole countrie, committed manie outrages and spoiles, preied the countrie, & burned sundrie towns. Likewise the gentlemen of the countie of Wexford, and namelie sir Nicholas Deuereur knight, being greeued with the death of Robert Browne, who was his nephue, being his sisters sonne, were as vnquiet on their parts, and all rose vp in armour against Brian Mac Kahir, and each one with all the forces they could make did resist the other, so that all the whole countrie was thereby in a verie troublesome state; and no end could be had before they had tried it with the sword. For the Wexford men following their matters verie egarlie, and being in a great companie well appointed, they sought out Brian Mac Kahir, and gaue the onset vpon him; but he so watched the matter, and toke them at that aduantage, that although he and his companie were but Brian Mac Kahir hath the victorie of the wexford men.
small in respect of the others, yet he gaue them the foile and ouerthrow, and killed the most principall gentlemen of that shire about or aboue thirtie persons. Thomas Masterson.

In this companie was an English gentleman, who after was in great credit & office among them, and he in danger to haue drunken of the same cup, was driuen to leape vp on horsebacke behind another man, and so escaped, or else he had neuer béene seneschall of that prouince. After this fight, though the grudge were not forgotten nor a reuenge vnsought, yet by little and little it quailed. About two yeares after, Brian Mac Kahir made humble suites to the lord deputie for his pardon, and submitted himselfe to his lordships deuotion, confessing in writing his fowle disorders and outrages; and yet firmlie auouching that the quarell did not begin by him nor by his meanes: his submission was such and in so humble sort, as that he obteined the same. And according to his promise then made, he did thenseforth vse and behaue himselfe most dutifullie, and liued in a verie good order. This Brian was a Cauenaugh, and the sonne of Charels, the sonne of Arthur, which Arthur was by king Henrie the eight made a baron for terme of his life: for he was a man of great power within the counties of Wexford & Catherlough. And this Brian Mac Kahir Mac Arthur was a yonger sonne to Charels, but the chiefest for valiantnesse, magnanimitie and wisedome; and none of all the sept of the Cauenaughs, though they were manie and valiant men, to be compared vnto him euerie waie, and vnto whom they all would giue place. Brian Mac Kahir his submission. Brian Mac Kahir what he was.

Now he being assured of them, and also being allied by marriage vnto Hewen Mac Shane, whose daughter he married, he was also assured of the Obirnes and of the Omeroughs, & so a man of great strength and ablitie. He became in the end to be a follower vnto sir Peter Carew, with whom he neuer brake his promise, but stood him in great steed aswell in matters of counsell, as of anie seruice to be done in those parts. A man (which is rare among these people) verie constant of his word, and so faithfullie he serued, and so much he honoured sir Peter Carew, that after his death, being as one maimed, he consumed and pined awaie, and died in peace. The strength of Brian Mac Kahir. Brian Mac Kahir is a follower to sir Peter Carew.

The Omores, notwithstanding the earle of Kildare was waged by hir maiestie to persecute and chastise them, yet without anie resistance or impechment they rage and outrage in all traitorous manner and rebellious disorders. They inuaded the English pale, spoiled and burned sundrie townes and villages, and carried the preies and pillage with them without anie resistance. The whole prouince of Connagh was altogither in actuall rebellion by the earle Clanricard sonnes, and they for their aid had called & waged a thousand Scots. And though they and the Irishrie were of diuerse nations, yet of one and of the same dispositions and conditions, being altogither giuen to all sinne and wickednes, and their harts were altogither imbrued in bloud and murther. The earle himselfe was at this time prisoner in the castell of Dublin for the same rebellion, who hearing of the outrages of his sonnes, made suite to the lord deputie, that if he might be set at libertie, he would vndertake to bring in his sons, and to quiet the countrie. The Omores rebell. All Connagh in actuall rebellion. The false dissembling of the earle of Clanricard.

The lord deputie, desiring nothing more than peace, after sundrie conferences had with him, did by the aduise of the councell inlarge him, in an assured hope that he would effectuallie performe in deed what he had promised in word. But he came no sooner home among his people, and had conferred with his sonnes, but he forgat his promise and performed nothing at all. Likewise the Ochonners and the Omores, accompanied with a rable of like rebels, fall into open rebellion, spoile the countrie, deuoure the people, and make all waste and desolate. Tirlough Lenough in Vlster was readie to reuolt, but that he stood in doubt of the earle of Esser, who lieng vpon the fines and marches in Vlster, was not onelie in readinesse to haue bearded him: but also he had set Odonelle in open warres against him. Mounster was likewise in open rebellion. But sir John Perot then president so coursed and followed them, that notwithstanding a great combination and league The Ochonners and the Omores rebell.

The distressed mind of the lord deputie.

was betweene James Fitzmoris and all the rebels in Connagh and Leinster, yet he kept them asunder and so sharpelie pursued James, that he left him no one place to rest in, nor anie followers to follow him. Besides these vniuersall troubles, which were sufficient to haue apalled the best and wisest gouernour, these three things increased his griefe and sorrow. First the losse of a most faithfull councellor and one of his chiefest and trustiest assistants doctor Weston then lord chancellor, whom it pleased God to call out of this miserable life, a man in his life time most godlie, vpright and vertuous, and such a one as that place was not possessed of the like in manie currents of yeares, in his life most vertuous and godlie, in matters of councell most sound and perfect, in iustice most vpright and vncorrupted, in hospitalitie verie bountious and liberall, and in manners and conuersation most courteous and gentle, faithfull to his prince, firme to his friend, and courteous to all men. And as was his life so was his death, who a little before the same called his household, and gaue them such godlie instructions, as to their callings apperteined. Then he set his priuate things in order, and he spent all the time that he had in praiers and exhortations.

The death of doctor weston lord chancellor.

At last, feeling a declination towards, he appointed a generall communion to be had of his household and friends in his chamber, vnto which all the councell came and were partakers. And then these godlie actions finished, he gaue a most godlie exhortation to the councell, persuading them to be vertuous and zelous in Gods true religion: then to be mindfull of their duties to hir maiestie, and lastlie remembring their callings and estate, and the great charge of the gouernement laid vpon them and committed vnto them, that they would be valiant, carefull, and studious to performe the same, as might be to the glorie of God, honor to the queene, & benefit to the whole realme. Which points he handled so godlie, learnedlie & effectuallie, that he made their teares to trill, and their hearts to be heauie. After this done he bid them farewell, and not long after he being feruent in his praiers, he died most godlie, vertuoustie, and christian like.

The earle of Desmond breaketh prison.

The next was the breach of the earle of Desmond, who was a prisoner in the castell of Dublin, and he hauing giuen his faith and oth to be a true prisoner, and to shew himselfe a dutifull subiect, did yet make his escape: which being done in so troublesome a time, it was doubted verie much what would insue thereof. Wherefore not onelie in that land, but in England also, hir maiestie vpon knowledge did cause musters to be made in all the parts vpon and towards the south and west parties, and men to be in readinesse to be transported, if anie occasion by his escape should happen to follow. For it was greatlie doubted what would follow of that his breach, saiing that the president in Mounster was thought to be sufficientlie prepared and furnished against him, if he did or would attempt anie disorder that waie.

The reuocation of the erle of Esser.

The third was the reuocation of the earle of Esser, who had taken vpon him to recouer the whole prouince of Ulster to obedience, with hir maiesties aid. And he hauing with great charges brought the same to a great likelihood and towardnesse, the armie was cashed, and he dismissed and discharged, and the enterprise dissolued. These with sundrie other accidents of the like nature, were sufficient to haue swallowed vp anie man in the gulfe of despaire, had not the lord God looked vpon him, and hir maiestie most gratiouslie pondered his manie & sundrie most humble requests for his reuocation, which hir highnes by hir letters vnto him granted; and immediatlie whereupon he (after foure yeares painfull seruice) was discharged of his office, & returned into England. Manie god & notable things were done in the time of this mans deputation worthie to be remembred, and for euer to be chronicled. But forsomuch as the records and presidents of the same cannot bee had, and the imprinter cannot staie his impression anie longer time, the same with patience must be borne withall, vntill a better opportunitie shall serue as well for it, as for the commendation of this honorable & ancient gentleman, who hath deserued well and honourablie of his prince and countrie for his seruice and gouernment. After that this man was cleane discharged, the sword and office was deliuered vnto sir Henrie Sidneie, who now the third time entred into the gouernment of this cursed land, and arriued at the Skirries the twelfe of September 1575, who at his comming found the infection of the plague so generallie dispersed, and especiallie in the English pale, that he could hardlie find a place where to settle himselfe without danger of infection. And euen as this plague reigned, so the old rebellious minds of the northerne Ulsterians brake out. For he was no soner knowne to be entred into the land, but for a bien venu to welcome him into the countrie, Serlo Boie with his companie came to Knockfergus, there to make preie of the towne, & so proudlie assailed the same, that he slue a capteine named Baker, and his lieutenant, with fortie of his souldiers, besides diuerse of the townsmen, of whome some were hurt, some maimed, and some slaine; and yet neuertheless by the valour & courage of the rest of the souldiers and townsmen, the preie was rescued, and the Scots perforce driuen awaie.

Sir william Fitzwilliams discharged of the deputiship.

1575 Sir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie the third time.

The pestilence great in the English pale.

Serlo Boie assaulteth Knockfergus

The lord deputie, considering with himselfe that of such beginnings euill would be the euents and sequels thereof, if the same were not out of hand preuented; and knowing also by his owne experience, how perillous delaies be in such cases, thought it verie necessarie and expedient (according to the old saieng Principijs obsta sero medicina paratur, &c) forthwith to withstand the same. And therefore by the aduise of so manie of hir maiesties priuie councell, as could in that queasie time be assembled, he tooke order for the safe keeping of the English pale, and committed the custodie thereof in his absence, to certeine gentlemen of best account and wisedome, to see the same to be kept and quieted. And he himselfe in his owne person, taking with him hir maiesties armie, which was then about six hundred horsemen and footmen, and accompanied with such gentlemen and councellors as he had appointed for that seruice, tooke his iourneie towards Ulster. And as he passed, he found the whole countrie throughout wasted, spoiled, and impouerished, sauing the Newrie, which sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshall did inhabit, and the Glins and Routs which Serlo Boie with the Scots possessed, and Killultagh.

The lord deputie maketh a iourneie into Ulster.

Now in all that iorneie few came to submit themselues, sauing Mac Mahon, and Mac Gwier, & Tirlough Lenough, who first sent his wife; and she being a woman verie well spoken, of great modestie, nurture, parentage, and disposition, and aunt to the then earle of Argile, was verie desirous to haue hir husband to liue like a good subiect, and to be nobilitated. Tirlough himselfe followed verie shortlie after his wife, & came before the lord deputie without pledge, promise or hostage, and simplie & without anie condition did submit himselfe in all humblenesse and reuerence to his lordship, making the like sutes as his wife before his comming had motioned vnto his lordship, referring himselfe neuertheless to be ordered and directed by his lordship in all things. And after that he had spent two daies, vsing himselfe in all the time of his abode in all dutifulnesse, subiection,

Tirlough Lenough submitteth him in all humilitie

and,

and reuerence, did in like maner take his leaue, and returned to his owne home. And as for Odonell lord of Tirconell, and Mac Gwier lord of Farmanaugh, albeit they came not in persons, yet they wrote their most humble letters of submission, and offered all such rents and seruices, as to them apertained to yéeld, making request that they might onelie serue vnder hir highnesse, and be discharged from the exactions of all others.

The tourneie of the lord deputie in Leinster.

After that the lord deputie had performed this tourneie, and was returned to Dublin, then he made the like tourneies towards the other parts of the land. And beginning in Leinster, he found the whole countie of Kildare, and the baronie of Carberie, extreamelie impouerished by the Omeries, both in the time of the late rebellion, and also since, when they were vnder protection. The kings and quænes counties were all spoiled & wasted by the Oconnors and the Omores, the old native inhabiters of the same, and of them Rorie Og had gotten the possession and the setling of himselfe in sundrie lands there, whether the tenants will or no, and as a prince occupieth what he listeth, and wasteth what he will. Neuertheless, vpon the word of the earle of Ormond, he came to the lord deputie at his being in Kilkennie; and in the cathedrall church there he submitted himselfe: and in outward appearance repented his former faults, and promised amendment: but how well he kept and performed it, his rebellions in the yeare following can witnesse.

Rorie Og vpon the word of the earle of Ormond came vnto the lord deputie, and submitteth himselfe.

The lord deputie interteined verie well in Kilkennie.

The lord deputie at his comming to Kilkennie was receiued by the townsmen in all the best maner they could, and the earle of Ormond himselfe feasted and intreated him most honourablie, and had great care that his lordship and all his traine should not want anie thing. At this towne the two cousins and kinsmen of sir Peter Carew late deceassed, that is, Peter Carew, and George Carew, and the gentleman who had béene his agent in all his causes within that land, came before the lord deputie, and there communicated with his lordship the state of the deceassed knight, and of his countrie; submitted the same to his order and direction, as also made humble sute vnto his lordship for his presence at the funerals at Waterford, where it was appointed he should be buried. Whose lordship as vpon the first newes of this knights death, so now also vpon the new recitall thereof, maruellouslie lamented and bewailed the losse of so worthie a knight, and the want of so wise and faithfull an assistant and councellor. And then he toke order therein, shewing most honourablie not onelie the offices of a faithfull and good friend to the dead; but also the like good will to the two yong gentlemen, of which one was then his heire, and to inioy his baronie. And according as things were determined, the corps was remoued from Rosse where he died, and carted to Waterford against his comming thither, where it was buried in verie honourable maner, as shall hereafter appeare; being not impertinent to the historie to set downe some short discourse of this most worthie gentleman and of his life.

Sir Peter Carew died at Rosse, & was buried at waterford verie honourablie.

Sir Peter Carew his life, birth and conditions. His descent. Baron of Carew.

Sir Peter Carew was descended of noble and high parentage, whose first ancestor was named Montgomerie, and in the time of king Henrie the second he maried the ladie Elisabeth daughter to Rosius prince of Southwales, by which mariage he was aduanced to honour, and made baron of the castell of Carew, whereof his posteritie in time toke their surnames, being called Carews. And some of them passing into Ireland did grow to be mightie men, and of great honor and possessions in that land, being marquesses of Corke, barons of Hidron and Kernew, lords of Maston, and inheritors to sundrie great lordships and seignories in that land. And likewise in England they were men of great credit, seruice, and honour, and by waie of mariages matched and combined with honourable and great houses.

His stature.

His disposition.

His skill and seruice in the warres.

His trauels.

His religion.

His qualities.

His learning.

His conditions

His anger without malice.

His zeale.

This foresaid sir Peter, who was lineallie descended from them, was of stature meane, but verie stronglie and well compacted; of complexion cholerike, from his childhood vpwards bent and giuen to an honest disposition, and in his tender yeares he serued vnder, and was page to the prince of Orenge beyond the seas, and by that means had the greater delight & skill in martiall affaires, wherein he had good knowledge, as did well appeare in the manifold seruices he did vnder king Henrie the eight, king Edward the first, and quæne Elisabeth, in sundrie places beyond as also on this side the seas. He was in his yonger years a great traueller, and had béene at Constantinople in the Turkes court, at Vienna in the emperours palace, at Venice, and in the French kings court, and in the houses of the most of all christian princes; in euerie of which places he left some tokens of his value. He was blessed of God with manie singular good gifts, as well of the mind as of the bodie, being vertuouslie disposed euen from his verie infancie, sincere in religion (and for which he was partlie an exiled man in the Marian daies) dutifull to his prince, and faithfull to his countrie, vpright in iustice, politike in gouernement, and valiant in armes, skilfull in the Italian and French tongs, and a great student in such bookes as those tongs did yéeld; and by that means some knowledge ioined with his pregnancie of wit, he would discourse verie substantiallie in anie matter concerning policie or religion, peace or warres, good to euerie man, hurtfull to no man; bountifull & liberall, abhorring couetousnesse and whordome; a great housekéeper, and of great hospitalitie. And if anie fault were in him, it was rather of too much spending, than in reasonable sauing; he would be soone warme, but without gall, and against his enimie most stout and valiant: finallie such was his vpright dealing, honest conuersation, and zeale to the commonwealth, as no man was more honoured nor vniuersallie beloued than was he.

His title to his lands in Ireland.

He recouereth some part of his lands in Ireland.

His good dealing with his tenants.

When he had spent the greater part of his age, he bethought himselfe vpon such lands as his ancestors had in Ireland, and which in right did descend vnto him: and finding his title to be good, he acquainted hir highnesse therewith; and obteined hir fauour and good will to passe ouer into Ireland, to follow the recouerie thereof. Which he did, and made such good proues of his title, as well by records as by euidences, that he recouered so much as he did then put in sute, namelie the lordship of Maston, of which he had béene dispossessed of about seauen score yeares, which he departed with vnto sir Christopher Chiuers knight, then tenant to the same, and the baronie of Hidron then in the possession of the Cauenaughs, the ancient enimies of the English gouernment, and who had expelled his ancestors about two hundred yeares past. But being put once in possession, he dealt in such good order with them, and so honourablie vsed himselfe, that they all voluntarilie yéelded vp the Irelands, and submitted themselues to his deuotion; and finding him to be a verie rare man in manie and sundrie respects, as of the like they had not heard nor knowne, they much reioised of him, and counted themselues happie and blessed to be vnder his gouernment. At his first comming he resumed the whole baronie into his owne hands, and thereof he gaue some péeces in frée hold, to such gentlemen as he thought good; and for the residue euerie of them what he had before, he toke it againe vnder writing by leale. He diuided the baronie into certeine teine manors and lordships, and in euerie one he did erect a court baron, and there all matters in variance betweene them were ended and determined after the English maner, according to iustice & truth. He would not suffer anie wrong to be done vnto them, neither would he beare with anie of them doing wrong. Their complaints he would heare, and with indifferencie he would determine them: he dwelled among them, and kept a verie liberall and a bountifull house, and such hospitalitie as had not béene tofore knowne among them; and for which he was marueilouslie beloued, and his fame spred throughout that land.

His houseképing and hospitalitie.

He kept continuallie of his owne priuat familie, aboue or néere a hundred persons in house, he had alwaies in readinesse fortie horsemen well appointed, besides footmen, & commonlie one hundred Kerns, and all that his countrie at commandement; by which meanes he chased and pursued such as laie vpon the frontiers of his countrie, that they if anie had offended, would come and submit themselues simplie to his mercie: & the residue willing to serue him at all néeds. If anie noble man or others did passe by his house, there he first staied and was interteined according to his calling, for his cellar dore was neuer shut, & his butterie alwaies open, to all commers of anie credit. If anie garrison either came to assist and attend him, or passed through his countrie, he gaue them interteinment, and victualled them at his owne charges, and paied readie monie both for it, and for all things taken of the countrie; for without present paiment he would haue nothing: which was a rare thing and not heard of in that land. And as concerning hir maiesties seruice, it was so honourable for hir highnesse, and so profitable to the countrie, and accomplished with such a disposition and a good will, as all and euerie the gouernours in his time thought themselues happie to be assisted with such a man. In matters of counsell he was verie graue and considerate, in matters of policie verie wise and circumspect, and in martiall affaires verie valiant and noble, and in all of great knowledge and experience: in euerie of which (as occasion serued) his seruice was readie and at commandement, so long as his abode was in that land.

Readie paiment for all things.

His seruice in the Irish wars.

In the Butlers warres, vpon commandement from the deputie, he did first seruc at Cloghgreman, a castell of sir Edmund Butlers, where being accompanied with capteine Gilbert, capteine Palbete, and capteine Basnet, and Henrie Dauels, and their bands, assaulted the castell, tooke it, and gaue the preie to the souldiers. Then they went to Kilkennie where they issued out and made a sallie vpon the whole armie of sir Edmund Butler: which being about three miles from the towne, gaue them the ouerthrow, and put all the Gallowglasses and the rest to the sword, sauing the horsemen and Kernes which fled into the woods: and then méeting the lord deputie, attended him in the whole iourneie and seruice of the said warres vntill the same was ended. In which he assisted the said deputie with his faithfull aduise and counsell, and with all such dutifull seruice as which his lordship could not lacke, and which he so aduertised to hir maiestie. Likewise in Ulster he was in the whole or the most part of that seruice with the earle of Esser, whom he aduised and assisted with all the best seruice and counsell he could, to the great comfort of the earle, and commendation of himselfe.

Sir Peter Carewes seruice in Ulster.

The fame and report of this noble gentleman, for his wisedome, valiantnesse, experience, vprightnes, housekeeping, bountifulnesse, liberalitie, and his iust dealings with euerie man, was spred through out all that nation, and he fauoured and beloued of all men. And certeine gentlemen in Mounster, knowledging and confessing that he had a iust title to their lands and possessions, and that he (as descending lineallie from the marquesse of Corke) was their lawfull lord, and to whome they ought to yéeld their lands; some of them made their repaire, and some wrote their letters vnto him: and all with one consent acknowledged him to be their right and lawfull lord, and offered not onelie truelie to instruct and to aduertise him throughlie of his whole inheritance; but if it would please him to come to the citie of Corke, they would all appeare before him, and submit themselues, and yéeld vp their lands into his hands. Sir Peter Carew, when he had considered and well bethought of these offers, and had taken aduise with his frends, thought it not good to refuse the same; and that so much the sooner, because he had made hir highnesse acquainted with his title, and had before obteined hir letters to sir William Fitzwilliams then lord deputie of Ireland, and to sir John Parret then lord president of Mounster, that they should assist him in his suites, and to call the contrarie parts, and to persuade them with all quietnesse to yéeld to his iust titles. And againe, finding that part of the realme to be now verie quiet, & the people well disposed, he sent first his agent the writer hereof to Corke, where and before whome there came Mac Artie Riogh, Corman Mac Tæge, Barrie Og, the Omalions, the Odriscots, the Odallies, & sundrie others, who of their owne freewill offered to giue in recompense of that which was past, and towards the setting vp of his house, if he would come and dwell among them, three thousand kine; and so manie sheepe and hogs and corne, as according to to that proportion; and would also yerelie giue him in the like maner such a portion as should be to his contentation and good liking. When his agent had aduertised these things vnto him, and according to his order had prepared a house in Kinsale, and one other in Corke for him: the said sir Peter did set the house of Leighlin to his kinsman and cousine Peter Carew, who afterward was his heire, and prepared his ship to passe himselfe with his household stuffe to Corke. And being in readinesse for the same, it pleased God to call him to another passage; for falling sicke at the towne of Rosse, he died the seauen and twentith of November 1575, and was buried verie honorablie and in warlike manner at Waterford, the fiftéenth of December in the cathedrall church, with all such ensignes of honor as to his degrée apperteined, there being then present sir Henrie Sidneie lord deputie, and the councell. And thus much concerning that worthie knight sir Peter Carew.

His title to his lands in Mounster.

The offer of the gentlemen to be his tenants.

The death of sir Peter Carew 1575.

His burial.

The lord deputie, being accompanied from Kilkennie with the earle of Ormond vnto the citie of Waterford, he was verie honourablie receiued at his entrie into the citie, by the maior & his brethren, and an oration congratulatorie made vnto him in the Latine tong by a yong scholar clad in white attire, verie well and eloquentlie pronounced. Great triumphes were made, both vpon the land and vpon the water; with all such shewes and tokens of ioie and gladnesse, as could be deuised. And whiles he remained in the citie, there wanted not anie thing meet and conuenient for the interteinement of his lordship, and of all his traine: which his lordship did verie well accept and take in good part; as also aduertised it to the lords of hir maiesties honourable priuie councell in England. This citie is a verie ancient citie, and first builded (as the common opinion is) by Sitiracus one of the three brethren, which came out of Norwaie, called Easterlings. It standeth and is situated vpon the riuer of Suire, which riseth in the hill or mount Blandina, named in Irish Slough blome:

The reteining of the lord deputie at Waterford.

The description of the citie of Waterford.

The situation.

blome: and fleeteth by Thurles in Tipperarie, whereof the earles of Ormond are vicounts: from thense to the Holie crosse, Ardmale, Cahir Dolweske, Ardfinan, Inislonagh, Clomnell, Caricke Mac Griffin, and so to Waterford.

It was of it selfe a verie little pile, but strong and well walled, and of late yeares (vpon occasion of warres) inlarged in the time of king Henrie the seuenth and inclosed with a strong wall: when Lamberd (named Perkin Warbecke) was crowned king at Dublin, about which king fell great controuersies betweene them and Gilbert erle of Kildare. For the said erle being then lord deputie sent his letters to the said maior & his citizens, requiring them to receiue into their citie the new king, as other good cities had done: who refusing to acknowledge anie other king, than king Henrie of England, he threatened them that he would take their citie perforce and hang the maior. Whereupon hot words grew on euerie side, & the same like to haue growne to hand fight: the Waterfordians offering to wage the battell where the erle would appoint. Which their truth at that time auailed them much afterwards, and they in speciall fauour with king Henrie the seuenth and king Henrie the eight, by whome their liberties and franchises were inlarged.

The soile about it is verie barren and full of hils and rocks, and the lesse profitable for lacke of good manurance and husbandrie: but what faileth in the land, is recompensed with the sundrie commodities which the riuer yeeldeth, which is not onlie plentifull and abundant of all sorts and kinds of fishes, but also it is a goodlie hauen and a receptacle for all sorts of ships: & for this it is called Larga porta, The great or large hauen. The resort of merchants from out of all countries to this citie maketh the same verie populous and rich, & is the chiefest Emporium of that prouince. Great be the priuileges which the kings of England gaue to the maior & citizens, as well concerning the riuer as the citie, by king John, king Henrie the third, and king Edward the first.

The riuer was bounded and limited from the mouth of the seas, betweene Rindowan where Hoke tower standeth vpon the east side, and Rodibanke vpon the west side, and from thense vnto Caricke vpon Suire: and so farre beyond, as the said riuer ebbeth and floweth that waie: & from the said mouth vnto the Inokiage vpon the riuer of Mire, and so far as the same water ebbeth and floweth; and likewise from the said mouth, vnto saint Molins vpon the riuer of Barrow; and so farre beyond the same, as the water ebbeth & floweth. Yet notwithstanding great controuersies haue bene betweene this citie and the towne of Rosse, which lieth vpon the riuer of Barrow, concerning the bounds and limits that waie, because they of Rosse do claime a priuilege vpon that riuer as of the gift and grant of Roger Bigod earle marshall: who married Isabell the eldest daughter of Walter earle marshall, and in hir right was lord of Rosse and of the riuer of the Barrow. Whereupon certeine inquisitions were taken in the time of king Edward the third, and of king Richard the second: and then at Clomnell vpon the othes of six knights and eightene esquiers, it was found for the citie of Waterford. And these are the bounds of the port or hauen of Waterford; within the which bounds and limits the citie of Waterford, by the grants of sundrie kings vnder their charters, haue these priuileges: That no ship shall be laden nor vnladen, but at the citie of Waterford, and there to paie all such customes and duties as belong and are due for their merchandize: Also that they haue the passage wines and the iurisdiction of the admeraltie, within the limits of the said riuer.

The citie it selfe was first incorporated by king Henrie the second, & after confirmed by king John, Henrie the third, and king Edward the first with augmentations. The maior hath the sword borne before him by the gift of king Edward the fourth, and king Henrie the seauenth, by the name of the sword of iustice. They haue cognisance of all maner of plees as well reall, personall, & mixt. They are iustices of oier and determiner, & maie sit vpon triall of treasons, murthers, and felonies, without anie speciall commission to be sued out for the same. Also that no officer nor officers of the kings or quenes of England, nor their deputies shall intermeddle, nor exercise anie authoritie nor iurisdiction, within the citie and liberties, but onelie the maior & officers of the same. Also they haue a maior and officers of the staple yearelie to be chosen, who haue the liberties for taking of statutes and recognisances staple, not onelie within their owne towne & concerning themselues, but also of sundrie townes in Leinster and Mounster, and the counties of Waterford, Kilkennie, Werford, and Tipperarie. Also they haue libertie from time to time to transport, lade, and carrie awaie corne, vittels, woll, horses, & hawks; and to licence anie other within the limits of their iurisdiction to do the like. Also all forfeitures, amerciaments, fines, felons goods, and deodands goods, they haue to their owne vse. Also that in all doubts, the words of their charters should be expounded to the best sense, and if then there were anie further doubt, the same should be determined and decided by the king or his councell in the realme of England. Also that they should not at anie time be compelled to go and serue in anie hosting, except the king himselfe or anie of his sonnes were present in person.

The incorporation of the citie.

The priuileges of the citie of Waterford.

The sword of iustice.

These and manie other like priuileges of the kings of England from time to time, of their bounteous liberalitie, and in consideration of their dutifull and good seruices, did giue and bestow vpon them. All which, O you the inhabitants of Panapia and citizens of Waterford, the offspring of so good ancestors, ought to be lessons and presidents vnto you, for your continuance in the like offices and duties: that you maie thereby shew your selues to be as were your predecessors, faithfull, loiall, and obedient: and that your apophthegme maie be for euer found true, Waterfordia semper manet intacta: Otherwise brag neuer so much of your worthinesse, & glorie neuer so much of your values (as the Iewes did of their father Abraham) yet it shall so little auaile you, that their honour shall be your reproch, and their glorie your shame, if you do not also the like; and in the end your vtter confusion. For as the holie scripture saith: If you be the children of light, then as children walke you in the light; otherwise that light which is in you shall be darkenesse. If you be the children of Abraham, then do you the workes of Abraham: otherwise God, who is able and will raise vp the verie stones to be sonnes to Abraham, shall reiect you, and giue your citie to a people which shall bring forth the fruits of dutie and obedience. For so did he with his owne peculiar people, the Iewes, whom for their disobedience against himselfe, and against his annointed princes, did after sundrie punishments and no amendment giue them ouer vnto their enimies hands: who put their young men to the sword, & their priests to slaughter, their virgins were deflowred, their widows defiled, their citie vtterlie destroied, and not one stone left vpon an other; and all the people which escaped the sword, carried awaie captiues, & made vagabonds, euen to this daie vpon the face of the earth. If he did this to his owne peculiar people, do not you of Waterford, whom God hath blessed manie waies, thinke

An admonition to the citizens of Waterford.

Waterfordia semper manet intacta.

that

The controuersie betweene the earle of Kildare and the Waterfordians.

The Waterfordians refuse to acknowledge Perkin to be their king.

The Waterfordians in fauor with the kings of England.

The commoditie of the riuer.

Larga porta.

The riuer at Waterford.

A controuersie betweene the waterfordians and the towne of Rosse for the riuer of Barrow.

A verdict passed in the behalfe of the Waterfordians.

The priuileges of Waterford vpon the water.

An exhortation to the citizens of Waterford.

that you doing the like wickednesse, shall escape the like iudgements. Wherefore if you will eschew the wrath to come, beware by their examples, and humble your selues in all dutifulnes & obedience to God and to your prince. Examine not his authoritie, nor decipher his power: compare not your priuileges with his authoritie, nor doo you dispute your liberties with his prerogatiue. For notwithstanding your priuileges, liberties, and grants be great and manie: yet they can not abate nor impugne the least part of the princes prerogatiue: which is so great, as nothing can be greater, if you will take the view of Gods owne ordinances, when he first erected and established a king, who gaue him so high and so absolute authoritie, that (as the apostle saith) it must be with all humblenesse obeied: because he is Gods minister especiallie when it concerneth the interest of his maiesties imperiall crowne of that land, the suppression of rebels and traitors, & the deliuerie of your selues and that realme from the enimies and rebels.

The princes prerogatiue.

And doo not you thinke that this digression is impertinent to the historie. For as your ancestors good doings are set downe to their praises and commendations; so the same shall be done of yours, either to your praises for your well doings, or for your reproch to the contrarie. But to the historie. When the lord deputie had giuen thankes to the maior and his brethren for his good interteinement, he departed thense by iournies towards Corke, and by the waie at Dungaruon the earle of Desmond came vnto him, and verie humblie offered him all the seruice he was able to doo to hir maiestie, and did accompanie him from thense vnto the citie of Corke, where the said lord deputie was receiued in the best manner the citizens could, with all humblenesse, and with all such triumphs and other shewes and tokens of good will and dutifulnesse as they could giue, without grudging or complaining either of the townesmen or of the souldiers. To this towne resorted vnto him the earles of Desmond, Thomond, Clancar, and all the noblemen and best gentlemen in all Mounster, and their wiues, and there kept their houses the whole Christmasse. During his being there, manie complaints were made of great outrages, murthers, spoiles, and thefts done throughout that prouince; whereupon dailie sessions were kept, and the malefactors of which three and twentie verie notable and notorious offendors were executed and put to death.

The earle of Desmond humblie offereth his seruice to the lord deputie.

The lord deputie receiued honorablie into Corke.

All the noblemen in Mounster repaire to the lord deputie.

Executions at Corke.

It was also ordered, that for the cutting off and abolishing of the great swarmes and clusters of the idlers, which like waspes troubled the whole land, and liued onelie by spoile and rapine; that euerie nobleman and gentleman should giue and deliuer in the names of euerie seruant and follower which he had, and should see the same to be booked and registred. And if any of them were found vnbooked and not registred, that he should be vsed as a fellon where so euer he was taken; and for all such, as whose names were registred, his lord and master should answer for him. To this order all the noble and gentlemen gaue their full consents, and forthwith the same was openlie proclamed in their presence, who seemed to receiue it with all ioy, and promised that it should be followed with effect, and immediatlie they gaue in their pledges. When all things were thus in these parts setled in good and quiet order, he toke his iournie towards Limerike, and there he was receiued with much more pompe and shewes than in anie place before. But as before, so here he spent a few daies in keeping of sessions, in executing of iustice, and in hearing of poore mens complaints, and toke the like order for registring of euerie noble and gentlemans follower, as he had done at Corke. Which when he had done, he rode thense vnto Thomond, where he was complained vnto of manie great murthers, rapes, thefts, and other outrages, wherof he found great plentie. And for want of sufficient time to proceed throughlie to doo iustice and iudgement therein; he referred the same to certeine commissioners appointed for the purpose: sauing that he committed the principall offendors to ward, and some he banished and abandoned out of those parts, vntill further order were taken for them.

Euerie noble man and gentleman to answer for his men.

The lord deputie honorable receiued at Limerike.

Thomond is cleane out of order.

From thense he entred into Connagh, and came to the towne of Gallewaie, where he found the towne much decaied and almost desolated, sundrie of the good houlholders hauing sought new habitations vnder Mac William Eughter, and the countie throughout altogither spoiled and deuoured by the Mac an Earles, the hopeles (but much better if they had bene hopelesse) sonnes of the earle of Clanricard, whose outrages were most heinous and horrible. But when these graceles impes perceiued of the great complaints made against them, and doubting what would be the sequele if some waie were not taken, they voluntarilie went to Gallewaie towne, and came to the church vpon a sundaie at the publike seruice, where the lord deputie then was; and there kneeling vpon their knées confessed their faults, submitted themselues, and most lamentablie craued pardon, promising vnfeinedlie amendment, and neuer to reuolt more from their dutifull obedience to hir maiestie and hir lawes. The deputie moued herewith, and hoping the best, did by the aduise of hir maiesties councell thinke it good, with some sharpe reprehensions and a little punishment for this time to release them, & so he toke his iournie towards Dublin, where he came the thirteenth of Aprill 1576, but kept sessions in euerie place as he passed throughout the countrie, and placed his garrisons in places conuenient.

The towne of Gallewaie in great decaie.

The earle of Clanricards sonnes submit themselues.

1576

In this his iournie he found a verie ruinous state and most lamentable disorders, which required a speedie reformation. And though the outrages in the ciuill gouernment were great, yet nothing to be compared to the ecclesiasticall state, for that was to too far out of order; the temples all ruined, the parish churches for the most part without curates and pastors, no seruice said, no God honored, nor Christ preached, nor sacraments ministred. And therefore it appeered, yea and it was openlie preached before the lord deputie himselfe, that manie were borne which neuer were christened: and the patrimonie of the church wasted & the lands imbezelled. A lamentable case, for a more deformed and a more ouerthrowne church there could not be among christians. The deputie considering and bethinking with himselfe, how the church of God was abused, and that God had in store some wrath and indignation for this defiling of his holie sanctuarie, did for the auoiding thereof write his letters of aduertisement to hir highnesse, and most earnestlie praied hir princelie authoritie for redresse thereof; and therewith most humblie requested, that the commonwealth being destitute of a chancellor, and other most necessarie magistrates for the gouernement, might likewise with all speed be sent ouer. When hir maiestie and councell had considered this aduertisement, and had entered into the depth thereof, order for a redresse was taken forthwith: and the matters concerning religion and reformation of the church, it was committed to the said lord deputie, and to archbishops and certeine bishops, with others, to see the same to be put in execution. And for the gouernment one William Gerard esquier a professor of the laws was sent to be lord chancellor, & sir William Drurie to be president of Mounster, which arriued at Dublin,

The ruine of the ecclesiasticall state.

Manie in Ireland not christened.

The spoile of the churches.

In order for the reformation of religion.

William Gerard to be lord chancellor.

Sir William Drurie to be lord president.

1576 Dublin, the one the xrtænth of June, and the other the thræ and twentith of the same 1576. The lord chancellor he did forthwith settle and place in his rome. And then his lordship prepareth to take a tournie towards Waterford, to do the like with sir William Drurie. But when he was passed a daies tournie, word was brought vnto him from the bishop of Meth, who laie then vpon the confines of Meth and Connagh for ordering of matters in these parties; and the like from the maior of Gallewaie, and from diuerse others, who affected well the state, crieng out with trembling termes and dolefull reports, that the earle of Clanricard his sonnes that bastarlie brood, which not scarse two moneths past had humbled themselues to the lord deputie, confessed their faults, and craued pardon, and had most firmelie protested and sworne most dutifull and continuall obedience.

The earle of Clanricards sonnes brake out into rebellion.

The earle consented to his sonnes disloialtie.

These (I saie) not without the counsell and consent of their father, were on a night stollen ouer the riuer of Shennon, and there cast awaie their English apparell, and clothed themselues in their old wonted Irish rags, and sent to all their old friends to come awaie to them, and to bring the Scots whom they had solicited, and their Gallowglasses, and all other their forces with them. Who when they met togither, they forthwith went to the towne of Athenrie, and those few houses which were newlie builded, they sacked, set the new gates on fire, beat awaie the masons and labourers which were there in working, brake and spoiled the quænes armes, and others, there made and cut to be set vp. Bad and wicked they were before, but now ten times worse than euer they were; being come, euen as it is said in the scriptures, that the wicked spirit was gone out of the man, and wanting his wonted diet, returneth vnto the house from whense he came, and finding the same swept cleane, he goeth and seeketh out other seuen wicked spirits, and entreth and dwelleth where he did before, and the last state of that man is worse than the first. And if a man should aske of these bastardlie boies, and of their sier, what should be the cause that they should thus rage, and so wickedlie and suddenlie reuolue, as dogs to their vomits, so they to their treasons and treacheries, hauing bene so courteouslie vsed, so gentlie interteined, so friendlie countenanced, so fatherly exhorted, so pithilie persuaded, & so mercifullie pardoned in hope of amendment: surelie nothing can they answer, but that they would not be honest, nor in anie part satisfie a little of infinite the robberies, thefts, and spoiles which they had made. For bastardlie slips cannot bring forth better fruits, neither can thornes bring forth grapes. It is the good tree onelie that bringeth forth good fruits, & which is to be cherished, and to be much made of; but thornes and briers are prepared for the fire, and to be burned. For let the husbandman bestow neuer so much husbandrie vpon the thorne, he will still be but a thorne: yea let him graffe neuer so good a peare vpon him, the same shall be but a stonie peare; and lacking continuall husbandrie, will reuolt to his old nature againe. As the husbandman then prospereth best, when his fields and gardens are weeded and clensed from thornes, brambles & briers, prepared for the fire: euen so shall the magistrate inioie the quiet state of a commonwealth, when iustice taketh place, and iudgement is executed; when the good are preserued and cherished, and the wicked (prepared for the gallowes) according to their deserts are punished.

Athenrie spoiled.

Selfewill cause of the rebellion.

Punishment of the wicked maketh a quiet common wealth.

The instrument, when euerie string is streined to his proper tune, then the musike is sweet, and the harmonie pleasant; but if that one string be out of order, the discord of that one marreth and disgraceth all the whole musike of the rest: euen so is it in a commonwealth, when euerie subiect is dutifull to his prince, obedient to his magistrate, and liueth according to his vocation and calling, the same prospereth and flourisheth; but let the wicked be left at libertie, and be vnpunished, the whole state is disturbed, & the commonwealth (as a garden ouergrowne with weeds) in perill and danger to be ouerthrowne. The best commonwealth in all ages then prospered best, when the wicked were as well punished, as the good serued. And experience teacheth, that a theefe, murtherer, a traitor, & such malefactors do neuer better seruice to their prince & commonwealth, than when they be hanged on the gallowes, and so fastened to a gibbet. But to the matter.

The lord deputie vpon these aduertisements, finding the matter to be of such importance, which required some expedition to withstand the same, or else the whole land like to be in danger, altereth his intended tourneie, and returneth to Dublin, vsing such expedition, that within thræ daies following he was entered into Connagh. The brute thereof when it was blowne abrode, it was scarse credited by the rebels, because it was so sudden and with such spæd. But finding it to be true, and they affraid of their shadowes, they all one and other fled into the mounteins, sauing certeine gentlemen of the earls countrie, which left the traitorous boies, & came to the deputie, and offered their loialtie and seruice with fidelitie. The earle their father would faine haue excused himselfe, but in the end when no excuses could be accepted, his castels were taken, and he brought to the lord deputie: who notwithstanding his humble submissions and crauing of pardons, he was sent to the castell of Dublin, and there kept in close prison. But the lord deputie he passed thense to Gallewaie, and after he had there staied a few daies, for the comforting of the townesmen, who stood much dismaied of their estate, and in feare to be surprised and taken for pledges: he passed through Thomond, and came to Limerike, where he setled sir William Drurie (who had accompanied him in all this seruice) to be the lord president. And from thense being accompanied and attended vpon with him and the nobilitie of that prouince, and diuerse gentlemen of account, they passed to Corke, & there the lord president remained.

The lord deputie altereth his course, and entreth into Connagh.

The earle of Clanricard is sent to the castell of Dublin and kept in close prison.

Sir William Drurie placed to be lord president in Mounster.

The gouernmẽt of sir William Drurie.

Now he the said president, being thus placed in the gouernement of that prouince, did beare himselfe so vprightlie, and in so honourable a sort, that he reformed the same maruellouslie both in life and maners: and of a fierce people he tamed them to obedience. For the euill men he spared not, but by law and iustice in the open sessions, or by sword without respect of persons he punished according to their deserts: euen as of the contrarie the good subiects he would fauour and protect. If anie seruice were to be done vpon the enimie and rebell, he would be the first in the field, and neuer ceasse to pursue him, vntill he had either taken him, or driuen him out of the countrie. If anie matters were in variance betweene man and man, or anie bils of complaints exhibited vnto him, the same he would either determine, or referre them to the law, for which he kept courts continuallie, & where the same were heard and ended, and at which for the most part he would be present. The rude people he framed to a ciuilitie, & their maners he reformed and brought to the English order. And by all these means he did maruellouslie reforme that whole prouince to a most peaceable, quiet and ciuill estate, sauing the countie palatine in Kerie: which the earle of Desmond claimed to be his libertie, and that no person was to intermeddle nor yet to vse any iurisdiction there, other than his owne officers. But when his lordship had looked into the most

The earle of Desmond will haue no officer to intermeddle in his countie palantine.

The countie palantine a sanctuarie of sinne and wickednesse.

most lose and dissolute life there vsed, and that it was a sanctuarie for all lewd and wicked persons, and how that liberties granted at the first for the maintenance of iustice was now become a cloke and a shrowd for all licentiousnesse: he purposed and was fullie determined to make a iourneie into that priuileged place, to make a passage for law and iustice to be there exercised, euen as he had tofore done in other places, knowing that it could not be safe among a great flocke to leaue a scabbed sheepe, nor good for a commonwealth to haue nurseries for sinne.

The lord president purposeth to do iustice in Kerrie.

The erle, when he perceiued this, he was in a great furie and agonie, and vsed all the waies he could to dissuade the lord president from the same. Which when he by no means could compasse, then according to his accustomable dissimulations he maketh faire weather, and offereth all the seruice he could do to his lordship, and requested him that it would please him to vse his house and countrie at his pleasure, and that it would likewise please his lordship to lie at his house at Tralie when he passed that waie; the earle minding nothing lesse than his welcome thither, but practising in the end openlie what he had dissemblinglie and in secret deuised and determined. The lord deputie, nothing mistrusting anie secret practise to be imagined against him, granteth the earles request; and when he saw time, he taketh his iourneie into Kerrie, hauing no more men with him than sufficient, to the number of six score, or seuen score persons: and as he passed through the countrie, he kept courts and sessions, and heard euerie mans complaint: and at length as his iourneie laie, he rode vnto Tralie, where he minded to lodge with the earle. The earle hauing the gouernor (as he thought) within his cloches, and minding to practise that openlie, which he had deuised secretlie; had appointed in a readinesse seuen hundred, or eight hundred of his best followers to haue intraped his lordship; and in sted of a bien venu into the countrie, to haue cut him off for euer comming more there. Which his villanous treacherie when his lordship saw and vnderstood; and considering that he was so nere vpon them, as that he was either to aduenture vpon them, or with dishonor to hazard himselfe and his companie: he calleth all his companie togither, and with verie good and pithie words incourageth them to giue the onset vpon them: and forthwith with a good courage they all march forwards, and gaue the charge vpon them. But they, notwithstanding they were all well armed, and seuen to one of the other: yet being as it were astonied at the boldnesse of this noble man, and at his great courage; for which he was famous in & through all that land: both the earle and his companie turned their heeles, forsoke the field, and dispersed themselues into the woods, and elsewhere, for their best safetie

The lord president entreth into Kerrie.

The treacherous practise of the earle to haue intrapped thr lord president.

The lord president giueth the charge vpon the earle of Delmond.

The countesse, when she heard hereof, fell in a great sorow and heauinesse for hir husbands so bad dealings; and like a good Abigaell went and met the lord president, fell vpon hir knees, held vp hir hands, and with trilling teares praied his lordships patience and pardon, excusing as well as she could hir husbands follie, saieng that he had assembled all that companie onelie for a generall hunting, nothing thinking vpon his lordship; and that the men seeing his lordship could not be persuaded to make anie staie: and so praied his lordship to take it. And herein she so wiselie and in such modestie did behaue hir selfe, that his lordship granted hir request, and temporised with the earle. But he followed his determination, and vsed his authoritie to decide matters in and throughout the palantine of Kerrie. This greeued the earle to the hart, who hauing no other waie to be reuenged, he deuiseth certeine articles against the president, which he with great exclames exhibited vnto the lord deputie. The lord deputie, when he departed from Corke, he returned to Dublin, where he was aduertised that the Mac an Earles in Connagh had hired a new supplie of two thousand Scots, and were in actuall rebellion. Whereupon he prepared a new iourneie thitherwards: and being come thither, he found the matter to be true, and that they were vp in campe and in outragious maner spoiling the countries. But before his comming they had besieged Ballie Riogh which was the earles their fathers house, and for his treacherous dealings confiscated.

The erle complaineth against the lord president.

The Mac an Earles in Connagh rise in rebellion.

The earls sons do besiege Ballie Riogh.

In this house the lord deputie, at his last departure from thense, had placed Thomas le Strange, and capteine Colier with one hundred footmen, and fiftie horsemen to lie in garrison; but the earls sons, thinking themselues of sufficient strength to recouer the same againe, laid siege vnto it, and inuironed it round about: but they were so resisted, that they did not onelie not preuaile; but the garrison within did make sundrie assaults vpon them, and slue at sundrie times six of their principall capteins, and one hundred and fiftie of their men. And in the end, when they saw they could not preuaile, they raised their siege, and followed their accustomed robbing and spoiling of the countrie; but especiallie vpon Mac William Eughter, from whome they tooke sundrie of his castels, and spoiled him of his goods and cattels. The lord deputie, not slacking nor slowing his businesse, followed out of hand the foresaid rebels, who skipped to and fro in such sort, that in no case could he find them at any aduantage. Wherfore he did disperse his companies, and according as intelligence was giuen, he caused pursute to be made vpon them. And by that meanes, although he could not méete with the whole troope of them, whereby to haue a full aduantage vpon them; yet manie times he met with some of them, slue them, hanged and executed them, tooke their preies from them, and gained awaie their holds and castels. And at length hauing good espials, it was aduertised vnto him, that the Scots were incamped in the confins and marches of Mac William Eughters countrie: and therupon he forthwith marched thitherwards, and in his waie manie of them fell into his lap, who had their rewards. Vnto whose lordship resorted the said Mac William with all the force he had, & could make; who in this rebellion, being the onelie man of power in Connagh, & yet not able to saue himselfe a hole from their inuasions, did shew himselfe most loiall, and did the best seruice that was done vpon the rebels: and by the meanes of the said deputie, he recouered, and was repossessed of sundrie his castels, which in this rebellion had bene taken from him.

Walter William Eughter his countrie spoiled.

The lord deputie followeth the rebels.

The Scots incamped in Connagh.

Mac william Eughter commeth with all the force he could make vnto the lord deputie.

The Scots, when they heard of the approching of the deputie towards them, they raised their campe, and suddenlie dispersed themselues, and the most of them, being wearie of their abode and interteinment, fled into the rout in Vlster. The residue like vnto the bare arsed rebels sculked to and fro; but in the end, they and the others were all dispersed, & durst not to appeare. Wherefore the deputie, when he had broken the galles of them, & had thus dispersed them, he by iournies returned towards Dublin, and hauing a little before receiued hir maiesties letters in the behalfe of Nicholas Malbie hir seruant, whome she commended for his sufficiencie, both for martiall and ciuill causes: and as well for the incouragement of him, as for the nourishing of the like vertues in others of his profession; hir pleasure was to commit vnto him the chefe charge and gouernement uernement vnder the said deputie in Connagh, and willed that he should be forthwith established in that office, & to be sworne one of hir priuie councell, & to haue that countenance, authoritie, & interteinement as was meet, conuenient & agréeable for the place, office, & person. Which the said deputie most willinglie & gladlie performed, dubbed him knight, and made him gouernor by the name of a coronell of Connaugh: thinking himselfe most happie, that he was assisted with such a man, as who for his experience in iudgement, his discretion in gouernement, and his painefulnesse and skill in martiall seruice was sufficient and compleat; and best able, partlie by force, partlie by persuasion, and chieflie by ministring of iustice, was (I saie) best able, and would frame the rude and barbarous people of that prouince to ciuilitie and good order. And thus much he aduertised vnto hir maiestie by his letters, with thankes for hir choise of so méete and apt a man. During the time of this seruice and being of the lord deputie in Connagh, the earle of Esser, a man of great nobilitie and parentage died in Dublin. Great doubts were made of his death; some thinking that he should be poisoned, because he was then in the best time of his age, of a verie good constitution of bodie, and not knowne to haue bæne sicke anie time before his death. But the matter examined by all the meanes that could be deuised, there was no such thing then found: but supposed, that for so much as he had a flux, which was a spise of a Dysenteria, and wherewith he had bæne oftentimes before troubled, by the inspection and iudgement of such physicians & others who were present, it was iudged and found that it was some cause of his death. Some thought rather that he should be bewitched, as that countrie is much giuen to such dailie practises. But how far is that from all christianitie, all wise and godlie doo know, and euerie good christian should vnderstand. It is against the word of the Lord and all christian religion; and therefore not to be credited. It was thought and so affirmed by the most part of all men, that some inward griefe of the mind and secret sorow of the hart had hastened that, which no infirmitie of the bodie nor anie other deuises extraordinarie could compasse. For where that maladie is once entered, and hath seized and taken possession, and which by no physicke can be releeued or cured: it is but in vaine to minister the same to the bodie, which can not indure when the other faileth, no more than can an accident remaine, when the substance is gone; or else as the imbers or ashes giue heat, when the wood is burned and consumed.

The Scots forsake Connagh and returne home.

Sir Nicholas Malbie appointed gouernor of Cõnagh.

The death of the earle of Esser.

Dysemeria.

The sundrie opinions of his death. Poisoning. Witchcraft.

Sorrow and griefe of mind.

No physicke against the sorow of the mind.

He was no more honorable of birth and parentage by his ancestors, of whome some descended out of kings loines; but as singular a man for all the gifts both of mind and bodie, as that age had not manie better. Towards God he was most deuout and religious, whome he serued according to his holie word in all truth and sinceritie, and his whole life according to his vocation he framed after the same; being not spotted with drunkennesse, couetousnesse, whoredome, incontinencie, or anie other notorious crime: a great fauourer of the godlie, a friend to the professors of the gospell, & an extreame enimie to the papists & enimies of the true religion: to his prince & souereigne most dutifull and humble, faithfull & obedient: his superiors he honored, his elders he reuerenced, his equals he loued, his inferiors he fauored: to his countrie trustie, to the commonwealth zealous, to all men courteous, and to the poore and oppressed bounteous and liberall.

The vertues of the earle of Esser.

In matters of policie he was verie prudent, and of a great reach: in causes of counsell sound, and of a déepe iudgement: in martiall affaires most valiant and of great courage, and of so heroicall a mind, that if his abilitie had answered his good will, he had not bin a second, neither to Lacie, nor to Courcie, nor to anie the first conquerors of Ulster to the crowne of England. For such a plot had he laid for the regaining therof, that it could not be denied, but if the same had béene followed, great good would haue insued in processe of time to hir maiestie, in obedience and reuenues, and a great suertie to that estate, and the like increase of benefit to the whole commonwealth. The more noble were his good and worthie attempts, the more he was crossed and contraried: but by such secret meanes, as which he did rather for the most part coniecture amisse, than hit aright: but yet such was the great valour of his mind, and the magnanimitie of his stomach, that his good meanings & attempts, for the honor of his prince, and the benefit of the commonwealth, being so contraried and ouerthwarted, he whome no trauels, no paines, no seruice, no hardnesse could breake; the verie griefe of mind and sorrow of heart (as it was thought) did onelie consume and ouerthrow. He was also verie learned, and of great reading, and sometimes a scholer in the vniuersitie, and had verie good knowledge in all kind of letters, as well theologicall as humane, and of a verie quicke wit to conceiue, of a good capacitie to vnderstand, and of a readie tong to vtter and deliuer in a verie good order what he had conceiued; and so well he would discourse and argue anie matter, as few scholers better, and not manie so skilfull in anie one, as he was generallie in all good vertues. A more noble man euerie wale, not England, nor anie other nation hath lightlie afforded. And certeinlie, if it had pleased God that Lachesis had bene idle, or had spun a longer thread, that he might haue liued to haue bæne imploied according to his excellent vertues, either in matters of counsell, of policie, or martiall, no doubt he would haue prooued a most worthie and beneficiall member vnto hir maiestie, and hir whole commonwealth. As his life was, so also was his death most godlie, comfortable, and vertuous, the one answerable to the other, euen as S. Augustine writeth; vix malè moritur qui benè vixit. In all the time of his sicknesse, which was about twentie or one and twentie daies, although he were manie times tormented with grœuous pangs in the bellie: yet was he neuer heard to grudge or murmur, nor to speake anie angrie or idle word, but most patientlie and méekelie take all things in good part. After he perceiued that nature began to faile and defect, he yéelded himselfe to die, and was verie desirous that his friends and welwillers should haue accesse vnto him, and to abide by him at their pleasure. And by that meanes he had continuallie about him diuerse men of all degrees, as well of the clergie, as of the laitie, both men and women, gentlemen & seruants, before whom he did shew most apparant arguments of a godlie and vnfeined repentance of his life past, and of a most christian and perfect charitie with all the world, frœlie forgiuing euerie offense done vnto him, and asking the like of all others. His faith he openlie confessed, and witnessed a most vndoubted assurance of his saluation in Christ Jesus, purchased for him in his bloud and death: and manie times he would with a lowd voice saie; Cupio dissolui & esse cum Christo. He spent most part of the time, when the extremitie of his sicknesse did not let him, in praiers, and in hearing the word read vnto him, and would vse such godlie admonitions, such pithie persuasions, & so graue instructions, as he neuer did, nor thought he could doo in all his life time: for he neuer seemed in all his daies to be halfe so wise, learned, and eloquent. The néerer that death drew, the more feruent he

A plot for the regaining of Ulster.

The earle of Esser contrarried in all his attempts.

The earle verie well learned.

A godlie life hath a godlie end.

His patience in his sicknes

His repentance and charitie.

He confesseth his faith.

His praieng and hearing the word.

he was in praier, and requested all his companie to doo the like; and the verie last words that he spake was, The lord Jesus. And when his tong gaue ouer to speake anie more, he lifted vp his hands & eies to the Lord his God, vntill most sweetlie, mildlie, and godlie he did yéeld vp his ghost, which manie times before he had commended to his Lord and God. And thus this noble man vpon the two and twentith daie of September, and in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred seuentie and six, left this world, to the great sorow of his frends, and losse of the commonwealth; but to the gaine of himselfe, who by all aparant arguments and testimonies of his vndouted faith, doth assure vs of his euerlasting ioie, and eternall felicitie.

See more of this earle of Essex in the chronicles of England, pag. 1263.

His letters to the lord deputie.

About three daies before his death, he wrot his last letters to the lord deputie, being then in the remote parties of Connagh; and verie desirous he was to haue spoken with him. In which letters he gaue his lordship most hartie thanks for all the good frendships past betweene them, and wished that the good and faithfull dealings betweene them were knowne as well in England as elsewhere. Then he commended to him all his seruants generallie, and some by particular name; and therein a speciall request for his sonne and heire, that though he himselfe should die to his frends, yet his sonne the earle of Essex might liue to the seruice of his prince, and the good of the commonwealth. And lastlie, he touched somewhat concerning his burtall, and herewith he sent vnto his lordship a little George and a garter, the ensignes of the order of the garter, whereof they both were knights and companions, to be a memoriall of the loue and goodwill past betweene them. And now leauing this honorable earle in his heauenlie ioie and blisse: let vs returne to the historie of this effere and effrenated nation.

The effect of the earles letters to the deputie.

The disagréements betweene the earls of Desmond and Thomond.

The prouince of Mounster was indifferent quiet, but some repinings were betweene the earles of Thomond and Desmond, the one not abiding nor digesting the orders, which vpon sundrie complaints were made against him, which he refused to obeie, vntill volens nolens he were pressed thereunto by the lord president: the other, who was alwaies a verie wilfull man, notwithstanding he had at Corke yéelded himselfe (of his owne frée consent) to abide the orders there made for the quietnesse of the countrie, yet now hauing taken the aduise of his disordered followers, he would not be withdrawen from his wonted exactions, and therefore repined to beare further anie cesse; and wrote his letters to the lords of hir maiesties priuie councell in England, complaining much, and prouing nothing, and aggrauating the taking of the cesse, with most manifest vntruths. And so far he was carried in misliking the gouernment, bicause he saw his owne wonted swaie was much abated, that he would verie faine haue slipped out if he could. And it was verelie thought that he was combined in a secret conspiration with the forelorne sonnes of the earle of Clanricard, as was his brother sir John of Desmond, who for his conference had with Shane Burke, was suspected to haue ioined with him in his rebellion; as also because he had promised him aid out of Mounster, if he would hold out, and for which he was committed to ward. Which carted the more likelihood, bicause his intention was to put awaie his owne wife, & to haue matched himselfe in marriage with Shanes sister, who was Orwackes wife, & of late forsaken by him. Neuer theless, the erle was fearefull to offend the state, for the president was so watchfull to espie out both his and all the rest of their doings, and in such a readinesse to be at inches with them, and vpon their bones if they started out neuer so little, that he kept himselfe quiet, and came in to the said president, and deliuered in his men that were demanded, & which before he denied, being verie notorious malefactors and practisers of vnquietnesse.

The earle of Desmond repineth against all good orders, and complaineth against the cesse.

Sir John of Desmond committed to ward.

Sir P. Desmond putteth away his wife and marrieth another mans wife.

And now that the whole land was (as was thought) in quiet, or at least in outward shew more quiet than in times past, the noblemen & gentlemen in the English pale, of whome least suspicion of anie euill was thought, they begin verie inconsideratlie to repine against the cesse: who if they had entred into the due consideration thereof, they (although somewhat to their further charge) should haue mainteined it: because that the same was procured for the defense of themselues, and they onelie had the benefit thereof. For you shall vnderstand that the lord deputie, being a man of great wisdome, knowlege, and experience, when he considered the fickle state of that wauering and rebellious nation of the Irishrie, who notwithstanding they had neuer so firmlie promised, sworne, and vowed all allegiance and obedience to hir maiestie: yet vpon euerie light occasion, without anie respect of faith and dutie, would fling out into secret conspiracies, and so into open rebellion; and then for the appeasing thereof, and the preseruation of hir good subiects, hir highnesse was driuen to inlarge hir garrisons, and to increase hir armie to hir excessiue charges, and all which companies were victelled by the English pale: and further, considering that the benefit which grew hereby, was generallie extended to the whole pale, who in equitie should be contributorie to the burthen, as they were partakers of the ease, and yet manie of them, pretending to haue liberties and priuileges, claimed to be exempted from anie contribution at all, whereby the residue were the more greeued, & the greater burthened, to their impouerishing, & the hinderance of their seruice: the lord deputie caused a through search to be made in hir highnesse court of the exchéker in Ireland, of all the records, for and concerning all and all manner of liberties which at anie time had tofore bin granted to anie person or persons whatsoeuer: and in the end found that (verie few ancient liberties excepted) all were vsurped, or by statute repealed.

The gentlemen in the pale begin to repine against the cesse.

Liberties claimed to be discharged of the cesse.

The records searched for liberties.

Wherevpon to ease the oppressed, and to make the burthen to be borne more vniuersallie, and so more indifferentlie; and for the better furtherance of hir highnesse seruice: he commanded by proclamation all such liberties and frédoms to be dissolued, as which either had no grant at all, or which had not that continuance of times out of memorie of man. And of this latter sort were manie made by a statute but to indure onelie for ten yeares, and all which were expired. And for this cause they neuer found fault before now that they are greeued, and therefore doo repine against cesse; and with open mouths crie out, that they were so poore that they could not beare anie cesse, and that it was against the law. And here for your better vnderstanding what cesse is, and what is meant thereby; it is a prerogatiue of the prince, to impose vpon the countrie a certeine proportion of all kind of victels for men and horsse, to be deliuered at a reasonable price called the quéens price, to all and euerie such souldiors as she is contented to be at charge withall, and so much as is thought competent for the lord deputies house; and which price is to be yearelie rated and assessed by the lord deputie and the councell, with the assistants and assent of the nobilitie of the countrie, at such rates and prices as the souldiors may liue of his wages, and the said deputie of his interteinment.

Liberties dissolued by proclamation.

What cesse is.

The malecōtents make their supplication to the

These things although they were orderlie done, yet certeine malecontents, finding themselues greeued, bicause they should also now beare a portion, and be be contributaries: first they draw their heads togither, and make there supplication to the lord deputie and councell, which was receiued verie willinglie, and offer made that conference should be had with them, how and what waie it might best be deuised to ease there grieues, & not to charge the queene. Wherupon at a time appointed they all met, and came in persons before the deputie and councell, where the said malecontents first opened their grieues, that they had certeine old and ancient priuileges and liberties which were taken from them; then that they were compelled to pæld to an vnreasonable cesse, which they were not able to beare, and that was will and pleasure onlie, and contrarie to all law and reason, that anie such charge should be imposed vpon them without a parlement or grand councell.

The lord deputie & councell to be discharged of the cesse.

When the lord deputie and councell heard them at full, they appointed a daie, when they should come and receiue their answer. In the meane time the lord deputie and councell consulted and consideted of the matter, and resolued themselues vpon an answer. And when the daie came and they appeered, answer was made vnto them by the mouth of the lord chancellor, that they had no charters nor liberties at all to be found in hir highnesse records, other than such as were expired and of no validitie. And as for the greatnesse of the cesse, the burden whereof they had alleged to be vnreasonable and not to be borne, because they said & auouched that it was ten pounds & twelue pounds of ech plough land; it was offered that they should be discharged, if they would paie but fiue markes for euerie plough land. And whatsoeuer they said in derall of the pateng of the cesse, it was and is to be proued, that it was not onelie hir maiesties prerogatiue which may not be impeached; but also to be prooued by most ancient records, that euer since the time of king Henrie the fourth, for the space of eight or nine score yeares, there hath bin still from time to time, as occasion hath required, the like charges imposed by the name of cesse by the deputie and councell, and such nobilitie as were sent for and did come to the same, now in question and by them repined at. Neuertheless, they repined and flatlie denied that they would yéld to anie cesse, saieng and alledging as before, that it was against reason and law, and therefore praied that they might haue his lordships libertie to make their repaire ouer into England, and to acquaint hir highnesse with their case. Wherevnto he answered, that he would neither giue any such leaue nor denie them to go. Wherevpon they assembled themselues togither againe, and by the aduise of certeine busie headed lawiers and malecontented gentlemen, who had stirred and set them a worke to conioine themselues to follow this sute, and contributed a masse of monie amongst themselues, for the charge of the said lawiers, namelie Barnabie Scurlocke, Richard Peteruill, and Henrie Burnell, who hauing bene sometimes students in the ins of the court in London, & acquainted with Littletons tenures, thought themselues so well fraughted with knowledge in the lawes, as they were able to wade in all matters of the deepest points of the law. But if they had first (as it becommeth dutifull subiects) to haue looked in the booke of God, they should haue found it written there, that it was God himselfe who first made kings and established their thrones, and gaue them most excellent preeminences next to himselfe, that they should be vnder him the supreme gouernours vpon the earth; and haue that authoritie and prerogatiue, that all inferiors and subiects should and ought in all humblenesse and dutifulnesse submit themselues vnto the obedience of them for the Lords sake: because so is it the will of God, without sifting of his authoritie or examining his gouernment. For there is no power (as the apostle saith) but of God, & they are ordeined of God; wherfore who so resisteth them, resisteth God, and whose resistances & disobediences the Lord himselfe hath reuenged oftentimes on the disobedient. Wherfore euerie man is to be subiect in all humilitie & obedience vnto them in all maner of ordinances, being not against God, not onlie because of wrath, but also for conscience sake, especiallie in matters being well considered, & which do concerne their one benefit and safetie. If this be the infallible truth, how farre were these men ouerthot, that thus would dispute the princes prerogatiue with their Littletons tenures; and measure the same with their owne rules and deuises? It had bin much better for them, & more to their commendations, if they had (as the scholers of Pythagoras) kept silence and had held their peace, vntill such time as they had beene better studied in their owne lawes: and then they should haue found it written that the prince or king is the head and most excellent part of the bodie of the commonwealth; and through his gouernance the preseruer and defender of the whole bodie, and (as the prophet termeth them) to be nourishing fathers of the people which are the rest of the bodie, and for which causes the lawes do attribute vnto him all honor, dignitie, prerogatiue, and preeminence aboue all others; and which his prerogatiue doth not onelie extend to his owne person, and all that which he hath of his owne, but also to all his subiects. And the lawyers themselues do so far stretch this for a Maxime, that whatsoeuer lawes be made and established either for the benefit of holie church or common profit, it is alwaies implied Salua in omnibus regis prærogatiua; and that nothing shall be intended to be preiudiciall to his crowne and dignitie. But by all likelihood these men were not so farre read; or if they had, their malice or desire of some pelting lucre, which blindeth manie of that profession, had made them forgetfull of themselues & of their duties. Well, these great lawiers beare the malecontented lords & gentlemen in hand, that their cause & sute was good and reasonable, and by the law to be warranted, & not to be doubted but the same would haue good successe. Wherupon they made vp their supplication and letters to hir maiestie, with the like letters to hir honorable priuie councell, dated the tenth of Januarie, 1576, and vnder the hands of Rolland vicount of Baltinglas, Ed. of Deluin, Christopher of Hoth, Peter of Trimleston, James of Kellew, and Patrike Naugle barons; sir Oliuer Plunket, sir Thomas Nugeat, sir Christopher Chiuers, and sir William Searefield knights; Edward Plunket, Patrike Naugle, Patrike Hulleie, George Plunket, Francis Nugeat, Laurence Nugeat, Nicholas Talle, James Nugeat, and William Talbot, in the names of all the inhabitants within the English pale, had subscribed. And then also they deliuered in the like order their letters of atturneie vnto their said agents, and so much monie for their expenses as was thought sufficient, with their order and promise to suplie what soeuer they should næd. And thus being furnished with all things to their contentments, they past ouer the seas, and made their repaire vnto the court of England, and there at time conuenient did exhibit their supplications and letters to hir maiestie and the lords of the councell, which in effect consisted in these points.

The kings prerogatiue by the lawes of the realme.

The impaled gentlemen send into England their agents to complaine.

The prerogatiue of a prince by the law of God.

First, that where there was a cesse imposed by the lord deputie and councell vpon the English pale for hir maiesties garrisons, they finding themselues grieued therewith, made their complaint thereof vnto the said lord deputie and councell for redresse, and could not be heard.

1 The effect of the letters & complaints exhibited to hir maiestie and councell.

2 Secondarilie, they affirmed that the said cesse, or anie other like to be imposed vpon them, was against the lawes, statutes, and vsages of that realme.

3 Thirdlie, that the cesse was a most intollerable and grieuous burden, there being eracted out of euerie plough land ten and twelue pounds.

4 Fourthlie, that in the leuieng and eracting, there were manie and sundrie abuses donne and committed.

The matter is referred to the councell. When hir maiestie had throughlie read both the complaints and letters, she forthwith sent and set them ouer to the lords of hir priuie councell to be considered, and the same to be throughlie examined; who forthwith assembled themselues, and hauing read and heard the contents thereof, did compare them with the like letters sent vnto them from the said malecontented lords & gentlemen; as also with the instructions and aduertisements, which they likewise had receiued from the lord deputie and councell out of Ireland, concerning the same. And after long debating of the matter, that they might the better proue and vnderstand the greatnesse therof, did by hir highnesse commandement call before them the earles of Kildare and Ormond, the vicount of Gormanstone, and the baron of Dunsanie, who then were attendant at the court, and declared vnto them the whole matter, and the maner of these mens procéedings both héere and in that realme, whose intent and meaning was in verie déed, vnder color to séeke some releefe, to haue taken awaie wholie the imposing of anie cesse, and so consequentlie to haue taken awaie the right & prerogatiue, which hir maiestie & predecessors haue alwaies inioied, and without which that realme could not be defended, nor themselues preserued.

These foure noblemen, when they had heard the whole matter, séemed to be sorie, and to mislike of their vnaduised procédings: they confessing and acknowledging that cesse hath bæne alwaies vsed to be taken, and they thought him not to be a dutifull subiect, who would denie or impugne the same: although they wished and did praie, that the poore inhabitants in times of scarsitie might be eased of some part of the burthen which they now presentlie did beare. When the lords of the councell had procæded herein so farre as they could, they deliuered vp their opinions to hir maiestie, aduertising that concerning the first article they could say nothing; but that they supposed that the dooings of hir highnesse deputie was not so strict as was complained: bicause he had written otherwise.

The answers of the councell to the articles of the complainers.

To the second their opinion was, that it touched hir maiesties prerogatiue, so much to be denied of that imposition, which hath bæne vsed, allowed, and continued for manie yeares, and in times of hir sundrie predecessors; that now it might not be suffered to be impeached, vnlesse hir highnesse would lose and forgo hir title, right, and interest to the crowne of Ireland, or else support the whole burthen and charge to defend the same of hir owne purse: neither which extreamities could or might in anie wise be tollerated.

To the third, that the cesse was intollerable, and not able to be borne, they thought that to be true, if ten pounds and twelue pounds should be demanded out of euerie plough land, as they complained: but they vnderstood by credible informations from the deputie and councell the contrarie, & that they were offered at fiue marks the plough land: which was supposed to be verie easie and reasonable.

To the fourth article their opinion was, that if anie such abuses were donne, it were good the same were set downe and knowne, and a redresse therof to be ordered.

When hir highnesse had read and thoroughlie considered their opinions and resolutions, and finding hir selfe vndutifullie to be handled by hir subiects, commanded by the aduise of hir councell the said agents which followed their suit, to be committed to the Fléet, and forthwith wrote hir letters to the said hir deputie and councell, finding hir selfe grieued with the said hir subiects of the pale, that the releeuing of hir armie with vittels by waie of cesse, should be auouched to be a matter against law, and ancient custome: and yet the same both in hir time and in the times of hir progenitors, hath vsuallie bæne imposed, and now impugned by some such as in times past had subscribed thereunto, in prejudice of hir prerogatiue, and hinderance of hir seruice. And therfore she did not onelie mislike, & was greatlie offended with these their presumptuous and vndutifull maner of procéding; but also found fault with the said deputie and hir councell there, that they would and did suffer hir prerogatiue in contempt of hir highnesse and authoritie to be so impugned, & the parties not committed & punished: by which meanes the matter at the first and in the beginning might haue bæne remedied. And therefore as hir highnesse had alreadie giuen order for committing them to the Fléet, for the punishment of the agents which were sent ouer with the complaints and letters, for such their iustifieng and mainteining the imposition of the said cesse to be against the lawes and customes of that hir realme, and therefore séeking to impeach hir prerogatiue and roiall authoritie: but also willed and commanded him and all hir whole councell to send for those lords and gentlemen, which subscribed the letters sent vnto hir highnesse, who if they will stand to mainteine their assertions, and auow the imposition of the cesse to be against the lawes and customes of the realme, and not warrantable by hir prerogatiue, that then hir pleasure was, that these persisting and auowing to be likewise committed.

Hir maiestie offended with the complainers.

The agents of the complainers sent to the Fléet.

Hir maiestie offended with the lord deputie and councell for suffering the complainers vnpunished.

The complainers which subscribed to be sent and committed to ward.

And concerning the abuses perpetrated in the maner of the leuieng the said cesse, hir commandement and order was, that whosoeuer were culpable therein, he should be punished with all seueritie. And herewith also she was contented, and had giuen order for some qualification to be yælded vnto, as by the said hir deputie and councell should be thought méet: considering the scarsitie and the dearth which was then in the said English pale. And in case the said lords and gentlemen vpon better consideration will be contented to acknowledge their offenses, and submit themselues simplie, and vnder their handwritings: that then they to receiue fauour. And as for those and such hir learned men, as were present at the debating of the matter, and did forbeare (contrarie to their dutie & knowledge) to stand in maintenance against the said prerogatiue, to be displaced and discharged out of hir fée, and their places to be supplied by such others as by the deputies shall be thought méet. Immediatlie vpon the receipt of hir maiesties letters, and the like from the councell, the lord deputie and councell by their letters sent not onelie for those malcontents, which had before subscribed to the letters sent to hir highnesse and councell; but also in discretion for such others who for their disguised and cunning manner of dealings were specialie noted to be councellors, ringleaders, and procurors of these letters to hir maiestie and the lords of hir councell: who when they were come, and then being dealt withall, touching their claime of frædome from cesse: their answers were arrogant and wilfull, and repining against hir maiesties prerogatiue, and affirming boldlie in plaine spéeches and without anie sticking, that no

The complainers acknowledging their faults to be gentlie vsed.

The lawyers of hir maiesties fée maintening the complaints, to be displaced.

The malcontents & their abbettors sent for.

The proud answers of the malcontents.

cesse

ceſſe could be impoſed but by parlement or a grand councell; and whatſoeuer was otherwiſe ſet downe, was againſt the law: and ſo ſtubbornelie they were bent therein, that they would not yæld to anie conference: whereupon they were all committed to the caſtell of Dublin, notwithſtanding ſome of them (after they had better aduiſed themſelues) yælded a ſubmiſſion and praied mercie.

The malcontents are all committed to priſon.

Which doings when the lord deputie and councell had forthwith aduertiſed to hir highneſſe & the councell in England; they nothing liking theſe arrogant and diſſolute parts of theſe impaled malecontents, ſent for their agents; and hauing the like conference with them, found them of like diſpoſition, being as a fit couer to the pot, verie froward, arrogant, and wilfull: whereupon they were remoued from the Flét to the Tower: a place appointed for the offendors in capitall cauſes, and for ſuch (being impugners of hir prerogatiue) as be ſuppoſed to offend in the nereſt degrée to the higheſt. These things when they were notified vnto the lords and gentlemen in Ireland, they were maruellouſlie grieued; but not the one nor the other would giue ouer, vntill their arrogancies and inſolencies were by apparant matter and good records fullie conuinced, and condemned: for which the lord chancellor of verie purpoſe was ſent ouer into England, who ſo fullie, effectuallie, and diſcrætlie did reſolue hir maieſtie and councell in euerie point, which the parties agents could not denie.

The agents for their frowardneſſe ſent to the Tower.

The lord chancellor of Ireland ſent into England.

Now in the end they conſidered better of themſelues, and ſent their humble ſubmiſſion in writing vnder their hands to the ſaid lords of hir maieſties priuie councell, confeſſing that they had diſſolutallie and inſolentlie, both in words and writings offended moſt grieuouſlie; proteſting yet that their intent was neuer to denie hir rotall prerogatiue, to vſe the ſame as occaſion ſhould ſerue, but onelie to redreſſe certeine abuſes; and therefore moſt humblie praied they might find ſome mercie, and that the hard and painfull impriſonment which they had ſuſteined, might be a ſufficient puniſhment for the ſame. Whereupon they were releaſed, putting in bonds of one thouſand pounds, that within fiue daies they ſhould depart homewards into Ireland; and after their tranſportation & arriuall thither, ſhould make their immediat repaire, without ſtaie or lingering, to the lord deputie and councell, and there to giue their attendance, vntill by them they ſhould be licenced to depart. At their comming home they perfor-med the conditions of their obligations, and moſt humblie in like order ſubmitted themſelues to the lord deputie and councell, and then (according to an order thought good by the lords of the councell in England, and referred to the liking of the lord deputie and councell in Ireland) the ſame was after long trauerſe ended and determined. But here to ſet downe what practiſes, informations, & deuiſes were made againſt the ſaid deputie, by the ſaid malecontents, and ſome (by their means) of no ſmall calling had informed that he had alienated the hearts of the ſubiects from totall obedience, that he had farmed all the whole relme, that he had waſted hir maieſties treaſures and reuenues, that he wanted policie in his gouernement, that he ſhould for this dealing with hir ſubiects be reuoked, that he did all things by his owne mind without the aduiſe of others, contrarie to the courſe of other deputies before him, that he did grant manie pardons, to the imboldening of manie which offended the more.

The agents were releaſed vpon their bonds to appeare before the lord deputie and councell.

The falſe accuſations made againſt the lord deputie.

These and manie ſuch other like vntruths they ſpred. But truth, which is the daughter of time, did manifeſt it to the whole world, that their ouerthrow was his credit, and his preuaile was to their reproch and ſhame. And albeit manie were the pangs and inward griefes, which for a time by the meanes of their falſe ſuggeſtions he ſuſteined, and with great paines he couered: yet in the end it turned to his great ioy and comfort. And here by the way, if a man without offenſe ſhould fall into the conſideration of this their reſiſtance, and repining againſt the ceſſe; which was then enterpriſed and taken in hand; when the whole land ſtood in a broken and doubtfull ſtate, and the time verie dangerous; when the earle of Deſmond frowardlie kicked at the like, and all the lords in Mounſter had contrarie to their owne orders and promiſes, denied, and commanded their tenants to denie after the manner of the Engliſh pale, to paie anie ceſſe; when James Fitzmoris being furniſhed with men, monie, and munition, by the pope and king of Spaine, was dailie loked for to come and inuade the land; and when the great ones hauing hollow harts, and addicted to papiſtrie, did dailie gape and expect for the ſame; when the diſſolute Iriſhrie in Mounſter and Connaugh were combined and ioined in theſe conſpiracies; when Rorie Og, Omore, Connor Mac Cormake, Oconnor & others, animated by the forſaid conſpiracies, were vp in open rebellion, and vſed moſt execrable outrages; when ſome of the beſt townes in Leinſter did aid, comfort, and mainteine theſe rebels, and beſides manie other circumſtances concurring herewith: might it not be well preſumed (and as it was ſo doubted) that the cauſe being like, they ſhould alſo be combined and linked alike? And might not the whole world iudge that neither barrell was the better herring? And yet notwithſtanding it fell in the end to a better effect. For the lords and inhabitants in the Engliſh pale, ſince the time of the conqueſt by king Henrie the ſecond, and ſince their firſt arriuall into this land, it hath not béene lightlie knowne that they had broken their faith and their allegiance, and not to rebell in anie warres againſt the crowne of England, and the kings of the ſame; ſauing as now in reſpect to ſaue their purſſes, rather than meaning anie breach of dutie, had ouer ſhot themſelues: which vpon a further conſideration of the truth they repented, and vpon their ſubmiſſion were pardoned, in hope and vpon their promiſe that they would neuer thenſeforth offend, nor be found faultie with the like. During the trauerſe about the ceſſe, manie things happened in the land worthie to be reprehended (as great and ſundrie were the aduertiſements from out of France by ſuch Engliſhmen as were there imploied) of an intention of James Fitzmoris to inuade Ireland, who had béene at Rome with the pope, and there was he princelie interteined, and returned from thenſe with a good maſſe of treaſure, making his returne through Spaine, and by the king thereof was furniſhed with men, munitions, & treaſures, and all things neceſſarie. Which things were by letters from him ſignified vnto the chéefeſt of all Mounſter his ſecret confederats, and they being papiſts both in bodie & ſoule, deſirous of change of gouernement, and to be vnder a prince of their owne ſuperſtition, did dailie languiſh and expect his comming. Wherefore hir maieſtie and councell, hauing the like intelligences, do alſo prepare monie, munitions, vittels, and men, and all other things neceſſarie for the withſtanding of him.

The fidelitie of the Engliſh pale to the crowne.

Rorie Og, Omore, and Connor Mac Cormake, Oconnor, and their coparteners, contrarie to their othes, ſubmiſſions, and promiſes, hoping for aid out of Connaugh, began anew to gather their frends and confederats out of ſeuerall places, to the number of a hundred ſwords, which with his owne made aboue ſeauen ſcore; and being animated by Shane Burke to continue a rebell, he burned diuerſe mens haggards, poore mens houses, and sundrie villages, and committed manie outrages: and being not resisted, he toke such incouragement of his successe, that leauing poore villages, he went to great townes, as to the Naas, distant from Dublin about ten miles. The verie same daie that he came thither at night, was the patrone daie of the said towne, commonlie called the church holie daie, which daie after the maner of that countrie, and not much vnlike the festiuall daies which the Ethnikes and Pagans were wont to celebrate to their idoll gods of Bacchus and Venus, they spent in gluttonie, drunkennesse, and surfetting. And after they had so filled their panches, and the daie was gone, they somewhat late in the night went to their beds, hauing forgotten to make fast their towne gates, or put anie watch to ward them. Which thing Rorie Og when he knew, and hauing intelligence that euerie man was in his bed a sleepe, then he in the dead night came to the towne with all his companie, who like vnto a sort of furies and diuels new come out of hell, carried vpon the ends of their poles flankes of fier, and did set as they went the low thatched houses on fier. And the wind being then somewhat great and vehement, one house toke fier of another, and so in a trise and moment the whole towne was burned; and yet in the towne supposed to be fiue hundred persons in outward appearance, able to haue resisted them: but they being in their dead sleeps, suddenlie awaked, were so amazed, that they wist not what to do, for the fier was round about them and past quenching, and to pursue the enimie they were altogither vnfurnished, and durst not to do it, neither if they would they could tell which way to follow him. For he taried verie little in the towne, sauing that he sat a little while vpon the crosse in the market place, and beheld how the fire round about him was in euerie house kindled, and whereat he made great ioy and triumph, that he had done and exploited so diuelish an act. And then after a short space he arose and departed with great triumph according to his accustomed vsage in all his euill actions, but yet contrarie to his vsage, he killed no one person in the towne. As he returned he preied and spoiled the countrie, and ranging to and fro, as his wauering head carried him, he came verie shortlie vnto the towne at Leighlin bridge, and there burned part of the towne.

D.ij. haggards,

The burning of the Naas by Rorie Og.

Rorie Og burneth the towne at Leighlin bridge.

But George Carew brother vnto Peter Carew, then constable of the said towne and fort, hauing then but a small ward to defend the violence of the enimie, and yet thinking it should be to great a dishonour vnto him to be bearded with a traitor, and to let him depart vnfought withall: he issued out vpon him, hauing with him onelie seuen horsemen and fiue shot, and gaue the charge vpon the said rebels, being two hundred and fortie, with such a courage and valiantnesse (and they astonied bicause it was so sudden and in the night time) that he killed some of them: and then they with the losse of those men began to flie. But at last when they perceiued his force to be but small, and too weake to resist their great number, they returned and chased him to the verie walles of the castell; where if he and his small companie had not like valiant and good souldiers acquited themselues, the rebels had entred into the house; for they were within the gate and there fought, but driuen out and the gate shut. At this bickering they lost sixtéene men, and one of their chiefe captaines named Piers Moinagh, who died verie shortlie after of his hurt. Captaine Carew lost but two men and one horsse, but euerie one of the rest of his companie was hurt.

George Carew with twelue persons against 240 setteth vpon them & driueth them to flie.

The castell in danger to be taken.

The enimie, nothing triumphing nor liking this interteinement, presentlie retired and departed, by which meanes the one halfe of the towne was saued. After their returne from hense, they spoiled sundrie townes and villages vpon the confines & borders of the English pale. And albeit they were verie egerlie followed and pursued, and oftentimes with losse of his companie, yet he was so mainteined, and his watch and spiall was so good, that partlie by the helpe of his acquaintance, and partlie by meanes of the water bogs and fastenesse in euerie place, he was in safegard and safetie. In this pursute made vpon him, it happened that a parlée was appointed betweene captaine Harington and him: vnto whom Rorie Og swore and promised most faithfullie to yeeld himselfe to some conformitie and order. The captaine nothing mistrusting him, gaue too much credit to his subtill promises, and did so open himselfe vnto him, that through his owne follie Rorie toke aduantage, and perforce toke him and Alexander Cosbie, who was with him in hand, both which he handfasted togither, and caried them along with him as his water spaniels, thorough woods and bogs, threatening them still to kill them. This thing being knowne, great sorow and greefe was conceiued of the lord deputie, and of all good Englishmen, and dailie practises were deuised for their deliueries; and at length by treatie of friends an agreement was in a manner concluded. But before the same was fullie perfected, a draught was made by Robert Harepole constable of Catherlough, to intrap and to make a draught vpon Rorie: for he knowing where the said Rorie was wont to haunt, and by good espials learning where his coch and cabine was, he being accompanied with Parker lieutenant to captaine Furse and fiftie of his band, earelie in the morning, about two houres before daie, he went and marched to the verie place where Rorie late, and beset the same. Rorie hearing an vnwonted noise, and suspecting the worst, he came suddenlie vpon Harington and Cosbie, thinking to haue slaine them, and getting in the darke to the place where they late, gaue him diuerse wounds, but none deadlie; the greatest was the losse of the little finger on his left hand. Robert Harepole when he had broken open the doore of the cabin, he toke as manie as were within prisoners: but Rorie himselfe and one other priuilie in the darke stole awaie and crept among the bushes, so that he could not be found. The souldiers in the meane time, making spoile of all such goods as they found, killed all the men who were there, but saued captaine Harington and Cosbie.

The enimie is driuen to retire and flie awaie.

Rorie Og by slight and deceipt taketh captaine Harington prisoner.

A draught made vpon Rorie Og by Harepole.

Captaine Harington is hurt.

Rorie Og escapeth.

Rorie Og albeit he was glad that he was so escaped, yet in a great griefe for the losse of his prisoners, and minding to be reuenged, priuilie with all the companies which he could get, besides them which Shane Burke had sent vnto him out of Connagh, he went to Catherlough earlie in the morning, and burned a few haggards of corne and a few houses, and so retired. Robert Harepole hearing hereof, forthwith followeth them with ten or twelue horsses which he had in a readinesse, and at a ford not far off he ouertoke them, and killed sixtéene or seuentéene of his best men, and Rorie himselfe escaped verie narowlie; and so continued still in his former outrages, vntill he was intraped and taken by a deuise of his owne to intrap others, which was in this manner. Vpon the nine and twentith of June 1578, he set forth of purpose an espiall, whom he had cunninglie framed, and made apt for the purpose to go to sir Barnard Fitzpatrike lord of vpper Ossorie, and to tell him by the waie of great friendship and in secretie, that Rorie Og had béene of late in the countie of Kilkennie, and there had taken a great preie and spoile of pots, pans, and other houshold stuffe, which he might easilie take if he would aduen-

Captaine Harington is deliuered.

Rorie Og burneth Catherlough.

1578

A bait laid for the lord of vpper Ossorie.

ture

ture the matter; and if he did wiselie handle it, he might also take Rorie himselfe and all his companie, which as he said (but untrulie) that they were but few in number. The lord of vpper Osserie, neither beléeuing nor yet mistrusting this newes, and yet forecasting the worst, did put himselfe in readinesse to follow the occasion that was offered; and taking with him a good companie of horsemen and footmen, went towards the place where the bait was laied; and being come néere vnto it made staie, or else he had béene intrapped, and sent thirtie of his men into the woods to serch for Rorie. But the baron himselfe with certeine of his horsemen and shot staied in the plaines, to attend the issue of the matter. The companie were no sooner entered into the woods, but Rorie the rebell shewed himselfe with a thirtie persons, the rest lieng in ambush; and he was of the opinion that his fame and estimation was so great, and of such value among the Irishrie, that no man durst to aduenture vpon him if he once saw his presence. But he was deceiued. For at the first sight and view of him, the lord of Osseries kerne gaue the charge vpon him, and at their incounter one of them lighted vpon him, and with his sword presentlie thrust him through the bodie: which was no sooner done, but two or three hacked vpon him, & gaue him such deadlie wounds that he fell downe and died, the same being the last date of June beforesaid; and so this bloudie caitife, delting all in bloud, perished and died in his owne bloud.

Rorie Og is slaine.

But before Rorie Og was thus brought to destruction, the lord deputie made a iournie to the borders of Offallie and Ler, to haue met with the foresaid Rorie Og & his companions the Oconnors for the suppressing of their insolencie, who were growen into such a pride by taking of capteine Harington, and their strength so increased, that with most vndutifull termes they breathed out slanderous speéches against hir maiestie, as which were not to be indured. Wherefore he beset the whole countrie & confines as he thought best, to stop their passage and to annoie them, & so he went to Kilkennie, and there by sundrie examinations found people of all degrees in that towne to haue relieued the said Rorie with vittels and all other necessaries, for his feeding and defense, with whome he toke order according to their deserts. At his being there he sent for the earle of Desmond to come vnto him, bicause he had refused to come to the lord president when he sent for him sundrie times, and for which cause the said lord president was there to complaine vpon him, as also that he had of his owne authoritie, without anie warrant, gathered togither a rable of lewd and vnrulie followers, which harried vp and downe the countrie, eating and spending vpon the same, contrarie to all good orders, and which was not to be suffered.

The lord deputie maketh a iournie vpo Rorie Og.

The earle of Desmõd sent for to come to the lord deputie to Kilkennie.

Which earle forthwith, vpon the receipt of the said letters, came to Kilkennie to the lord deputie, and there being examined of those his vnséemelie parts, confessed some part: and for excuse he alledged and much mistrusted and doubted the president, least he would haue staied him, and haue vsed him hardlie, for which he was blamed and reproued by the lord deputie. But in the end, when they came togither, they were reconciled and made good friends, and then he promised vpon his returne home to disperse abroad his companions, and to obeie the president as hir maiesties principall officer of that prouince, and to come vnto him at all commandements, and which things he performed. For not long after he vttered and bewraied to the said lord president the practises of James Fitzmorris, who by the arriuall of certeine Frenchmen and Irishmen vnto Sligo, in a ship of saint Malowes, did what he could to stirre & make a rebellion in Mounster and Connagh, whereby a plot was laied for the staie of those Frenchmen, and the apprehension of the Irishmen. These were good demonstrations to the vtter shew of the obedience and loialtie of the said earle, but in truth mere dissimulation, as afterwards it appeared.

The earle of Desmond and the lord president of Mounster are reconciled.

The earle of Desmond discouereth to the lord president Iames Fitzmorris his practises.

Connagh was in some part troubled, by means of Orwarke capteine of his surname; in whose countrie there were certeine coiners of monie, and maintained by him. The coronell vnderstanding hereof, he sent vnto Orwarke for them, and who denied to deliuer anie of them: wherefore to correct that his pride, disobedience, and insolencie, he sent a priuat band of footmen, who distressed Orwarke, slue his men, toke his castell, and put all the ward to the sword. Whereupon he came with all humilitie, and submitted himselfe, and craued pardon. All the residue of Connagh was verie quiet, and increased hir maiesties reuenues to the yearelie summe of eightéene hundred pounds by the yeare, with good contentation. And now when it was thought that all things were quiet throughout all Ireland; behold sudden aduertisements were giuen both vnto hir maiestie and councell in England, and to the lord deputie in Ireland, that Thomas Stukeleie was arriued out of Italie vnto Cadis in Spaine, with certeine men, ships, and munitions assigned vnto him by the pope. And being accompanied with certeine strangers attending vpon him, he was come to the seas, to land vpon some part of the realme of Ireland, in traitorous maner to inuade the same, and to prouoke the people to ioine with him in rebellion. All things, as well men, munitions, monie, vittels, and all other things necessarie were prouided and prepared for the preuenting of them, as well by sea as by land: but in the end, aduertisement was giuen from out of Portugall, that his enterprise was diuerted another waie, and to another purpose, and so all things were quiet. Neuertheless, it appeared that he was in great fauour with the pope, and was appointed to some speciall seruice against hir maiestie, if opportunitie would haue serued, & all other things had fallen out as it was deuised. And for the incouraging of him, the pope besides great treasures liberallie bestowed vpon him, he gaue him sundrie titles of honour, and made him knight, baron of Rosse and Idron, vicount of the Porough & Kenshlagh, and earle of Wexford and Catherlough, and marquesse of Leinster, and generall to the most holie father Gregorie the seuenth Pontifici maximo.

Coiners in Connagh.

Orwarke refusing to deliuer ỹ coiners his castell is taken, and he submitteth himselfe.

Tho. Stukeleie suspected to come into Ireland.

Great preparation made against Stukeleie.

The pope his fauour to Stukeleie.

Stukeleie his honour and titles.

In the middle of these broiles, the vicount Baltinglasse, one of the chiefe impugners and malecontents against the cesse, wrote his letters to the earle of Ormond, then attendant at the court of England, and complaineth of great iniuries and spoiles to the value of two hundred pounds in monie, besides numbers of shéepe and kine, done vpon him and his tenants by the English souldiers, vnder sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshall, when they were lodged one night in his house at Baltinglasse, in the time that they serued vpon the rebell Rorie Og. Which letter was by the said earle shewed to hir maiestie, and to the lords of hir most honourable priuie councell. Vpon which complaint, bicause it séemed somewhat pitious and lamentable, and hir maiestie partlie persuaded (as a matter verie likelie to be true) that such gréeuous extortions suffered incorrected, made hir gouernement more hatefull to that nation, than did anie of the Irish exactions: letters were sent to the lord deputie, to take care with all diligence, that the poore oppressed might be satisfied, and the offendors also be punished, according to the quantities and qualities of their offenses.

The vicount Baltinglasse complaineth to the earle of Ormond against sir Nicholas Bagnoll.

The earle of Ormond aduertiseth the complaint of the vicount to hir maiestie and councell. Hir maiestie sendeth letters in the behalfe of the vicount Baltinglasse.

The vicount Baltinglasse complaineth to the lord deputie against sir Nicholas Bagnoll.

The lord deputie, before the receipt of these letters, was complained vnto by the said vicount, and sir Nicholas Bagnoll was called to answer such hurts as were obiected against him. And vpon the replication of the vicount, sir Lucas Dillon and sir Thomas Fitzwilliams knights were appointed to examine all such witnesses, as were brought forth for proofe of the surmises, which in the end fell out to none effect, for nothing could be proued to anie purpose. But it appeared manifest of the contrarie, by the report and testimonie of sundrie gentlemen of verie good credit, and how that the said marshall at his first comming to that towne, had giuen great charge to euerie capteine, to foresee that no iniurie should be offred, no spoiles committed, nor anie thing to be taken by anie souldier or other person without present paiment, protesting and proclaming execution according to marshall law, vpon such as should do the contrarie.

Likewise at his departure from thense, he made the like proclamation, that if there were anie which had anie cause of complaint for anie wrong or iniurie done, or that anie thing were taken and not paied for, he should come and be heard, and be satisfied. And by this it doth appeare, that the surmises were made rather to aggrauat his greefe conceiued against the imposition of the cesse, than for anie good matter in truth. Wherefore as he and his complices preuailed little in the one, no more had he successe or credit in the other. For the matter was fullie certified vnto the lords of the councell, and a request therewith made verie earnestlie, that the said vicount might be reproued, and also terrified to profer or practise anie such vntrue and indirect dealings. By these and other the like practises of the said vicount, that because he did not breake nor like of the cesse, he thought by waie of exclames to aggrauat his owne case, that thereby the lord deputie might fall into the dislike of hir maiestie, and be out of fauour, but the contrarie in the end fell out to his owne reproofe and discredit.

The vicount Baltinglasses complaints are vntrue.

The whole land in peace

When the lord deputie had ended and finished all his businesse, and had set the whole realme in order and peace, being now deliuered from inward and ciuill warre, and from the feare of Stukeleies inuasion, he prepared (according to hir maiesties former letters of the six and twentith of March last past) to take his passage for England, and to make his repaire to hir highnesse. And so when all things were accordinglie prepared, and the wind & weather seruing, he deliuered vp the sword according to hir maiesties commandement, the six & twentith of Maie 1578, vnto sir William Drurie, then lord president of Mounster. And then being conducted by the said now lord iustice and councell, and all the nobilitie, citizens & people to the waters side, he imbarked himselfe, taking his leaue in most honourable, louing, and courteous maner of euerie man. And at his verie entring into the ship for his farewell vnto that whole land and nation, he recited the words of the 114 psalme, In exitu Israel de Aegypto, & domus Iacob de populo barbaro: alluding thereby to the troublesome state of Moses in the land of Aegypt, and of his departure from out of the same: who notwithstanding he had in great wisedome, care, and policie gouerned the stifnecked people of Israell, had done manie miracles and wonderous works to their comfort, had deliuered them from manie great perils and dangers, had preserued and also kept them in peace and safetie, had in the end through the mightie hand of God brought them out of the hands of Pharao, and from out of the land of Aegypt, and had giuen them the sight of the land of promise: yet he found them alwaies a froward and peruerse generation, a stiffenecked and an vngratefull people: euen no lesse as this noble man, and most worthie gouernour hath found of the people of this most cursed nation. Who notwithstanding he was a verie painfull trauceller both by daie and night, in fowle and in faire weathers, in stormes and in tempests, in troubles and in dangers, in scarsitie and in penurie, in danger of the enimie and perill of his life: and yet continuallie studieng, deuising, trauelling, toiling, and labouring to do them good (as he did full manie and often times) which so long as they felt the ease & comfort, so long were they contented and quiet: but otherwise most vngratefull and vnthankefull. And offering vnto him the like reward as Licurgus receiued of the most vnthankfull Lacedemonians, who when he had recouered that sauage nation to a ciuill life, and a politike gouernement, and in the end reduced them to that order and maner, as they became to be feared of all their neighbors, they in recompense euill intreated him in verie bad speaches, and strake out one of Licurgus his eies. But these men for thousands and infinit commodities, would not onelie haue béereft his lordship of both his eies, but also done him a further inconuenience (if successe had happened) according to their malice.

The painfull trauels of the lord deputie not considered.

The ingratitude of the Lacedemonians to Licurgus.

And now here by the waie, let it not be offensiue to set downe somewhat of much concerning this worthie and noble man for the course of his life. He was borne and descended of a noble house and parentage, his father named sir William Sidneie, a knight of great reputation and credit in the countie of Kent, and in great fauour with king Henrie the eight, in whose time, and with his great good liking, he and others lustie yong gentlemen of the court trauelled into Spaine and other nations, to visit and to sée the maner of the emperours and other princes courts: his mother descended of the house of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke, vnto whom she was verie nére alied. This yong gentleman, his father being deceassed, and he of verie tender and yong yéeres, was brought vp in the court vnder the same maister as was king Edward the first, and profited verie well, both in the Latine and French tongs, for he had a verie good wit, and was verie forward in all good actions, and thereof was conceiued some good things would come of him: his countenance was verie amiable, and his behauiour verie gentle and courteous, in whome king Henrie the eight (being his godfather) had a verie great liking, and made him be attendant and plaisfellow with prince Edward.

The parentage of sir Henrie Sidneie.

Sir Henrie Sidneie was brought vp in the court.

This prince fell in such a good familiaritie and good liking of him, that he vsed him not onelie as a companion; but manie times as a bedfellow, and so delighted in his companie, that for the most part they would neuer be asunder, neither in health, nor in sickenesse, vntill the dieng daie of the prince: who then departed his life in this gentlemans armes. Somewhat before his death, the king gaue the order of knighthood to this gentleman, for a memorie and a recompense of his good will and loue: vpon which daie also he did the like vnto sir William Cicill, now lord Burghlie and lord high treasuror of all England: by meanes of which their conioined aduancement, there entred a verie feruent affection and good will betweene them, with a reciprocke answering of beneuolence each one to the other, vntill their dieng daies. This noble gentleman for his forwardnesse in all good actions, was as it were the paragon of the court, by reason of the manie good gifts which God had bestowed vpon him euerie waie. For concerning the bodie, he was goodlie of person and well compact, and well beseene; he was comelie and of a good countenance, he was so courteous and Sir Henrie Sidneie the king his companion and bedfellow.

The king died in sir Henrie Sidneis armes.

The king dubbeth sir Henrie Sidneie and sir William Cicill knights in one daie.

Edm. Molineux.

1578 The sword is deliuered to sir William Drurie as lord iustice.

The departure of sir Henrie Sidneie, and of his last saieings.

The notable works of Moses, & yet he not accepted.

of

of so good behauiour, he was so wise and so modest, so vertuous and so godlie, so discreet and so sober, as he was another Scipio, being but yong in years, and old in behauiour, and finallie so rare a man, as that age had not affoorded manie better. This man for his excellent good gifts, he was made ambassador into France, being but about one and twentie yeares of age; and twise in one yeare after that into Scotland: and by quéene Marie ioined in commission with others to attend king Philip his comming into England, for the mariage betwéene their maiesties. And now in this hir maiesties reigne, he was sent ambassador into France, to treat a peace or pacification betwéene the prince of Condie and the duke of Guise.

Sir Henrie Sidneie an ambassador sundrie times.

In the beginning and about the second or third yeare of hir maiesties reigne, he was made knight of the garter, and lord president of Wales; and after one of hir maiesties most honorable priuie councell. But before this, immediatlie vpon his returne from out of Spaine, he accompanied the lord Thomas lord Fitzwaters his brother in law into Ireland: where he was made treasuror at the wars, one of the principall offices in the land: and in course of time & yeares for his excellencie in knowledge and experience in that land, he was made lord iustice foure times, and was lord deputie three times. In which offices, how he did most honorablie acquite himselfe, his acts do declare, and the summarie recitall shall partlie discouer and set downe. He was no sooner placed in gouernement, but first and forthwith he laid downe his plot, whereupon he would ground & laie the foundation of his gouernement, and according to it would he frame and direct all his actions: which plot and deuise consisteth in these points; religion towards God, obedience to the prince, the peace of the people, and the well gouernement in all things concerning the commonwealth, either in causes ciuill or martiall.

Sir Henrie Sidneie lord president of Wales and knight of the garter.

Sir Henrie Sidneie lord treasuror at armes.

He was lord iustice foure times.

The plot of Sir Henrie Sidneis gouernement.

Religion.

Concerning religion, he was no more carefull in his owne person, but the like also in his priuat familie, where he had dailie exercises of praiers, both earlie and late, morning & euening, neither would he haue anie to serue him, who was not affected to religion, and of an honest conuersation. Atheists and papists he detested, dronkards and adulterers he abhorred, blasphemous and dissolute persons he could not abide. And at his first being in authoritie in Ireland, & finding the whole land generallie (a few priuat places excepted) to be either of no religion, or of papisticall religion; and being openlie by a preacher out of a pulpit aduertised, that in the remote places of that land, manie a soule was borne which neuer receiued baptisme, nor knew anie christening; great was his greefe, and much was he vnquieted, vntill he had found the redresse thereof. Wherfore he aduertised hir maiestie, & most earnestlie sued & praied for redresse & reformation, which in the end was granted, & a commission sent to him for the same: which forthwith he committed to the archbishops & bishops to execute, with whom he ioined, furthered and holpe them accordinglie to the vttermost. But yet it tooke not that good effect as he wished and willed it might. And as for ecclesiasticall liuings which were of his gift and disposition, he would neuer bestow, but vpon such, as of whome he conceiued a good opinion, both for his religion and honestie.

Manie borne in Ireland neuer christened.

The prince, who was scarse knowne in manie places in that land, he brought both to knowledge and obedience. The wild he tamed, the froward he reformed, the disobedient he punished, the traitors he persecuted, the rebels he chastised, the proud he made to stoope, and that arrogant and most insolent Shane Oneile, who could abide no equall, nor acknowledge a superior; by aduanture was brought to his deserued confusion & whose head for a tropheie, & for the example of Gods iustice laid vpon him, was set vpon a pole vpon the gate of the castell of Dublin. The whole prouince of Vlster, with all the mightie personages of the same, he brought to the quénes peace & obedience. The earle of Clanricard he toke and imprisoned, and his vntamed Scingals he draue to submission, and to sweare dutie and obedience. The vnconstant earle of Desmond and all his Giraldines and followers, and the proud and vngratefull earle of Clancar, and all the Irishrie of his adherents, he made them perforce to submit themselues, and to craue pardon. The Cauenaghs, the Otooles, the Obirnes, the Ocomors, the Omores, and a rable of other like septs, together with Rorie Og, Pheon Mac Hew, and other their leaders and guides in Leinster he tamed, and perforce compelled to sweare totaltie and subiection. Lastlie, the malecontents against hir maiesties prerogatiue for the cesse in the end cried Peccaui, and conformed themselues in all dutifulnesse. And when he had trauelled long in these affaires, which he saw could not haue continuance, vnlesse they by some other meanes might be kept vnder gouernement: he by pithie persuasions, sound arguments, great reasons, and continuall sutes to hir maestie and councell, obteined to haue rulers and gouernors to be placed in the remote prouinces and sound, learned, and vpright iust lawiers out of England to be sent ouer, for the direction of the gouernement, according to the lawes of England: which in the end hir maiestie most gratiouslie granted, and he most ioifullie obteined.

In all Vlster brought to obedience.

The earle of Clanricard imprisoned.

The mightie earles in Mounster brought to submission.

The rebels in Leinster tamed.

The malecontents against the cesse reformed.

In Mounster therefore first he placed a colonell to breake the ise; namelie sir Humfreie Gilbert, a valiant, a worthie, and a notable man, both for his martiall seruice, and his ciuill gouernement: after him followed the like and worthie gentleman sir John Perot knight: and lastlie the valiant and prudent sir William Drurie, which both were lord presidents. This man was afterwards lord iustice, and the other at these presents is lord deputie of that land. In Connagh sir Edward Fitton knight, a verie wise and a modest gentleman, late treasuror at armes, was lord president: and after him was sir Nicholas Malbie knight a valiant and expert man in martiall matters, and verie wise and of good knowledge in publike and ciuill causes: who could verie exactlie handle the sword, and vse the pen, he (I saie) was made colonell of all Connagh. And how well the foresaid rulers and gouernors did rule by the sword, with the assistance of their captains, and how vprightlie they ministred law and iustice by the aduise of the councellors in their seuerall prouinces, the records and registers of their doings do at large witnesse and set forth. The like order he tooke also at Dublin, which being the metropole and chiefe citie of the whole land, and where are hir maiesties principall and high courts, to answer the law to all suitors throughout the whole realme: and he considering that a great defect was in the administration of iustice in those courts, by reason of kinred, affinitie, and priuat affections among the chiefe iudges and officers of that countrie birth: he by his like earnest sutes to hir maiestie, procured them to be remoued, and their roomes to be supplied with such wise, graue and learned Englishmen, as were sent from out of England to be chiefe iustices, attorneie, and solicitor. And further also, whereas there were manie good lawes & statutes established in the realme, which hitherto were laid vp and drowned in filth and cobwebs, and vtterlie vnknowne to the most part of the whole land, and euerie man ignorant

Sir Humfreie Gilbert colonell in Mounster.

Sir John Perot, Sir william Drurie lord presidents in Mounster.

Sir Edward Fitton and sir Nicholas Malbie gouernors in Connagh.

English lawyers placed to be iustices in the courts.

The statutes to be reuewed and printed.

Shane Oneile slaine.

norant in the lawes of his owne native countrie, he caused a through view, and a review to be made, and then a choise of all such statutes as were most necessarie to be put in vre and execution: which being done, he caused to be put in print, to the great benefit of that whole nation.

The records searched and set vp in places conuenient.

And likewise for the records, which were verie euill kept, not fenced or defended from raine and foule weather, but laie all in a chaos and a confused heape, without anie regard; he caused to be viewed and sorted, and then prepared méete rowmes, presses, and places for the keeping of them in safetie, and did appoint a speciall officer with a yearelie fée for the keeping of them: and for all such matters as were to be heard and determined in the castell chamber, before the lords, as it is in the starchamber in England; he would be for the most part present at euerie court, and alwaies would haue the assistants and persons of hir maiesties learned councellors. Neuertheless, he himselfe had a marueilous head to conceiue, a déepe iudgement to vnderstand, and a most eloquent tong to vtter whatsoeuer was requisit to be spoken, either in that place, or in anie other assemblie, which he would deliuer in such an eloquent phrase, and so pleasantlie it would flow from him, with such pithie reasons, sound arguments, and effectuall discourses, as that the lesse learned he was, the more strange it was that such great good things could come out of his mouth. And such was his amiable countenance, his comelie behauior, his commendable personage, that he would and did conquer their hearts, and gaine the loue of euerie man; and the people of all sorts would and did fall in loue with him for his vprightnesse, indifferencie, and iustice, in determining of euerie mans cause. And he knowing the nature and disposition of that people, who could not abide anie long sutes in law, he was so affable and courteous, that euerie suter should haue accesse vnto him, and forthwith he would heare his cause, and with such expedition would cause the same to be determined, that he purchased to himselfe the vniuersall loue of all the Irishrie, who thought themselues the more happie, if their causes might be once brought to his hearing, & the more willing to leaue their Obrian law, & to imbrace the course of the English lawes. Wherevpon he deuised, and consequentlie with great policie and wisedome executed the diuision and distribution of the wild, sauage, and Irish grounds into shire grounds and counties, appointing in euerie of them shiriffes, constables, and all such kind of officers as are vsed to be in all other counties: by which meanes hir maiesties writ had passage amongest them, and they brought to the order of the English lawes & gouernement, which neuer tofore was heard or knowne among them.

The castell chamber dulie kept.

Edm. Molineux.

The Irish grounds reduced into counties and shires.

When he had done all such things as are before recited, for and concerning the due course of gouernment by order of law: then also he bethought himselfe vpon such other things as were necessarie in sundrie respects to be done, as the castell and house of Dublin, which before his comming was ruinous, foule, filthie, and greatlie decaied. This he repared, and reedified, and made a verie faire house for the lord deputie or the chiefe gouernor to reside & dwell in. The towne of Carigfergus, being open to the northerne rebelles, he began to inclose with a wall and to fortifie, which for shortnesse of time he could not finish. A gaole at Molengar he builded, a verie necessarie thing in those parties, for restreining and safe keeping of malefactors. The towne of Athenrie in Connagh he caused to be reedified, & the faire bridge of Athlon vpon the déepe and great riuer of the Shenin he builded with masonrie and free stone, and raised vp the walles & battlements verie faire. By building of which bridge a passage (neuer tofore had) was made open & free betweene the English pale and Connagh, which more danted, apalled, and kept the rebelles in awe and obedience than any thing before had done. Sundrie like common workes he made and did, and more would, if his residing there had continued. All which his forsaid doings, no doubt, were verie chargeable to hir maiestie. And for easing thereof he (as it became him) & in verie deed had also promised and deuised how and by what means these charges might be answered, and hir highnesse be released of the great and intollerable charges which she dailie was at in that land, he did by good means inlarge and increase hir reuenues and yearelie receipts to about eleuen thousand pounds by the yeare more than he found it, and much more would he haue done, if he had staied there but a short time longer than he did.

The castell of Dublin repared.

The towne of Carigfergus fortified.

A gaole at Molengar builded.

The towne of Athenrie reedified.

The bridge of Athlon new builded.

The quéenes great charges to be releeued.

Hir maiesties reuenues increased.

Thus much briefle of his generall actions, and concerning his priuat dealings and conuersation. He was godlie disposed, & a zelous promoter of the true religion, a notable orator, & out of whose mouth flowed such eloquent spéeches, such pithie sentences, such persuasorie reasons, as it was verie strange, that he by a naturall course should performe that which manie by learning could not reach nor atteine vnto. He had some sight in good letters and in histories and armories, and would discourse verie well in all things; he was affable and courteous to all men, verie familiar with most men, and strange to none; verie temperat and modest, seldome or neuer in anie distempered or extraordinarie choler, vpright in iustice, free from corruption, and liberall to euerie deseruing person, a bounteous housekéeper, and of great hospitalitie, and had all officers in verie honorable order, according to his estate & honor; a thing much allowed and liked in that nation: verie familiar, and a louer of all such as were learned and were men of vnderstanding, whome he would honor and estéeme verie much; gratefull to all men, and a most louing maister to all such as serued him, whom he loued full dearlie. And albeit he were a man of a great reach and iudgement, yet he would not do anie thing without aduise & counsell, for which purpose he made a speciall choise of two singular men, who were priuie to all or most part of his actions; sir Lucas Dillon knight, and Francis Agard esquier: the one a lawier, and yet not ignorant in anie thing perteining either to the marshall affaires, or to the ciuill gouernement: the other a verie wise man, and of a déepe iudgement and experience in all matters of policies. And so true and trustie these were, that he named the one Meus fidelis Lucas; and the other Meus fidus Achates. And notwithstanding in sundrie and almost infinit respects, as partlie by the course of this historie it dooth appeare, he hath deserued most hartie thanks, and a gratefull remembrance for euer amongst them: yet most vnnaturallie and vngratfullie they haue requited and recompensed him. Not much vnlike the viper, who when he hath done the act of generation with his female, which (as the writers of naturalles saie) it is done by the mouth, she immediatlie biteth off his head, and so destroieth him; and likewise the yong, conceiued with the death of their sire or father, and nourished in the wombe of their mother, and readie now to be borne & brought forth; they not abiding their due time, most vnnaturallie do gnaw out hir wombe and bellie to hir confusion; and so they are conceiued with the destruction of their father, and borne with the confusion of their mother. This vngratfull people (I saie) notwithstanding the innumerable benefits bestowed vpon them and that whole commonwealth, yea and the dailie purchasing of their wealth, preseruation, and safetie,

The good vertues and disposition of sir Henrie Sidnie.

Religious.

Eloquent.

Affable.

Temperat.

Liberall.

A housekéeper.

His more of this sir Henrie Sidnie in the English chronicles, An. Dom. 1586, noted by Edm. Molineux.

The ingratitude of Ireland.

The nature of the viper.

safetie, could ne would be euer thankfull. As besides manie examples it appeared at the parlement holden in the eleuenth yeare of hir maiesties reigne, where vhen lawes were to be established for their benefit, and the abolishing of certeine wicked and lewd vsages, which were among the Irishrie, they not onelie did impugne and resist that assemblie, as much as in them laie: but recompensed the good things (for their benefits established) with open war and rebellion against hir maiestie. Also, when a reasonable and a vsed cesse was to be set and leuied for the benefit of the inhabitants and dwellers in the English pale; and for the represse of their enimies which thirsted after their confusion: they immediatly repine and do resist the same. For this is their corrupt nature, that if he did at anie time pursue the enimie for their peace and quietnesse, and did aduenture neuer so great dangers for them, were his successe neuer so good, yet would they enuie at him. If he by the aduise of the councell did determine anie thing for their behoofe, yet would they mislike it. If anie thing well meant had euill successe, they would like it; and vpon neuer so little occasion offered they would make their complaints, libels should dailie be exhibited, and accusations be deuised, with open mouths they would exclame, and nothing would they leaue vndone which might turne to his discredit and impechment of his gouernement. But truth the daughter of time, which in the end was manifested; and when he had yelded before hir highnesse and councell a true and a perfect account of all his doings, and had trulie manifested the course of his gouernement, then their glittering gold was found to be worse than copper, not abiding the hammar; he according to his desert receiued thanks, and they reproch and ignominie. Wherefore great good cause had he to be glad and ioifull, that he was to be deliuered from so vngratfull a people and vnthankfull a nation. But shall a man saie the truth? It is a fatall and an inevitable destinie incident to that nation, that they cannot broke anie English gouernor; for be he neuer so iust, vpright, & carefull for their benefit, they care not for it: let him be neuer so beneficiall to their commonwealth, they account not of it; let him be neuer so circumspect in his gouernement and aduised in his doings, they will discredit and impeach it. If he be courteous and gentle, then like a sort of nettles they will sting him; if he be seuere, they will curse him; and let him do the best he can, he shall neuer auoid nor escape their malice and spite.

This noble and worthie man, who aboue all others had best triall thereof, thought himselfe most happie when he was deliuered from them, and gone out of their Egypt, and now returned to his owne native countrie of Chanaan, who thenceforth sometimes attended the court, and serued hir maiestie as a most faithfull, graue, and wise councellor: sometimes he followed his charge and calling of president in Wales, which office he did most honorablie vse and discharge. In the end, when Lachesis had spun out the thread of his life, and Atropos readie to execute hir office, he fell sicke at Worcester: and feeling a decaie of nature, and that he did dailie wax weaker and weaker, he yelded and humbled himselfe to die; and holding vp his hands, and lifting vp his eies, he continued in most hartie and incessant praiers vnto God, craving with a most penitent hart, pardon for his sins, and commending his soule into the hands and mercie of God, thorough the bloud of Jesus Christ. And when his hands gaue ouer, his tong ceassed, and his sight failed, he yelded vp his spirit, and departed this life in a most godlie and christian maner the 21 daie of Maie, one thousand fiue hundred eightie and six. His bodie was imbowelled, and his entrails were buried in the deans chapell of the cathedrall church in Worcester: his hart was carried to Ludlow, & there intombed in the tombe that his welbeloued daughter Ambrosia was buried, which he had builded in the collegiat church of the same towne; wherin he had erected a certeine monument for a perpetuall remembrance to that town & to Tikenhill, to which he was verie much affected, & made his most abode during the time of his presidencie. And from thense his bodie by easie iournies was verie honorablie caried to his house of Penshurst in Kent, & in his parish church there he was interred in all honorable maner, as to his estate did agree vpon the one and twentith of June, in the yeare one thousand fiue hundred eightie and six, he being then about the age of seauen and fiftie yeares. And thus this noble and worthie knight, who had spent the whole course of his life in the dutifull seruice of his prince, and to the great benefit of the commonwealth, is now deliuered vnto the euerlasting seruice of the eternall God, in whose celestiall heauens he resteth in blisse and ioie with the foure and twentie elders, who there are now beholding the face of God, and praising his holie name for euer.

But to returne to the lord iustice, who being entered into the gouernement, and finding it in some quiet state, did by the aduise of the councell follow that course as neere as he could, as which was left vnto him; and by that meanes kept the whole land verie quiet and in peace. For almost a yeare after his entrie into that office and gouernement, vntill that Romish cockatrice, which a long time had set abrod vpon hir egs, had now hatched hir chickins; which being venemous as were their sire, raised, wrought, and bred great treasons, open warres, and hostilitie through out that land. For James Fitzmoris a Giraldine & cousine germane to the earle of Desmond, who not manie yeares before had beene an archtraitor, and a principall capteine of the warres and rebellion in Mounster; and wherein he was then so followed at inches and pursued by sir John Perot, then lord president of Mounster; that after manie and sundrie conflicts, he was in the end compelled and inforced to yeld and submit himselfe, and to craue hir maiesties gratious pardon: insomuch that he came in simplie into the towne of Kilmallocke, and there in the church before all the people did humble and prostrate himselfe before the said lord president, and asked pardon, swearing and promising then all dutifulnesse, truth, & obedience for euer to hir highnesse, and to the crowne of England.

Euen this periured caitife, who for his treasons and great outrages, villanies, and bloudsheds, had deserued a thousand deaths, and yet in hope of amendement hir maiestie gaue him his pardon, and sent it vnto him by hir seruant Francis Agard esquier: euen this man (I saie) most traitorouslie fled into France, and there comming into the kings presence, did offer to deliuer into his hands the whole realme and land of Ireland, if that his maiestie would giue him aid, and furnish him with men and monie, and such furniture as he should haue need of in such an action. The king at the first gaue him good countenance, great rewards, & liberall interteinement, and accepted his offer: but when he had well considered the matter, and had further looked into the same, he changed his mind. James Fitzmoris, who had staied there in the French court about two yeares, and saw nothing go forward, & the French king ware cold; who in the end gaue him no other answer, but that he would commend him by his letters to his sister the quæne of England, for obteining of a pardon for him, and for hir good countenance

This was a troublesome parlement.

The cesse impugned.

The corrupt and vngratfull nature of the Irishmen.

The fatall destinie vpon all gouernors in Ireland.

The death of sir Henrie Sidnete.

Edm. Molineux.

Sir William Drurie the lord iustice followeth the course of his predecessor to rule in peace.

James Fitzmoris an archtraitor.

James Fitzmoris submitteth himselfe and sweareth obedience.

James Fitzmoris hath his pardon sent vnto him.

James Fitzmoris fleeth into France and offereth the crowne of Ireland to the French king.

The French king misliketh to deale in Ireland matters.

James Fitzmoris seeketh to king Philip and to the pope.

nance towards him: he forsoke France, and made a tournie into Spaine vnto king Philip. The king who had receiued the gift of Ireland of the pope by meanes of the bishop of Cashell, being not willing to deale therein, without his assistance & aduise; James Fitzmoris made his tourneie from thense to the pope, vnto whom he declared that he had béene with king Philip, as doth apeare by his letters of credit to his holinesse; and that he would deliuer and cause to be deliuered the kingdome of Ireland vp into their hands, and reduce the same againe to the holie church of Rome, if he might haue men, monie, and such furniture of munitions, & other necessaries as should be requisit in that seruice. The pope was verie glad of this suite, and liked it verie well, and did accept this offer, as also gaue him good countenance and interteinement. And in the end vpon sundrie conferences betwéene the pope and king Philip, it was agréed betwéene them, that Fitzmoris should be furnished with men, monie, and all things necessarie for this seruice. James Fitzmoris during his being in Rome, he fell acquainted with doctor Sanders an English Iesuit, & doctor Allen an Irish Iesuit, and both traitors to hir maiestie and crowne; and these two men being glad of such a suite, & they in great fauor with the pope, followed the suite verie earnestlie, and promised to follow it to the vttermost in their owne persons.

James Fitzmoris maketh his promise to king Philip and the pope.

The pope is glad of James Fitzmoris offer.

James Fitzmoris falleth acquainted with doctor Sanders and doctor Allen.

Now when all things were concluded betwéene the pope and king Philip, doctor Sanders, doctor Allen, and James Fitzmoris made their last repaire to the pope, who forthwith made Sanders his legat, & gaue him the holie ghost, with authoritie to blesse and curse at his will and pleasure; and to him and the others he gaue then also his blessing: and therewith his letters of commendation to king Philip, who according to the conclusion made betwéene them both, he was furnished with all things méet and necessarie for them. Whereupon when time serued they imbarked themselues, and their companie in three ships well appointed for the purpose, and arriued at Smerewéke, alias saint Marie wéke, in the beginning of Julie 1579, nére the Dingle a cush in Kerrie in Ireland: where he landed, and all his companie, being about the number of foure score Spaniards, besides a few Englishmen and Irishmen, and there builded a fort in the west side of the baie for their safetie: and drew their ships close vnder the said fort.

James Fitzmoris is furnished with ships and all necessaries.

James Fitzmoris landeth at Saint Marie wéke in Ireland with foure score Spaniards.

The two doctors, when they had hallowed the place after their popish maner, promising all safeties, and that no enimie should dare to come vpon them, and trouble them: neuertheless they were beguiled. For at that instant, there was in Kensale a Deuonshire gentleman and a man of warre, named Thomas Courtneie, and he hearing of the landing of this James Fitzmoris, and of the popes traitorous legats, was contented, and by the persuasion of Henrie Dauels, being then in those parts; and hauing a good wind, did come about and doubled the point, came into the baie of Saint Marie wéke or Smerwéke; and finding the three ships of James Fitzmoris at anchor, was so bold in the waie of good speed to take them. And after that he had staied there a while in that seruice, he toke them all along with him: whereby James Fitzmoris and his companie lost a péece of the popes blessing, for they were altogither destituted of anie ship, to ease and releéue themselues by the seas, what néed soeuer should happen. As soone as they were thus landed, newes was sent and carried abrode forthwith to James & John brethren to the earle of Desmond, and so consequentlie to the whole countrie. These two brethren, who had long looked for the arriuall of this their cousine, and archtraitor, assembled all their tenants, followers, and friends; and out of hand made their present repaire vnto him: whose commings and companies he accepted verie thankefullie, sauing that he had not a thorough and a full liking of his cousine sir John of Desmond. Which when sir John perceiued, he deuised how he would salue that sore, as most wickedlie afterwards he did.

James Fitzmoris his ships are taken awaie by one Thomas Courtneie a gentleman of Deuon.

Sir James and sir John of Desmond the earles brethren come to James Fitzmoris.

The earle of Desmond at this time was in reedifieng of a castell, which he had in the confines of Bzenne Agonellis countrie, who assone as he heard of the arriuall of his cousine James Fitzmoris, he forthwith did discharge and dismisse his whole companie of workemen and labourers, pretending in outward shew what he neuer meant, that he was to withstand and resist his cousine and all his companie, and forthwith maketh his repaire into Kerrie, and there assembleth all his followers and force, as though he would do great things and worke miracles. And forthwith likewise he sent his letters to Mac Artie More earle of Clancar, & willeth him in all hast to assemble all the force he could make, and to make his spédie repaire to him, for vanquishing (if they could) of the enimies now landed at S. Marie wéke. The earle of Desmond in the meane time had receiued a péece of the popes blessing, and his heat was abated. But the erle of Clancar returned his answer, that he would come vnto him with all spéed, and lie in campe with him where he would, as nére to the Dingle as he might: and accordinglie he came to the place appointed. Which Desmond séemed to like well though it were against the splene, neuertheless when he saw the forwardnes of Clancar, albeit he would not, nor yet well could in open termes fall out with him, yet he deuiseth matters whereupon he might haue some occasion to dislike with him, & to make him wearie of his companie. Which when Clancar perceiued, and saw the vnwillingnesse of Desmond to do anie seruice against the rebels, but rather inclined towards them, he toke the best opportunitie he could, and departed awaie from him, and dismissed his companie.

The erle hearing of the landing of James Fitzmoris grieth ouer his buildings.

The earle of Desmond pretending some seruice against the rebels sendeth to the earle of Clancar to ioine with him.

The earle of Clancar attendeth the earle of Desmond.

Desmond liketh not Clancars readinesse.

Clancar departeth from Desmond.

The lord iustice, who was at Dublin, as soone as he was aduertised of James Fitzmoris landing, he maketh all the preparation he can, & marcheth with all the quéenes force towards Mounster, dispatching also a messenger to hir maiestie of these toward broiles and rebellion. But before he could prepare all things, as to such a great action did apperteine, he sent Henrie Dauels an English gentleman before him, that he being verie well acquainted with the earle of Desmond and his brethren, should practise with them to prepare themselues to be in a readinesse to assist his lordship, for the resisting against those enimies. Who being accompanied with one Arthur Carter prouost marshall of Mounster, made his spédie repaire to the earle of Desmond: & his brethren being in Kerrie, and aduertised vnto them the lord iustices pleasure, as also as much as in him late did persuade them to the like, who as then had all his force and souldiers about him. From thense he departed to the fort, whereof when he had taken the view, & saw the force as yet not so great but might be easilie as yet ouerthrowne; he returned backe to the earle, and gaue him aduise to draw all his force and companie towards the fort, persuading him to assaile it while it was but weake, of small force, and easie to be taken, and that in so doing it should be greatlie to his honour. But the earle being not of so good a mind, or bent to do so good a péece of seruice, answered; that he would not aduenture to take so great an enterprise in hand with so small a companie as he then had. Then Dauels went to sir James and to sir John of Desmonds the earles brethren,

The lord iustice prepareth to march into Mounster.

Henrie Dauels sent to the earle of Desmond.

Henrie Dauels persuadeth Desmõd to serue against the rebels.

Desmond refuseth to giue the onset vpon James Fitzmoris.

and

and perſuaded them to aduiſe their brother the earle, either to do that ſeruice which would be to his great honour and commendation, or elſe that they would take it in hand; which if they would alſo refuſe it, that then the earle would ſpare to him a companie of his Gallowglaſſes, and about three ſcore of his ſhot, and he would ſome with captaine Courtneis who laie then within the baie with his mariners, & he would giue the aſſault by land, and the other ſhould do the like by ſea.

The earle refuſeth to do anie ſeruice.

But the earle, being mooued hereof, would not yeeld to this motion, but anſwered that his ſhot was more meet to ſhot at foule than fit to aduenture ſuch a peece of ſeruice, and his Gallowglaſſes were good men to incounter with Gallowglaſſes, and not to anſwer old ſouldiers. Where vpon when he ſaw the bent and diſpoſition of the earle, that he minded not to annoie, but rather to ioine, aid, and helpe the traitors: he togither with the prouoſt marſhall toke their leaue of the earle, and minded to returne backe vnto the lord iuſtice, to giue his lordſhip to vnderſtand how all things ſtood, & what ſucceſſe he had had in his meſſage. And by the waie they laie that night at Traleigh, which is about fiue miles from caſtell Maine, and laie that night in one Rices houſe, who kept a victelling houſe and a wine tauerne, the houſe being both ſtrong and defenſible, but ſo little that their companies and ſeruants were diſperſed, and laie abroad in other places where they might haue lodging. But ſir John of Deſmond, whoſe hart was imbrued with a bloudie intent, followed him, but ſomewhat late, and came to the towne of Traleigh, and immediatlie ſet ſpies vpon Dauels, as alſo had corrupted the man of the houſe which kept the gate, that he ſhould leaue the doores open. Henrie Dauels miſtruſting no hurt, and leaſt doubting of that tragedie which was ſo neere at hand, eſpeciallie to be done by him, whom of all the men borne in that land he leaſt doubted, & beſt truſted, gat him to his bed; & Arthur Carter the prouoſt marſhall with him.

Henrie Dauels departeth from Deſmond.

Sir John of Deſmond followeth Dauels and corrupteth the porter.

Now about the dead of the night, when they were in their deepe ſleepes, ſir John according to his wicked deuiſe came to the houſe, the caſtell doore being left open for the purpoſe, with all his companie, euerie one being armed and their ſwords drawne, and went forthwith vp into the chamber where Dauels & his companie were in their beds faſt aſleepe, but with the noiſe they were ſuddenlie awaked. When Dauels ſaw ſir John of Deſmond armed and his ſword drawn, he was ſomwhat aſtonied at that ſight, and riſing vp in his bed ſaid vnto him (as he was euer wont to ſaie verie familiarlie) What ſonne! what is the matter? But he anſwered him; No more ſonne, nor no more father, but make thy ſelfe readie, for die thou ſhalt. And forthwith he & his companie ſtrake at him & his companion, both naked in their ſhirts, and moſt cruellie murthered them both. Then they ſearched the whole houſe & ſpared none, but put all to the ſword, ſauing a boie named Smolkin, who laie in the chamber, and had beene a continuall meſſenger betweene Dauels and this John Deſmond.

Henrie Dauels moſt cruellie murthered.

The faithfulneſſe of a boie to his maiſter.

This boie ſeeing his maiſter to be thus murthered ran vpon John of Deſmond, and held him by the armes as well as he could, crieng; What wilt thou kill my maiſter? But he anſwered; Go thy waies Smolkin, thou ſhalt haue no harme. But the boie ſeeing blowes ſtill to be giuen, caſt himſelfe downe vpon his maiſter, crieng; If thou wilt kill him, then kill me alſo. And ſo ſaued him as well, and ſo long as he could. But it auailed not, for ſlaine and moſt cruellie he was there murthered.

Henrie Dauels what he was, and of his conditions

This Henrie Dauels was a gentleman, borne in Deuon, and deſcended of a verie ancient and worſhipfull houſe, and being but a yonger brother, and hauing but a verie ſmall portion left vnto him, when he came to ſome yeares and knowledge, he gaue himſelfe to ſerue in the warres. And king Henrie the eight, hauing then warres againſt the French king, he entred into France to ſeeke his aduenture: and there he had verie good interteinment, and proued to be a verie good ſouldiour. After whoſe warres he ſerued in Scotland, and was in garriſon at Barwike: and from thenſe he was remooued into Ireland, where he ſerued vnder ſir Nicholas Yerne knight conſtable of Leighlin, and ſeneſchall of Wexford; and ſo well he behaued himſelfe there, that he was commended for his good ſeruice towards the prince, well beloued of his countriemen, and in marueilous fauour of the Iriſh people; for no ſeruice was too hard for him in the kings cauſes: and ſo well he was acquainted with the countrie, as no man better knew and had the ſkill to ſerue than he could there. As for his countrimen, he was ſo deere and louing towards them, as he was more like a father than a freend, and more like a freend than an vnacquainted countriman: for he was an hoſt and a harborer to euerie one of them, of what eſtate and condition ſo euer he were of. For were he rich or poore, a gentleman or a begger, he was freendlie to euerie one; and no man did or could lacke that interteinment, that he was by anie manner of waie able to giue and afford: which a number of Engliſhmen tried and found to their great comfort, and to his euerlaſting fame.

The loue of Dauels to his countrimen.

And as for the Iriſhmen, the longer he liued the better beloued among them: for as he would not iniurie them, no more would he ſuffer them to be oppreſſed or iniured: a great houſekeeper amongſt them, which they marueilouſlie eſteemed. When he was in office among them, he was vpright and iudged righteouſlie; if out of office, louing & freendlie to euerie man, and by that means ſo well (as no man better) beloued and truſted. For what he had once ſaid and promiſed, that would he ſurelie keepe and performe, and thereof it came into a bie-word in the countrie where he dwelled, that if anie of them had ſpoken the word, which was aſſuredlie loked to be performed, they would ſaie; Dauels hath ſaid it: as who ſaith, it ſhall be performed. For the nature of the Iriſhman is, that albeit he keepeth faith for the moſt part with no bodie, yet will he haue no man to breake with him. But Henrie Dauels, he was ſo carefull of his word, that if he once promiſed, he would not breake it for anie mans pleaſure; and by that means he was ſo well beloued, that his verie hoſſeboies had free paſſage euen through the enimies, if he were knowne to be Dauels man. And that which is more, as the writer hereof ſpeaketh vpon knowledge, that if anie Engliſhman had anie occaſion to trauell in that countrie thoroughout Leinſter or Mounſter, if he had but a hoſſeboie of his, he ſhould not onelie paſſe freelie thorough the countries without impeachment, but ſhould haue alſo verie good and freendlie interteinment. Among the noblemen he was greatlie eſteemed, and was in great fauour with the earles of Ormond and Deſmond: who although they were for the moſt part at iarres and contentions, yet Henrie Dauels was in ſuch fauour, as he could and did paſſe to and fro in the greateſt matters of importance betweene them: wherein he bare ſo indifferent a hand, as both parties imbraced him for his vprightneſſe and indifferencie. The earle of Ormond himſelfe loued him ſo well, as no Engliſhman better; and all his brethren found ſuch a freend of him, and ſuch interteinment with him and eſpeciallie ſir Edmund Butler, that at all needs and in all diſtreſſes they were ſure to haue him to their freend; and manie times it ſtood

The credit of Dauels word.

them

them in good ſtéd.

And as for the earle of Deſmond, though he were a verie vncerteine and a mutable man, yet Henrie Dauels could preuaile with him: and were his furie neuer ſo hot, and he neuer ſo haſtie, yet could he appeaſe and quiet him. And as for ſir John of Deſmond the earles brother, ſuch was his profeſſion and outward affection towards him, of a moſt firme frendſhip; that it was thought to be impoſſible, that the loue and goodwill betweene them could by anie meanes be diſſolued. For in what diſtreſſe ſo euer ſir John of Deſmond was (as he was in manie) Henrie Dauels did alwaies helpe him, and at ſundrie times redéemed him out of priſon, yea out of the caſtell of Dublin, when he was committed for capitall crimes, and became ſuertie for him in great ſums of monie, and became pledge bodie for bodie for him; Dauels purſſe was at his commandement, his houſe at his deuotion, and what he had at his diſpoſition. And ſo farre this good will grew betweene them, that John of Deſmond, as one knowledging himſelfe moſt bounden to him, did call him father; euen as the other called him ſonne. And now ſée, when treaſon and treacherie was entred into him, how contrarie to all faith, frendſhip, and humanitie, the ſonne moſt vnnaturallie bereft the father of his life, and moſt cruellie murthered him. Woe worth to ſo wicked a villaine, that ſo bereft the prince of ſo faithfull a ſubiect, the gouernor of ſo truſtie a ſeruitor, the commonwealth of ſo good a member, of a man moſt dutifull to his ſuperiors, vpright in iuſtice, truſtie in ſeruice, expert in the warres, faithfull vnto his frend, loning to his countrie, fauoured of all men, hurtfull to no man, of great hoſpitalitie to all good men, good to all men, a father vnto the diſtreſſed, and a ſuccorer of the oppreſſed; finallie ſuch a rare man of his degrée and calling, as few like haue béene found in that land; and yet againſt all pittie and mercie, moſt cruellie murthered by a traitor to God and his prince, euen to the gréefe of the traitors of his owne blood. But here it falleth out that is of old ſaid; Saue a murtherer or a théefe from the gallowes, and he ſhall be the firſt that ſhall cut thy throte.

Henrie Dauels alwaies a faſt frend to ſir John of Deſmond.

When this bloudie murtherer had executed this crueltie vpon his good frend, he forthwith made his repaire to James Fitzmoris, and to his doctors and companie in great brauerie, recompting vnto them what a noble act and a valiant ſeruice he had done in murthering of an honeſt, faithfull, & friendlie gentleman, ſaieng; I haue now killed an Engliſh churle (for ſo malicíouſlie the Iriſhmen terme all Engliſhmen) & ſaid to his couſine James; Now thou maiſt be aſſured of me and truſt me, for now that I haue begun to dip my hand in blood, I will now ſtand to the matter with thee to my vttermoſt. James Fitzmoris when he had heard him at full, although both he and his doctors, and the whole companie of the Spaniards did reioiſe and were glad of his death, yet James did blame and abhorre the maner of his death, blaming and reprouing him verie much, that he ſhould murther him in his bed, being naked and ſcarſe awaked out of his ſléepe, which he ſaid was too cruell, becauſe he might otherwiſe haue had aduantage vpon him either by the high waies or otherwiſe to his commendation. Howbeit, doctor Sanders terming his bloudie murther to be a ſweet ſacrifice before God, did both allow it, and gaue him plenarie remiſſion of all his ſinnes. The earle himſelfe likewiſe, when he heard hereof, he was marueilouſlie gréeued and offended with his brother and gaue him ſuch ſharpe ſpéeches and reprofes as it was thought they would not ſo ſone haue béene frends againe: but wicked doings amongſt the wicked eſtabliſh and confirme them in their wickednes. At this preſent time, there was with the earle (as verie often he had béene) one Apeſlete an Engliſh capteine, who could do verie much with him, and vpon the hearing of the death of his good friend Henrie Dauels, he began to doubt and miſtruſt of himſelfe and of his owne aſſurance. Wherefore he goeth to the earle, and diſſembling his griefe, perſuadeth him to draw his companie together, and to remoue from thence to his houſe of Aſketten, which is about fourténe miles from Limerike, and there to abide the comming of the lord iuſtice, and to ioine with him in this ſeruice againſt the enimie. The earle, who minded nothing leſſe than ſo to ſerue, diſſembled the matter, and followed this counſell, and remoued from thence to Aſketten, where he laie cloſe and did nothing, but ſtill ſéemed in ſpeeches and outward ſhewes to miſlike with James Fitzmoris and all his companie; and yet dailie his beſt followers and ſoldiers flocked and repaired to James Fitzmoris, manie of them for zeale to the popiſh religion, wherin they were as deuout as the popes legates and the Spaniards: but manie of them knowing the earles intent, did it for feare and auoiding of his diſpleſure. The Spaniards, who had continued there in the fort and elſewhere, and not finding the repaire of the ſouldiers, nor yet anie other thing anſwerable to that ſeruice as it was promiſed them, began to miſlike it; and diſtruſting of anie good ſucceſſe, did repent and were ſorie, wiſhing themſelues at home againe: but ſuch was their caſe, that they could not ſhift for themſelues to eſcape neither by ſea nor by land; and therefore neceſſitie ſo compelling, they reſolued themſelues to abide the brunt.

The earle of Deſmond remoueth to Aſketten.

The earles cheefe men turne to the enimie.

The Spaniards like not their cõming.

James Fitzmoris perceiuing their diſcontented minds, had conference with them, & perſuaded them to be of a good comfort, for they ſhould verie ſhortlie haue a greater ſuplie and companie which he dailie looked for, and all things ſhould be had according to their owne minds: aduertiſing them that in the meane time he was to take a iournie to a place of three or foure daies iournie from thence, called the holie rod or croſſe in Tipperarie, and there to performe a vow which he had before made when he was in Spaine, praieng their patience. But in verie truth his intent was to trauell into Connagh and into Vlſter, and in both his waies, his neereſt waie was through Tipperarie, and there to flocke and draw vnto him all and ſo manie of the rebels as he could wage to ioine with him, whereof he made no doubt, but aſſured himſelfe to find as manie readie to go as he willing to haue. And ſo taking his iournie with three or foure horſſemen, and a dozzen Kernes, he paſſed through the countie of Limerike, & came into the countrie of ſir William Burke his verie neere couſine and kinſman, and who before in the laſt rebellion did ioine with him, to the great danger of his life and loſſe of all his goods.

James Fitzmoris perſuadeth the Spaniards to patience.

James Fitzmoris pretendeth a pilgrimage.

And when he came ſo farre in his iournie, being now about three ſcore miles from S. Marie Wéeke, his cariage horſſes (which they terme garons) waxed faint, and could not trauell anie further: wherefore he commanded ſome of his men to go before, & looke what garrons they firſt found in the fields, they ſhould take them and bring them vnto him. And as it fell out they eſpied a plow of garrons plowing in the field, which they forthwith tooke perforce from the poore huſbandmen two of them, and caried them awaie. Whereupon according to the cuſtome of the countrie, the hobub or the hue and crie was raiſed. Some of the people followed the tract, & ſome went to their lords houſe, which was ſir William Burke being néere at hand to aduertiſe the matter, who hauing three or foure of his ſonnes and verie tall gentlemen

James Fitzmoris ſtealeth garrons.

The Burkes follow the preie.

The brags of John Deſmond for killing of Dauels.

His crueltie miſliked.

The popes doctors dow allow and commend the murther.

This was a draught made by the lord president.

tlemen at home with him, they take their horses and a few kernes and two shot with them, and followed the tract, and ouertake them at a fastenes fast by the woods side, where they found James Fitzmoris, whome before they knew not to be come into those parties, to make head to answer them. But when he saw that it was his cousine Theobald Burke and his brother and his companie, who had bene his companions in the late rebellion when sir John Perot was lord president of Mounster, he spake ouer vnto them, and said; Cousine Theobald (who was the eldest son to his father) two carriage horses shall be no breach betweene vs two; and I hope that you which do know the cause that I haue now in hand, you will take my part therein, and do as I and others will do: and so continuing some speeches, did what he could to draw him and all his companie to be partakers in this rebellion. But he answered that he and his father had alreadie dealt too much that waie with him, and that he will neuer do the like againe: for his father, he, and all his brethren, had sworne to be true, obedient, and faithfull to the quéenes maiestie, and which oth they would neuer breake: cursing the daie and time that euer they joined with him in so bad a cause against hir maiestie, and therefore required to haue his garrons againe, or else he would come by them aswell as he could.

James Fitzmoris maketh head to resist.

James Fitzmoris perswadeth the Burkes to rebellion.

James Fitzmoris standing vpon his reputation, thought it too much dishonorable vnto him to depart with that which he had in hand; and therfore vtterlie denied the deliuerie, and thereupon each partie set spurre to the horses and incountered the one the other. The skirmish was verie hot and cruell, and Theobald Burke & one of his yonger brethren were slaine, & some of their men. James Fitzmoris likewise and his companie had the like successe, for he himselfe was first hurt and wounded, and then with a shot striken thorough the head, and so was slaine, with sundrie of his companions: wherein he found that the popes blessings and warrant, his Agnus Dei, and his graines had not those vertues to saue him, as an Irish staffe or a bullet had to kill him. Thus was hir highnesse most happie, and that whole land most happiest, that they were deliuered from so wicked and bloudie a traitour, and that the great & venemous hydra was thus shortened of one of his heds. For otherwise it was to be doubted that if he had liued, he would haue bin the cause of much bloudshed, and all the rebels in that land would haue joined with him. For he was of verie good credit & estimation through the whole land, he was of a verie good gouernement, and of a great reach; but a déepe dissembler, passing subtill, and able to compasse anie matter which he take in hand, familiar to all men, and verie courteous, valiant, and verie expert in martiall affaires, but so addicted to poperie and that baggage religion, that he became a most horrible traitour to hir maiestie, and a mortall enimie to euerie good man: and so far he was imbrued herein, that a man might saie that he was borne to the same end, euen to be a traitor and a rebell to God, to his prince, and to the whole commonwealth.

James Fitzmoris slaine.

Some thinke that this péece of seruice was a draught made by sir William Drurie lord iustice.

After that he was thus dead, and the same made knowen to the lord iustice, he gaue order that he should be hanged in the open market of Kilmallocke, & be beheaded & quartered, & the quarters to be set vpon the towne gates of Kilmallocke, for a perpetuall memorall to his reproch for his treasons and periuries, contrarie to his solemne oth taken in that errour. Hir maiestie, when she was aduertised of this péce of good seruice of sir William Burke and the losse of his eldest sonne, she wrote hir letters of the good acceptation of his seruice, comforted him for the losse of his son, and in recompense did create him baron of the castell of Connell by hir letters patents dated the fourth of Maie, the twentith yeare of hir reigne, & gaue him the yearelie pension of a hundred marks, to be paid at hir maiesties exchéker yearelie during his life, wherof he take so sudden joy that he sowned, and séemed to be dead.

James Fitzmoris his quarters set vpō the gates of Kilmallocke.

Sir William Burke being made a baron sowned for joy & shortlie after died.

When newes of the death of James Fitzmoris was brought to the fort at S. Marie worke, great sorow was amongest them all, they being all amazed and wist not what to do, especiallie the Spaniards who depart could not, and to submit themselues they would not, and yet they were of the mind to giue ouer and to intreat for a licence to depart. Which purpose they would haue followed, if that sir John of Desmond had not taken the matter in hand: for he hauing imbrued himselfe so vnnaturallie in bloud, and doubting the same would neuer be pardoned, did follow the matter. The lord iustice (as is aforesaid) immediatlie vpon the newes of the arriuall of these Spaniards, and of the death of Henrie Dauels, made his preparation of all the forces which hir maiestie had in that land, which was but foure hundred footmen and two hundred horsemen, a verie small companie for so great seruice towards: yet considering that the victorie consisteth not in the arme of man, nor in horse or mule, but onelie in the good gift of God; he marcheth forth in his tournie, hauing in his companie of Englishmen sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshall, sir Nicholas Malbie coronell of Connagh, Jaques Wingfield maister of the ordinance, and Edward Waterhouse one of hir maiesties seruants, Edward Fitton, Thomas Masterson, and others. And of the Irish lords he was accompanied with the earle of Kildare, sir Lucas Dillon chiefe baron, the vicount Mountgarret, the baron of vpper Offerie, and the baron of Dunboine, who had of themselues two hundred horsemen, besides footmen and kernes: and so they marched forward by iournels vntill they came to Kilmallocke, where not farre from the towne they all incamped: & then he sent from thense a messenger to the earle of Desmond, and so likewise to all the principall gentlemen of the best accompt in those parties, to come vnto him.

The Spaniards amazed with the death of Fitzmoris.

Sir John of Desmond supplieth James Fitzmoris rome.

Sir William Drurie lord iustice maketh a tournie into Mounster.

The lord iustice incampeth neare to Kilmallocke.

The earle in outward appearance séemed verie willing to come, but vntill he had receiued some promise of fauour from the lord iustice, he still lingered and trifled the time and came not. But in the end his lordship being verie well accompanied with horsemen and footmen, he went to the campe, and presented himselfe before the lord iustice, and made a shew of all dutifulnesse, obedience, & fidelitie, whereas indéed no such thing was ment. For though his bodie were there, his mind was elsewhere; for whiles he was in the campe, sundrie trecheries were practised by him; yet they were not so secretlie done but they came to light, & were discouered to the lord iustice. Whereupon he was committed to the custodie of the knight marshall. Whiles he was in his ward, and fearing least some greater matters would be reuealed against him, he praied accesse to the lord iustice; and then he humbled himselfe verie much, and promised and sware vpon his honour & allegiance, that he would faithfullie and to the vttermost of his power serue hir highnesse against the rebels. Whose humblenesse and promise the lord iustice by the aduise of the councell did accept, and so inlarged him: which was in the end the vtter confusion of the earle himselfe and all his familie, and in the meane time great troubles, causes of much bloudshed, and vndoing of all Mounster.

The earle of Desmond cōmeth to the lord iustice to the campe.

The earle of Desmond is committed to ward.

The earle of Desmond doth humble himselfe and sweareth to serue trulie.

Whiles the lord iustice laie thus in campe about Kilmallocke, newes was brought vnto him, that sir

John of Desmond incampeth at Slewlougher.

John of Desmond was incamped with a great companie of the rebels vpon the borders of Slewlougher. Whereupon his lordship remoued and marched thitherwards, the earle then promising that he would in person incounter and fight hand to hand with his brother. Now when they were come to the place of seruice, the earle being best acquainted with the countrie, gaue aduise to the lord iustice, that he should diuide the armie into two parts, and the lord iustice should take one waie, and he the earle would take another waie: which aduise was followed. But bicause that place of the present seruice is adioining to a great wood, and wherein were manie fastnesse, the lord iustice did diuide the rest of his companie into two other parts, and so euerie of these three companies toke waie into the wood & serched it throughout, but there they found no bodie. For sir John had some secret knowledge of the lord iustices comming, and so was gone before.

The daie being spent to small purpose, & the night drawne towards, he incamped that night in the same places where the rebels had lien before, & there he remained somewhat longer than he thought: bicause he would spend and waste the forrage of that countrie, which was one of the chiefest places of reliefe that the enimies had. And from thense he went backe againe towards Kilmallocke, where he incamped himselfe at a place called Gilbons towne, which lieth in the plaines betweene Limerike and Kilmallocke towards Emelete and Harlo; & there he continued about nine weekes in continuall toiling and trauelling to and fro, in all such seruices as was dailie offered to be done vpon the enimie, from which he had no rest neither day nor night. Wherupon for the better seruice he diuided his bands, and toke out of the Irish companies one hundred, and deliuered them to the guiding of capteine John Herbert, a man of verie good seruice, and one other hundred to capteine Price.

These two capteins had made spiall vpon certeine rebels, which shrowded themselues in the great wood called the blacke wood, vpon whom they made a sallie, and did verie good seruice vpon them. But as they were to returne to the campe, which laie beside Getenbre castell, the said John of Desmond, who laie in ambush for them, met and incountered them, where was a sharpe fight betwixt them, and the two capteins with the most part of their companie slaine: & John of Desmond himselfe was there hurt in the nose. The losse of those two capteins and their men was a great weakening to the lord iustice his armie; his enimies being strong and manie: and his companie weake and few, sauing at that instant the souldiers sent out of Deuon and Cornewall arriued at Waterford to the number of six hundred men, vnder the leading of capteine George Bourchier, capteine Peter Carew, capteine George Carew his brother, and capteine Dowdale, whose comming at so present a distresse was both ioifull and also gladsome.

Sir John of Desmõd lieth in an ambush for the Englishe capteins and discomfiteth them.

The Deuonshire souldiers arriue at waterford.

And neere about this time, it was aduertised vnto the lord iustice, that John of Desmond was at Connell, which was about sixteene miles from the campe; and his lordship being well furnished & prepared, and he minding to do some peece of seruice vpon him, made verie secretlie a iourneie thither: but Desmond wanting not his good espials, had an inkling and a knowledge thereof, and so shifted himselfe awaie, whereupon the lord iustice returned to his campe. The queens maiestie and councell, being alwaies mindfull of hir Ireland, and by reason of the newes that the enimies were dailie stronger and stronger, she sent ouer sir John Perot late president of Mounster, with six ships well furnished and appointed, whereof he was admerall; and William Gorge maister porter of the tower and a pensioner, viceadmerall: and all these arriued vnto the citie of Corke. Whereof the lord iustice being aduertised, was verie glad, and did appoint one hundred vnto sir William Stanlete, who before was capteine of certeine horsemen, and one other hundred he assigned vnto capteine Hind. And seeing now some good seruice towards, and to incourage certeine gentlemen to be the more willing to follow the same, called before him George Bourchier, William Stanlete, Peter Carew, and Edward Poore, and vsing vnto them verie good speeches, to incourage and persuade them to do hir maiestie good seruice in these hir affaires, and in hope they would performe the same, he dubbed them knights: who accordinglie did acquit themselues, and some of them with the losse of their liues ended their daies in this seruice.

Knights dubbed in the field.

And he further also for his owne part, the more he bethought himselfe of the great seruice and charge laid vpon him, the more carefull he was to do what the same required: where, in his owne person he so toiled and trauelled, and so ouercame himselfe with studieng, watching, labouring and trauelling, that he ouerthrew his owne health, and was no longer able to indure the same: but being ouercome by sicknesse, and driuen to yeeld therevnto, was determined to haue dissolued his campe, and so to haue returned to Waterford, and there to staie for a time. But the capteins seeing the necessitie of the present seruice, persuaded him not to dissolue the armie, but to take some order herein for hir highnesse seruice, and he to sequester himselfe for a time for his health. Upon whose aduises he prepared himselfe to trauell towards Waterford, and for the continuance of the seruice did commit the gouernement to sir Nicholas Malbie, who was then gouernour by the name of coronell of Connagh; and then by easie iourneies he came to Waterford, and there he found himselfe euerie daie more weaker than other, and in the end did distrust his owne recouerie.

Sir William Drurie falleth sicke & goeth to waterford.

Sir Nicholas Malbie made gouernor of Mounster.

And yet mindfull of hir maiesties seruice, he to incourage other therein, sent & called before him William Pelham esquier, William Gorge esquier viceadmerall of the six ships, Thomas Perot sonne and heire to sir John Perot, and Patrike Welsh maior of the citie of Waterford, and gaue vnto them the order of knighthood, vsing the like persuasions as heretofore he had done vnto others in the like case. And albeit he were of a good heart and courage, yet that was no sufficient physicke to recouer his helth of bodie, but that still decated. And douting verie much of his recouerie, he sent to Dublin to the lord chancellor, and to the ladie Thame his wife, for their speedie comming vnto him, who accordinglie satisfied his request. But he inioied their companie a verie short time: for he died within two daies after their comming, being the last of September 1579, and after his death his bodie was caried vnto Dublin, where it was buried.

Knights dubbed at waterford.

Sir William Drurie lord iustice dieth.

But here by the waie (which should before haue beene said) as he came towards Waterford through Tipperarie, the countesse of Desmond met with him, and brought with hir hir onelie sonne and heire to the earle; and being a suter in the behalfe of hir husband, presented him to the lord iustice to be a pledge for the truth and fidelitie of the earle hir husband. For after the time that he was set at libertie in the campe neere Kilmallocke, he neuer repaired any more to the lord iustice, but stood vpon his owne keeping; notwithstanding by his letters he professed all loialtie and obedience, which he neuer meant. For in verie truth he was (notwithstanding his dissembling) a verie ranke traitor, as in open fact and action did verie shortlie

The countesse of Desmond giueth hir son to be a pledge for his father.

Sir John Perot sent to serue on sea.

shortlie appeare, to his owne deserued confusion.

But to returne to sir Nicholas Malbie, who immediatlie vpon the departure of sir William Drurie vnto Waterford, according to the office & charge laid vpon him, he set in hand forthwith to follow and performe the same. For he was able to do it being of great experience in martiall affaires, hauing béene seruitor that waie vnder sundrie kings, & in strange nations; as also was verie wise, lerned, and of great knowledge in matters of policie, hauing béene a student in good letters, and a great traueller in sundrie nations, and therein did obserue the maner of the seuerall gouernments in euerie such place as where he trauelled. He had vnder him in the whole an hundred and fiftie horsemen, and nine hundred footmen, to command; and diuiding them according to the seruice then in hand, he sent sir George Bourchier, captein Dowdall, and captein Sentleger, vnto Kilmallocke with three hundred footmen, and with fiftie horsmen, there to lie in garrison, and a speciall place meet for the same, & which the enimie most speciallie coueted to possesse. But the more his care was that waie, the like was their diligence, vigilancie, & care of the other waie to keepe the same. Then with the residue of the companie he marched himselfe to the citie of Limerike, where he staied and remained for a time to refresh his souldiors.

The commendation of sir Nicholas Malbie.

During his abode and being there, it was thought good by him and his capteins, to send vnto the earle of Desmond for his repaire vnto him, and to haue conference with him, to vnderstand his bent and aduise for hir maiesties seruice against the enimies. The earle hauing receiued the gouernours letters, gaue verie good words, & promised much, but performed nothing. Wherefore he was againe and againe sent for from time to time, but he came not, but laie still at his house of Asketten, which is about fourtene miles from Limerike. For albeit as yet he was not in ante actuall rebellion, yet it was not vnknowne but that he was secretlie combined with his two brethren, which as open traitors were in open rebellion and in armes against hir maiestie. Which the earle, suspecting the same might be laid vnto his charge, would not aduenture himselfe to come in person to the gouernor; but still fed him with faire words and friuolous answers. Wherefore the gouernor thought good to spend no more time in vaine to looke for him, but left Limerike, and went into the fields, where he incamped himselfe, and so set forwards to do some seruice vpon the enimie, hauing then in his companie six hundred footmen vnder the ensigns of sir William Stanleie, captein George Carew, captein Fisher, captein Furse, captein Piers, & captein Hinder; and he himselfe and captein Apeslie reserued one hundred horsemen betweene them. Now being aduertised that a great companie of the rebels were incamped in Connilo vnder their captein John of Desmond, he marched towards them. And being come néere to an abbeie or monasterie called Monaster Neuagh, seuen miles from Limerike, there appeared a great companie in a plaine field both of horsemen and footmen, in estimation two thousand or there abouts, marching in battell araie, and had cast out their wings of shot, and placed euerie thing verie well and orderlie.

The gouernor sendeth for the earle of Desmond.

The earle giueth onelie words and dissembleth.

The gouernor remoueth from Limerike to Connilo.

When the gouernor perceiued and beheld this, being verie glad that some péece of seruice was towards, he likewise conferreth with his capteins, and by their aduises setteth his companie in like good order, and brought them into a quadrant proportion, setting out his flankers in seuerall places according to the seruices, & appointed verie good leaders for the same: but his carriages he placed in the rereward, with shot sufficient for their safegard. Now when all things were thus ordered, he marched forwards to the enimies. John of Desmond, when he saw that he must fight or flie, and that brags would not beare out the matter, by the councell of doctor Allen, who had the holie ghost at commandement, to giue them the victorie, caused the popes banner to be displaied; and then marching forwards in verie good order, hee tooke a plaine ditch in the open field: and minding to abide the fight, disposeth his horsemen, footmen, Galowglasses, and his shot for his best strength and aduantage.

The gouernor setteth forwards, & giueth the onset vpon them with his shot, who valiantlie resisted the first & second volées, & answered the fight verie well, euen to the couching of the pikes, that the matter stood verie doubtfull. But the Englishmen so fiercelie & desperatlie set vpon them afresh with the third volée, that they were discomfited and had the ouerthrow giuen them, and fled. John of Desmond, as a worthie Kerres, who (as the historiographers write of him) was Primus in fuga, postremus in bello, sat vpon his horsse all this while and gaue the loking: who soener turned first, he was the first that was gone: for he put spur to the horsse & fled awaie as fast as he could, shewing a faire paire of héeles, which was better to him than two paire of hands. In this fight were manie slaine, of which doctor Allen was one, and three score others of good account. And in the chase, there were slaine and hurt, which died shortlie after, about two hundred men. This doctor Allen was an Irish man borne, and the chiefest cause of this fight. For he trusting to the Spaniards, whom he knew to be verie skilfull, and also dreaming the victorie by his inchantments to be at his commandement, incouraged John of Desmond forwards: and in the campe in the waie of good spéed would néeds saie masse, and as the prophets of Baal in the time of king Achab, he offered to his God Bazim, and cried out for his aid, but none would come; for his God was asléepe and could not heare. Notwithstanding, he stood so much vpon the credit of his offrings and sacrifices, that he assured them of a victorie, and that he himselfe would be the first that should that daie giue the first blow; but whether he so did or not, there was he slaine: where he had the iust reward of a traitor, who most wickedlie and disloiallie forsoke the dutie and allegiance, which by the word of God he did owe vnto hir highnesse, and denoted himselfe a professed Jesuit to the Romish antichrist, and an open traitor vnto his lawfull prince. The earle of Desmond himselfe was not present in this fight, but he and the dissembling baron of Lernew stood in the view & sight of it, vpon a little hill in a wood about a quarter of a mile from thense: but the whole companies were there, and had part of the breakefast.

The popes banner displaied.

The battell betweene the gouernor and sir John of Desmond.

The Irish lost the field.

Doctor Allen is slaine.

Doctor Allen incouraged the campe to fight.

The earle of Desmond was in view of the fight.

The gouernor marcheth to incounter with John of Desmond.

This baron of Lernews eldest sonne, named Patrike, was seruant to hir maiestie and sworne, and serued in the court; but had leaue of hir maiestie to come into Ireland to see his father: but he was no soner come, and entred into his fathers house and home, but he forsoke his faith and oth to hir highnesse, and became a wicked rebell, and most traitorouslie bare armes against hir, and so continued a ranke traitor to the verie end. Wherein appeareth the nature of himselfe, and of the brood of that cursed generation, among whome there is neither faith, nor truth. And therefore they maie be verie well resembled to an ape, which (as the common prouerbe is) an ape is but an ape, albeit he be clothed in purple and veluet: euen so this wicked impe. For notwithstanding he was trained vp in the court of England, sworne seruant vnto hir maiestie, in good fauour and countenance in the court, and apparel-

The baron of Lernews son, seruant to the quéene and sworne, beareth armes against hir.

No faith nor regard of an oth among the Irishrie.

led according to his degrée, and dailie nurtured and brought vp in all ciuilitie: he was no sooner come home, but awaie with his English attires, and on with his brogs, his shirt, and other Irish rags, being become as verie a traitor as the veriest knaue of them all, & so for the most part they are all, as dailie experience teacheth, dissemble they neuer so much to the contrarie. For like as Iupiters cat, let hir be transformed to neuer so faire a ladie, and let hir be neuer so well attired and accompanied with the best ladies, let hir be neuer so well esteémed and honored: yet if the mouse come once in hir sight, she will be a cat and shew hir kind: but to the historie.

Iupiters cat.

When the battell was ended, & the retreat sounded, the gouernor incamped himselfe fast by the riuer side of the monasterie aforesaid, and there laie that night. About midnight, when all things were quiet, & euerie man was at his rest: euen then the often named earle of Desmond sendeth a messenger with letters of congratulation vnto the gouernor, bearing him in hand that he was verie glad and ioifull of his good successe and victorie: and like an hypocrite pretending verie good will to hir maiestie, gaue him aduise that for the auoiding of hir great charges, he should dislodge himselfe from that place; which as he thought was not best for an armie to lie in. The gouernor answered his letters with the like, and requested him to come vnto him, that they might haue conference togither, and ioine in this hir maiesties seruice, and wherein he would be glad to follow his aduise in anie thing that might further hir highnesse seruice: but to withdraw himselfe and his companie from thense, vnlesse he could giue him a good reason, he would not yéeld to his motion, nor take his warrant for anie warrantise. And therefore he remained thenseforth in the same place three or foure daies, expecting still the earles comming: but he so little meant anie such thing, that henseforth he became a rebell in open action, and in armes against the gouernor, finding nothing in the earle but dissembling, and to vse delaies and faire spéeches to gaine time to serue his turne, removed from thense to a towne of the earles named Rebell, and there incamped himselfe. They were no sooner settled, but the scoutmaister, hauing béene abroad, declareth to the gouernor that he had discouered a great companie of horssemen and footmen which were within a mile of the campe, & therewith was the alarum made, & sundrie horssemen & shot according to the direction of the gouernor issued out, & met with the enimies, and skirmished with them, of whom they killed manie, and toke some prisoners.

The earle of Desmonds dissembling, & his counsell.

The gouernor remoueth to Rebell.

The earle of Desmond becometh himselfe to be an open rebell.

These men, being examined, declared that the earle was now in the fields and in armes, and so had béene euer since the last ouerthrow of his brother John of Desmond; and likewise declareth the whole bent of the earle and his brother. This péece of seruice being doone, and the night drawing néere, the watch was charged, and euerie man toke his rest. But the earle and his brother minding to do some mischiefe, they watched, and in the dead of the night then following, taking aduantage of the time, when men were wearie and in their sléepes, came with all their companies, and meant to haue set vpon the whole campe. But they came too short and missed of their purpose: for the campe was too well warded for them to take anie aduantage. The gouernor considering the intent of the enimies was to do what they could to remoue him from that place, which could not be kept but to the great damage of the enimies sundrie waies, and that the same was a verie necessarie place for a garison and a ward, whereby to stop the continuall intercourse of the enimies, which by the means of a bridge ouer that water, they had a continuall recourse to & fro that waie: he before his departure from thense did plant & place a ward in the castell adioining to the bridge, which did from that time annoie the enimies verie much: and then from hense he marched towards the earles house of Asketten, and by the waie he met with sundrie of the earles companie, and skirmished and fought with them to the losse of manie of them.

The earle of Desmond in open rebellion.

The earle of Desmond secretlie in the night stealeth to the gouernors campe to intrapit.

A garison placed at Rebell.

This house of Asketten is a verie strong castell, standing vpon a rocke in the verie midst of the riuer, and the chiefest house of the earles, wherein he had a strong ward: but he himselfe at this present time and his brother John were assembled vpon a little hill on the further side of the riuer, standing there vpon their whole force. The gouernor hoping of some good seruice towards, drew all his companie into the abbeie house of Asketten, not far from the castell house; and there conferring with the capteins what were best to be done, it was agréed and thought good, that a letter or two more should be written to the earle, and to persuade him to submission. The gouernor, who was a verie good secretarie, and could pen a letter verie excellentlie well, did draw a letter, vsing manie good words, termes, and reasons to persuade him to conformitie and obedience to hir maiestie: & that he should not be the occasion of the vtter fall & end of so noble a house, which descended from Roesius the great prince of South-wales by his mother Nesta, daughter vnto the said Roesius, as Giraldus one of the same familie writeth. And herewith by the waie of a parenthesis, it doth not appeare by anie sufficient authoritie, vnlesse a sonet and a deuise of a noble man be a sufficient authoritie, that the Giraldines came out of Italie; but perhaps out of Normandie: and the first of them placed in England had some interteinement and liuing at Windesor, and thereof was called Giraldus de Windesora: and he gaue not the armes of Richard Strangbow earle of Chepstow, as some haue written: but as he was a gentleman of himselfe, gaue the armes incident to his owne house, which is argent a salter gules.

Asketten the earle of Desmonds chiefest house.

A letter sent to the earle of Desmond to persuade him to submission.

The house of Desmond.

For certeine it is, he was and is a verie ancient gentleman, whose ancestors were planted and placed in that land by king Henrie the second, and haue euer since continued in this land in much honor, wishing, aduising, and persuading, that if there were anie feare of God, obedience to the prince, or regard of himselfe, and of his name and familie; that he would reclaime himselfe vnto dutie and obedience: and that the honor of his ancestors might not be buried in his treacheries and follies. These letters being well penned were sent vnto him. But notwithstanding the most pithie, true, and effectuall reasons and arguments were sufficient to haue persuaded anie honest or reasonable man: yet was his Pharaos heart so hardened and indurated in disobedience, rebellion, and treacherie, that nothing could make him to yéeld and relent: but leauing his former and wonted dissimulations, returneth the messenger with a flat denial that he will not yéeld anie further obedience to hir highnesse. And forthwith to confirme the same, he fortifieth his strongest and best houses and castels: as namelie Asketten with his chosen followers and men of best trust; the castels of Carigofoile and Strangicullie with Spaniards and some Irishmen. The gouernor, vpon the receipt of the earles answer, and minding to frame his seruice accordinglie; news was brought him that sir William Drurie lord iustice was dead, who deceassed at Waterford vpon the third of October 1579, which was a dolefull hearing to all good Englishmen, and a great hinderance vnto hir highnesse seruice.

The earle of Desmond will not be persuaded.

The earle of Desmond fortifieth his castels.

Sir William Drurie dieth.

This

The conditions and manners of sir William Drurie.

This sir William Drurie was verie valiant, wise, and a gentleman of great experience, descended of a verie ancient and a worshipfull house, being a yonger brother, but the birthright excepted, nothing inferior to his elder brother ante kind of waie in the gifts of wisedome, valiantnesse, knowledge, and experience of matters politike or martiall. In his youth he was a page, and serued in the court; and as in yeares, so in knowledge of all courtlie seruices he did growe and increase, and became to be as gallant a courtier as none lightlie excelled him. He was verie deuout, and a follower vnto the then lord Russell lord priuie seale, and after earle of Bedford, who gaue him good countenance and interteinment: for vnder him he serued in France at Muttrell and Bullongnois, and after the warres ended, he went to Calis, and oftentimes being there he issued out, and did manie good seruices about Cambraie and in Artois: and in the end about Bruselles he was taken prisoner. Not long after he was redéemed and ransomed, and then he would néeds serue at the seas, and hauing gotten a ship well appointed for the purpose, he aduentureth that seruice. The beginning of it was so hard, that in nine daies he was in a continuall stormc, and in great despaire for euer to recouer: neuertheless, whom the sword could not make afraid, the seas could not dismate; but was euer one and the same man, of a good mind and great corage: and the storme being past, he followed the seruice which he had taken in hand, and became to be an excellent maritimall man, and verie expert in all seruices at the seas. When the time of this his seruice was expired, he returned into England; & attending vpon the earle of Bedford, he accompanied him in the seruice against the rebels of Deuon, at the commotion or rebellion in the third yeare of the reigne of king Edward the first one thousand fiue hundred fortie and nine, and did there verie good seruice. After which in course of time, he went to serue at Berwike, where his valor and behauior was such, that he was made prouost marshall vnder the earle of Sussex being lord lieutenant, and for his sundrie notable good seruices he rewarded him with the degrée of knighthood.

His seruice at Bullongne.

He is taken prisoner.

He serueth at seas.

His seruice at the commotion in Deuon.

His seruice at Berwike.

He is prouost marshall.

He is dubbed knight.

Not long after that, there was a péece of necessarie seruice to be done in Scotland by the said earle vpon the quéenes commandement; but he was verie sicke, and at that time he could not performe the same: wherfore he deputed in his place this worthie knight, whome he then made generall of the armie: and with such forces as were thought mét he entreth into the seruices appointed vnto him, being accompanied with the earle of Lennor, sir Thomas Manners, sir George Carie, and sir Robert Constable, with sundrie other capteins, to the number of twelue hundred footmen. And his commission being to serue at Edenborough, which then by the reason of the diuision among the noblemen, about the murthering of the earle of Murreie, he tooke, spoiled, and burned sundrie forts and castels: and in the end besieged and tooke the towne and castell of Edenborough, and deliuered the same, according as he was commanded, to the vse of the king: and so he returned againe to his old charge, with great praise and commendation, as in the chronicles of England and Scotland is at large recorded.

He is generall of the armie, and doth a good péece of seruice in Scotland.

He besiegeth and taketh Edenborough castell.

In verie short time after, hir maiestie hauing good experience of the valor of this knight euerie waie, aswell for his valiantnes in martiall affaires, as for his wisedome in ciuill gouernement, she calleth and draweth him from his office and charge at Berwike, and remoueth him into Ireland, there to be imploied in the office of a lord president, and assigneth vnto him the gouernement of the whole prouince of Mounster, where he shall haue sufficient matter and occasion to vse both the sword & the law, iudgement and mercie. And hauing receiued hir highnes commandement in this behalfe, he maketh his voiage & repaire into Ireland: & being now serued in his roome and office by the right honorable sir Henrie Sidnete lord deputie, he acquiteth himselfe verie well euerie waie, being as seuere a iudge and earnest persecutor of the wicked and rebellious, as a zealous defender of the dutifull and obedient, to the great good liking of hir maiestie, the terror of the wicked, the comfort of the good, and the benefit of the commonwealth. After some time of his triall in this office, and sir Henrie Sidnete lord deputie being reuoked into England, he who had serued well in part, is called now to serue in all: and from a particular president is called to be a generall gouernor: and is in place of the departed deputie made lord iustice. He was no sooner entred into the office, but forthwith the rebellion and warres of the Desmonds began in Mounster vnder James Fitzmoris, and the Italians lately come from the pope, and vnder the earle of Desmond and his brethren, who had long breathed and looked for this time. For the pacifieng, or rather subduing of this wicked rebellion, he toke such continuall trauels and troubles, & so bruised his bodie, that being not able to hold out any longer, he fell sicke & died (as is before said) in the citie of Waterford, and from thense his corps was remoued to Dublin, and there buried; his bodie resting in peace, his soule in euerlasting blisse, and his fame in this world for euer immortall.

Sir William Drurie is made lord iustice of all Ireland.

The rebellion of the Desmonds in Mounster.

The death of sir William Drurie.

Sir Nicholas Malbie, who was chéefe gouernor of Mounster, now that his commission by the death of sir William Drurie was expired and ended, gaue ouer to follow ante actuall warres or ciuill administration in Mounster; but remoued himselfe and the whole campe vnto Lougher, and there dispersed them abrode in townes and villages to lie in garrison, and vpon their owne gards, vntill it were knowne who should haue the sword, and be the principall officer. Amongest the capteins thus dispersed into seuerall places, sir William Stanleie, and capteine George Carew were assigned to lie at Adare. The traitors & rebels, hearing of the death of the worthie knight, of whose prowesse and valiantnesse by the sword, & of whose wisedome & vprightnes in gouernement, they had good triall; yet not abiding to be alienated from their old leauened and wicked vsage, they were not a little glad that he was dead, euen as the other were most sorowfull for the losse & lacke of him. Wherefore now they pull vp their spirits, & confer togither how they may in this inter-reigne win the spurs, and be vtterlie deliuered from the English gouernement. Wherefore it is agreed among them, that vpon euerie seuerall garrison of the most principall capteins, they would set seuerall companies to watch & kæpe them in their holds, that they should not issue out, but to their perill. Some therefore are appointed at Kilmalocke, some at Carigofoile, some at Asketten, and some at one place, and some at another. And at Adare, where these two gentlemen sir William Stanleie & George Carew laie, sir James of Desmond brother to the earle with foure hundred Kerns and fiftie horsses was appointed to serue and watch; which he did so carefullie & narowlie, that none durst to pæpe nor looke out but in danger of some perill. But when vittels waxed short within dores, the souldiors, who could nor would be pined, gaue the aduenture to fetch that which was without dores: and as want of vittels did increase, so did their issuings out vpon the enimies growe and increase. And so often were their sallies and incountrings with the enimies, that in the end they finding & kæling the courage

Sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew are assigned to Adare.

The garrisons are besieged and inuironed by the Irishme.

Sir James of Desmond besiegeth Adare.

The Irishmen league to inuiron the garrison.

rage of the Englishmen, they had alwaies the worst side; and at euerie bickering euer lost some of their companie. Wherevpon they raised their siege, gaue place to the garrisons, and returned to the earle of Desmond. For albeit as yet they wanted a generall gouernor to rule aboue all, yet the captens were not to seeke, nor yet failed to doo the seruice which vnto them did apperteine, either for seruice or safetie. And among all the rest sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew (as is before said) lieng in garrison at Adare, and vpon an occasion minding to doo a peece of seruice, verie earlie, and before the breake of the daie, they toke a bote or a cote trough, which could not hold aboue eight or ten persons at a time, and passed ouer their soldiors vnto the other side of the riuer, which lieth betweene Adare and the Kerrie, minding to haue burned & wasted all the lands and countrie belonging & apperteining to the knight of the valleie, who then was in actuall rebellion against hir maiestie, with the earle of Desmond and his brethren, where they then laie at a castell named Ballilogban, the chiefest & strongest place which the enimie had in that place and countrie, and this was furnished with a strong ward of the Spaniards. After that these two capteins had burned and spoiled the countrie, and put to the sword whomsoeuer they thought good: in their returne before they could recouer the riuer, sir James of Desmond, the knight of the valleie, and the foresaid Spaniards with all their forces, to the number of foure hundred footmen and thirtie horssemen, gaue the charge vpon these two enlignes verie fiercelie, they hauing not in their companie aboue sir score persons to the vttermost. These two capteins answered the charge, and most valiantly skirmished with them at the push of the pike without intermission aboue eight hours, and killed of them aboue fiftie shot and Kernes; and sir James himselfe with others grieuouslie hurt and wounded, without the losse of anie one of their owne men, sauing sundrie were shrewdlie hurt and wounded. At length these two capteins recouered their bote, and caused all the souldiors to be transported; they themselues being the verie last that passed ouer, and the enimies doubting of the safetie, stood afterwards vpon a better force.

The knight of the valleie his countrie spoiled.

The knight of the valleie a rebell.

Sir william Stanleie and capteine George Carews seruice at Adare.

The lords of the councell at Dublin in the meane time, considering the distressed state of the whole land for want of a principall officer, did assemble themselues, and toke aduise for the choise of some one wise man, meet and fit for the gouernement. And in the end they resolued vpon sir William Pelham, whom they chose to be lord iustice. And vpon sundaie being the eleuenth of October 1579, he receiued the sword and toke his oth in Christs church of Dublin: there being present the lord chancellor, the archbishop of Dublin, the earles of Ormond and Kildare, and the whole councell: besides a great number of barons, knights, and gentlemen. The sermon being ended, he returned to the castell, before whome sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight, marshall of Ireland, by his office did beare the sword before him, & the whole companie there did attend him: being come to the castell, he was receiued with the shot of all the great artillerie. As soone as he was entered into the chamber of presence, and the sword there deliuered, he called the lord chancellor before him: and in consideration of his good seruices in causes of councell, and of hir maiesties good acceptation of the same, he rewarded & honoured him with the degree of knighthood, by the name of sir William Gerard.

Sir William Pelham chosen to be lord iustice. 1579

Sir william Pelham hauing taken the sword, dubbeth the lord chancellor knight.

Likewise, he called Edward Fitton the sonne and heire of sir Edward Fitton, late treasuror of Ireland, and dubbed him knight. After dinner the councell sat, consulting vpon causes of the estate: and for quieting of the realme, letters were sent vnto all the noblemen and gentlemen of anie countenance and calling, persuading them to the continuance of their loialties and dutifull obedience. And for the gouernement of the prouince of Mounster, in absence of the lord iustice, a patent was sealed and deliuered to the earle of Ormond: who hauing the keeping and custodie of the yong lord Giraldsonne and heire to the erle of Desmond, was by a warrant willed to deliuer him to capteine Mackworth, and he to bring or conueie him to the castell of Dublin. Likewise, a warrant vnder the broode seale was sent to sir Warham Sentleger, to be knight or prouost marshall of all Mounster. These and other things doone concerning the keeping of the English pale in quiet: the lord iustice, who had a speciall eie to the troublesome state of Mounster, prepareth to make presentlie a iournie into Mounster. But first it was concluded and agreed, that the lord chancellor should passe ouer into England, with letters of aduertisement to hir maiestie and councell of the present state of Ireland, and of his lordships iournie towards against the rebels: who had also in commission to vtter by speech what was to be aduertised & answered vpon hir maiesties demands and councels. When all things were prepared for his iournie, he appointed the erle of Kildare to defend the borders northward, and his lordship marched southward toward Mounster, taking with him the three bands latelie come from Berwike, vnder the leading of capteine Walker, capteine Case, and capteine Pikeman: with so manie others as he thought meet and necessarie for that seruice. And when he came in his waie to Kilkennie, being the nineteenth of October, there he remained two daies and kept sessions, whereat he sat in person, and determined manie matters, and did cause Edmund Mac Neile a notable traitor, & sundrie other malefactors, to be executed to death: and also he made a peace and reconciliation betweene the earle of Ormond and sir Barnabie Fitzpatrike, baron of vpper Ossorie: betwixt whome was a mortall hatred. And bonds were taken betweene them for restoring ech one to the other the preies, which either of their men had taken. During his abode and being in Kilkennie, the earle gaue his lordship verie honourable and good interteinment.

The earle of Ormond made gouernor of Mounster.

Sir Warham Sentleger made prouost marshall of Mounster.

The lord iustice maketh a iournie into Mounster.

The lord chancellor sent into England.

The lord iustice keepeth sessions at Kilkennie.

From this towne he departed the two and twentith of October, and by iournies he came to Cashell, where the earle of Ormond with a band of two hundred and thirtie men came and met him. And here the lord iustice sent his letters of the foure and twentith of October to the earle of Desmond, for his repaire vnto him, for the appeasing of the quarrell and controuersie betweene him & sir Nicholas Malbie, referring vnto him to come either to Cashell or to Limerike. And from this towne he rode to Limerike, and about a mile before he came to the citie, sir Nicholas Malbie and sundrie other capteins & gentlemen met his lordship; and for his welcome gaue him a braue volee of shot: and so brought him to the citie, where the maior in all dutifull maner receiued him, and presented him with a thousand well weaponed and appointed men of the same citie. The next daie he departed thense, and went to a towne named Fanings, where sir Nicholas Malbie presented vnto his lordship a letter, which he receiued from Ulike Burke: the same being the letter of doctor Sanders sent vnto the said Ulike, and with most pestilent reasons persuaded him to rebellion. And to this towne came the countesse of Desmond from hir husband, with letters of hir husband to the lord iustice, in excusing his not comming vnto him.

The earle of Ormond and the baron of vpper Ossorie reconciled and made frends.

The earle of Desmond is sent for to come to the lord iustice.

The lord iustice honorablie receiued into Limerike.

Doctor Sanders wicked letters to Ulike Burke.

The lord iustice seeing the earle to vse but delaies, toke aduise of the councell which was with him, what what was best to doo. And in the end it was concluded, that the earle of Ormond should go vnto him, and to conferre with him vpon such articles as were deliuered, and now sent by him vnto the said Desmond, and to require his resolute answer.

The said articles were in summe as followeth.

The earle of Desmond is required to deliuer doctor Sanders and the Spaniards.

FIrst, that he should deliuer vnto the said lord iustice, doctor Sanders, and certeine strangers of diuerse nations, now remaining in the said earles countries, and mainteined by such traitors and in such castels, as be at his deuotion and commandement.

The earle to deliuer one of his castels.

That he shall deliuer vp into hir maiesties hands one of his castels of Carigofoile or Asketten, for the pledge of his good behauiour: which vpon sundrie and diuerse reasons is suspicions, and he for his disloialtie greatlie suspected.

The earle to submit himselfe.

That he doo forthwith come and simplie submit himselfe vnto hir maiestie, and to referre his cause to the iudgement of hir maiestie and councell in England, or vnto him the lord iustice and councell in Ireland.

That he prosecute his brethren and rebels.

That he doo forthwith repaire to the lord iustice, and ioine with his lordship with all his forces, to prosecute his brethren and other traitors, and to assist and aid the earle of Ormond, lord generall in this seruice.

Which conditions if he will hold, then he shall be reputed as a nobleman, and be receiued into fauour notwithstanding his errours past: but if he refuse, that then let him know, that immediatlie by open proclamation he shall be published a traitor.

The earle of Ormond, according to the order, went to the said Desmond, and deliuered vnto him both the letters and the said articles, and required his resolution and answer. Which when he had ouer read and considered, he returned his answer by a letter dated at Crogh the thirtith of October 1579, vsing therein nothing but triflings and delaies, requiring restitution for old wrongs and iniuries, and fustfleng himselfe to be a good subiect, though he doo not yeeld to the foresaid articles. During the time of this parlée, the lord iustice was remoued to Crome, where he expected the returne of the erle of Ormond and to that place sir William Stanleie & capteine George Carew came vnto his lordship with their two hundred footmen.

The earle sendeth letters but commeth not.

The earle of Ormond being returned, & hauing little preuailed with Desmond, notwithstanding his sundrie persuasions, there were other letters sent vnto him to induce him to the consideration of himselfe and his estate: but when no reason, no persuasion, nor counsell could preuaile; then it was thought good by the lord iustice & councell to proceed to their former determination, and to proclame him a traitor. The lord iustice remoued from Crome to Kathkill, and he was no sooner incamped, but alarum by the traitors was raised: which was answered forthwith by the lord iustice and the earle of Ormond: & in that skirmish three or foure of the traitors were slaine, of which the earle of Desmonds butler was one, the earle himselfe being then incamped within a mile of his brothers: and notwithstanding his iustification to be a good subiect, he dailie accompanied and conferred with them. The lord iustice seeing that neither counsell nor delaie of time could auaile with the earle of Desmond, then by the generall consent of the nobilitie, the councell, gentlemen, and the whole armie, a proclamation was openlie published against the said earle and all his confederats, in the highest degree of treason at Kathkill the second of Nouember 1579. The effect of which treasons and proclamation was as here vnder followeth.

The second letter sent to the earle of Desmond for his comming in.

The earle of Desmonds butler taken and slaine.

The earle of Desmond proclamed traitor.

The earle of Desmonds treasons articulated.

THat the erle of Desmond hath practised most vnnaturallie the subuersion of the whole state.

2 That he practised to bring in strangers, and practised with forren princes to bring and allure in strangers to inuade this land.

3 That he fostered and mainteined doctor Sanders, James Fitzmoris, and others beyond the seas to worke these feats.

4 That albeit to the vtter shew of the world, he seemed at the first to dislike with them at their landing: yet were they secretlie interteined by the said earles permission, throughout all his countie of palantine in Kerrie.

5 That when his brethren most traitorouslie had murthered Henrie Dauels and others at Traleigh, he did let his said brethren slip, without reproouing or blaming of them, and had also commended specialtie the slaughter of Edmund Duffe an Englishman, who at the said murthering laie in the next bed vnto Dauels.

6 That when the strangers at Smerwicke had no waie to escape by sea, at the comming of sir William Drurie, he gaue place vnto them for their escape by land, and gaue his tenants and followers libertie, to aid, helpe, and mainteine them.

7 That contrarie to the commandement giuen vnto him by the lord iustice, he returned into Kerrie, and caused the strangers to leaue the fort, and to repaire to the towne of the Dingle and to other places which were at his deuotion, & had there interteinements.

8 That he distributed the ordinances and artillerie of the forts vnto the rebels, as doth appeare by a note found in the port mantieu of doctor Allen latelie slaine in the incounter executed by sir Nicholas Malbie.

9 That he hath set at libertie such strangers as he kept colourablie as prisoners, and hath appointed them to gard his houses and castels.

10 That he hanged most abhominablie Richard Eustace, Simon Brian, and others the quéenes subiects, for whome he vndertooke to the late lord iustice to be safelie brought vnto him.

11 That he sent sundrie of his principall men, seruitors, and followers, and his houshold seruants, as also his chiefe capteins, which vnder the popes banner displaied most traitorouslie in the fields, did assaile sir Nicholas Malbie knight hir maiesties lieutenant of all Mounster, at Mounster Euagh, and which banner Nicholas Williams the earles butler did that daie carie.

12 That he hath vtterlie refused manie persuasions, friendlie counsels, sundrie messages, and all the good means vsed and wrought to reduce and to bring him to obedience.

13 That he hath not onelie refused to deliuer vp doctor Sanders and the Spaniards, which doo dailie accompanie him; but hath broken downe his castels, burned his townes, and desolated his countries aforehand, to the intent hir maiesties forces and subiects shall not be succoured nor refreshed.

14 That he dailie looketh for a further aid and a new supplie of forreners, & dailie solliciteth the chiefe men of the Irish countries to ioine with him in this his most execrable and rebellious enterprise.

15 That he openlie protested & sent a message to the

the lord iustice that he would disturbe the whole state of Ireland. Wherfore they did pronounce, proclame, and publish him to be a most notorious, detestable, and execrable traitor, and all his adherents, against hir maiesties crowne and dignitie, vnlesse within twentie daies after this proclamation he did come in, and submit himselfe. Vnto which proclamation there subscribed the earle of Dsmond, the baron of Dunboine, the bishop of Waterford, the vicount Mountgarret, sir Nicholas Malbie, sir Edmund Butler, Edward Waterhouse, Theobald Butler, Edward Butler, and Piers Butler.

ges. And they then little thinking and lesse looking for anie such ghests, were vnawares and vpon a sudden intrapped and taken napping, and the most part of them taken and slaine, and the villages for the most part burned and spoiled. The earle of Desmond at this present time was there, but not knowne in his castell called the New castell, and escaped verie narowlie. This péece of seruice being done, the lord gouernour marched towards Mac Willies countrie, and being to go through a certeine passe, he met with the seneshall, vpon whome he gaue the charge, who answered the same verie valiantlie, and the skirmith was verie hot, in which the seneshals brothers and sundrie of his men were slaine; and the like also befell vpon the lord gouernours men, though not so manie, amongest whome capteine Zouches trumpetor was one; which so greeued the lord generall, that he commanded all the houses, townes, and villages in that countrie and about Lesinnen, which in anie waie did belong to the earle of Desmond, or of anie of his frends and followers, to be burned and spoiled.

The earle of Desmond in danger to be taken.

The proclamation against Desmond is sent to all the cities in Ireland.

This proclamation was forthwith sent and dispersed to Dublin, Waterford, Corke, Limerike, and other principall townes to be in like order proclamed. Immediatlie and within an houre after this proclamation, the countesse of Desmond came to the campe; but the campe was before dislodged from the towne, and all his countrie forthwith consumed with fire, and nothing was spared which fire & sword could consume. From this place the lord iustice remoued to Pople Bzian, where vpon the third of Nouember he toke a generall musser of the whole armie: and then he deliuered to the erle of Dsmond two hundred and fiftie horsemen, and also eight ensignes of footmen, of the which companie George Bourchier went to Kilmallocke, and sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew to Adare, And then he remoued and toke his iournie vnto Limerike, being accompanied with the earle of Dsmond, who the next daie left the lord iustice and returned to his charge. After which departure of the lord iustice, the proclamed traitor of Desmond and his brothers, not able anie longer to shrowd his treacheries, went with all his forces to the towne of Poughall, where against his comming the gates of the towne were shut, but yet it was thought but colourablie: for verie shortlie after, without dentall or resistance, the earle and all his troope of rebels entered the towne and toke it, and there remained about fiue daies, rifling and carrieng awaie the goods and household stuffe to the castell of Strangicallie and Lesinnen, the which then were kept by the Spaniards.

The towne of Youghall taken & spoiled.

A barke well appointed at Waterford is sent to Youghall.

The earle of Dsmond causeth a barke well appointed to be dispatched from Waterford, & to come to Poughall: the capteine of which barke was named White, a man of that countrie birth, verie valiant and of a stout stomach. Assone as he was come to the wals of the towne, and had anchored his ship, he recouered from the rebels certeine ordinances of the said townes; and being put to vnderstand that the seneshall of Imokellie was comming towards the towne, he set all his men on land; and setting his men in good order, he entered into the towne at the watergate, and marched in good order through the towne, till he came where the rebels were togither, and then more rashlie than consideratlie, gaue the charge and onset vpon them: but the number of them being great, and his but a handfull to them, he was in verie short time inclosed and ouerlaied, and there slaine, and with much adoo did a few of his companie recouer their ship againe. The lord generall and gouernour in the meane time, not slacking his businesse, did assemble and musser all his companie, & being accompanied with sir George Bourchier, sir William Stanleie, capteine Dowdall, capteine Furse, and others, made a iourneie into Connilo, which was then the cheefest place of trust that the earle had, both for safetie and strength, and for vittels and forage, and there his greatest force and strength of his souldiors were seized in the townes and villa-

The ordinances recouered from the rebels.

White, capteine of the barke is slain.

The earle of Dsmond maketh a rode into Connilo, & killeth a number of the rebels.

From this he toke his iourneie towards Corke, and in his waie at Dsunfening he toke a preie of one thousand fiue hundred kine or cowes, which were all driuen and sent vnto Corke, at which citie assoone as his lordship was come, and had rested a small time, then by the aduise of the capteins he diuided and bestowed his companie into sundrie garrisons and places conuenient, as which might best answer the seruices. And his lordship being accompanied with capteine Dowdall and capteine Furse, he went to Cashell, and by the waie he toke the maior of Poughall, whome forthwith he examined, and for his treasons and treacheries, in that he would yéeld vp the towne vnto Desmond, and had before refused a band of Englishmen, which was appointed to lie in garrison in that towne, for the defense thereof, and had promised that he would kéepe and defend the same against all men; he carried him along with him vnto Poughall, and there before his owne doore hanged him. The lord gouernour when he came into the towne, found it all desolate, rifled and spoiled, and no one man, woman or child therein, sauing one frier, whome he spared, bicause he had fetched the corps of Henrie Dauels from Traleigh, and had carried it to Waterford, where it was buried in the chancell of the cathedrall church. And his lordship much pitieng the desolate estate of the towne, did take order for the reedifieng of the wals and gates, and placed therein a garrison of thrée hundred footmen vnder capteine Morgan and capteine Piers, who did verie good seruice in the countrie, and by good means drew home the people and old inhabitants, and inpeopled the towne againe. And the lord gouernour departed thense, and followed his seruice, as time, place, and opportunitie did serue; and taking aduise with the capteins for some speciall seruice, and remembring that the Spaniards had hitherto lien in rest and quietnesse, in garrison at Strangicallie, and hitherto nothing done or said vnto them; it was agréed betweene his lordship and the capteins, to doo some seruice vpon them, and to trie their value: whereupon they marched thither and laid siege thervnto.

The maior of Youghall hanged before his owne doores.

The towne of Youghall all desolate.

The inhabitants reuoked to dwell and inhabit the towne.

The Spaniards who kept alwaies good watch, and had also verie good'espials abrode, they were forthwith aduertised that a companie of souldiers were drawing and marching towards the said castell, and when they themselues saw it to be true, and had discouered them, they began to distrust themselues, and to doubt of their abilitie how to withstand them. Wherefore abandoning & forsaking the castell, they passed ouer the water, thinking to recouer the woods and

The Spaniards lieng in Strangicallie forsake their fort and in fleeing are slaine.

and so to escape that present danger. But sir William Stanleie, capteine Zouch, capteine Dowdall, capteine Piers, capteine Roberts, and all their companies did so egerlie follow and pursue them, that in the end they ouertoke them, and slue all or the most part of them, and so toke the castell, wherein the lord gouernour placed a ward. Likewise when he laie at Adare, and vnderstanding that the erle of Desmond was abrode, the garrison minding to doo some seruice vpon him, they issued out. Whereof he hauing some intelligence, notwithstanding his companie was but small in comparison of the others: yet he laie in an ambush to meet them in their returne; and vpon an aduantage he gaue the onset vpon them, and gaue a verie hot charge, in which the souldiers of the garrison were so hardlie assailed, that they brake the most part of their pikes, and were inforced with their swords and with the stumps of their staues to stand to their defenses; which they did so valiantlie, that the earls in the end with the losse of his men was driuen to giue ouer and to flee.

The erle of Desmond lieth in an ambush.

The like seruice did sir Henrie Wallop, who then laie at Limerike, sir George Bourchier, capteine Dowdall, capteine Holingworth, and all the residue of the capteins in their seuerall charges and garrisons, who though of themselues they were verie forward; yet the lord gouernour neuer slept his time, but was alwaies in readinesse, being the first with the formost, and the last with the hindermost. In the moneth of August 1580, he remoued and dislodged himselfe from Adare, and marched to Boteuant a house of the lord Barries, where a peece of seruice was appointed them to be done: but suddenlie such a sickenes came among the soldiers which toke them in the head, that at one instant there were aboue three hundred of them sicke, and for three daies they laie as dead stockes, loking still when they should die, but yet such was the good will of God, that few died; for they all recouered. This sickenesse not long after came into England, & was called the gentle correction. Now the companie being thus recouered, his lordship minding to follow a peece of seruice, diuideth his companie into two parts, the one he toke himselfe, and toke the waie by the Iland; & the other he appointed to go directlie vnto Traligh, and there they met and diuided their companies into three parts, & so marched to Dingle a cush. And as they went they draue the whole countrie before them vnto the Ventrie, & by that means they preied and toke all the cattell in the countrie to the number of eight thousand kine, besides horsses, garrons, sheepe, and gotes, and all such people as they met they did without mercie put to the sword. By these meanes the whole countrie hauing no cattell nor kine left, they were driuen to such extremities, that for want of vittels they were either to die and perish for famine, or to die vnder the sword. Neuertheless, manie of them vnderstanding that sir William Winter vice admerall of England was newlie arriued with the quenes ships at the Ventrie, and that he had receiued a commission to vse marshall law, they made their repaire vnto him, and obteined protections vnder him. Which the souldiers did verie much mislike, the same to be somewhat preiudiciall to hir maiesties seruice: bicause they persuaded themselues, that if they had followed the course which they began, they should either haue taken or slaine them all.

The diligent seruice of the earle of Ormond.

A sickenesse in the campe.

All the countries preied.

Sir William Winter giueth protections.

Sir William Winter keepeth the seas.

Sir William, vicеadmerall of England, vpon the newes reported to hir maiestie that a new supplie was prepared to come into Ireland from out of Spaine, was commanded to keepe the seas and to attend their comming, and as occasion serued to doo his best seruice vpon them. Who when he had so done certeine moneths, his vittels waxed scant; and seeing no such matter, and also that the winter was drawing onwards, thinking nothing lesse than that the Spaniards would so late in the yeare arriue thither, he hoised his sailes and returned into England. But he was mistaken & deceiued: for not long after they came and landed at Smerwicke, as hereafter shall be at full declared. And now leauing the soldiers in their garrisons, let vs returne to the lord iustice, who when he departed from Limerike the fift of Nouember 1579, being accompanied with the Berwike bands, he went into Thomond, where the erle and his sonne with two bad horssemen met his lordship; and from thense he trauelled by iournies vnto Gallewaie, where he was verie honorablie receiued. And to the end to incourage them to persist and continue in dutifull obedience, he confirmed vnto the corporation certeine branches and articles, whereof some before this were granted vnto them in the time of sir Henrie lord deputie, and some now newlie set downe and granted, which in effect were these as followeth.

The lord iustice with the Berwike bands goeth into Thomond.

The lord iustice is verie honorablie receiued into Gallewaie.

The charter of Gallewaie with new liberties confirmed.

FIrst, that no writ of sub pœna shall be warded out of the chancerie against anie inhabitant in Gallewaie, vntill the partie which sueth out the writ, haue put in good and sufficient suerties before the lord chancellor, or the maior of Gallewaie to prosecute the same with effect.

That no new office nor officer be erected in the towne of Gallewaie by anie deputie or gouernour, otherwise than as they in times past haue vsed to doo.

That the maior by the aduise of foure aldermen, and other foure discreet men of the towne vpon good considerations may grant safe conduct and protection to English rebels and Irish enimies.

That the merchants of the towne which shall buie anie wares or merchandize of strange merchants, shall put in good and sufficient bands before the maior that he will well and trulie make paiment vnto the said merchant stranger for his debt and dutie.

That if anie inhabitant in the towne doo vse anie vndecent & vnreuerent speach to the maior, that he shall be punished according to the qualitie of the fault and offense.

That the maior, bailiffes, and inhabitants shall inioy, vse, and exercise all their ancient liberties, vsages, and customes.

That in all actions tried before the maior, the partie condemned shall paie reasonable costs, and the said maior shall not take anie fee for anie sentence, called Dleigethe.

That no dead bodie shall be interred or buried within the towne and walles of Gallewaie.

That when anie strange merchants come to their port and hauen, that the same be serched and viewed for weapons and munitions, and that none aboue the number of ten persons of the said ship shall come into the said towne.

That no stranger be suffered to take the view of the strength of the towne, nor to walke on the wals.

That the maior from time to time doo take the muster and view of all the able men, and of their furniture and armour.

That all vnseruiceable people in time of seruice be sent out of the towne.

That sufficient vittels from time to time be prepared to serue the towne for ten moneths at the least before hand.

That a storehouse be prouided alwais in the towne for a staple of vittels to be kept there at all times.

From

From thense his lordship by sundrie iournies came to Athlon and so to Dublin; where about three miles before he came to the citie, William Norris newlie arriued out of England, and accompanied with certeine gentlemen, met him with a hundred and fiftie horsemen, well furnished and well horsed with English geldings, euerie man wearing a red cote with a yellow lace, who attended his lordship into the citie, and from thense he was assigned and sent vnto the Newrie, where he died verie shortlie after vpon the fiue and twentith of December 1579. His hart was consumed, his splene corrupted, and his braine mixt with filthie matter. His bands were diuided and deliuered to either capteins. And immediatlie vpon his entrance into the citie, he sent for Jaques Wingfield master of the ordinance, and by order he was commanded as prisoner to keepe his chamber for his contempt, bicause he did not attend the lord iustice into Mounster as he was commanded; but vpon his submission after foure daies he was released. And vpon the death of Francis Agard esquier, sir Henrie Harington, who had married one of his daughters and heires, was by vertue of certeine letters from out of England, appointed to be seneshall of the Obirnes, as his father in law before was. The earle of Desmond and his two brethren sent a proud and an arrogant letter vnder their hands, dated the nine and twentith of November 1579, to the lord iustice, aduertising, that they were all entered into the defense of the catholike faith, with great authoritie both from the popes holinesse and king Philip, who haue vndertaken to defend and maintaine them, and therefore persuaded the lord iustice to ioine with them.

William Norris newlie come out of England meeteth the lord iustice.

Capteine Norris sent to lie at the Newrie.

Sir Henrie Harington is made seneshall of the Obirnes.

The proud letters of the earle of Desmond.

The lord iustice, hauing set the pale in some order, & hauing committed the same to the gouernement of the erle of Kildare, he made a new iournie into Mounster, and departed out of Dublin the eighteenth of Januarie 1579, with such companies and forces as he thought good for that seruice, and toke his iournies along by the sea coasts; and being come to Waterford, there he kept sessions, & sat in person at the same. And from thense taking Tinneterne in his waie he came to Wexford, the fiue and twentith of Januarie 1579, by water from Ballihacke in certeine botes verie well appointed by the maior of the citie. And before he came thither, sir William Stanleie, sir Peter Carew, and capteine George Carew, and capteine Piers, issued out of the citie with their foure bands, and neere to the shore in the view of his lordship, they presented him with a iollie skirmish, and so retired themselues, to make ward against his landing. The bulworks, gates, and curteins of the citie were beautified with ensignes and shot in warlike maner, and then all the shot of the ships in the hauen, and a great ranke of chambers vpon the keie, together with the shot of the souldiers, were discharged, and gaue his lordship a liuelie and a great thundering peale.

The lord iustice entreth a new iournie into Mounster.

The lord iustice keepeth sessions at Wexford.

At his landing the maior and aldermen araied in their scarlet gownes met him, and presented vnto his lordship the sword and the keies of the gates, which forthwith he redeliuered vnto them againe, and the sword the maior bare and caried before his lordship. He went first to the church, and by the waie vpon two seuerall stages made for the purpose, there were two orations made vnto him in Latine; and at his returne from the church, he had the third in English at the dore of his lodging. And to this citie the earle of Ormond came vnto him, and they being together, letters were sent from sir William Morgan of aduertisement, that the traitors were come downe about Dungaruon and Boghall. Wherupon one hundred horsemen vnder capteine Zouch, and Sentleger, and foure hundred footmen vnder sir William Stanleie, sir Peter Carew, capteine George Carew, & capteine Piers were dispatched to serue against them.

The lord iustice from Waterford, vpon notice of the trouble dailie increasing, sent a commission of the eleuenth of Februarie, to sir Warham Sentleger to be prouost marshall, authorising him to proceed according to the course of marshall law against all offendors, as the nature of his or their offenses did merit and deserue; so that the partie offendor be not able to dispend fortie shillings by the peare in land, or annuitie, or be not worth ten pounds in goods: also that vpon good causes he maie parlee and talke with anie rebell, and grant him a protection for ten daies: that he shall banish all idlers & sturdie beggers: that he shall apprehend aiders of outlawes and theeues, and execute all idle persons taken by night: that he shall giue in the name and names of such as shall refuse to aid and assist him: that in doing of his seruice, he shall take horse-meat and mans-meat where he list, in anie mans house for one night: that euerie gentleman and noble man do deliuer him a booke of all the names of their seruants and followers: that he shall put in execution all statutes against merchants and other penall lawes, and the same to see to be read and published in euerie church by the parson and curat of the same: and that he do euerie moneth certifie the lord iustice how manie persons, and of their offenses and qualities, that he shall execute and put to death: with sundrie other articles, which generallie are comprised in euerie commission for the marshall law.

The articles of a cõmission for the marshall law.

The lord iustice, after that he had rested about three weekes at Waterford, he remoued and went to Clonmell, where the earle of Ormond met him, being the fifteenth of Februarie 1579, and from thense he went by iournies vnto Limerike, where the chancellor of Limerike vpon suspicion of treason was committed to prison, and his lodging being searched, manie masse bookes and other popish trash, togither with an instrument of the earle of Desmonds libertie palantine of Kerrie was found. He was after indicted, arreigned, and found guiltie, but in the end pardoned. And the bishop likewise was vpon some suspicion committed prisoner vnto his owne house.

The chancellor of Limerike sent to ward for treason.

The bishop committed prisoner to his owne house.

And out of Limerike he marched the tenth of March to Kathkell, where within one houre the erle of Ormond came vnto him, and there consulted for the manner of the persecution of the enimie. Which when they had agreed vpon, they passed the nert morning ouer the bridge of Adare, and by the waie they burned and spoiled the countrie, and went to Kathkell. Now when they had amended the bridge which the rebels had destroied, and made passable, they passed ouer the same into Connilo, where the lord iustice and the earle of Ormond diuided their companies, and as they marched they burned and destroied the countrie, and they both that night incamped within one mile at Kilcolman. And there it was aduertised, that Nicholas Parker lieutenant vnto capteine Fenton, comming from Limerike with fiue horsemen, and three shot, which were of the garrison at Adare, he was set vpon at Kathkell by a hundred traitors, which did discharge sixteene or eighteene shot at him, and sundrie darts, before he espied them: but he and James Fenton the capteins brother, and Guidon, so bestirred themselues, that they gaue the enimie the repulse, and slue their leader, with fiue or six others, and so came safe to the campe, but with the hurt of one of their horses.

Nicholas Parker verie valiantlie defendeth himselfe.

The souldiers likewise in the campe were so hot vpon the spurre, & so eger vpon the vile rebels, that

The lord iustice receiued honourablie into Waterford.

that

that day they spared neither man, woman, nor child, but all was committed to the sword. The same daie, a souldier of the marshals incountered with two lustie kernes, the one of them he slue, and the other he compelled to carrie his fellows head with him to the campe: which when he had done, his head also was cut off and laid by his fellowes. The next daie following, being the twelfe of March, the lord iustice and the earle diuided their armie into two seuerall companies by two ensignes and three togither, the lord iustice taking the one side, and the other taking the other side of Slewlougher, and so they searched the woods, burned the towne, and killed that daie about foure hundred men, and returned the same night with all the cattell which they found that daie.

And the said lords, being not satisfied with this daies seruice, they did likewise the next daie diuide themselues, spoiled and consumed the whole countrie vntill it was night. And being then incamped neere togither, the baron of Lernew came to the earle of Ormond, whome the earle in the next morning brought before the lord deputie, where he in most humble maner yelded, and submitted himselfe to his lordships deuotion, promising and presenting his seruice with all dutifulnesse. And then, when after great trauels they had maruellouslie wasted and spoiled the countrie, they appointed to march to Carigofoile, and to laie siege to the same: for in it laie the greatest force of the Desmonds, and which was garded and kept by the Spaniards. This castell standeth in the riuer, and at euerie full sea both it and the bannes about it are inuironed with the said flouds and flowing waters. Assone as they were incamped, the lord iustice approched the castell so neere as he could, to take the view thereof, that accordinglie he might consider the most fittest places for the laieng of the shot for the batterie: and then he commanded capteine George Carew to take out certeine shot, and to go with him in this seruice. Now the Spaniards hauing espied them, spent manie shot vpon them, and where the lord iustice verie hardlie escaped with his life, and from being slaine with a musket shot. When his lordship vpon this view had determined what he would do, he caused the canon shot to be planted in the place most fit for the batterie, for otherwise the fort was not to be assaulted.

The baron of Lernew submitteth him selfe.

The castell of Carigofoile is besieged.

The lord iustice and capteine Carew take the view of the castell.

The castell besieged.

In the same were sixteene Spaniards and fiftie others vnder one Julio an Italian, who at the request of the countesse of Desmond vndertoke the keeping of it, and who reported himselfe to be a verie notable enginer: & standing vpon his reputation, he plied the campe with continuall shot, putting out an ensigne and railing with manie bad speeches against hir maiestie; declaring also that they kept it for the king of Spaine and so still would, vntill further aid were sent from him: and which in verie deed was dailie loked for. Before the canons and other battering peeces could be vnladen, they spent the time, occupieng the one the other with such deuises as they thought good for the seruices. And the Spaniards, hauing the aduantage, did by their often shot hurt and kill some Englishmen, namelie a souldior of sir George Bourchiers, one of sir Henrie Wallops, & one of capteine Zouches: and sir William Stanleie comming with his companie to the trenches to take the ward of capteine George Carew, which kept the watch that night past, was hurt with a musket shot out of the castell in the necke. Assone as the ordinance was vnladen and planted, they began forthwith to batter the fort with three canons, a culuering, and a demie culuering; and in short time they so beat it, that the house fell and filled the ditches: by meanes whereof the same became to be assaultable.

The proud brags of the Spaniard.

The castell is battered with shot.

Capteine Macworth, who had the ward of that daie, entred into the vtter banne by a doore that the souldiors had broken, and was maister of it presentlie. The Spaniards thervpon retired to a turret that was vpon the wall of the barbican, & some sought other places to hide and to saue themselues, but that part of the castell was beaten downe: and then capteine Macworth recouered the possession of the whole, and did put fiftie to the sword, of which nineteene were found to be Spaniards; and six others he tooke, whereof one was a woman, which were executed in the campe. None were saued that daie but onelie the capteine Julio, whome the lord iustice kept for certeine considerations two or three daies: but in the end he was hanged as the rest were before him. The next daie, being the first of Aprill one thousand fiue hundred and fourescore, the ordinances were remoued and carted to the ship, which with all such souldiors as were sicke and hurt were sent to Limerike, to be relieued and cured. This castell, one of the principallest and chiefest forts thus recouered, there resteth onelie the house and castell of Asketten: and the lord iustice, and the earle of Ormond thought nothing more necessarie, than euen forthwith to march to Asketten, and to incampe there and to besiege it, euen as they had done to this fort of Carigofoile. Where when they came, the two lords diuided themselues, the one taking the one side, and the other taking the other side of the water: and vpon the third of Aprill they incamped at the said castell, the lord iustice lieng in the abbeie, and the earle of Ormond vpon the further side of the riuer.

Capteine Macworth, who had the ward of that daie, entred into the vtter banne by a doore that the souldiors had broken, and was maister of it presentlie.

Capteine Macworth first entreth the castell.

The castell of Carigofoile is taken.

The bragging Spaniard is taken and hanged.

1580

The castell of Asketten appointed to be besieged.

The lord iustice viewed the place, and found no waie possible to place ante watch or ward neere to the castell, by reason of the great disaduantage of the rockes which laie altogither vpon the castell. While the campe laie there, sir William Stanleie, capteine George Carew, and capteine Walker went to giue siege vnto the castell of Ballilogh an, a strong house of the Desmonds, and which was warded vntill this time against hir maiestie. The ward had no sooner the sight and view of these three ensignes, but that they fired the house and fled: but they were so narrowlie pursued, that the leader of them and some of his companie were ouertaken and slaine. Whilest the siege laie at Asketten, sir Henrie Wallop treasuror at warres came from Limerike to the campe the fourth of Aprill 1580: and the verie same night following, being a verie darke and close night, the warders of the castell fearing the example of the execution done at Carigofoile, and doubting the sequele of the lord iustice preparation made for the batterie to be laid against it, did abandon and forsake the castell verie secretlie about midnight, leauing a traine of pouder to set it on fire, which consumed & burned a great part of the same: but the principall towers remained vntouched. The warders by fauor of the darke night escaped into the woods.

Sir William Stanleie and capteine George Carew besiege the castell of Ballilogh an.

The warders forsake the castell.

The warders of Asketten forsake the castell, and by a traine set it on fire.

This castell thus recouered, the earle of Desmond had neuer a castell in all Mounster which was warded against hir maiestie: but all were now at hir deuotion. The lord iustice being possessed of Asketten, he appointed a strong garrison to reside there, and placed sir Peter Carew, and sir Henrie Wallops companie in the castell; and capteine George Carew, and capteine Hollingworth to be in the abbeie, and so vpon the fift of Aprill he dislodged with the rest of the armie, and went vnto Limerike: commanding the capteins to cut down the woods on both sides of the riuer, that the botes might passe freelie to and fro. At his comming to Limerike, all things now seeming to be at peace, the earle of Ormond returned home to Kilkennie, & certeine of the councell

The castell of Asketten is taken.

A ward placed at Asketten.

The armie is dispersed, and the garrisons are sent to their places appointed.

cell which had followed in this iourneie rode to Dublin: and sir Nicholas Malbie departed into Connagh. And notwithstanding that the most part of the armie was now dispersed into garrisons: yet the seruices of euerie of them neuer abated. For alwaies as the time of seruice required, the Irishmen were issued out vpon, and most commonlie had the worst side. And the lord iustice himselfe taking an occasion to visit the ward at Adare, he passed by water, and capteine Case went by land, and after a time spent in searching the woods, they returned with a preie of one thousand and two hundred kine, and verie good store of sheepe, besides the slaughter of manie traitors.

A commission to create sir William Burke to be baron.

At his being and during his abode in Limerike, vpon the fifteenth of Maie, he receiued his maiesties commission vnder the broad seale of England to be lord iustice (where before he held the same by the election and order of the councell) and therewith also one other commission, for creating of sir William Burke baron of castell Connall, with a pearelie pension of one hundred markes during his life. And from this time, the lord iustice spent this summer in Mounster, trauelling to and fro through out the whole prouince: he himselfe and euerie other capteine in his seuerall garrison doing such seruice vpon the rebels as by occasion was offred. The lord iustice vpon the fifteenth of June, after that he had marched a few miles in Mac Aulies countrie, spoiling, defacing, and burning the same, he passed through the boggie mounteine of Slewlougher into Kerrie, and there he discouered a great preie of the countrie; and pursuing the same, by the vaward of his horsemen, and he himselfe in person toke about two thousand kine, besides store of sheepe and garons, with part of the traitors masking apparell.

The earle of Desmond and his wife and doctor Sanders in perill to be taken.

The earle of Desmond, the countesse his wife, and doctor Sanders little thinking of this matter, escaped verie hardlie; and their priest for hast was faine to leaue his gowne behind. The like seruice he did the nert daie, being the fiue and twentith of June at Caskelmange. But at this time, a great mutinie began amongest the souldiors vnder sir George Bourchier, capteine Macworth, and capteine Dowdall, by reason of their wants: but his lordship with such lenitie and courtesie handled the matter, that they departed from him well satisfied. Likewise sir Cormac Mac Teige shiriffe of the countie of Corke did notable seruice vpon sir James of Desmond; which sir James vpon the fourth of August made a roade into Muskroie, and toke a great preie from the foresaid sir Cormac: Whereupon his brother Donnell assembleth his brothers tenants and countrie and followed the preie, and recouered the same: sir James, who thought it to be too great a dishonor and reproch to depart with anie thing which he had in hand, withstanding the matter.

A mutinie among the souldiors for lacke of victels.

Sir Cormac Mac Teige doth a peece of seruice vpon sir James of Desmond.

Whereupon they fell at hand-fight. In which conflict and fight the said Donnell behaued himselfe so valiantlie, and his companie so lustilie stucke to the matter, that the preie was recouered, and sir James himselfe mortallie wounded and taken prisoner, and all his force, being aboue a hundred and fiftie persons, were slaine and ouerthrowne. He that toke him was a smith, and seruant to sir Cormac, who forthwith handfasted him: and for auoiding of certeine inconueniences, he kept him close, and secretlie hid him in a certeine bush in the fastnesse there, and bound him so fast and sure, that he could not escape nor run awaie. And when all the companie was gone, then he toke him and carried him to sir Cormac his maister, who kept him in safe custodie, vntill, by letters of commandement from the lord iustice and councell, he did deliuer him vnto sir Wary-ham Sentleger then prouost marshall, and to capteine Raleigh; who (according to a commission in like order to them addressed) was examined, indicted, arreigned, and then vpon iudgement drawen, hanged and quartered: and his bodie being quartered, it was togither with the head set on the towne gates of the citie of Corke, and made the preie of the foules. And thus the pestilent hydra hath lost an other of his heads.

Sir James of Desmond in taking of a preie is taken prisoner and executed.

Sir James of Desmond sent to sir Warham Sentleger & to capteine Raleigh, and was executed to death.

This seruice of this knight was maruellouslie well accepted, and first from the lord iustice and councell, and then from hir maiestie he receiued verie frendlie and thankfull letters. This man was a yonger house vnto Mac Artie Reough, and they both a yonger house vnto Mac Artie More now earle of Clancar, and whose ancestors (as is said) were kings before the conquest of Mounster. They are all men of great power, and greatlie esteemed in those parties. But this sir Cormac, in dutie and obedience to hir maiestie and hir lawes, and for his affection to all Englishmen, surpasseth all his owne sept & familie, as also all the Irishrie in that land. For albeit a mere Irish gentleman can hardly digest anie Englishman or English gouernment, & whatsoeuer his outward appearance be, yet his inward affection is corrupt and naught: being not vnlike to Iupiters cat, whome though he had transformed into a beautifull ladie, and made hir a noble princesse; yet when she saw the mouse, she could not forbeare to snatch at him: and as the ape, though he be neuer so richlie attired in purple, yet he will still be an ape. This knight, after he did once yeeld himselfe to hir maiesties obedience, and had professed his loialtie, he euer desired to ioine himselfe vnto the companie of the Englishmen, and became in time a faithfull and frendlie man vnto them, liued according to hir maiesties lawes, and did so good seruice at all times when it was requisit and required, as none of that nation did euer the like. And if at anie time he were had in suspicion, he would by some kind of seruice purge & acquite himselfe, euen as he did in this present seruice in taking of sir James of Desmond, to his great praise & commendation, and to his acquitall against the reprochfull reports of his aduersaries. And sir William Fitzwilliams in the time of his deputiship, hauing had a verie good triall of his fidelitie, truth, and good seruice, did giue vnto him the order of knighthood, and made him shiriffe of the countie of Corke: euen as the lord iustice now did commend this his seruice vnto hir maiestie by his letters of the twelfe of August, a thousand fiue hundred and eightie, and praieng that the same might be so acceptablie receiued, as that the enobling of him might be both an ornament to his house, an incouraging vnto others to do the like, and a testimonie against others of his sort, who haue neglected a number of occasions (at greater aduantages) to haue done the like seruices.

Iupiters cat.

The loialtie of sir Cormac Mac Teige.

Sir Cormac Mac Teige made knight.

The death of James of Desmond, and the quartering of his bodie did maruellouslie dismaie the earle himselfe, sir John his other brother, and doctor Sanders, and all their confederats. And by reason of the continuall persecuting of the rebels, who could haue no breath nor rest to releeue themselues, but were alwaies by one garrison or other hurt and pursued; and by reason the haruest was taken from them, their cattels in great numbers preied from them, and the whole countrie spoiled and preied; the poore people, who liued onelie vpon their labors, and fed by their milch cowes, were so distressed, that they would follow after the goods which were thus taken from them, and offer themselues, their wiues, and children, rather to be slaine by the armie, than to suffer the

The miserie of the people.

the famine wherewith they were now pinched. And this great calamitie made also a diuision betweene the earle of Desmond and his brother sir John, either of them excusing that where of they were both guiltie. The earle himselfe (without rest) fleeth from place to place, and findeth small comfort, and seeing no other remedie, sent his ladie and wife vnto the lord iustice, who in great abundance of teares bewailed the miserable estate of hir husband, hir selfe, and their followers, making (with most lamentable requests) suite, that hir husband might be taken to submission.

The fute of the countesse of Desmond.

Sir John of Desmond, being in the like distresse, he togither with doctor Sanders gaue the aduenture, to passe for their refuge to the vicount Baltinglasse, then being in the countie of Kildare. The garrison which laie at Kilmallocke, making an issue out by night to doo some seruice, by chance met the said John and Sanders in the darke night: and not knowing them did set vpon them, and of foure of them they tooke two, the one being a frier named James Haie and standardbearer to the late James Fitzmoris, who vpon his examination confessed that the earle of Desmond was author of all these warres, and the other was Sanders man, who was slaine; and the frier was reserued, but sir John and the doctor by the benefit of the darknesse verie hardlie escaped, & cut off from their iournete. The lord iustice being at Newcastell, and being aduertised that the earle of Desmond and Sanders were in Kerrie, he forthwith sent for the garrisons of Adare and Asketten to come to him, and for the garrison of Kilmallocke to méet him at the place, daie, and time appointed, for a speciall pæce of seruice then to be done. Whose commandement being done and obeied, they tooke their waie into Kerrie, and there they had taken the earle, and his countesse, and doctor Sanders, had not a false brother bewraied the matter, and yet for hast they left their breakfast behind them halfe dressed. Neuertheless, they tooke two preies, the one of fiftéene and the other of eightéene kine; and the next daie they tooke another preie of two hundred kine, slue diuerse traitors, and take two friers, whose gownes were too long for them to follow the earle and the popes nuntio, they being poore bare foted friers, and he a lustie horsman: and then his lordship returned to Asketten, where he left maister Parker constable of the place; and from thense he went to Limerike, where he receiued news by maister Zouch, and after by letters from the lord Greie lord deputie, of his arriuall to Dublin. And then his lordship minding to make his spédie repaire to Dublin, did set the countrie in some good order, and by the aduise of the councell at Limerike, he appointed sir George Bourcher coronell of all Mounster, and instructions were deliuered vnto him, both for certeine speciall seruices to be done, & also for the generall gouernement of the whole prouince; & had left vnto him the charge (vnder his gouernement) of the whole forces in Mounster; which of footmen were two thousand eight hundred & twentie; and of horsemen thrée hundred fourescore and fiftéene: the whole, thrée thousand two hundred and fiftéene men. Likewise he had sent the like instructions to sir Warham Sentleger, and the erle of Clancar. And these & other like things done, he tooke his iourneie through Conaugh for the like establishing of the countrie, & came to Dublin the first daie of September, one thousand fiue hundred fourescore and one; and the next daie he deliuered vp the sword to the lord Greie, as to the lord deputie of Ireland, in saint Patrikes church in presence of the councell, noble men, and gentlemen, which were for the same purpose there assembled.

Sir John of Desmond minded to ioine with the vicount Baltinglasse.

Sir John of Desmond and doctor Sanders in flieng, were in danger to be taken.

The earle and his countesse in danger to haue béene taken.

This force is both of the princes paie, and of the lord of the prouince.

Sir George Bourcher coronell of Mounster.

And within six daies after the lord Greie his arriuall, it was giuen his lordship to vnderstand, that the vicount of Baltinglas, and Pheon macke Hugh, the chiefe of his ser of the Obzins, were lieng in the Obzins countrie, and were now of great force and strength, by meanes of the companie of capteine Fitzgirald, kinsman to the earle of Kildare, who had a band of footmen committed vnto him in the beginning of this rebellion, for the defense of the countie of Kildare, which bordereth fast by the Obzins. And he nothing regarding now, either the dutie of a subiect, or his owne credit, most traitorouslie reuolteth from his lawfull prince, and consorteth himselfe with traitors and rebels. And with these he practiseth and persuadeth to resist and make head against hir maiesties forces; because they could not (as he said) withstand or preuaile against them: who without anie reward promised, were easilie persuaded, because they would be persuaded, and were most willing to exercise anie maner of outrage. All these thus combined, drew one string, & incamped themselues in the fastnes of the Glinnes, about 20 miles from Dublin, where they kept all their goods & cattell. This fastnesse was by nature so strong as possible might be: for in it is a vallie or a combe lieng in the midle of the wood, of a great length, betweene two hils, & no other waie is there to passe through. Under foot it is boggie and soft, and full of great stones and slipperie rocks, verie hard and euill to passe through; the sides are full of great & mightie trees vpon the sides of the hils, & full of bushments and vnderwoods.

The vicount of Baltinglasse lieth in the Glinnes with the rebels.

The strength of the fastnesse in the Glinnes

The lord deputie, being not yet acquainted with the custome of the countrie, nor with the Irish seruices, and thinking himselfe in honor to be touched, and the whole armie to be discredited, if a companie of traitors should lie so nére vnto him, and not be touched nor fought withall, resolued himselfe to haue a péce of seruice to be done vpon them. Wherfore he with all his whole armie marcheth vnto the said Glinnes, & giueth order to sir William Stanleie, sir Peter Carew, sir Henrie Bagnoll, capteine Awdlete, and to John Parker, lieutenant to capteine Furse with all their footmen, and to Francis Cosbie capteine of the kerne, and George Moore an old veteran of Berwike, coronell of all the footmen, to take this seruice vpon them. But Cosbie, who had béene a long seruitor, and knew what to that kind of seruice did belong, did foresée the danger which would follow hereof, and so declared it to his companie: notwithstanding to auoid the reproches which might be laied to his charge, followed the said seruice, and vpon the next daie, being the fiue & twentith of August, they entered the Glinnes.

A seruice appointed to be done against the Obzins.

The lord deputie being accompanied with the earle of Kildare, Jaques Wingefield, capteine George Carew, capteine Denie, and others on horsebacke staied vpon the mounteine side hard by the wood. The archtraitor Fitzgirald, hauing some secret intelligence of the seruice towards, he bestoweth and placeth all his men with their pæces amongst the trées, and there couered themselues, vntill the Englishmen were entered and passed into the fastnesse, about halfe a mile or more, and could not easilie returne: and he hauing them at aduantage vpon euerie side of the hill, with great furie assaileth them with his shot, and in verie short time did kill the most part of the vaward, both captens and souldiors. The residue which followed, being in despaire to recouer what was lost, and distrusting themselues, fled at all hands, and ran backe as fast as they could in so bad a waie. And yet such was the nimblenesse of the traitors, and their skill of seruice in such places, that they were like to haue béene killed; if the lord deputie, and the horsemen had not rescued them: vpon whose comming they retired into their fastnesse.

The lord deputie staied vpon the mounteins.

The English men slaine in the Glinnes.

In this conflict, George Pore, capteine Audlete, Francis Cosbie, and sir Peter Carew coronell, were then murthered and slaughtered; which sir Peter was verie well armed, and with running in his armor, which he could not put off, he was halfe smothered, and inforced to lie downe: whome when the rebels had taken, they disarmed him, & the most part of them would haue saued him, and made request for him, they thinking that more profit would grow among them by his life than benefit by his death. Notwithstanding, one villaine most butcherlie, assone as he was disarmed, with his sword slaughtered and killed him; who in time after was also killed. Before the entrie into this seruice, Jaques Wingfield being acquainted with this kind of bold and rash hardinesse, and foreseeing the euill successe which was feared would insue, persuadeth with his two nephues, sir Peter and capteine George Carew, to state and to forbeare to aduenture into the woods. But sir Peter could not listen thereunto, nor be persuaded; but would needs go in. His brother would haue done the like, but his vncle perforce kept him, saieng; If I lose one, yet I will keepe the other: and so by that meanes he was by Gods goodnesse saued and preserued.

Sir Peter Carew slaine.

Jaques Wingfield his wisdome towards his nephues.

This blacke daie was a dolefull and a grieuous daie to the lord deputie and all his companie: notwithstanding, hoping of a hard beginning would follow a better ending toke the matter as patientlie as he could, and made his returne vnto Dublin, abiding the comming of the lord iustice; who as sone as he was returned, then the lord Greie was sworne, and had the sword deliuered vnto him. The earle of Ormond in this meane time, being verie desirous to do some seruice vpon the Spaniards, being nothing afraid of their force and multitude, marcheth towards the fort, and incampeth at Traleigh, where the scout the same night espied a light in the enimies campe, and by reason of the darke night, the companie of them seemed to be the greater: which caused the gouernor to be more watchfull and circumspect. Wherefore in the morning, like a wise and a politike capteine, setteth all his companies in battell araie, & so marcheth forwards in his strength & verie good order ouer the strand of Traleigh towards the fort, euerie man being at a full resolution to do his best seruice that day against the enimie. When these strangers had knowledge of the approching of the lord gouernor, and his companie, albeit their fort was verie strong, both by nature and by art; yet they distrusted themselues, and forsoke the fort, and by the guiding of the Irishrie, they remoued themselues from thense to Glanningell, whome the gouernor pursued, & ouertoke some of them, vpon whome he gaue the onset, and skirmished with them: diuerse of them he slue, and manie he toke, whome he caried along with him: the residue of them fled into the fastnesse of Glanningell, which is a verie strong place and couert, by reason of the great woods and of the mounteines adioining. Whereupon the daie being spent, and no seruice for that time to be done anie further, the lord gouernor incamped there that night, fast to their enimies nose, to trie him what he would, or durst do.

The earle marcheth in order of battell to the fort.

The Spaniards leaue their fort.

The earle followeth the Spaniards and putteth them to the foile.

Assone as he was incamped, he calleth the prisoners (who were taken) before him, and they confessed that they were in number, not aboue seuen hundred men: but had brought with them pikes, caliuers, munitions, and all kinds of artillerie, sufficient for fiue thousand men: because they knew that the Irishmen were of bodies sufficient, but that they lacked furniture and training; & in these two things they minded to furnish them: and further also they said, that they had sent backe two of their ships into Spaine, to aduertise that they were safelie arriued, and how that they were interteined: requesting that the suplie appointed before their comming from home, might with all speed be sent awaie, and for which they did dailie looke: because it was throughlie concluded betweene the pope and king Philip, to make a through conquest of all Ireland; and so consequentlie as time should serue, to do the like with England. And moreouer, that they had brought with them a great masse and store of monie and treasure, which according to their commission they had deliuered to the earle of Desmond, sir John his brother, & to doctor Sanders the popes nuntio; and more is promised to be sent.

The Spaniards make a shift to conueie the prisoners away.

The number of the Spaniards not aboue seuen score.

The determinations of the pope and king Philip, to make a through conquest of Ireland.

After these things thus done, it was giuen to the said gouernor to vnderstand, that the same night there were three hundred souldiors of the enimies companie returned & gone backe to the fort. Whereupon he returned also, and followed them the next morning, and came to Dingle, where he incamped as neere to the fort as he could; and there chosing to himselfe capteine Dowdall, capteine Piers, and certeine shot, he drew so neere to the fort as he had the whole discouerie and sight of the fort and companie therein, which seemed to be easie to be gotten, if he had anie shot and munitions for the same. But as neither the scholer without his booke, nor the artificer without his toles, can do anie thing in his profession: no more can the souldior fight without his meet weapons, nor serue without his necessaries: and therefore for want of things necessarie for this batterie, the lord gouernor was driuen to returne, and to leaue the fort.

The earle of Ormond incampeth at the fort.

The earle for lacke of munition could not preuaile against the fort.

The Spaniards perceiuing this, or mistrusting some other matter, made a sallie of three score men; and the gouernor seeing their aduantage, thought to follow the aduise of his capteins, and not to haue dealed at all with them. But one Andrew Martin more hastie than aduised, and more rash than wise, procured a skirmish with them, in which he was slaine; and the lord gouernor compelled of force to answer the skirmish. But it was not long, but that he sounded the retract; and being not able to annoie the enimie, nor preuaile at the fort, he returned backe againe, and by iourneies he came to Rekell: where he met the lord deputie, vnto whom he yelded vp all his companie, and his commission, and then made prouision of his men, and for victuals, to follow the said lord deputie. The lord deputie had now in his companie about eight hundred men, horsemen and footmen, vnder the leadings of capteine Zouch, capteine Walter Raleigh, capteine Denie, who had also capteine George Carews companie vnder his ensigne, capteine Macworth, capteine Achin, and others: and then he marched towards the fort where the Spaniards and Romans were setled.

The Spaniards issue out and giue a skirmish.

The lord deputie commeth to Rekell, and is there met by the earle of Ormond.

Capteine Raleigh, notwithstanding that the lord deputie had raised his campe at Rekell, and was gone towards the fort, yet he taried and staied behind, minding to practise some exploit. For it was not vnknowne vnto him, that it was a maner among the Irish kerns, that whensoeuer anie English campe was dislodged and remoued, they would after their departures come to those camps to take what they there found to be left. Thus therefore lieng, and keeping himselfe verie close, taried and abode the comming of the said kerns; who suspecting no such trap to be laid for them, came after their maners and old vsages to the said place, and there

toke

toke their pleasure; who when they were in their securitie, the capteine and his men came vpon them, and toke them all. Among them there was one, who caried and was laden with withs, which they vsed in sted of halters: and being demanded what he would do with them, and whie he caried them; gaue answer, that they were to hang vp English churls: for so they call Englishmen. Is it so (quoth the capteine) well, they shall now serue for an Irish kerne: and so commanded him to be hanged vp with one of his owne withs; the residue he handled according to their deserts.

The lord deputie marcheth to the fort, and besiegeth it.

The lord deputie incamped himselfe as neere the fort as he could. And at this present was sir William Winter also newlie returned from out of England: but he arriued at Kinsale, and his viceadmerall capteine Bingham came into the bate of saint Marie weeke or Smerewéeke, and not long after, sir William Winter himselfe followed. And by these meanes the said lord deputie was so well furnished of all things necessarie, that he at land, and sir William Winter at sea besieged the fort. But before anie assault giuen, he first summoned the fort; requiring of them who they were, what they had there to do, by whom they were sent, and whie they fortified in hir maiesties land, & required therewith to yéeld vp the fort. But they answered that they were sent some from the holie father, which had giuen that realme to king Philip; and some from king Philip, who was to receiue and recouer that land to the holie church of Rome, which by hir maiesties meanes was become schismaticall, and out of the church, with other reprochfull spéeches: and that therfore they were in that respect to kéepe what they had, and to recouer what they yet had not. Whereupon the lord deputie sent to sir William Winter, to haue conference with him, how, in what sort, and by what waies they were to worke for the dispossessing of these strangers from their fort, and how their artillerie and munitions might be best placed and laied for the batterie; and betweene whom it was then determined how all things should be done.

The fort is summoned.

The answer of the fort.

The Spaniards make a sallie vpon the Englishmen.

Whiles they were thus in spéeches, and consulting of the matter, the Spaniards thinking to take some aduantage, made a sallie vpon the Englishmen: which was forthwith answered by capteine Denie (who as then had but a dozzen shot) and by Michaell Butler lieutenant to capteine Raleigh: & these so valiantlie behaued themselues, and so worthilie followed the fight, that they made the Spaniards with more hast than with good spéed to returne againe to their fort. The same night following, sir William Winter, according to the conclusion betweene the lord deputie and him, he did cause to be vnloden certeine culuerings, and like péeces of ordinance out of hir maiesties ships, which then late in the rode of Smerewéeke, and then there being a great banke betweene the shores side and the fort, through which the ordinance were to be caried, they did in the same night cut through that banke, caried their ordinance through it, and mounted them in the place appointed, before the breake of the date, and before it was open date the batterie was readie to be giuen. A péece of seruice (the place and time considered) thought worthie great commendations. The lord deputie likewise had done the like vpon the land side, & so being on both sides in readinesse to follow the seruice, his lordship summoned them by the shot of a péece of ordinance, offering vnto them mercie if they would yéeld. But they knowing nothing what was done that night, answered as before, that they would kéepe what they had, and would increase what they could get. Whereupon they began to batter the fort on both sides, both by land and by water.

The diligent seruice of the mariners.

The fort is beset vpon the land side.

This first date of batterie was capteine Raleighs ward date. But the Spaniards made their brags, that they cared not for this; and to set a good face vpon it, some of them sallied out, and offered the skirmish, but verie faintlie and fearefullie: and so both vpon the first date, the second date, and the third date, little was done, but onelie the continuance of the batterie. The fourth date was capteine Zouches ward date, vnder whom was a lustie yong gentleman named John Cheeke, who drew so néere the fort, that he loked ouer the purport into it, which being séene and perceiued, one of the Spaniards leuelled a péece at him, & with his shot strake him in the head, wherewith he died. About the end of these foure dates, the trenches for the full batterie were drawne and brought so néere vnto the fort, that now they left to dallie anie longer with the fort, but verie hotlie and sharpelie they battered at it on both sides. The Spaniards, who had staied themselues vpon the hope of some further suplie, to come out of their countrie, and thinking of some better aid of the erle of Desmond, & of his brethren, than yet they had receiued; and séeing also the batterie to be such as they could not be able to withstand and hold out, they desired a parlée with the lord deputie, who vtterlie denied it: saieng, that his seruice was against traitors and rebels, with whom no spéeches nor parlées are allowed. And forsomuch as they (though strangers by birth) otherwise did confederat with them in such a traitorous action, they were in the like predicament with them. Then they requested that they might haue libertie to depart with bag & baggage, which also would not be granted. Then they requested that certeine particular men among themselues might haue their free passage, and certeine other conditions: but my lord refused both this, and all other conditions, requiring an absolute yéelding, or nothing at all. When they saw that they could not preuaile anie waie, then at the length they hanged out a white flag, and with one voice they all cried out Misericordia, misericordia, and offered to yéeld both themselues and the fort, without anie condition at all. Which thing when it was aduertised to his lordship, he sent capteine Jaques Wingfield maister of the ordinance to the fort, and to make triall whether this their offer were true and vnfeigned: who when he came to the fort, he was receiued in, and forthwith the capteine of the fort came vnto him, and in all humble maner yéelded himselfe to be brought, and to be presented vnto the lord deputie: and at the commandement of the said Jaques Wingfield he disarmed himselfe, and caused all his companie to do the like, and to bring all the armour in the fort into one place; and there they laied their pikes acrosse vpon the same. Which being done, the said capteine Wingfield came out of the fort, and brought the capteine with him, promising him safe conduct to the lord deputie. But by the waie, his lordship sent some to receiue him at his hands, and willed the said Jaques Wingfield to returne againe to the fort.

John Cheeke is slaine.

The fort is battered on euerie side.

The Spaniards desire a parlé.

Capteine Wingfield is sent to the fort.

In this fort sir James Fitzgirald knight, and lord of the Decies, was a prisoner by the order of the earle of Desmond, and one Plunket an Irishman, and one Englishman, which came and accompanied the traitors out of Spaine. The knight was set at libertie, but the other two were executed. When the capteine had yéelded himselfe, and the fort appointed to be surrendered, capteine Raleigh together with capteine Macworth, who had the ward of that date, entered into the castell, & made a great slaughter, manie or the most part of them being put to the sword. And when all things were cléere, the lord deputie came to the fort, and hauing done what pleased him, his lordship returned, and manie of the capteins he saued. The fort forthwith was rased, the armor and munitions were dispersed abroad, and all things done as it pleased the lord deputie, he sent the coronell and campemaister ouer into England by capteine Dente, and dismissed the armie, and sent euerie capteine to his garrison. And his lordship went from thense to Dingham, which is a long scattering waste towne, and in it foure or fiue castels, which the earle of Desmond had caused to be defaced in the beginning of this rebellion.

The prisoners in the fort deliuered.

Capteine Zouch made the gouernour of Desmond.

And here the earle of Dzmond met with the lord deputie with a new supplie of his owne men, being readie to haue followed the seruice if need had so required. In this towne the lord deputie made capteine Zouch gouernor of Kerrie and Desmond, and appointed vnto him three hundred men, and accompanied him with capteine Cash, who had one hundred men, and capteine Achin, who had fiftie horsemen, and commanded these to lie in garrison in that towne, or where they thought good. And these had to them giuen all the victuals which were found in the fort. And from hense his lordship went to Limerike, and came thither the seauen and twentith of November, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred & eightie. At which time there arriued out of England sir new bands of soldiers, vnder the leading of capteine Berklete, capteine Cruse, capteine Herd, and capteine Tanner, all which his lordship bestowed in seuerall garrisons, and in such places as were most meet for seruice; capteine Berkelie onelie of the capteins remained in Mounster, and was placed in the house of Asketten, the chefest castell of the earle of Desmond with two hundred men. The others went into Connagh, where the wicked sonnes of the earle of Clanricard were now vpon their keeping. For notwithstanding that the Spaniards were ouerthrowne, and thereby a sufficient warning was giuen to the rebels, to bethinke themselues, that if they did persist in their rebellions, the like would also insue vpon them: yet see how that the venemous Hydra had no soner lost one of hir heds, but in stéd of one, sundrie and manie others are sprong vp. For at the verie instant, the bastardlie brood of the earle Clanricard, the vicount of Baltingglasse, associated with the Obrins, Omores, and Kauenaughs in Leinster, & with sundrie others of that wicked nation, conspire, and are vp in open rebellion; and so now at this one instant, Mounster, Connagh, and a great péece of Leinster are in arms and actuall rebellion: onelie Ulster (which was wont to be the worst) is now the best and most quietest.

The earle of Dzmond is the gouernour of Mounster.

The lord deputie being at this present in Limerike, & aduertised of these troubles, setteth all things in order for the seruice in Mounster, and committed the whole gouernement of that prouince vnto the earle of Dzmond, and then he returned vnto Dubline, where he toke order for Connagh & Leinster. And about this time there arriued out of England 150 horsemen set out at the charges of the cleargie of England, vnder the leadings of William Russell sonne to the earle of Bedford, and of Brian Fitzwilliams, which were dispersed according to the seruice. The lord deputie being returned vnto Dubline, the earle of Kildare, and the baron of Deluin his sonne in law, were had in suspicion to be partakers and secret dealers in these rebellions, and thervpon were committed to ward vnder the custodie of Jaques Wingfield maister of the ordinance. Immediatlie vpon whose apprehensions, the lord Henrie Fitzgirald, sonne and heire to the said earle, and of the age about seauentéene yeares, being persuaded by his fosterfathers and followers, he fled into Dyhalia whereof he was baron, and there (as it was said) he was taken by the Oconhours, and kept against his will for his safetie, vntill they did heare further what should be become of the earle.

The earls son is kept by the Oconhours.

This thing being aduertised to the lord deputie, he coniectured that this was but a surmised and colorable kind of dealing, to bleare his lordships eies: wherefore by order and good aduise he first willed the earle to send for his sonne, who did so. But his messenger returned with an answer, that the yong lord was willing to come, but the Oconhours, who were in doubt what should be become of the earle, would in no wise suffer his sonne to depart, vnlesse they might haue good assurance for his safe returne againe vnto them. The lord deputie not liking these kind of fond excuses and disordered dealings, sent the earle of Dzmond then being in Dubline, to deale with the Oconhours, who being accompanied with sir Edmund and Piers his brethren, Nicholas White maister of the rolles, capteine George Carew, capteine Macworth, and sundrie other capteins and gentlemen, made their repaire to the borders and marches of Dyhalia; whense after much talke to no purpose, they all returned without the yong lord. Neuertheles afterwards the Oconhours when they had better considered of the matter, and had had some conference with Hussen and others the earles men, and mistrusting that some further troubles would insue, euen as the earle of Dzmond had partlie threatened them; and doubting also least the stateng of the sonne might be prejudiciall to the father; then in all hast did send the yong lord to the erle of Dzmond, who caried him to Dubline, and deliuered him to the lord deputie: and his lordship forthwith sent him to the ward, where he remained with his father, vntill they both and the baron of Deluin were sent into England, where the earle and the baron were sent to the Tower, and the yong lord committed to the custodie of the earle of Bedford. The earle died after in London, and his bodie was caried into Ireland, and there buried amongest his ancestors.

The earle of Dzmond is sent for the yong lord Fitzgirald.

The yong lord is sent to the earle of Dzmond.

The earle of Kildare and his sonne and sonne in law are sent into England.

The earle died in London.

Capteine Walter Raleigh, lieng in garrison at Corke, and nothing liking the outrages, bodrages, and villanies dailie practised by Barrie, Condon, and others vpon the good subiects and hir maiesties garrisons, whereof sundrie complaints had bene made, and small redresse had, he rode himselfe to Dubline vnto the lord deputie, and made his complaints thereof, alledging that the outrages of the Barries and his consorts were such, that vnlesse they were proclamed traitors, and with all diligence followed and pursued, the euent therof would be verie euill, to the aggreuance of good subiects, & to the incouragement of the wicked: whose insolencie and pride was growne to such a heigth, that the sword with extremitie was the onelie meane now to redresse the same.

Capteine Raleigh complaineth against the sufferance of the rebels.

The lord deputie and counsell, when they had heard and well considered this, they sent him backe againe with a commission vnto himselfe, to seize and enter vpon the castell and house of Barrie court, and all other the lands of the said Barrie: and likewise to pursue and follow him in the best maner as he thought good: and for his better seruice to be done herein, he had certeine horsemen in wages also giuen vnto him, and added vnto his ensigne of footmen: wherupon he returned. But before he was come backe to Corke, the case was altered; for the matter was so ordered and handled by such as there and then were in authoritie, and so manie delaies were vsed to hinder the good seruice purposed, that his commission auailed him verie little or nothing, for the castell of Barrie Roze was committed Capteine Raleigh hath a commission, & the inlargement of a band of horsemen to pursue the enimie.

Dauid lord Barrie burneth and spoileth his owne house.

Connagh, Leinster and Mounster, are all vp in rebellion.

The cleargies band do arriue into Ireland.

The earle of Kildare, and the baron of Deluin had in suspicion, and are committed to ward.

mitted and deliuered to the cuſtodie of the mother of the ſaid Dauid Barrie, and by hir ſet ouer vnto him hir ſonne: and who forthwith burned and defaced the ſaid caſtell being his principall houſe, as alſo waſted the whole countrie, and became more worſe and outragious than he was before. This capteine making his returne from Dublin, & the ſame well knowne vnto the ſeneſchall of Imokellie; through whoſe countrie he was to paſſe, laie in ambuſh for him to haue intraped him betweene Youghall and Corke, lieng at a ford, which the ſaid capteine muſt paſſe ouer with ſir horſſemen, and certeine kerne. The capteine little miſtruſting anie ſuch matter, had in his companie onelie two horſſemen and foure ſhot on horſſebacke, which was too ſmall a force in ſo doubtfull and dangerous times: neuertheleſſe he had a verie good guide, which was the ſeruant of John Fitzedmunds of Cloue, a good ſubiect, and this guide knew euerie corner and ſtarting hole in thoſe places.

Capteine Raleigh is laid for by the ſeneſchall.

The capteine being come towards the ford, the ſeneſchall had eſpied him alone, his companie being ſcattered behind, and verie fiercelie purſued him, and croſſed him as he was to ride ouer the water, but yet he recouered the ford and was paſſed ouer. The Iriſhman who was his guide, when he ſaw the capteine thus alone, and ſo narrowlie diſtreſſed, he ſhifted for himſelfe and fled vnto a broken caſtell faſt by, there to ſaue himſelfe. The capteine being thus ouer the water, Henrie Moile, riding alone about a bowes ſhot before the reſt of his companie, when he was in the midle of the ford, his horſſe foundred and caſt him downe; and being afraid that the ſeneſchals men would haue followed him and haue killed him, cried out to the capteine to come and to ſaue his life; who not reſpecting the danger he himſelfe was in, came vnto him, and recouered both him and his horſſe. And then Moile coueting with all haſt to leape vp, did it with ſuch haſt and vehemencie, that he quite ouer leapt the horſſe, and fell into a mire faſt by, and ſo his horſſe ran awaie, and was taken by the enimie. The capteine neuertheleſſe ſtaid ſtill, and did abide for the comming of the reſt-one of his companie, of the foure ſhot which as yet were not come forth, and for his man Jenkin, who had about two hundred pounds in monie about him, and ſat vpon his horſſe in the meane while, having his ſtaffe in one hand, and his piſtoll charged in the other hand. The ſeneſchall, who had ſo fiercelie followed him vpon ſpur, when he ſaw him to ſtand and tarrie as it were for his comming, notwithſtanding he was counted a man (as he was indeed) of great ſeruice, and having alſo a new ſupplie of twelue horſſemen and ſundrie ſhot come vnto him; yet neither he nor anie one of them, being twentie to one, durſt to giue the onſet vpon him, but onelie railed and vſed hard ſpeeches vnto him, vntill his men behind had recouered and were come vnto him, and then without anie further harme departed.

The ſeneſchal followeth capteine Raleigh.

The diſtreſſed ſtate of Henrie Moile.

The coward-neſſe of the ſeneſchall.

It happened that not long after, there was a parlee appointed betweene the lord gouernor and the rebels; at which the ſeneſchall was preſent, and ſtood much vpon his reputation. Capteine Raleigh being preſent began to charge him of his cowardneſſe before the earle of Ormond, that he being twentie of his ſide, to him alone, durſt not to incounter with him. Whereunto he gaue no anſwer. But one of his men ſtanding by, ſaid; that his maiſter was that daie a coward; but he would neuer be ſo forgetfull againe, if the like ſeruice were to be done, and in manie great terms exalted his maiſter the ſeneſchall for his valiantneſſe and ſeruice. The earle of Ormond hearing thoſe great ſpeeches, tooke the matter in hand, and offred vnto the ſeneſchall, that if he and ſir John of Deſmond there preſent, and three or foure others, the beſt they could chooſe, would appoint to meet him; capteine Raleigh, and ſuch foure others as they would bring with them, they would come to the ſame place, and paſſe ouer the great riuer vnto them, and would there two for two, foure for foure, or ſir for ſir, fight and trie the matter betweene them; but no anſwer was then giuen: whereupon the white knight was afterwards ſent vnto him with this chalenge, but the rebels refuſed it. Not long after this, there were ſpeeches made, that the earle of Ormond was to depart from this long and wearie ſeruice into England, & capteine Zouch ſhould in his place be the generall. Betweene the remouing of the one, and the placing of the other, ſir William Morgan, capteine Raleigh, and capteine Piers had a commiſſion to be gouernors of that part of Mounſter, where they ſpent all that ſummer, and laie for the moſt part at Liſmore, and in the countrie and woods thereabouts, in continuall ſeruices vpon the enimies from time to time, as occaſion and opportunitie ſerued.

The chalenge made by the earle of Ormond to the ſeneſchall.

Capteine Raleigh a commiſſioner in Mounſter.

And when the ſummer was ſpent, capteine Raleigh returned with all his band vnto Corke, being in number eight horſſemen and foure ſcore footmen. And as he paſſed through the countrie, it was auertiſed to him, that Dauid Barrie an archtraitor was at Cloue with a great troope of ſundrie hundreds of men. Whereupon he thought good to paſſe that waie through the towne of Cloue, minding to trie the valor of Dauid Barrie, if by anie meanes he might meet with him. And euen at the verie towns end he found Barrie and all his companie, and with a luſtie courage gaue the onſet vpon him. But Barrie refuſed it, and fled. And then this capteine paſſing from thenſe, in his iorneie he eſpied in a plaine neere adioining to a woods ſide, a companie of footmen by themſelues, vpon whome with ſix horſſemen he gaue the charge: but theſe being cut off from the wood whereunto they were flieng, and hauing not ſuccor now to helpe & releeue themſelues, they turned backe, & conioining themſelues togither to withſtand this force and onſet made vpon them, in which they behaued themſelues verie valiantlie, and of the horſſes they killed fiue, of which capteine Raleigh his horſſe was one, and he himſelfe in great danger, and like to haue beene ſlaine, if his truſtie ſeruant Nicholas Wright a Yorkſhire man borne had not bin. For he perceiuing that his maiſters horſſe was galled and ſtricken with a dart, and plunged ſo much, that to his ſeeming he was paſt ſeruice; the ſaid Nicholas willed and called to an Iriſhman there, whoſe name was Patrike Fagaw, that he ſhould looke to his capteine, and either to reſcue him, or to giue charge vpon the enimie. Whereupon the ſaid Fagaw reſcued his capteine, & the ſaid Nicholas Wright forthwith gaue the onſet vpon ſix of the enimies and ſlue one of them. And therewith came one James Fitzrichard an Iriſh gentleman with his kerne to the reſcue of the capteine, but his kerne was ſlaine, and himſelfe in danger. For Wright not looking on them followed the enimie verie egerlie, and recompenſed the loſſe of one with the ſlaughter of others. Which capteine Raleigh perceiuing cried out to his man, ſaieng; Wright, if thou be a man, charge aboue hand & ſaue the gentleman. Who at his maiſters commandment preſſed into the middle of the enimies, and ſlue one of them, and ſo ſaued the gentleman: and in which ſkirmiſh his horſſe leg was cut vnder him. Diuerſe footmen were ſlaine of the enimies, and two were taken priſoners, whome they carried with them to Corke.

Capteine Raleigh followeth vpon Barrie.

Capteine Raleigh in danger to be killed.

The good ſeruice of Nicholas Wright.

The lord Roch is had in suspicion, and is sent for.

Capteine Raleigh commeth to the lord Roches house.

Capteine Raleigh being receiued into the castell getteth in all his men.

The lord Roch yeeldeth to go with capteine Raleigh.

The L. Roch acquiteth himselfe.

The L. Roch and his sonnes good seruices.

Capteine Zouch putteth the earle of Desmond in danger to be taken.

At his lieng in Corke there were sundrie pèces of seruices done by him, all which doo verie well deserue to be for euer registred. And amongst all others this one point of his seruice deserueth both commendation and perpetuall remembrance. The lord Roch was growen into a suspicion that he was not sound of his lotaltie. Wherevpon capteine Raleigh by commandement was to fetch him and his ladie to Corke vnto the generall. This thing was not so priuilie determined, but that the seneschall and Dauid Barrie had knowledge thereof, and minding verelie to take the capteine at some aduantage, they had assembled a great companie of themselues to the number of seuen or eight hundred men to haue met with him either comming or going. The capteine perceiuing and forethinking how dangerous his enterprise was against so noble a man in that countrie as the lord Roch was, who was verie well beloued, commanded vpon a sudden all his men one and other, both horsemen and footmen, which in the whole were not aboue foure score and ten persons, to be in a readinesse vpon the paine of death betweene ten and eleuen of the clocke of the same night. At which time euerie man being in a readinesse, he toke his iornete and marched toward the lord Roches house called Ballie in Harch, which is about twentie miles out of Corke, and came thither somewhat earlie in the morning. At his comming he went forthwith to the castell gate.

The townsmen when they saw their lords house and castell thus suddenlie beset, they doubting the worst, did arme about fiue hundred of themselues: Wherevpon capteine Raleigh placed and bestowed his men in battell raie in the towne it selfe, & marched againe to the castell gate, with certeine of his officers and gentlemen of his band, as by name Michaell Butler, James Fulford, Nicholas Wrtte, Arthur Barlow, Henrie Swane, & Pinking Huith; and they knocked againe at the gate. And after a while there came three or foure of the said lord Roches gentlemen, & demanded the cause of their comming, vnto whome the capteine answered, that he was come to speake with my lord: which was offered he should, so that he would bring in with him but two or three of his gentlemen, which the capteine was contented with, yet in the end (but with much adoo) he came in with all these few persons before named. When the capteine was once come within the castell, and had entred into some spèeches with the lord Roch, he so handled the matter by deuises and meanes, that by little and little, and by some and some, he had gotten in within the iron doore or gate of the courtlodge all his men. And then hauing the aduantage, he commanded his men to stand and gard the said gate, that no man should passe in or out: and likewise charged euerie man to come into the hall with his pèce well prepared, with two bullets. The lord Roch when he saw this, he was suddenlie amazed & stricken at the hart with feare: but dissembling the same, he set a good face vpon the matter, and calling for meat, requested the capteine and his foresaid gentlemen to sit downe, & to kèepe him companie at dinner.

After dinner, the capteine falling into spèeches with the said lord Roch, declared plainlie vnto him the cause of his comming, and shewed that he and his wife were accused to be traitors, and that he had a commission (which he shewed vnto them) to take and carie them along with him to Corke: which he was to performe, and so would. The lord Roch alledged manie excuses for himselfe and for his wife, saieng in the end that he neither could nor would go: the capteine answered, that if they would not go with a good will, they should perforce go against their will. The lord Roch seeing that there was no remedie, he yeelded: and then the capteine minding to lose no time, willed him to command and cause all those of the towne, and all such as were about the house, to attend and be in readinesse to aid him, and to set him forth in his iornete: which he did, and verie willinglie shewed himselfe to abide and obeie the capteines commandement, saieng that he would answer the matter well inough, and discharge whatsoeuer should be laid to his charge, for he knew himselfe to be cleare. And so he made himselfe and his wife redie to take the iornete in hand, as the capteine did appoint and command: and towards night the paid set forward to Corke. But the night fell out to be verie tempestuous and foule, and therewith so darke, that no man could see hand or fot, nor yet discerne one another; and the waies also were so foiole, so full of baths, hillocks, pits, and rocks, that the souldiors thereby were maruellouslie troubled and incombred, some stumbled among the stones, some plunged into holes, and some by their often fals were not onelie hurt, but also lost their armour, and were maruellouslie spoiled: and besides that, they were among and in the middle of the enimies, who laie in sundrie ambushes, thinking verelie to haue intercepted them, and to haue set vpon them: but the darke night which was cumbersome to themselues, was a shadow to shrowd them from their enimies. And in the end, though with much trouble, they came to Corke in safetie, sauing one soldier named John Phelium, who by his often falling and stumbling among the stones and rocks, did so hurt one of his fèet that he could neuer recouer the same, but did in the end consume and rot awaie.

The capteine being come to the towne somewhat earlie in the morning, he was receiued in, and presented his prisoners to the generall, with no little admiration that he had escaped so dangerous a iornete, being verelie supposed of all men that he could neuer haue escaped. The lord Roch being brought to be examined, did so well answer for himselfe, that in the end he was acquitted, and taken for a true and a good subiect, and which in time was well tried and knowne. For not he himselfe onlie, but all his sons and followers, did attend and performe all such seruices as were laid vpon them; and in which, three of his sonnes were killed by the enimie in hir maiesties seruice.

Capteine Zouch (as is afore said) laie at the Dingham, among whose companie there fell a dangerous and an extreme sickenesse: few or none escaped it, howbeit manie died therein. And in which distresse it was aduertised him, that the earle of Desmond and Dauid Barrie was assembled at Aghado with three thousand men; and he being verie desirous to doo some seruice vpon them, drew all his full force of horsemen and footmen vnto Castelmange. And then by the aduise of his capteins Achim and Cash, he suddenlie made an onset vpon his enimies, before they wist of anie such thing, and slue a great companie of them, and draue the erle to such a push, that he in his shirt was driuen to shift for himselfe, in the middle of his gallowglasses, and by that means he escaped. The earle nothing liking this course successe, sought a better place of safetie, and remoued himselfe to Harlow wood, and passed by the waie to Kilmallocke. Which when the garrison there did vnderstand, they pursued and followed him, namelie capteine Bourchier, capteine Dowdall, capteine Pakworth, and capteine Norris, three miles togither vpon the plains betweene Kilmallocke and the wood, and slue manie of the rebels. And capteine Dowdall who was acquainted verie well with that wood, and in it had serued sundrie times, he would nèeds, and did did enter into the wood, where he met with the earle of Desmond now the second time, and gaue the onset vpon him, killed a great number of his men, toke from them their cariages, and droue awaie a great preie of kine, and brought them to Kilmallocke to the garison. Neere about this time the seneschall came to Lismore, and preied that countrie, and droue awaie their cattell. Which when the garison heard, and were aduertised thereof, they issued, and followed the preie to recouer it; but they were so incountered and skirmished withall, that they lost the preie, and fiue and twentie of their men were slaine. Diuerse skirmishes were dailie doone vpon the enimie, and manie iorneies made vpon them to their great damages and hurts.

Capteine Dowdall preieth the erle of Desmond.

The seneschall preieth the garison of Lismore.

In the moneth of August next following, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred eightie and one, the lord deputie made a iorneie into Mounster, where when he had taken an account of all their doings and seruices, he established capteine Zouch to be gouernour of all Mounster, and generall at armes; and then his lordship returned through Conagh vnto Dublin. This now new gouernor, being accompanied with capteine Raleigh and capteine Dowdall, trauelled from place to place to see all things in good order: but the certeine place of their resting was at Corke, where for the most part they laie in garison: making in the meane time sundrie iorneies, as occasion of seruice did require. And they being in Corke, newes was brought vnto the gouernour that there was a great quarell fallen out betweene Dauid Barrie and the seneschall, and that they were mortall enimies, and at a deadlie feod; and they laie both in Dunfrinnen side, not far from the blacke water. The earle of Desmond and John his brother laie in Patrike Condons countrie, being on the further side of the said water, who were verie sorie for this quarell, and would haue come vn to them, but the waters were so great they could not: yet they sent their messengers to and fro among them for some pacification, but it was to no effect. Capteine Dowdall vpon these newes sent out an Irish man which he had, and who was a notable spiall, named Richard mac James, and willed him to seeke out where the seneschall was, to the end that he might make a draught vpon him. This Richard drawing himselfe to the companies of the rebels, and lieng among them in their cabins where they laie in the woods, he fell in companie, and then entred into a great familiaritie of one which was a messenger from the Desmonds vnto the seneschall, and he thinking nothing but that this Richard was one of the said companie, began to discourse vnto him the businesse which he had there to do: and told him that the next daie following, sir John of Desmond did appoint to come thither, and to make a peace and an agreement betweene Barrie and the seneschall. When as Richard mac James had heard at full all his speeches, then he intreated him that he would go to Corke with him, which in the end the fellow was contented so to do. And in the next morning they went togither to Corke, and at their comming thither, did declare vnto capteine Dowdall the whole matter, and he forthwith aduertised the same to the gouernour: who albeit he did not altogither beleeue what was told, yet he agreed that it was best that some seruice should be doone vpon them, and concluded that himselfe and capteine Dowdall should do the same, vnder the colour that they were to make a iourneie vnto Limerike, and so they caused it to be said: for in no wise would they be knowne of that which they had determined. And hauing prepared all things necessarie for this seruice, the same night they left the charge of the garison vnto capteine Raleigh lieutenant: and themselues taking their leaue, as though they were bound for Limerike, they marched out at the gates, and by breake of the daie they came to cassell Lions, the weather being verie misie and thicke, and in the cassell they found but one poore man, who told them that Dauid of Barrie was gone but a little before them vnto Humacquilliam. The gouernour and the capteine being verie eger, and desirous to do some seruice, they followed the tract of the horsse a good prettie waie; but the capteine mistrusting that no good seruice would be doone that waie, persuaded the gouernour that he should rather enter and search the woods, which were fast by, where as he thought some good seruice would be done, whose aduise the gouernour followed: and they had ridden but a little waie, but they saw two horssemen come riding toward them, but as sone as they had seene the said gouernour and capteine, they returned backe againe.

The L. Barrie and the seneschall fall out.

Capteine Dowdall maketh a spiall vpon the seneschall.

Sir John of Desmond appointed to make a league betweén Barrie and the seneschall.

The gouernor Zouch and captein Dowdall make a secret iourneie.

Then the capteine told him that there was a bog in the wood, and his aduise and counsell was, that some of his shot should be sent to stand betweene the bog and the wood; which being done, they followed those two men so short, that they were driuen to forsake their horsses, and to run on foot towards the bog. But the lose shot being in a readinesse, did put them backe againe vpon the horssemen, who gaue the onset vpon them; and the one of them, which was sir John of Desmond they sore hurted with a horssemans staffe, that he spake verie few words after. And the other, whose name was James Fitzjohn of Strongecullie, they toke: and both they caried with them to Corke. Sir Johns head was sent to Dublin, but his bodie was hanged vp by the heeles vpon a gibbet, and set vpon the north gate of Corke. And James Fitzjohn was drawne, hanged, & quartered. And thus haue you the third head of the venemous Hydra cut off, who had his iust reward and merit, if not too too good for so villanous & bloudie a traitor: who respecting neither the honor of God, the obedience to his prince, the credit of his owne house, the faith to his friend, nor the state of the commonwealth, was wholie imbrued in bloud and villanie; and in bloud he died, and had his reward by Gods iust iudgement.

Sir John of Desmond killed, and his bodie hanged vpon a gibbet by the heels.

Not long after this, it was agreed that a draught should be made vpon Dauid Barrie, for the preis which he and Goren mac Swene had made in Carbreie, and passed with the same by Bentrie, where laie a garrison vnder the leading of capteine Apesleie: but he being deceassed, the same was committed to captein Fenton, whose lieutenant named Richard Cant, minding to crosse the preie, fell into the fight with Barrie and his companie: but he was slaine and all his companie, there being but one man the drumslager left aliue, who by swiftnesse of his bote escaped. The foresaid Apesleie was a verie proper man, a gentleman borne, and of a good house, and brought vp in learning; he could write verie well, and also deliuer his speeches verie orderlie and eloquentlie. When he grew to some ripe yeares, he fell acquainted with some lose companions, who persuaded him to accompanie them to the seas, promising him the sun and the mone, and all the wealth in the world. And he being sone intised and persuaded, was contented, and went to the seas, and became as bad as the baddest; whereof great troubles insued, and he at length was driuen to leaue the seas, and to wander a long time on the seacoasts in the prouince of Mounster: where by occasion he fell to come to acquaintance of the earle of Desmond, with whome he found such fauor, that no Englishman could do more with him than he he could. Afterwards, when the narrow searching for him was quailed and forgotten, he fell to be acquainted with the good Henrie Dauels, whome he found rather a father than a friend vnto him: and then his behauiour was such, that he grew to be in good fauour with all Englishmen, and in the end put in trust to doo sundrie seruices in Mounster, and was become and made a capteine, in which office he discharged himselfe verie honestlie and faithfullie. The gouernor continuing still in one and the same mind, to doo some seruice vpon Barrie, who then late in Dunfrennin, he togither with capteine Dowdall marched to Barries campe, and earlie in the morning (they being vnlooked for) entred into the campe and there made a great slaughter vpon Barries men, but Barrie himselfe was gone and fled. After this time, the said Barrie considered his distressed case, and how continuallie he was pursued and followed by the gouernour and the English garisons, whose force he saw that he could by no means auoid, but that at one time or other they would take him at some aduantage. He maketh humble petition to the gouernour that he might be vnder his protection, and to liue thenceforth in some dutifull and restfull order; which he in the end did obteine.

The gouernor and capteine Dowdall spoile and enter into Barries campe and kill his men.

Barrie sueth for a protection

The lord deputie, thinking that by the death of John of Desmond, and the silence of the earle his brother, who what was become of him no man could tell, but supposed that he was fled beyond the seas, or that he was dead, and that all things were well and in quiet in all Mounster; he thought good to ease hir maiesties charge, and so cashed sundrie bands and discharged sundrie garisons, leauing for the seruice of Mounster in the whole but 400 footmen & 50 horsemen, of which, 200 were vnder the leading of the gouernor, one hundred vnder capteine Dowdall, and one hundred vnder Sir George Bourcher; and the first horsemen were vnder capteine Achin, who late in garrison at Adare in Kerrie. When all things (I saie) seemed to be at rest and in peace, and all things well, behold a new stirre (and vnlooked for) is now raised; for Fitzmoris baron of Lerna, who had hitherto dissembled the matter, and pretended to haue beene a dutifull subiect, when he saw the weakenesse of the Englishmen, & how that the garisons were discharged, & therefore the few men left were scarse able well to saue and keepe themselues, much lesse to hurt others: he breaketh out into open rebellion, and ioineth with him his wicked, traitorous, and periured sonne. This baron of Lerna his first ancestors were seruants to the barons of Carew, and of Odzon, and lords of Lerna, and had the chiefe rule and gouernment vnder him of all his countrie in Mounster, which was verie great and large: his eldest sonne he kept in the court of England. And this Fitzmoris, who by the authoritie vnder his master was growen into great credit in the countrie, and standing in hope to haue their friendship and assistance in all his businesse, watched his time, and killed the lord Carew his maister, at a table which yet remaineth in the house, and entred into all his baronie of Lerna & his other possessions in Mounster, euen as the like was done by the Kauenaghs in Odzon in Leinster. And the heire of Carew in England, who had great and large possessions in Deuon and in sundrie shires elsewhere in England, made the lesse and little account of his lands in Ireland, and so by little and little they lost all their lands in Ireland.

The L. deputie calleth sundrie bands in Mounster.

Fitzmoris baron of Lerna breaketh into open rebellion.

The cause of this his breaking out, some do impute it to the hard dealing of the gouernor, who so narowlie watched him, that he alwais took from him what he had, and so intercepted him from his prouision, that he had nothing left to eat.

Fitzmoris seruant to Carew lord of Lerna killeth his maister.

This new baron of Lerna, the first thing that he toke in hand, was to cleanse and to rid his owne countrie from all Englishmen and their garisons; and in the end, taking capteine Achin at an aduantage, slue him, and recouered the ward of Adare. After that, he went to the ward kept in the castell of Lesconile, in which were but eight Englishmen, and the castell being verie hard to be gained, he vsed this stratagem. He laid verie close & secretlie a companie of his men in an old house fast by the castell, & then he practised with an old woman, which was wont euerie morning to bring a great basket of coles or turfe into the ward, that as soone as she was betweene the two gates of the castell, she should let fall hir basket and crie out: which she did. For when she was come to the castell, and had after hir accustomable maner called to the ward, one of them came and losed the vtter iron doore, and then he did open the inner doore for hir to come in. When she was come betweene the two doores, she let fall hir great basket of coles and cried out. The companie forthwith lieng in the said old house came, and the ward being not able to draw vnto them the vtter iron doore, nor to shut fast the inner doore, the enimie entred, toke the castell, killed all the ward, and cast them ouer the wals. The good successe of this stratagem caused him to practise & to put in vre other like deuises for the regaining of the castell (as I remember) of Adnagh. For he supposing that hungrie soldiors would be contented to accept anie courtesie, he procured a yong harlot, who was somewhat snowtfaire, to go to the castell, pretending some iniurie to haue beene done to hir, and to humble hirselfe to the capteins deuotion, being supposed, that he by these meanes would fall into the liking and fantasieng of hir, and so would reteine hir. And by these meanes, she by hir cunning handling of the matter, according vnto the plot before contriued betweene Fitzmoris and hir, she should at one time or other find the occasion or opportunitie to betraie the castell. The capteine receiued hir into the castell, and not forgetting the late former practise at Lesconile, caused him to be the more warie and circumspect, and to loke vnto himselfe. Where vpon he so handled the matter with this harlot, that he in the end found out all the deuise, and forthwith he carried hir vp vnto the top of the castell and cast hir ouer the wals, where with the fall she was crushed and died. Fitzmoris being disappointed of his purpose, departed from thense, and ranged ouer all the countries of Tipperarie, Dzmond, and Waterford, where were no garisons to resist him, and there plaied his parts.

The baron of Lerna destroieth all the English in his countrie, and taketh the queenes forts.

A stratagem vsed in taking the castell of Lesconile.

A stratagem at Adnagh.

The gouernor, who late at Corke, being aduertised of these outrages, called his companie togither, which (as is before said, was not aboue foure hundred persons) and other reported (but vntrulie) to be about foure thousand: yet minding not to suffer an iniurie, marched with such companie as he had into Clanmoris, which is the said Fitzmoris countrie, and distant from Corke about three daies iourneie. The baron by his espials being aduertised of their comming, forsoke his castell at Adar, and defaced his castell at Lerna, and drew his goods, and all his forces into the wood of Lesconile. When the gouernor was come to Adsre, he found the towne burnt, and the few Englishmen (which were in the abbeie) greatlie distressed. From thense he went to Lesconile, which is ten miles further, where he discouered the baron and all his companie, which then late in a plaine bottome in the said wood, hauing then in his companie of gallowglasses, kerne, shot, and horsemen, about seuen hundred men.

The gouernor marcheth from Corke to Clanmoris to incounter with Fitzmoris.

The gouernor taking aduise what was best to be done, because that place was full of fastnesse, and no passage for anie horsemen, but all rested vpon the seruice of the foot men; they diuided their companie. And capteine Dowdall being verie desirous to aduenture the seruice vpon him, he had six score footmen appointed and deliuered vnto him, and the residue

Capteine Dowdall encountereth vpon Fitzmoris, and giueth him the foile,

The baron of Lerna fleeth into the hils of Slough-lougher.

one he reserued to himselfe. The capteine entred into the wood, and followed vntill he came into the plains where Fitzmoris was; who hauing a great companie, and the capteine but (as it were) a handfull to his, he diuided his whole companie into foure parts, thinking to haue inclosed the capteine, and to haue his will vpon them. The capteine perceiued it, and forthwith brake vpon one of the companies, and had such a hand vpon them, that he slue a number of them. Which when Fitzmoris saw, like a valiant man turned his backe and fled awaie into the mountains of Sloughlougher, and left all his goods behind; which the capteine tooke, and also all the cattell there, and brought the same to the gouernor. From thense they marched to the castell of Glan, of which Oliuer Stephanson had the ward and keeping: and there newes was brought vnto him, that the lord deputie had sent vnto him two bands of footmen, of which one hundred were sir Henrie Wallops, and the other capteine Norris. Whereupon he trauelled vnto Limerike, and left the whole charge of Clanmoris, and of Kerrie vnto capteine Dowdall. And the said capteine being put to weet that the baron was incamped at Glanflish with two hundred and fortie gallowglasses, two hundred kerne, foure score shot, and thirtie horsemen, and he himselfe hauing then but the lieutenant Wingfield in his companie, made a sallie vpon them, and killed with the sword, and draue into the riuer aboue seuen score of them, and recouered a preie of eight hundred kine, flue hundred horses and mares, besides a great number of sheepe and gotes: and in the taking of the baron, he found store of monie and plate, and mailing garments. And from hense he marched with his cattell, and incamped besides Alough, neere vnto the earle of Clancar his house, and from thense to Castellmange, and so to Adare, and furnished as he went euerie ward and garison with store of vittels, and with the goods he rewarded his souldiors. From this time, the baron Fitzmoris hauing lost all his possession & store, was neuer able to recouer himselfe, neither to credit nor to wealth, nor yet to hold vp his head, but was forsaken of all his frends and followers: and being ashamed of himselfe, and of his bad and disloiall trecheries, walked and wandred abroad as a forlorne man, not knowing what to do, whither to go, or where to seeke for succor and helpe.

A supplie of two hundred men sent to the gouernor.

Capteine Dowdall setteth vpon Fitzmoris in Glanflish and giueth him the ouerthrow.

The baron Fitzmoris with a few is ouerthrowne to his vtter fall, and forsaken of all his frends.

The baron being distressed of all helps, seeketh to the earle of Ormond for a protection.

At length being wearie of himselfe, and of his distressed miseries, bethinketh vpon the earle of Ormond, whome notwithstanding that without cause he had verie much iniured, hauing most outragiouslie preied his countries, burned his villages, and killed his people: yet he maketh his recourse vnto his lordship, acknowledgeth his fault, confesseth his follies; and being most sorie for the same, desireth his lordship to pardon and remit him, and most humblie requested him to haue vnder him a protecon. This honorable man, notwithstanding the great iniuries done vnto him, and he of a great courage and stomach, and of a noble mind, and loth to put vp so great iniuries, yet (as it is attributed to the lion, Parcere prostratis) when he had shewed the great greefes of the said Fitzmoris, he forgat all his owne wrongs, and granted him his request. Capteine Dowdall, leauing the gouernors souldiors and companie at Adare, vnder the leading of capteine Smith, he marcheth towards Corke, where he rested and laie in garrison. Now when all these broils were ended, and verelie supposed that all things had beene at rest, and the whole prouince of Mounster at peace; behold the earle of Desmond, who was thought to be either dead or fled, beginneth to appeare, and to shew himselfe; and hauing assembled a great companie, came to Adare, where the garrison issued out

The courtesie of the earle of Ormond.

The earle of Desmond thought to be dead doth now shew himselfe.

vpon him: betweene whom the fight was hot, and manie slaine on both sides. Among whom, Smith sergeant of the band, and Morgan the lieutenant were both slaine: but yet the English souldiors recouered the abbeie. About this time one Thomas Birne lieutenant to the notable archtraitor Fitzgirald, being wearie of the wicked actions which hitherto he had followed among the rebels, sent his messenger to capteine George Carew, requesting him to deale with the lord deputie for his pardon, and for so manie of his companie as would ioine with and accompanie him in a peece of seruice to be done: which he promised to recompense with the price of his capteins head, which he would in a bag present to his lordship, as also would kill so manie of his companie as would not consent with him thereunto.

The fight at Adare.

A draught made to kill Fitzgirald.

When this deuise was readie to be practised, the clearke of the band, who was one of the confederats, verie trecherouslie did discouer the same vnto Fitzgirald, who immediatlie tooke and hanged his lieutenant, the sergeant of his band (who was an Englishman) and so manie of the souldiors as were of that confederacie. Not long after, Fitzgirald bethinking vpon the extreame miseries, which in this rebellion he had indured, and the small hope which he had to preuaile in these his bad, and traitorous actions, but chiefflie being afraid of his owne life, least at one time or other he should be slaine by his souldiors: he sent a messenger to the then lord iustices, requiring his pardon, and which he would redeeme with the head of his best frend, and fellow in armes Pheon mac Hugh, the verie gall of all the wars and rebellion in Leinster.

Fitzgirald executed to death so manie as conspired against him.

Fitzgirald practiseth the death of Pheō mac Hugh.

This was not so couertlie done, but that Pheon mac Hugh had knowledge of the practise, and he forthwith intreated Fitzgirald in the like manner as he before had done with the lieutenant, and so hanged him vp. The lord deputie after long sute for his reuocation, receiued his maiesties letters for the same, and then he sent for capteine Zouch gouernor of Mounster to come to Dubline: and in the end of August 1582, after that he had serued full two yeres he deliuered vp the sword vnto the archbishop of Dubline then lord chancellor, and to sir Henrie Wallop then treasuror at armes, and tooke shipping; hauing with him capteine Zouch, who was after slaine by one of his most familiar acquaintance, and sundrie other gentlemen. The said lord Greie was a man of great nobilitie, and of as honourable and ancient descent, one that feareth God in true religion, and dutifull to his maiestie in all obedience. And albeit he had deserued well of that Irish nation, and had sowed the good seeds of notable seruices, as well for his martiall seruices, as for his ciuill gouernment; yet he reped (as his predecessors before him) but darnell and cockle. For they had among them not onelie conspired his death, for which some paid deerelie; but made also sundrie complaints against him, to which he answered to his commendation and acquittall, and to their reproch for their ingratitude.

Fitzgirald is hanged for his conspiracie.

The lord Greie yeeldeth vp the sword & returneth into England.

1582

The lord chancellor and sir Henrie Wallop are lord iustices.

These two lords iustices being fallen into a broken time, the warres being not ended, the people not quieted, and the gouernement not staied nor setled; yet they both ioining their wisedoms, seruices, and good wils, were so blessed therein, that by them that land was reduced to some perfection and quietnesse. For not long after they had taken the sword in hand doctor Sanders the popes nuncio and legat, who came from that holie see of Rome, the sea of all wickednesse, with James Fitzmoris in Julie in the yeare of our Lord one thousand flue hundred seuentie and nine, to beare arms in this land against his maiestie, after that he had wandered vp and downe

thre

thrée yeares togither with the earle and his brethren sir John, in woods and bogs, and had liued with them a most miserable and wretched life, and had béene partaker of their most cruell bloudsheds, outrages, murthers, and robberies, a life good and too good for a traitor and a rebell. He fell sicke of an Irish ague and of the bloudie flix, and laie in the wood of Cienneliffe, which is a wood full of allers, withies, briers, & thornes, and through which is no passage; where partlie of his sicknesse, but chéefelie for famine and want he died. Euen in this filthie place, that most miserable wretch and traitor was lodged and died, bequeathing his treasons, treacheries, and disloialties against his soueregne mistresse and ladie hir maiestie vnto the pope, reseruing the punishment to the Lord himselfe, who is a swift and iust iudge vpon all traitors and disobedient persons, and his bodie (as some saie) was deuoured vp of wolues, but (as some doo thinke) that so much as was left was buried at Clancarne, not farre off from the place where he died.

The death of doctor Sanders.

The two lords iustices being entred into this broken gouernement, did what they could to kéepe the same in peace; and vnderstanding the wilfull disposition of Desmond, they did vse all the means and waies they could to pacifie him; but so farre was he imbrued and poisoned with the venom of treason and rebellion, that no reason, no dutie, nor anie other respect could persuade him to be a loiall and dutifull subiect. Wherefore he continued still in his old accustomed spoiling and wasting the countries, and trusting to no house nor castell, did throwd himselfe in woods and bogs, and in the winter following he kept his Christmasse in the wood of Kilquieg néere to Kilmallocke. And about the fourth of Januarie then following, one John Welsh a valiant and a good souldior, was resolued to make a draught vpon the said earle, and he made acquainted therewith capteine Dowdall, capteine Bangor, and George Thorington prouost marshall of Mounster, all which laie then in garrison in Kilmallocke, and according to the order betweene them then agréed vpon, they marched in the night time to the place and wood where the earle laie.

The earle of Desmond kéepeth his Christmas in the woods.

A draught made vpon the earle by John Welsh.

But being come thither, they were to passe ouer a great riuer, before they could come to enter into the wood of Kilquieg, & by reason of the great raines then falling, it was impossible for man or horsse to passe ouer the same, which thing John Welsh did before mistrust. Wherefore the night before, he went thither verie closelie, with such few persons as he had chosen for the purpose: and there he caused a number of flakes and hurdels to be made of halson, allers, and withie rods, which he caused to be drawne ouer the riuer by one, whom he had there of purpose which could swim verie well. And this fellow when he had fastened some of the hurdels to a tree in the further side of the water, and then by a rope drew ouer the residue one after another, did so fasten and tie one vnto another, and so cunninglie handled the matter, that when the captains came, they passed ouer the riuer verie well without danger or perill. And so from thense the said Welsh did guide and bring them by the breake of the daie vnto the earles cabin: but the wood was so full of thickets, and so mirie, that they were faine to go a speares length wide from the cabin to come vnto it. The earle hearing a great noise, and suspecting some extraordinarie and a greater companie to be in place more than his owne, and doubting the worst, ran out of his bed in his shirt, and ran into the riuer fast by his cabin, and there hid himselfe close vnder a banke hard vp to his chin, by which meanes he escaped and his wife with him. The souldiors made diligent search for him both by searching of the riuer and of the wood, but could not find him; whereupon they did put to the sword so manie as they found there, and carried awaie the goods with them, and so returned to Kilmallocke.

A deuise how to passe ouer a great riuer.

The earle escapeth verie hardlie.

At this time the seneschall secretlie with all the force which he could make, came vnto the towne of Youghall, & entred into the end of the same towne. Whereupon the alarum was raised, and forthwith Caluerleigh being lieutenant to capteine Morgan, hauing all his souldiors togither, of which he had forte shot, went vnto that end of the towne where the seneschall scaled the wals, & there he made a sconse, or a little bulworke, and by that meanes saued the towne, and draue the seneschall from his purpose, and killed aboue fiftie of his men: and so being disappointed of his purpose he departed awaie. In the end of this moneth of Januarie the earle of Ormond arriued from out of England to Waterford with a new supplie of foure hundred men, whome he diuided and committed vnto the seuerall leadings of sir George Bourcher, sir William Stanleie, capteine Edward Berkleie, and capteine Roberts. And being now lord generall by hir maiesties appointment ouer all Mounster, and hauing obteined an augmentation of two pence by the daie for euerie souldiors wages, he assembleth all the souldiors and euerie capteine which had anie charge, and take order with euerie of them for such seruices as were to be done, furnisheth them with vittels, munitions, monie, and all things necessarie and meet for them, requesting euerie one of them to shew themselues like good and valiant souldiors, in the pursuing of the rebels, and vanquishing of the enimies: and such grace and loue he found among the souldiors, that he was no more desirous than they most glad and willing to performe the same. Such a good affection euerie one did beare to this honorable man.

The seneschall assaulteth & entreth into Youghall and hath the repulse.

The earle of Ormond arriueth to Waterford and is generall of Mounster.

The loue of the capteins and souldiors to the earle of Ormond.

At this time aduertisement was giuen vnto his lordship, that the earle of Desmond was incamped in the fastnesse of Harlo wood with a great number of rakehels & rebels. His lordship mustered all his companies, and minding to doo some seruice vpon the said rebels, marcheth towards the said fastnesse of Harlo wood. And being come thither, he diuideth his companies into foure parts, and they entered into foure seuerall places of the wood at one instant: and by that meanes they scowred the wood throughout, in killing as manie as they tooke, but the residue fled into the mounteins. The rebels being thus narrowlie followed and pursued, they neuer after met togither in the like companies, nor assembled themselues in such great numbers: but the most part of them, which were the chiefest followers and greatest frends vnto Desmond, as Fitzmorts of Lerna before named, the seneschall, the lord Barrie, Condon, Donnell mac Knought, & sundrie others, some and some came awaie, and sought for protection. And albeit their manifold and infinit outrages, murthers, bloudsheds and spoiles, had deserued a thousand deaths: yet his lordship considering their repentance, sorrows, and humble submissions, and respecting more hir maiesties godlie disposition to mercie than their deserts, did (for the most part) grant vnto euerie of them their requests. The souldiors after this péece of seruice were dispersed abroad into their seuerall garrisons. And albeit the greater parts of the rebels were some by sword, and some by protection abated, and much decreased, yet none of them laie altogither idle, but did follow the seruice as time and occasion offered. For the earle himselfe, though he were thus vnfeathered of his greatest helps, yet he was one & the same man, a most ranke traitor and rebell: and therefore vpon him

The lord generall scowreth Harlo wood.

Desmond is forsaken of all his followers and friends.

him dailie were draughts and pursutes made, and neuer left, vntill in the end he came vnto confusion.

In the moneth of August, in the yeare of Christ one thousand fiue hundred eightie and three, it was aduertised to the garrisons in Kilmalloche and Cashell, that the erle of Desmond was come againe to harborough himselfe in Harlo wood, and had aboue three score gallowglasses besides kerne a great number, vpon whom captein Dowdall hauing good espials, made a iorneie thither, and being entred into the wood verie earlie, laie close all the forenoone. For these gallowglasses had bin so dared from time to time, that now like a sort of dære they laie vpon their kéepings; and so fearfull they were, that they would not tarrie in anie one place anie long time, but where they did dresse their meat, thense they would remoue, and eat it in another place, and from thense go vnto another place to lie. In the nights they would watch, in the forenoones they would be vpon the hilles and mounteins, to descrie the countrie, and in the afternoone they would slæpe. The capteine breaking time with them, made staie in the wood accordinglie, and in the afternoone he learned by his espials, that they were returned from the mounteins, and were entred into their cabins, where some of them were aslæpe, and some of them occupied in dressing of a horsse for to eat, for other vittels were scant. The capteine suddenlie entred vpon them, and toke them at such aduantage, that they were all, for the most part, put to the sword: of which, fiue and twentie were taken in their cabins. After the dispatch of these gallowglasses, which are counted the best men of warre among the Irishrie: the residue of the Irish rebels were so dismaid, that a man might without anie great danger passe throughout Mounster.

A draught made vpon the gallowglasses in Harlo wood.

The gallowglasses in Harlo wood put to sword.

About a moneth after this, in September, in the yeare one thousand fiue hundred foure score & three, it hapned that certeine of the lord Roches men, being in Dowall nére to Trusham, were riding about certeine businesse, and met with the earle of Desmond, hauing in his companie two or three horsemen and a prest. The kerns which attended the said lord Roches men, inuironed & compassed them about; but the earle and his men being well horsed, escaped, onelie the prest they toke, by reason of his bad horsse, and him the lord Roch sent the nert date vnto the lord gouernour, and being examined, he confessed in what great distresse and miserie the erle was, and that for feare he lurked in corners, & would not be séene. And further, that he had his onelie relése and was fostered by Gozon mac Swene, a capteine of the gallowglasses, and who was then vnder protection. And by these meanes, the erle (who had not béene heard of since he was garred out of Harlo wood) is now discouered. Whereupon the lord generall commanded a barke to be forthwith vittelled, and to be dispatched into Dingle a Cush: and forthwith commanded capteine Dowdall to repaire thither, and there to lie in garison; which he did forthwith performe. The earle of Desmond when he heard how that he was discouered, and how that vittels and a garison were sent to Dingle a Cush to the working of his woe; he was assured that he should be surelie pursued by capteine Dowdall, who of all other capteines and sir George Bourchier did from time to time gall and most earnestlie pursue him. Wherefore now as for his last helpe, by the helpe and friendship of Gozon mac Swene, & Moile Morough mac Swene his brother, he gathereth a new companie, and maketh himselfe as strong as he can, and getteth himselfe into Desmond, and there standeth vpon his gard. Gozon mac Swene in the meane time entreth into Carberie, and taketh a great preie of kine, which he droue forthwith into Desmond toward the earle, but the iorneie was so long, that he laie short of the earle that night about three or foure miles.

The L. Roch his men discouer Desmond.

Desmond feareth Dowdall.

Gozon preith all Carberie for Desmond.

The men of the countrie, who had thus lost their goods, three of them with their swords and targets followed the tract a far off, minding to haue stollen awaie their owne kine if by anie means they could, and if opportunitie would so serue; for by force or by intreatie they knew it to be impossible for them to recouer anie thing at all. The foresaid Gozon, when he had lodged himselfe for all night, it was his pleasure to walke abrode in the fields; and suspecting no harme, went alone, hauing onelie one kerne with him (and both without weapon) about ten or twelue score off from his lodging. About which place it happned the foresaid three men had hidden and couched themselues in a bush, and taking the occasion offered, they went also betwéene him and his lodging, and fell vpon him and his kerne, & killed them both: and as soone as they had cut off their heads, they shifted for themselues. Gozons companie, finding their maister lacking, went abrode to séeke him, and in the end found him and his man without heads, lieng dead vpon the ground; which cast them into such a maze, as they wist not what to thinke or to doo: neither could they imagine nor deuise how this should come to passe: for garison there was none in those parts, and they knew of no person thereabouts whome they could suspect. But this is the iust iudgement of God, who in his iustice loketh vpon the periured and wicked, and in mercie beholdeth his seruants. For if this man had liued, it was feared that by his means the earle would haue increased a new force, and haue dighted the lord gouernour and all the garisons to greater troubles. The erle being aduertised of the losse of this his friend, his chéefe and onelie staie, was in a great agonie, and maruellouslie dismaid; and séeing no other remedie, he prepareth the best for himselfe, and taking the aduantage of the time, before the garison should be placed at the Dingle, he made a draught into Kerrie nére Traleigh, minding to take a preie from such as had forsaken him and had receiued their protections. Wherfore in the euening he sent two horsemen with a certeine kerne ouer the strand of Traleigh vnto a castell there, & commanded them to take their preie from thense, which they did, and brought the same awaie with them.

Gozon mac Swene is killed.

The erle commandeth preie to be taken in Kerrie.

Among those kine thus driuen awaie, a poore woman of that countrie lost all those few that she had, and being distressed of that which was the chæfe, and in a maner the onelie releése of hir and hir children and houshold; and not knowing how she could by anie meanes recouer them: she bethought hir selfe vpon a brother which she had, dwelling on the other side of the mounteine, in a castell named Drome, which was one of the Worrettos; and to him she runneth in all the hast she could, and declareth hir estate and case, praieng him to helpe hir, and that he would follow the tract for the recouerie of hir kine. Who when he was aduertised that there were but two horsemen & a few kerne which had drouen the preie awaie, he to pleasure his sister toke three other of his brethren, and followed the tract, till he came to Castelmange, which castell was in the waie. And when he came thither, he went to the castell, and desired the constable (whose name was Chelton, and not long before lieutenant to capteine Berkeleie) that he would spare him some shot and a few of his kerne to helpe him to follow the preie which was driuen that waie. The constable and the soldiors were verie glad to pleasure him, and so he had seuen shot and a dozzen of kerne which dwelled in an out house fast vnder

der the caſtell, & ſo they went altogither to Traleigh, they being in number three and twentie perſons; one of theſe was an Iriſh man borne, named Kollie, but ſerued alwaies vnder Engliſhmen, and could ſpeake verie good Engliſh. This man, when they came to Traleigh, they appointed & made him their leader or capteine; and Moretto becauſe he was borne in thoſe parties, and beſt knew the countrie, they appointed to be their guide: and from thenſe they followed the trac vntill they came to the ſide of a mounteine, where there was a glan, and in it a little groue of wood: and the night being come vpon them, there they ſtaid and reſted themſelues for that night. And in the darke night one of them had eſpied through the trées a fire not farre off, whereupon they drew themſelues cloſe together, and cauſed one of themſelues cloſelie and ſecretlie to draw towards the fire and to diſcouer what companie was there, and how manie was of them; which man did ſo. And when he returned backe vnto them, he told them that there was an old bad houſe, and about fiue or ſix perſons therein: whereupon they all determined and agreed to repaire to that place to knowe the whole matter. Moretto was the guide to bring them to the houſe, and Kollie did ſet his companie in order and good araie, as was moſt for their ſeruice, if need ſhould ſo require. And when they were come to the houſe, they found in it but onelie one old man, for the reſidue were gone. Then Kollie drew his ſword and ſtrake the old man, with which blow he had almoſt cut off one of his arms; and then he ſtrake him againe, and gaue him a great blow on the ſide of his head; wherwith the ſaid old man cried out, deſiring them to ſaue his life, for he was earle of Deſmond, and then Kollie ſtated his hands: but the erle bled ſo faſt, that he ſhared verie faint, and could not trauell anie further: whereupon the ſaid Kollie bid and willed him to prepare himſelfe to die; and then he ſtrake off the earls head.

The earle of Deſmond taken in an old houſe alone and ſlaine.

The reſidue of the companie in this meane time ſpoiled and rifled the houſe, and toke what them liſted: and then they all departed and went to Caſtelmange, and carried the earles head with them, but left the bodie behind; and whether the ſame were deuoured by the woolues or buried by his kerne, it is not certeinlie knowne. As ſoone as they came to Caſtelmange, they ſent the ſaid earles head vnto the lord generall, who forthwith ſent the ſame into England for a preſent to hir maieſtie; which forthwith was put vpon a pole, and ſet on London bridge. When this his death was noiſed and knowne, there was no more ſeruice to be done: for euerie rebell caſt awaie his weapon, and ſought all the waies they could to humble themſelues and to become good ſubiects: ſauing one John Bourke, who ſtood vpon his protection, and yet neuertheleſſe he and his companie went to Adare, there to haue taken a preie. But as he paſſed by the caſtell, a boie therein diſcharged his pece vpon the ſaid Bourke, & ſtrake him in the head, whereof he died. The common people, who had felt the great ſmart of this troubleſome time, reioiſed and were glad of the death of the erle, being in a good hope that the long troubles ſhould haue an end, and they to be the more at reſt. During theſe continuall troubles in Mounſter, the two lord iuſtices which laie at Dublin were much eaſed from all martiall affaires elſewhere, and were troubled but with the clamorings, exclamations, and brabling of the Iriſh people, not worth the remembring: ſauing that a certeine combat was fought and tried before them in the caſtell of Dublin, betweene two Oconhours, verie neere cooſens & kinſmen: the one was named Teig mac Guill Patrike Oconhour appellant; the other was named Con mac Cormake Oconhour defendant. One of theſe appealed and charged the other for ſundrie treaſons in the late rebellion, and which could haue no other triall but by combat, which was granted vnto them. Whereupon, according to the lawes and orders of England for a combat to be tried, all things were prepared, the date, time, and place appointed; and according to the ſame, the lord iuſtices, the iudges, and the councellors came and ſat in the place appointed for the ſame, euerie man in his degree and calling. And then the court was called, and the appellant or plaintife was brought in before the face of the court, being ſtriped into his ſhirt, hauing onlie his ſword and target (which were the weapons appointed) and when he had done his reuerence and dutie to the lord iuſtices and to the court, he was brought to a ſtoole ſet in the one of the ends within the liſts, and there ſat. After him was the defendant brought in, in the like maner and order, and with the like weapons: and when he had done his dutie and reuerence to the lord iuſtices and to the court, he was brought to his chaire placed in the other end of the liſts. Then were their actions and pleadings openlie read, and then the appellant was demanded whether he would auerre his demand or not: who when he had affirmed that he would, the partie defendant was likewiſe aſked whether he would confeſſe the action, or ſtand to the triall of the ſame: who did anſwer as did the other, that he would auerre it by the ſword.

The maner of the combat.

A combat betweene two Oconhours.

Upon this their ſeuerall anſwers, they were ſeuerallie called the one after the other, euerie of them taking a corporall oth that their quarell was true, and that they would iuſtifie the ſame both with ſword & blod. Thus they being ſworneare brought backe againe euerie of them to their ſeuerall places as before. And then when by the ſound of a trumpet a ſigne was giuen vnto them when they ſhould enter into the fight; they aroſe out of their ſeats, and met each one the other in the middle within the liſts, and there with the weapons aſſigned vnto them, they fought: in which fight the appellant did preuaile, and he not onlie did diſarme the defendant, but alſo with the ſword of the ſaid defendant did cut off his head, and vpon the point of the ſame ſword did preſent it to the lord iuſtices, and ſo with the victorie of his enimie he was acquitted. Thus much I thought good to ſaie ſomwhat of much, of the maner of a combat, which together with manie circumſtances therevnto belonging is now for want of vſe almoſt cleane forgotten, and yet verie neceſſarie to be knowne. And as for this combat it was ſo valiantlie done, that a great manie did wiſh that it had rather fallen vpon the whole ſer of the Oconhours, than vpon theſe two gentlemen.

The earle of Deſmonds head ſent into England and put vpon London bridge.

John Bourke having a protection, made a ſtealth, and was killed.

The vicount of Baltinglaſſe dieth of his life.

The vicount of Baltinglaſſe, being aduertiſed of the death of the earle of Deſmond, which was no ſmall griefe vnto him, and he alſo verie wearie of his trotting and wandering on foot amongſt bogs, woods, and deſert places (being altogither diſtreſſed, and in great miſerie, and nowdeſtitute of all his friends and acquaintances, and not able to hold head anie longer againſt hir maieſties force) did imbarke himſelfe for Spaine, in hope to haue ſome releefe and ſuccor, and to procure ſome aid from the king of Spaine; and by that meanes to be of ſome abilitie to renew his force and rebellion. But he found in the end verie ſmall comfort. And therefore of a verie melancholie greefe & ſorrow of mind, as it is thought, he died, being in verie extreame pouertie and need. Not long after this, the two lord iuſtices, who had ruled and gouerned the land in theſe troubleſome and broken times in great wiſdome, care, & circumſpection, when they had brought

The vicount Baltinglaſſe imbarketh himſelfe for Spaine.

the

the whole land to a peaceable & quiet gouernment, and deliuered the same from all open or knowne rebellion; they cashed and discharged all the garrisons in Mounster, onelie two hundred souldiors excepted: they kept it in good quietnesse, vntill the arriuall of sir John Perot knight, who was sent ouer to be lord deputie, and landed at Dublin about the middle of June, one thousand fiue hundred fourescore and foure, the six and twentith yeare of his maiesties reigne vnto whome they deliuered the sword: who being entered into his office, begun such a course, that of his good beginnings a great hope was conceiued of the like to insue. For he was a right worthie seruitor in that land, when he was lord president in Mounster: and by whome James Fitzmoris was subdued, and the whole prouince maruellouslie well reformed: whose notable and most noble acts as they do well deserue, so when the same shall come to his full measure, they shall be registred to his perpetuall fame and immortall honor. And yet in the meane time, it shall not be offensiue to remember some speciall points of his late seruice, which do deserue to be remembred: as also for the incouraging of this noble man to continue the good course which he hath begun; which do halson and giue a hope that he will Addere colophonem, and bring that land to a full and perfect gouernment & regiment; which Giraldus Cambrensis would not warrant could be done much before domesdaie.

Sir John Perot arriueth into Ireland to be lord deputie.

The Scots rebell and are subdued.

Not long after the arriuall of this man, the Scots after their accustomed maner, for a bien venu or welcome to his lordship, they began a rebellion, and are vp in armes readie for the warre. His lordship hauing notice and knowledge thereof, maketh himselfe forthwith in a readinesse to meete with them, and to stop them of their purpose: and therein he so ordered and handled the matter, that the Scots were driuen to seeke peace, to craue pardon, to submit themselues, and to sweare allegiance, faith, and obedience to his maiestie. Which when they had obteined, then they toke the lands wherein they dwelled, of his highnesse, yeelding a yearelie rent, which before they had not beene accustomed nor wont to doe. And by these meanes, if there be any truth in them, the state of that countrie standeth the better assured.

Then when he was from this seruice returned to Dublin, his speciall care, studie, and indeuor was to deuise and studie how to reduce and reforme the whole realme and the gouernment, according to the laws of England. Wherevpon he would and did verie often assemble the whole councell, or so manie of them as were there, for their aduise herein; whose names are these. The archbishop of Dublin lord chancellor, the earle of Ormond lord treasurer, the primat of Armagh, the bishop of Meth, the bishop of Kilmore, sir John Moris lord president of Mounster, sir Henrie Wallop treasurer at armes, sir Nicholas Bagnoll knight marshall, Robert Gardner chiefe iustice of the bench, sir Robert Dillon knight chiefe iustice of the common pleas, sir Lucas Dillon knight chiefe baron, sir Nicholas White knight master of the rols, sir Richard Bingham knight chiefe commissioner in Connagh, sir Henrie Cowlete knight, sir Edward Waterhouse knight, sir Thomas le Strange knight, Edward Brabesbie, Geffreie Fenton secretarie, sir Warham Sentleger & sir Valentine Browne knights; but discontinued. By the good aduise, helpe, and councell of these wise and prudent councellors, he first thought it best to bring the whole land into shire grounds, whereby the laws of England might haue a through course and passage. Wherefore, what sir Henrie Sidneie before had done in a few counties, that he performed in the whole realme, and brought the same into such & so manie seuerall counties, as was thought best and most fit for that purpose. To euerie of which new counties he appointed and assigned seuerall shiriffes, and all such inferior officers as were most requisit, and to the same incident and apperteining. All and euerie which shires hitherto not registred, nor published in chronicle, togither with such as before were knowne, I thought it good to set downe by their seuerall names, and in their prouinces as followeth.

The councell in Ireland.

The whole realme brought into shire grounds.

The shires in Ireland.

- Counties in Mounster.
  - Limerike, Corke, Kerrie, Tipporaria, Crosse, Waterford — Old counties.
  - Desmond — New countie.
- Counties in Vlster.
  - Louth, Downe, Antrim — Old counties.
  - Monahon, Tiron, Armagh, Colrane, Donergall, Farmanagh, Cauon — New counties.
- Counties in Leinster.
  - Dublin, Wexford, Catherlogh, Kilkennie, Kildare, Kings countie, Queenes countie, Meth & West-Meth, Longefford — Old counties.
  - Wickelow, Fernes — New counties.
- Counties in Connagh.
  - Clare, Letrimme — Old counties.
  - Gallowaie, Rosecomin, Maio, Sligo — New counties.

When he had performed this, and established the same by act of parlement, then his maiesties writs and processe had a free passage, and were currant through out the whole land, and his maiestie knowne to be souereigne ladie and queene of the same. Then the Irishrie by little and little gaue ouer their Brehon laws, and their Irish vsage, and became obedient vnto the English laws; vnto which they referred themselues to be tried, and to haue all their quarels to be decided and determined: whereof at these presents is extant a verie notable president & example betweene two of the most principall and chiefe personages in the prouince of Vlster. The one is he, who nameth himselfe Onele, and the other is the earle of Tiron, the heire to the great Con Onele. These two and their ancestors, and all other noble men in that prouince, when so euer anie discord or enimitie did fall out among them, they had no peacemaker but the sword, and by wars and bloudshed was the same decided. Neuertheless, these two noble men leauing to pursue their quarels, as in times past with the sword & in hostile maner, do refer themselues to the triall of the laws; and each one of them sueth the other at the common laws, and in the chancerie in his maiesties court

English lawes currant through Ireland.

Onele and the earle of Tiron sue each one the other at law.

at Dublin, and there as dutifull subiects do abide the triall of their cause. A thing so much the more to be considered, as the parties be of that nobilitie and stoutnesse; and a thing so rare, as heretofore not heard nor knowne. Which course if it haue so happie a progresse and successe, as it hath a good enterance and beginning; no doubt, but that partlie by the lawes, and partlie by the sword, an vniuersall obedience shall through that land be established, the common societie shall be preserued, the whole realme shall flourish and prosper, hir maiestie shall be obeied, the reuenues shall be increased; and in the end, peace shall be vpon Israell. And as this example giueth some manifest good hope thereof, so the same is confirmed and increased by the happie victorie of late in Connagh; where a number of Scots, hauing made an inuasion, were met and incountered withall, by the right worthie sir Richard Bingham knight, chiefe commissioner of that prouince, and by him they were vanquished & ouerthrowne, to the number of fiftéene hundred persons; so that verie few or none escaped the sword, to returne home with the newes of their successe: but were either killed or drowned.

Sir Richard Bingham his victorie vpon the Scots.

Thus much hitherto generallie concerning the gouernment of that land of Ireland, since the death of king Henrie the eight, vntill these presents. In the course of which time, manie more notable things haue béene done, worthie to be registred in the chronicles of perpetuall fame and memorie. For the atteining to the knowledge whereof, though Iohn Hooker the writer hereof haue béene a diligent traueller and a searcher for the same; yet he wanted that good successe, as both the historie it selfe requireth, and he himselfe wisheth. And yet the most part of all the actions in that age consisted most in continuall warres, rebellions, and hostilitie, either against their most sacred kings and quéenes, or amongst themselues. But whatsoeuer before hath béene done, none were so tragicall, impious, and vnnaturall, as were the last warres of the Giraldines of Desmond in Mounster. For of the Giraldines of Kildare, who were not acquainted, nor consenting to these wicked actions, nothing is meant. Whereinto who so listeth to looke, and well to consider, he shall find and sée most euident and apparant examples of Gods iustice & iudgement, against such as do rebell against the Lords annointed; whome the Lord by his expresse word hath commanded to be honored and obeied in all humblenesse and dutie: because they are his vicars, substitutes, and vicegerents vpon the earth, to defend the good, and to punish the euill; and who so resisteth them, do resist his ordinances, and shall receiue hard iudgement, as most manifestlie it doth appeare in this the earle of Desmonds rebellion. All which if it should be set downe particularlie, as in course it fell out, it would be verie tedious: but much more lamentable and dolefull to be read.

And therefore leauing the large discourse, it shall suffice to shut and conclude this historie, with the briefe recitall of the most spectall points, to moue euerie man to consider the mightie hand of God against traitors and rebels; and his louing mercie and kindnesse vpon the dutifull and obedient. First therefore James Fitzmoris, the first ringleader in this pageant, and who most vnnaturallie had flocked in strangers and forreiners to inuade the land, for establishing the antichristian religion, and the depriuing of hir maiestie from hir imperiall crowne of the realme of Ireland: this man (I saie) was he who yelded the first fruits of this rebellion. For in his idolatrous pilgrimage to the holie crosse, and his traitorous iourneie to practise with all the rebels and inhabitants in Connagh and Vlster to ioine with him, he did commit a robberie; and being pursued for the same, he was slaine by a gentleman, and one of his owne kinsmen Theobald Burke, and his head & quarters set vpon the gates of the towne of Kilmallocke.

When James of Desmond brother to the earle, hauing done a robberie vpon sir Cormac mac Teige, was likewise taken and caried to Corke, where he was drawne, hanged, and quartered; and his head and quarters set vpon the gates and wals of the citie of Corke. After him, sir John of Desmond, one other brother to the said earle, who was a speciall champion of the pope, from whom he had receiued manie blessings, buls, and Agnos dei, which should kéepe and preserue him from all harme: yet for all this his holie cote armour, he was met withall by capteine Zouch and capteine Dowdall, and by them he receiued his iust reward of a bloudie traitor, and a frendkiller; being killed and then caried dead to Corke, where his bodie was hanged by the héeles, and his head sent to Dublin, and there set vpon the top of the castle. And in the end, the earle himselfe was also taken, and with the sword the head was diuided from the bodie: the one was sent to London, and there set vpon London bridge; and his bodie vncerteine whether it were buried or deuoured by the wild beasts. And thus a noble race and ancient familie, descended from out of the loines of princes, is now for treasons and rebellions vtterlie extinguished and ouerthrowne; onelie one sonne of the said earles is left, and yet prisoner in the Tower of London. The two doctors, Allen & Sanders, who were the holie fathers legats and nuncios, and in their foolish fantasies dreamed that they had the Holie ghost at commandement, and yet most errant traitors against the lords annointed: the one of them lifting vp his sword against hir sacred maiestie, vnder the popes banner at Mounster, one thousand fiue hundred threescore and ninetéene, was slaine and killed: the other after that he had followed the héeles of the Desmonds almost foure yeares, wandering to, and fro in the woods & bogs, died most miserablie in the wood of Cleneles, in such diseases as famine and penurie vse to bring. The Romans and Spaniards, and the strangers which were sent from the pope and king Philip, with all their consorts and companies, verie few left of them to returne home, and to carie newes of their successe; but were all put to the sword. And as for the great companies of souldiors, gallowglasses, kerne, & the common people, who followed this rebellion, the numbers of them are infinit, whose bloods the earth dranke vp, and whose carcases the foules of the aire and the rauening beasts of the féeld did consume and deuoure. After this followed an extreme famine: and such as whom the sword did not destroie, the same did consume, and eat out; verie few or none remaining aliue, sauing such as dwelled in cities and townes, and such as were fled ouer into England: and yet the store in the townes was verie far spent, and they in distresse, albeit nothing like in comparison to them who liued at large. For they were not onelie driuen to eat horsses, dogs and dead carions; but also did deuoure the carcases of dead men, whereof there be sundrie examples: namelie one in the countie of Corke, where when a malefactor was executed to death, and his bodie left vpon the gallows, certeine poore people secretlie came, tooke him downe, and did eat him. Likewise in the baie of Smerewéeke, or saint Marie wéeke, the place which was first seasoned with this rebellion, there happened a ship to be there lost through foule weather, and all the men being drowned, were there cast on land.

James Desmond taken in a roberie, hanged, drawne, & quartered.

Sir John of Desmond slaine, and his bodie hanged by the héeles.

The earle of Desmond slaine, and his head sent to London, and set vpon London bridge.

Allen and Sanders died, the one with the sword, the other of famine.

All strangers slaine.

After the warres followed a famine.

A man hanged was eaten.

Men drowned and eaten.

The

The common people, who had a long time liued on limpets, ozewads, and such shelfish as they could find, and which were now spent; as sone as they saw these dead bodies, they toke them vp, and most græ-dilie did eat and deuoure them: and not long after, death and famine did eat and consume them. The land it selfe, which before those wars was populous, well inhabited, and rich in all the good blessings of God, being plentious of cozne, full of cattell, well stozed with fish and sundzie other good commodities, is now become wast and barren, yéelding no fruits, the pastures no cattell, the fields no cozne, the aire no birds, the seas (though full of fish) yet to them yéelding nothing. Finallie, euerie waie the curse of God was so great, and the land so barren both of man and beast, that whosoeuer did trauell from the one end vnto the other of all Mounster, euen from Waterford to the head of Smerewicke, which is about six score miles, he should not met anie man, woman, oz child, sauing in townes and cities; noz yet sée anie beast, but the verie wolues, the foxes, and other like rauening beasts: manie of them laie dead being famished, and the residue gone elsewhere. A heauie, but a iust iudgement of God vpon such a Pharoicall and stifnecked people, who by no persuasions, no counsels, and no reasons, would be reclamed and reduced to serue God in true religion, and to obeie their most lawfull prince in dutifull obedience; but made choise of a wicked idoll, the god Mazim to honoz, and of that wicked antichzist of Rome to obeie, vnto the vtter ouerthzow of themselues and of their posteritie. This is the goodnesse that commeth from that great citie vpon the seuen hils, and that mightie Babylon, the mother of all wickednesse & abhominations vpon the earth. These be the fruits which come from that holie father, maister pope, the sonne of sathan, and the man of sinne, and the enimie vnto the crosse of Christ, whose blodthirstinesse will neuer be quenched, but in the blod of the saints, and the seruants of God; and whose rauening guts be neuer satisfied, but with the death of such as do serue the Lozd in all godlines, & who will not be dzunke in the cup of his foznications: as it doth appere by the infinit & most hozrible massacres, and blodie persecutions, which he dailie exerciseth throughout all christian lands. Which bicause he can not perfozme also within the realmes of England & Ireland, what practises hath he made by inchantments, sozceries, witchcrafts, & treasons to bereaue hir maiestie of hir life? What deuises hath he vsed to raise vp hir owne subiects to rebellions and commotions, to supplant hir of hir rotall estate and gouernment? What practises hath he vsed with fozren pzinces and potentats, to séeke occasions of bzeaches of peace and raisings of warres? And how craftilie hath he subozned his vnholie & traitozous Iesuits, vnder colour of holines, to range from place to place thzough hir maiesties realmes, and to moue and persuade hir people from dutifull obedience vnto hir highnesse, and to denie hir supzeme authozitie and gouernment? Finallie, how doth he from time to time like a rauening wolfe séeke the deuouring of hir, and of all hir good subiects, which liue in the feare of God, and in the religion established vpon his holie wozd and gospell? Whereof hath insued the losse of infinit thousands of people, as wherof manie apparant examples are set downe and recozded in the histozies of England; but of them all, none mozе lamentable than is this histozie of Ireland, and especiallie this tragedie of Mounster. In which it doth appeare, how that foz the maintenance of the popes quarels, the earth hath dzunke vp the blond, the fouls of the aire haue pzeied, and the beasts of the field haue deuoured the carcases of infinit multitudes & numbers of people. Which if euerie man would well loke into and consider, the vngodlie shall sée the great iudgements of God, and his seuere iustice against all such as shall dishonoz his holie name; and against such as shall rebell and resist against his annointed: that thereby they may repent, amend their liues, and be conuerted vnto the Lozd, both in true religion towards him, and in all dutifull obedience to his annointed. And the good and godlie shall sée, and thereby consider the great good mercies shewed vpon them, in that he hath and continuallie doth pzeserue and kéepe them from out of the iawes of the lion in all safetie, that they should dailie mozе and mozе grow from grace to grace, and liue in all holinesse and vertue towards him, and persist in all dutifull obedience vnto hir maiestie our souereigne ladie and quæne; whose daies the Lozd God continue and pzolong to reigne ouer vs to his good will and pleasure: and so shall we hir people sée good daies, liue in securitie, and the peace of Israell shall be vpon vs.

The fruits which come from the pope.

The wicked practises of the pope.

Thus farre the chronicles of Ireland, continued by Iohn Hooker alias Vowell, Gent.

To the Right worshipfull Maister Thomas Secford Esquire and Maister of the Requests, William Harison wisheth all knowledge of God, with dailie increase of his gifts at this present, and in the world to come life euerlasting.

HAuing by your singular curtesie receiued great help in my description of the riuers & streames of Britaine, and by conference of my trauell with the platforms of those few shires of England which are by your infinite charges alredie finished (as the rest shall be in time by Gods helpe, for the inestimable benefit of such as inhabit this Iland) not a little polished those rough courses of diuers waters not exactly before time described by Leland our countrieman, or any ancient writer, I could not deuise any thing more agreeable with mine abilitie and your good nature (which greatlie fauoureth any thing that is doone for a commoditie vnto many) than to shew some token of my thankefulnesse for these your manifold kindnesses, by the dedication of my simple translation of the description of Scotland at this time vnto your worship.

Indeed the trauell taken heerein is not great, bicause I tie not my translation vnto his letter, neither the treatise of it selfe such, as taketh vp any huge roome in the volume of this chronicle. But such as it is, and whatsoeuer it is, I yeeld it wholie vnto you, as a testimonie of my good will, which detesteth vtterlie to receiue any benefit, though it be neuer so small, and not to be thankfull for it. Certes my vocation is such, as calleth me to a farre other kind of studie, so that I exercise these things onlie for recreation sake, & to saie the truth, it is much vnsitting for him that professeth Diuinitie, to applie his time any otherwise vnto contemplation of ciuill histories. And this is the cause wherfore I haue chosen rather, on-lie with the losse of three or foure daies to translate Hector out of the Scotish (a toong verie like vnto ours) than with more expense of time to deuise a new, or follow the Latine copie, which is far more large and copious. How excellentlie if you consider the art, Boetius hath penned it, and the rest of his historie in Latine, the skilfull are not ignorant: but how profitablie and compendiouslie Iohn Bellenden archdeacon of Murrey his interpretor hath turned him from the Latine into the Scotish toong, there are verie few Englishmen that know, bicause we want the books.

Wherefore sith the learned read him in his owne stile, and his countrimen in their naturall language, why should not we borow his description, and read the same in English likewise, sith the knoledge therof may redound to the great benefit of so manie as read or heare the same? Accept therefore (right worshipfull) this my simple offer, and although I assure my selfe, your naturall inclination to be such, as that it will take nothing in ill part that is well meant toward you, how rudelie soeuer it be handled in the doing, yet I will not let to craue pardon for my presumption, in that I dare be so bold as to offer such a trifle to you, whom more weightie affaires doo dailie call from things of so small importance.

Almightie God keepe your worship from time to time in his feare, and blesse you and my good ladie your wife with such increase of his benefits, as may most redound to his glorie, & your own aduantage.

The contents of the chapters conteined in this booke.

1 OF the bounds of Albion, with the ſundrie commodities thereof, and of the great infirmities that fall vnto the people there for their intemperancie: and finallie of the religion vſed there in old time.

2 The deſcription of the eaſt, weſt, and middle borders of Scotland, with the moſt notable townes and flouds thereof.

3 The deſcription of Gallowaie, Kile, Carricke, and Cunningham, with the notable townes, lakes, and riuers in the ſame.

4 The ſituation of Renfrew, Cliddeſdale, Lennox, Lowmund, Argile, Loughquaber, Lorne and Kentire, with all the notable things conteined in the ſame.

5 Of Roſſe, Stranauerne, and Murrey land, with ſuch lakes and riuers as are to bee touched there.

6 Of Boene, Anze, Buquhane, Mar, Mernes, Fiffe & Angus, with the lakes, flouds, abbeis, townes, and other notable commodities there to be ſeene and found.

7 Of Louthian, Striuelin, Menteith, Calidon wood, Bowgewall, Gareoth, with the notable cities, caſtels and flouds thereof.

8 Of the great plentie of hares, harts, and other wild beaſts in Scotland, alſo of the ſtrange nature of ſundrie Scotiſh dogs, and of the nature of ſalmon.

9 Of ſundrie kinds of muskles and cockles in Scotland, and pearles gotten in the ſame. Of vncouth and ſtrange fiſh there to be ſeene, and of the nature of the herbe Citiſus, commonlie called Hadder.

10 Of the Iles of Scotland, and ſuch notable things as are to be found in them.

11 Of the nature of their Claike geeſe, and diuerſe maner of their procreation, and of the Ile of Thule.

12 The deſcription of Orkeney, and Shetland, with other ſundrie ſmall Iles, and of the maners and conditions of the people dwelling in the ſame.

13 Of the maners of the Scots in theſe daies, and their compariſon with the behauiour of the old and ſuch as liued long ſince within this Iland.

14 The deſcription of an ancient Pict, and ſuch as dwelled beyond the wall of Hadrian.

15 Of biſhoprikes, vniuerſities, and counties in Scotland.

The authors out of whome this hiſtorie of Scotland hath beene gathered.

Hector Boetius.
Iohannes Ferrarius Pedemontanus.
Iohannes Maior.
Iohannes Fourdon.
Rogerus Houeden.
Richardus Southwell.
Wilhelmus Paruus, ſiue Neoburgenſis.
Albertus Crantz.
Aeneas Syluius.
Edward Hall.
Richard Grafton.
Iohn Stow: and others.

The description of Scotland, written at the first by Hector Boetius in Latine, and afterward translated into the Scotish speech by John Bellenden archdeacon of Murrey, and now finallie into English by W. H.

The bounds of Albion with the sundrie commodities thereof, and of the great infirmities that fall vnto the people there for their intemperancie, and finallie of the religion vsed there in old time.

The first Chapter.

THe Ile of Albion conteineth in the whole circumference, 2 M. miles, hauing in length 700, & in breadth 300, as appeereth well by the coast therof that doth lie ouer against France where it is broadest, and from whence it gathereth narrower and narrower, till it come to the vtter marches & last bounds of England and Scotland. For betwixt the Mule of Gallowaie that is on the west side ouer against the Irish seas, and saint Ebbes head, that lieth vpon the Germane ocean toward the east, are scarselie 130 miles, and thencefoorth it groweth smaller and smaller till it touch vpon the north seas, where it is not aboue thirtie miles, as I noted before in the description of Britaine.

This Ile is replenished with people, horsses, and all other kind of cattell and corne in most abundant maner, except it be in such places where as God of his singular goodnesse hath otherwise indued the soile with rich mines of gold, siluer, tin, brasse, copper, and quicksiluer, which for the most part are so plentifull, that they suffice not onlie for the necessaries of the whole Iland, but also of sundrie regions that are situated round about it, if the inhabitants were skilfull and painefull to deale withall accordinglie. But the abundance of all other things requisite for the vse of man, that is found generallie in our Iland, maketh the people lesse carefull of these commodities, and more giuen to idlenesse. For beside the great plentie of those things which heauen and earth do minister, as grasse, corne and cattell, foules of sundrie kinds, there is such store of fish in all parties of our seas, especiallie towards the north, that the same would suffice to feed and sustein all the people of the Iland, if there were none other commodities to be found within the same.

For the inhabitants of all countries that border vpon vs, as France, Flanders, Zealand, Holland, and a great part of Germanie (especiallie those which lie neere vnto the coast) do saile hither with great numbers of vessels dailie to fish vpon our coasts, and buy such as we haue alreadie caught, not onlie for their owne vse, but also for the Lenton prouision of such nations as lie vpon the Leuant seas, where they sell the same at their owne wils, with very speedie vtterance. Manie other rich and pretious commodities are to be gotten in the said Ile, whereof the aforenamed nations do make no small account, beside these common things. What shall I sais of our wooles, which are in so high estimation in all lands, bicause of their necessarie vses, and whereof a great part is so fine and soft, that of it are made the costlie skarlets, pliant gloues, and manie other grained and delicate clothes, of which I thought good to make this mention, bicause the report thereof is not yet made common and generallie knowne to all men.

Dionysius Alexandrinus saith that the wool of Britaine is often spun so fine that it is in manner comparable to the spiders draught.

Certes this I dare boldlie affirme, that if the kingdoms of Britaine had such grace giuen them from aboue, as that they might once liue in vnitie, or by any meanes be brought vnder the subiection of one prince, they should yer long feele such a sauour in this amitie, that they would not onelie liue franklie of their own, without any forren purchase of things, but also resist all outward inuasion, with small trauell and lesse dammage. For as touching their persons, and likewise their notable wits, apt both for the atteining of learning and knowledge of handicrafts, they are inferiour to no other nation. Thereunto we find them to be couragious and hardie, offering themselues often vnto the vttermost perils with great assurance, so that a man may pronounce nothing to be ouerhard or past their power to performe, if they would giue themselues to liue temperatelie, and follow their predecessors in moderation of diet.

Therefore it is (as I thinke) that almightie God in his prouident disposition of all things, hath ordeined their grounds (otherwise plentifullie indued with all kinds of commodities) to be destitute and void of wine; as foreseeing that the said liquor, which bringeth greatest benefit vnto other countries, would grow in the end to be most pernicious & noisome to them.

them. For they are giuen to such vnnaturall rauening and greedie desire of forreine things (whilest they contemne or not regard their owne) that they cannot refraine the immoderate vse of wine, and excesse vsed in drinking of the same: insomuch that we may see diuerse to be ouertaken and haunted, not onelie with sundrie kinds of grieuous maladies common to vs and them of the maine, but also manie other which they haue not, neither be anie thing at all acquainted with, as experience dailie teacheth.

Some by long sicknesse and languishing griefes do grow into such deformitie onelie through excessiue feeding, and greedie abuse of wine, that if you knew them when they were children & yong men, you shall hardlie remember them when they be old and aged: and that which more is, in comparison of other that liue more soberlie, you will hardlie thinke them to be borne in the Ile, but rather suppose them to be changelings and monsters, brought out of other countries to gaze and looke vpon: diuerse of them through the continuall vse of wine are molested in their age, with phrenetticall pangs and passions. Seldome also shall you see those that are giuen much vnto wine and such welfare, to become parents of manie children, sith their naturall moisture and generatiue force is much abated, if not altogither extinguished by such immoderate diet.

But to returne to our purpose, the Albanes or Britains, as Cæsar in his commentaries, and Tacitus in his annales do report, were very religious, after the maner of religion vsed in old time. For in those daies the priests of Britaine named Druides, were expert both in naturall and morall philosophie, and from thence came the first professors of that sect and opinion into France. The principall seat of their priests was in the Ile of Man, which was reputed at that season for the welspring and fountaine of all learning and knowledge, and after that their priests were once conuerted to the catholike faith, they perseuered in the same with great constancie, without anie note of heresie.

The description of the east, west, and middle borders of Scotland, with the most notable townes and flouds thereof.

The second Chapter.

THe Picts had sometimes the principall and most fertile part of that countrie, which now is vnder the regiment of the Scots, and after they had continued in the same by the space of 1171 yeares, ioined in maner in perpetuall league with the Scots, and mainteining mutuallie the warres sometimes with the Britains and Romans, and somtimes also iarring with their Scotish neighbours, at the last they fell into extreme hatred one of another, till it was brought to passe by the diuine prouidence, that the said Picts were ouerthrowne, their name extinguished, and the kingdome vnited vnto that other of the Scots for euermore. After this time furthermore, although the Scots haue béene verie oftentimes assailed with most dangerous and terrible wars, and oftentimes inuaded by enimies from diuers regions, yet such hath beene the fauour of almightie God towards them, that still they flourish and reteine their estate inuiolate.

What soeuer we haue generallie spoken of Albion, that is chieflie to be vnderstood of the Scots, and farre greater, especiallie among the Scots, as they call them in the high land, as people that haue lesse to do with forreine merchants, and therefore are lesse delicate, and not so much corrupted with strange blood and aliance. Hereby in like sort it commeth to passe, that they are more hard of constitution of bodie, to beare off the cold blasts, to watch better, and abstaine long, whervnto also it appeareth that they are bold, nimble, and thereto more skilfull in the warres. As for their faith and promise, they hold it with great constancie, as Hector hath set downe. Towards the Almaine sea, I find, that Scotland hath the Mers, sometime the most plentious region of the Picts for their march, which so long as the said people did inhabit it, was called Deera, or Dere; but after their expulsion, it was named Mers, that is to say, the marches or limits of their countrie. In processe of time also the Scots extended their bounds euen vnto the Twéed, which now diuideth Northumberland from the Mers.

On the other side of the countrie towards the west, sundrie small bournes descend from the Cheriot hilles, and other mounteines lieng thereabout into the Solue, diuiding Cumberland from Annandale, and so being brought into one chanell, they fall togither into the Irish ocean, & stand for the bounds of Scotland vpon that halfe of the countrie. The Cheriot hilles are in like sort taken for the middle marches of the region, which with certeine small brookes that fall from the same, do separate both the countries, whereby their limits are knowne. The Mers hath vnder marches at seuerall places (whither it is extended) as sometime the Germane sea, sometime east Louthian, sometime the Twéed, and sometime the Forth, and among manie strong holds and castels, that stand vpon the borders, is the towne and castell of Barwike in time past called Ordolucium, as the inhabitants are called Ordoluci (if Hector be not deceiued.)

The Twéed springeth out from a meane head, and after his augmentation with other small waters that fall into the same, it descendeth with a large course into the Almaine sea. Beyond the Twéed, to the middle march vnder the Cheriot hilles lieth Teuidale, that is to say, the vale of Tiffe: beyond it is Eskedale, or the vale of Eske, of a riuer so called that runneth through the same: ouer against Eskedale on the other side lieth Eusdale, so named of the riuer Eus that passeth thereby, and falleth into the water of Annand: but Tif and Eske do run into the Twéed: furthermore, on the west side ouer against the Irish sea, lieth Annandale, wherevnto the Annand water giueth denomination, which marcheth sometimes without the bounds of Middesdale, where all the three riuers aforesaid, that is to say, Eus, Annand and Sulway descend togither in one bottome into the Irish seas.

In Annandale is a loch or lake named Lochmaben, fiue miles in length and foure in bredth, not onlie verie full of fish, but of such kind as few men are acquainted with. Beside this lake also there is a castell of the same name, builded of purpose to restreine the furious dealing of théeues which do great hurt in those quarters. For not onlie in Annandale, but in all the dales or vales afore rehearsed, are manie strong théeues, which often spoile the countrie, and exercise much cruell slaughter vpon such as inhabit there, in anie troublous time. These robbers (because the English do border vpon their drie marches, and are their perpetuall enimies) do often make forceable rodes into the English bounds, for their better maintenance and sustentation, or else they pilfer priuilie from them, as men leading in the meane season a poore beggerlie and verie miserable life. In the time of peace also, they are so inured to theft and rapine, that they cannot leaue off to steale at home: and notwithstanding that they be often verie sore handled therefore, yet they thinke it praiseworthie to molest their aduersarie, as they call the truer sort, whereby it commeth to passe, that manie rich and fertile places of Scotland lie wast and void of culture for feare of their inuasion.

they

Not far from the Sulwaie (a water where great plentie of fish is to be had) are manie quicke-sands, and those so perilous that no man may well go ouer the same, but with great difficultie and danger of his life. This vale of Annand was sometime called Ordouicia, and the people thereof Ordouices, whose ancient barbarousnesse is reported to be such, that in times past they refused not to kill and eate such prisoners as had yelded themselues vnto them. The verie women in like sort would slea their husbands, if at anie time they fled from the field, and returned to their houses, onelie to giue occasion vnto other men to stand to their tacklings at euerie such aduenture. On the west borders and also toward the north lieth Niddesdale, so called of the water of Nidde. It beginneth with a verie narrow course, and increasing broder in the middle marches of Scotland, it finallie restraineth it selfe againe, till it commeth at the sea, whither it runneth with a swift course, as the Scotish writers do report. In this vale standeth a towne named Dunfrise, wherein manie fine clothes speciallie whites are made, which are brought vp and carted into England, France, Flanders, and Germanie, where they are had in great price and estimation.

The description of Gallowaie, Kile, Carricke, and Cuningham, with the notable townes, lakes and riuers in the same.

The third Chapter.

ABoue Niddesdale is Gallowaie (named sometimes Brigantia) the people whereof were in times past called Brigantes: this region is diuided by the water of Cree into two parts, whereof that which lieth nerest to Niddesdale, is called nether Gallowaie, and the other that is aboue the Cree is named vpper Gallowaie. In nether Gallowaie is Kirkcolbrie, a rich towne and of a god trade in merchandize, and in vpper Gallowaie is Whitherne, in Latine Candida Casa, an abbeie dedicated to saint Ninian the bishop, and there lieth his carcase, which is honored of the people with great superstition and errour. Aboue Whitherne is Wigton towne, and not far from thence is the great lake of Mirton, the one halfe whereof doth freze by naturall congelation as other poles and plashes do; but the other is neuer seene to beare anie yce at all, which vnto me doth seeme to be a great wonder. In Gallowaie moreouer are two other lakes, the Salset and the Neutramen, of equall length and breadth with the Lochmirton; as for Gallowaie it selfe, it yeldeth out a great point, promontorie, or cape (which the Scots call a mule or nuke) into the Irish sea. The common sort name it the mules nuke, and by the rounding of it selfe, it maketh two great lakes, named Rean and Lois, except I be deceiued, one of these lakes or poles is 30, and the other 16, miles of length, and both full of oisters, herrings, congers, cockles, and other like kinds of fish.

Some are of the opinion that Brigantia was the same region of Britaine that is now called Wales, wherein the Britains inhabited manie yeares after their expulsion out of Britaine. But this opinion is false, sith the Romans write that Man the Iland lieth ouer against Brigantium and midwaie betweene the same and Ireland: for albeit that the braies or baies are now worne wider & further distant ech from other by the washing and working of the sea, yet the same latitude & eleuation of the pole that Ptolomie ascribed to the Brigants, agreeth well to the height of the pole ouer Gallowaie, which is verie far from Wales, sithens the Ile of Man lieth also 300 miles from thence, and in the sight of Gallowaie. In like sort by the testimonie of sundrie authors both Irish and Spanish (we affirme that out of Brigantium a citie in Spaine, now named Compostella) there came a new companie of people into Ireland called Spaniards, and out of Ireland another crew of the same nation with king Fergus into Albion, and in remembrance of the citie Brigance, wherein they inhabited whilest they were in Spaine, they called themselues Brigantes. To this opinion in like sort Cornelius Tacitus doth seeme to leane, who saith, that the Brigantes descended from the Spaniards, which in his time dwelled in the vttermost parts of Britaine, including vnder that name all the Ile of Albion. These regions afore rehearsed, that is to say, Annandale, Niddesdale, and Gallowaie, beside fine wools and store of cattell, doth also abound with all kinds of graine, wheate onelie excepted.

Aboue Gallowaie is Carrike, sometime a portion of the region of the Silures, of whose name it is not yet certeinelie knowne, whether it was derued from the famous citie Carrike, whose ruines do yet remaine, or not. Silurie is diuided into three parts, to wit, Carrike, Kile, and Cuningham. In the first, as I said, was Carrike the noble citie: and in this countrie are manie strong castels, both by naturall situation and policie of man: herein also are faire kine and oxen, whose flesh is delicat and verie tender to be eaten, the tallow moreouer of their wombs is so moist and sapie that it neuer waxeth hard, but relenteth of the owne accord, and becommeth like vnto oile. Beyond Carrike is Kile, so called of Coile king of Britaine, sometime slaine in the said region, and therein is a stone, not much aboue 12 miles from the towne of Air, full 30 foot high, and three elns of breadth, called the deafe stone, not without cause: for when a man is on the one side thereof, he shall not heare what is said or done on the other, though there be neuer so great noise made, no not if a canon should be discharged of set purpose; which to me doth seeme vnpossible, neuertheless the further a man standeth from the same, the better shall he heare, whatsoeuer the noise be. Next to Kile is Cuningham the third part of Silurie, whose inhabitants in time past were most noisome to the Romans. In Kile is a pole named Downe, from whence the riuer Downe doth runne through the middest of that region into the Irish sea. In Cuningham likewise is a lake called Garnoth, equall in quantitie vnto the Downe, and no lesse famous for the abundance of fish that is dailie found therein; and not farre from the same is the towne called Largis, where Alexander the third king of Scotland of that name, sometime ouercame the Danes and Norwegians, whereby it grew to be famous, and of more reputation among vs.

Reade in the Latine Hector. 12 foot in hith 30 foot in length, and three elns thicke.

The

The situation of Renfrew, Clidesdale, Lennox, Lowmund, Argile, Louchquhaber, Lorne, and Kentire, with all the notable things conteined in the same.

The fourth Chapter.

THe water of Clide diuideth Lennor on the north side from the baronie of Renfrew, and it ariseth out of the same hill in Calidonwood, from whence the Annand falleth, and goeth with a long course into the Irish sea; some call this riuer Gluda, and Cluda: but Tacitus nameth it Glota. Not far also from the founteines of Clide, ariseth the water of Forth, that runneth on the contrarie side into the Germane ocean. In like sort after the water of Clude hath run for a season toward the north, it gathereth somewhat inward, till it come to the mounteine of Granzeben, & from thence holdeth on with a swift course, till it fall (as I said) into the Irish seas. The countrie where it runneth is named Clidesdale. Betwixt Clide and Lennor lieth the baronie of Renfrew, wherein are two poles named Quhinsouth and Leboth, of which the first is 12 miles in compasse, the other 20, and both verie rich and plentifull of fish. But in Lennor, that lieth nert aboue Renfrew toward the ocean (called by Ptolomie Lelgouia) is a great mere or lake that hight Lochmond, of 24 miles in length, and eight in breadth, and within this lhin or pole are 30 Ilands, well replenished with churches and dwelling houses.

And in the same also are three things worthie consideration, whereof the first is, that the pleasant and verie delicat fishes there bred do want fins. The second is, that the water will often swell with huge waues though no wind be stirring, and that in such wise that the best mariners in the countrie dare not aduenture to saile thereon. There is also a verie fruitfull and commodious Ile therein, verie necessarie for the pasturage of cattell, which fleeteth hither and thither as the wind bloweth. This lake is situat at the foot of the hill called Granzeben, which were sometime the marches or limits betwixt the Scots and Picts, and are extended from Lochlowmund to the mouth of Dee. Certes the Picts had no part of the countrie beyond the Granzeben, nor toward the Irish seas, for this region was inhabited by the Scots. Eight miles from Lochlowmond is the castell of Dumbrittene named sometime Alcluid, and here the water of Leuen falleth into the Clide.

Beyond Lochlowmund is Argile, an hillie countrie and full of crags and mounteins, therein also are two lakes, Lochfine & Lochquho, that diuide the region into three parts, that in the middest being called Knapdale. In Lochfine is more plentie of hering than in anie part of the coast that compasseth the Iland, but in Lochquho are such kinds of fish to be vsuallie had, as are commonlie bred in fresh waters. There are moreouer in Argile two castels, Glenunquhart and Enconell, & in it are 12 Iles, whose chiefe commoditie resteth rather in pasturage for cattell, than abundance of graine. In Argile furthermore are manie rich mines full of mettall, but the people there haue no skill to find and trie out the same. The constant report also goeth there, how there is a stone of such nature, that if it be hidden in straw for a certeine season, it will kindle of it selfe, and consume the straw to ashes. There are seuen other lakes in Argile, whereof some are thirtie miles in length and breadth, and other lesse.

It was told me once by Doncan Campbell a noble knight, that out of Garioll, one of the poles of Argile, there came a terrible beast, in the yeare of Grace 1510, which was of the bignesse of a greihound, and soted like a gander, and issuing out of the water earlie in the morning about midsummer time, did verie easilie and without anie visible force or streining of himselfe ouerthrow huge okes with his taile, & thereunto killed three men out-right that hunted him with three stroks of his said taile, the rest of them sauing themselues in trees thereabouts, whilest the foresaid monster returned to the water. Those that are giuen to the obseruations of rare and vncouth sights, beleeue that this beast is neuer seene but against some great trouble & mischiefe to come vpon the realme of Scotland. For it hath beene described also before that time, although not verie often. Lorne abutteth vpon Argile, which was once a part of Argile, and reacheth out into the Irish sea, in maner of a cape or tong, full sixtie miles. This point also was called Nouantia, but now it is named Kintire (that is to saie) the head of Lorne, whose vttermost part is not full 16 miles from Ireland. Some authors affirme, that both Argile and Cantire, were called Nouantia in old time, sith Ptolomie maketh no mention of Argile in his cosmographie. In this Lorne is great abundance of barleie, which the Scots call beir. Beyond Lorne is Lochquhaber, heretofore a portion of Murrey land, verie rich in mines of iron and lead, and no lesse beneficiall to the countrie in all kinds of cattell.

There are likewise manie woods, manie lakes, and manie riuers, but two of them are most notable for the plentie of samons, and other delicate fish, aswell of the salt as fresh water, which be there taken, and almost without anie trauell; neither is there anie where else in all the Ile such store. The one of these is named Lochtie, & the other Spanze, but vpon what occasion these names were giuen to them I find as yet no certeintie. The Lochtie riseth not aboue eight miles from Lochnes, and falleth beneath the same into the Germane ocean, and beside it, there is a rockie crag, running out at length into the sea, named Hardnomorth. In the mouth of Lochtie likewise was sometime a rich towne name Inuerlochtie, whither the merchants of France & Spaine did make their dailie resort, till at the last it was so defaced by the warres of the Danes, that it neuer was able since the said time to recouer hir pristinate renowme. But whether the negligence of the due repare of this towne, proceedeth of the slouth of our people, or hatred that some enuious persons do beare to cities and walled townes in our countrie, as yet it is vncerteine. Beyond Lochtie is the castell of Dunstafage, in time past named Euonium: beyond Dunstafage also is the mouth of the water of Spanze, where it falleth (as I heare) into the Germane ocean.

The discourse of Ros, Stranauerne, & Murrey land, with the lakes, riuers, and notable townes in them.

The fift Chapter.

BEyond the water of Spanze lieth Ros, sometime called Lugia, a verie narrow region (God it wote) but running out in great length through the middest of of the Iland, being enuironed on both sides with the ocean. That portion thereof which lieth nerest to the Irish seas, is verie difficult for such as trauell by the countrie, by reason of the high mountains, which maketh the countrie more apt for wild beasts than mankind to inhabit: neuertheless waxing more fertill on that part which stretcheth toward the German sea, it yeeldeth it selfe to culture, and rendreth some graine. In pasture also it is not altogither vnprofitable, sith there is good grasse and verie batable for their heards: for the vallies there, being watered with sundrie pleasant streames, do yeeld a sweet and verie sauorie grasse, wherewith all sorts of cattell are verie much delighted. In Ros are sundrie lakes, but Lochbrun is the greatest. There are also manie fresh riuers, fraught with excellent fish, and finallie a notable firth or safe hauen called Cromart, whereunto diuers in time of necessitie do resort, to auoid the danger of shipwracke, that otherwise would assuredlie annoy them. The Scotish men call it Peill of shipmen. In this region moreouer is the towne called Thane, where the bones of Dutho an holy man (as they say) do rest, & are had in greater estimation among the superstitious sort (as sometime ouer the whole Iland) than the holie gospell of God and merits of his sonne, whereby we are onelie saued. Two ancient houses are likewise maintained in one vale of the Ros, whose formes resemble so manie belles, but to what end as yet I do not find. Next vnto the said Ros lieth the Stranauerne, as the vttermost region of Scotland, the coasts whereof abutting for a while vpon the Deucalidon sea, do afterward turne againe toward the Almain seas, hauing partlie the Deucalidon coast, and partlie Cathnesse vpon the north side, Southerland on the east, Rossia on the south, and Deucalidon againe vpon the west. There are three great crags or points lieng on the vttermost side of Stranauerne, that is to sate, the Hoie, Holwbrun (the greatest of the three) and Downisbie, which bicause they shot farre off into the sea, do make two great firths and lakes, each of them being seuerallie distinguished from other.

Next vnto Cathnesse lieth Southerland, a profitable region both for graine and all kinds of prouision, but chieflie for the nourishment of bestiall, whereunto it chieflie inclineth, as do the other two last before rehearsed. On the further side also of this, lieth Murrey land, sometime called Vararis, although the marches thereof are changed from that they were of old. For whereas in time past all the region lieng betweene Spaie and Nesse to the Ireland sea, was named Murrey; now it is knowne to be onlie beyond the water of Spaie & Bissocke, & reacheth on vntill it come to the Irish sea. Betwixt Ros and Murrey land, is a great baie, and likewise a descent of sundrie waters: for thereinto fall the Nesse, Narden, Findorne, Los and Spaie, whereof this latter runneth with so fierce & violent a streame, that the force of the sea at the flood striuing to enter into the same, is put back, & may not resist the inuincible fall, and beates backe the water that descendeth into the ocean. The Nesse issueth out of a lake of the same name (which is not passing 8 miles from the said plaih, from whence the Lochtie runneth) & thence goeth into the Irish seas: and this propertie it hath, that neither the streame, neither the lake it selfe will yeeld to be frozen in the verie deepe of winter. Such also is the force thereof, that if anie yce or anie frozen substance be cast thereinto, it will by and by relent and dissolue againe to water, whereby it becommeth verie profitable for such cattell as are benummed with cold. In the mouth of the Nesse, standeth a towne called Inuernesse, where sometime was great abundance of herring taken, but now they be gone by the secret working of God. The common people put the fault in the rich & men of higher calling, who enuieng the commoditie of the poore inhabitants, willfullen seeme to bereeue them of this emolument, by force and slaughter. Whereupon (as they say) it commeth to passe, that the increase ekeweth decaieth, and verie small store is taken there by manie yeares after such iniuries offered.

But to proceed: beside Lochnesse, which is 24 miles of length, and foure in breadth, by reason of the great woods there standing, is great store of sauage beasts, as harts, wild horsses, roes, and such like. There are likewise martirns, beuers, fores & wezels, whose skins and cases are sold vnto strangers at huge and excessiue prices. In Murrey land also is not alonelie great plentie of wheat, barlie, otes, and such like graine, beside nuts and apples, but likewise of all kinds of fish, and especiallie of samon. The people thereof in like sort do vse a strange maner of fishing: for they make a long weele of wicker, narrow necked, and wide mouthed, with such cunning, that when the tide commeth, the fish shot themselues into the same, and forthwith are so inclosed, that whilest the tide lasteth he cannot get out, nor after the water is gone escape the hands of the fishers. In this region moreouer is a lake named Spiney, wherein is exceeding plentie of swans.

The cause of their increase in this place is ascribed to a certeine herbe, which groweth there in great abundance, and whose seed is verie pleasant vnto the said foule in the eating, wherefore they call it Swangirs: and hereunto such is the nature of the same, that where it is once sowne or planted, it will neuer be destroied, as may be proued by experience. For albeit that this lake be fiue miles in length, and was sometime within the remembrance of man verie well stored with samon and other fish, yet after that this herbe began to multiplie vpon the same, it became so shallow, that one may now wade through the greatest part thereof, by meanes whereof all the great fishes there be vtterlie consumed. In this portion furthermore, is the church of Pette, where the bones of little John remaine in great estimation. Certes his carcasse hath beene 14 foot long, his members well proportioned according to his stature, and not fullie six yeeres before this booke was written (by Boetius) he saw his hanch bone, which seemed so great as the whole thigh of a man, and he did thrust his arme into the hollownesse thereof, wherby it appeareth what mightie people grew vp in our region before they were ouercome with gluttonie and excesse. In this quarter finallie is the towne called Elgin, not farre from the mouth of Spaie, and therin is a cathedrall church furnished with canons: there are thereto sundrie rich and verie wealthie abbeies in Murrey, as Killos of the order of the Cisteaux, and Pluscardie of the Cluniaks.

This was no Scot but an Englishman, fled into Ireland, and then into Scotland

Of Boene, Anze, Buchquhane, Mar, Mernis, Fiffe, and Angus, with the lakes, flouds, abbies, townes, and o*ther notable things conteined* in the same.

The sixt Chapter.

NExt vnto the Murrey lieth Boene, and Anze, two fertill and plentifull regions, which extend their bounds euen vnto the seas. They are both verie notablie indowed with batable pastures, and by reason thereof are verie full of of cattell, they yeld moreouer excellent corne, and by meanes of their large woods and forests not without great store of wild beasts of sundrie kinds and natures. Neere also vnto the Douerne water, which is a riuer marueilouslie stored with fish, standeth a towne named Bamfe, and vnder those two regions aforesaid lieth Buchquhane, a verie batable soile for all kinds of cattell, but especiallie of sheepe, whose woll exceedeth that of the like beast of all other countries thereabouts for whiteneſſe and fineneſſe. The riuers that are in this countrie do in like maner abound with samons, so that there is no one of them void of this commoditie, except the Rattra onelie, wherein it is not heard that anie hath bene seene: herein also standeth the castell of Slants, in which the high constable of Scotland dwelleth, and neere vnto the same is a maruellous caue: for the water that droppeth into the same, in a short processe of time becommeth an hard white stone, and except they had beene oft remoued heretofore, the caue it selfe had bene filled vp with the same manie yeeres agone.

This region is void of rats, and such is the nature thereof, that if anie be brought thither from other places, they are found to die immediatlie: finallie it is most maruellous of all, that as otes do grow there in manie places of themselues without culture and tillage; so if a man come thither of set purpose to mow downe the same, he shall find nothing els but emptie huls and straw: but if he chance vpon the sudden and without premeditation of the thing to cut downe anie (a matter impossible in my mind) he shall find them so good and full as anie are elsewhere, to be gathered and led home. Certes it appeareth hereby, that this is nothing else but an illusion, wherewith the wicked fends do captiuate and blind the senses of the superstitious sort; for that it should be so by nature, it is a thing altogither impossible. Nert vnto this lieth the great region of Mar, which is verie plentifull of cattell, and extendeth 60 miles in length, from the Almaine seas to Badzenoch. In this is the citie of Aberden, wherin is a bishops see, and noble vniuersitie, sometime founded by William Elphinston bishop there. This citie lieth betwixt two rich riuers, the Done and the Dee, wherein is the greatest store of samons that is to be found againe within the compasse of Albion, and likewise the greatest and longest if you respect their quantitie.

Nert vnto Mar, we haue Mernis toward the sea, a verie fat soile, full of pasture, and abundantlie replenished with euerie sort of cattell. In this portion standeth Dunnother the marshall of Scotlands house, and likewise the towne of Fordon, in which the bones of Palladius do rest, who is taken generallie for the apostle of our nation. The water of Eske is bound vnto this region, which is otherwise called Northeske, a verie dangerous chanell, and wherein manie haue perished for default of a bridge, as they haue attempted to passe and repasse ouer the same. Angus bordereth vpon the Mernis, it was sometime part of Horrestia, and now watered with three notable riuers, as the Northeske alreadie mentioned, and marueilouslie replenished with samons, likewise the Southeske; and finallie the Taie, the noblest water in all Scotland, and remembred by the Romane writers vnder the name of Tau.

In Angus also is an high mounteine or promontorie, called the Red braes, which lieth out far off into the Almaine seas. The Taie also riseth farre beyond the mounteins of Granzben out of loch Taie, which is a pole of 24 miles of length, and 10 of breadth, wherein are not onelie diuers Ilands, with castels in them, but the water of the lake it selfe (being most fine and subtile) is notablie replenished with great store of fish, and therefore verie commodious for such as dwell about it. It falleth into the Almaine sea beside Dundee, a towne called in old time Alectum, wherein I was borne, and in which the people trauell verie painfullie about weauing and making of cloth. There are in Angus also manie other cities and rich abbeies, as Mountros, Brechin, and Forfaire, beside so manie castels as lieth not in me to number. This likewise is not to be passed ouer with silence, that whereas Forfaire was in times past a notable citie, strengthened with two roiall castels, as the ruines do yet declare, now it is brought vnto little more than a countrie village, replenished with simple cotages. Manie lakes & poles are also in Angus, and those well fraught with fish. There is also in this countrie one place called the vale of Eske, whose sheepe haue such white, fine, and excellent woll, as the like vnto it is hardlie to be found againe within the whole Iland.

After we be ouer the Taie, we come vnto Fife, sometime a part of Ottoline. In this region groweth all maner of graine so plentifullie as elsewhere in anie part of Albion; and where no corne is, there is no lesse foison of cattell. There are blacke stones also digged out of the ground, which are verie good for firing, and such is their intollerable heat, when they are kindled, that they resolue and melt iron, and therefore are verie profitable for smiths, and such artificers as deale with other mettals; neither are they found anie where else (that I do know of) but betweene the Taie and the Tine within the whole Iland. Salt is likewise made within this region in great quantitie of sea water, which they boile according to their maner. There are furthermore sundrie cities in the same, of which S. Andrewes is the chiefe, wherein is both the see of an archbishop and a famous vniuersitie. There are moreouer sundrie lakes, as loch Torre and loch Leuin, and in this later are diuerse Iles, and in one of them also the church of S. Phillane, a Scotish saint, of no small name and reputation.

Fife is diuided of Lowthian by the riuer of Forth that runneth a large & broad chanell into the ocean seas. Certes it is a water verie plentifullie indued with cockles, oisters, muskels, seales, pellocks, mereswine, whales, and great foison of white fish: and among manie other Iles that are to be found in this Forth, that of Maie is of greatest fame, because Adrian and his fellows were killed in the same. In the middest of this Ile springeth vp a founteine of fresh and cleare water, from an high rocke, which is not a little to be maruelled at, considering the quantitie and situation of the Ile. Beside this also is a wonderfull crag, rising within the sea, whereunto is so strict and narrow a passage, that a man shall hardlie come vnto it by a fisher bote, and thereto but at one place. This rocke (called the Basse castell) is inuincible, and therein are manie caues verie profitable for defense, made heretofore by great labor and industrie of men.

Certes, there is nothing in this rocke that is not full of admiration and wonder: therein also is great store of soland geese (not vnlike to those which Plinie calleth water eagles, or (as we saie) sea herons) and no where else but in Ailsaie and this rocke. At their first comming, which is in the spring of the yeare, they gather such great plentie of sticks and boughs together for the building of their nests, that the same do satisfie the keeper of the castell, for the yeerelie maintenance of his fewell, without anie other prouision. These foules do feed their yong with the most delicat fish that they can come by. For though they haue alreadie preied vpon anie one, and haue

it fall

it fast in their beake or talons, yet if they happen as they flie toward the land to espie a better, they let the first fall againe into the sea, and pursue the later with great and eager swiftnesse, vntill they take hold ther eof.

Sometimes their preie is taken from them by the keepers of the castell, as also their sticks from time to time for the aforesaid vse; but they making small or rather no resistance, do turne againe forthwith for more wood or fish (as their losse requireth) not ceasing till they haue builded their nests with the one, and nourished vp their yong with the other, so that what by the timber of their nests, the beguiling them of their preie, and stealing awaie of their yong, they bring yeerelie no small commoditie vnto the owner of the castell. Within the bowels of these geese there is a kind of grease to be had of singular force in medcine, and fleaing like vnto the skin from their bodies with the fat, they make an oile verie profitable for the gout and manie other diseases in the haunches and groines of mankind. In this crag more, there groweth an hearbe verie pleasant and delicious for salads, but if it be taken vp and planted elswhere, it either groweth not at all, or vtterlie giueth ouer the vertues wherewith it was earst indued.

There was sometime a stone found here in this rocke much like to a water sponge or pumice, hollow on the one side, and of such a nature, that if anie salt water had beene powred therein to, and suffered to run through, it would forthwith lose the naturall saltnesse, and become fresh and verie pleasant vnto the mouth and tast. We heare in these daies that this stone is to be seene in Fast castell, whither it was brought after it had passed manie hands for the triall of this matter. In this firth also is the Ile Aimon, wherein is an abbeie. There are likewise diuers other Ilands, and those are verie full of conies; and in the said firth are sundrie fishes oftentimes seene of monstrous shape, with cowles hanging ouer their heads like vnto monks, and in the rest resembling the bodie of man. They shew themselues likewise aboue the water to the nauill, howbeit they neuer appeare but against some great pestilence of men, or murren of cattell; wherefore their onelie sight doth breed great terror vnto the Scotish nation, who are verie great obseruers of vncouth signes & tokens.

The description of Louthian, Striueling, Menteth, Calidon wood, Bougewall, Gareoth, with the notable cities, castels, and flouds thereof.

The seuenth Chapter.

ON the south of the Forth lieth Louthian, so called of Lothe or Loth, one of the kings of the Picts, it was sometime named Pictland; but now it is parcell of the Scotish kingdome, & therto for bountie of soile is not inferiour to anie region of Scotland. In Louthian are manie abbeies, castels and townes, as Hadinton, Dunbar, Northberwic and Leith: but Edenburgh palleth them all, as well in policie of regiment as in forme of building and wisedome, and riches of the inhabitants: therein also is the castell of Maidens, remembred by the most renowmed authors, & also the kings chiefe palace, the which triumpleth the renowme of the foresaid citie. Not farre from thence moreouer is a certeine oilie spring, which riseth out of the ground in such abundance, that the more is caried from thence, the more is restored: and the people are persuaded hereof, that it is verie medicinable against all cankers and scalls.

Not farre from the mouth of Forth is the castell of Dunbar, which by naturall situation and industrie of man, is now become one of the cheefe holds in Albion. It was sometimes the principall house apperteining to the earles of March: and there hard by is a towne of the same name, wherin is a rich abbeie or colledge of canons founded by those earles. Next vnto Louthian lieth Mers, whereof I haue spoken alreadie, but we will now go vp higher into the land. Neerest vnto Mers therefore lieth Teuidale, and aboue it is Twedale: next vnto Twedale is Dryfesdale, Walcopdale, Douglasdale, and Clidisdale, and all these are such names as the riuers haue that run along their bottoms. The principall towne of Clidisdale is Glasco the archbishops see, wherein is a notable church erected in the honor of saint Mongow, and builded with great magnificence. In Glasco also is a noble vniuersitie, where the liberall arts and sciences are verie louslie taught.

In this region moreouer is a verie rich mine of gold, and another of azure, the commoditie of which later is reaped with small trauell. There are sometimes found diuers pretious stones also, as rubies and diamonds. Certes this mine was disclosed in the time of James the fourth, who would no doubt haue brought it to full perfection, if he had longer liued, whereas now little profit redoundeth thereby to the common wealth, because it is either vtterlie neglected, or not very much regarded. North of Glasco lieth Menteith, and Striueling shire, bordering vpon Argile and Lennor. In Striueling shire is the towne of Striueling, and aboue it is the castell of Striueling, which was sometime called the dolorous mounteine. At this towne also began the great Calidon wood, which ran through Menteith and Stratherne, to Atholl and Lochquhaber, as Ptolome writeth in his first table.

In this wood were somtime white buls with shackt heares and curled manes like fierce lions, otherwise they were like vnto the tame, neuertheless so wild and sauage, that they would neuer be made familiar, nor tast of any hearbe or grasse that mans hand had once touched, after manie daies. Being taken also by the industrie of man (which was very hard to do) they would refuse all sustenance, & starue themselues to death. Assone as any did inuade them, they would rush vpon him with great violence, and beare him to the earth; as for dogs, nets, or any kind of weapon they feared not, neither cared for any maner of engine.

It is said that Robert Bruze after his coronation did hunt one of these buls in the foresaid wood, being accompanied but with a small traine, in which voiage he escaped narowlie with his life. For after the beast felt himselfe sore wounded by the hunters, he rushed vpon the king, who hauing now no weapon left in his hand wherewith to defend himselfe, he had suerlie perished if rescue had not come: howbeit in this distresse one came running vnto him, who ouerthrew the bull by plaine force, and held him down till the hunters came that killed him outright. For this valiant act also the king indued the aforesaid partie with great possessions, and his linage is to this daie called of the Turnebuls, because he ouerturned the beast, and saued the kings life, by such great prowesse and manhod. Certes the flesh of these beasts were reputed in old time as a most delicate food, and ordeine meate for the nobilitie, notwithstanding that it be verie full of sinewes and grissles, whereat some delicat feders do often take offense. In times past also they were bred in many places of the Caledon, but now they be all consumed by the gluttonie of the inhabitants, so that none of them are left, but onlie in Comerland.

On the east side of Menteith lieth Stratherne, & bordereth also upon Fife. Through the dailies likewise of this region runneth the water of Ern, that falleth into Tay. This is moreouer worthie to be noted, that not foure miles from the confluence of Ern and Tay, there is a stone of small quantitie, and yet of great wonder, for in what place soeuer it be laid, it will not be remoued from the ace by manuall practise, art, or engine, & yet one man may so some moue it as an hundred. On the other side of Tay beyond Angus and Gowry lieth Stermond, a region plentifullie indued both with grasse and corne. Not farre from Stermond is Athole, wherein are manie noble dailies and riuers full of fish, as pikes, lamperns, &c. The soile there also is so bountifull, that it yeeldeth corne in maner without any tillage. There is likewise therein a towne called Lud, whose fields are so plentious, that (if they be well tilled and dressed) they will yeeld great store of barlie without any sowing of seed. Howbeit, as this is in that part of the region often verified, so in other there is a contrarious disposition to be found in the earth, which turneth wheat some into good and perfectrie, the like whereof I heare to be not far from Luke, & in the countries thereabouts.

West of Buchquhane and Boene lieth Wolgewell and Garreth, very plentifull soiles both for grasse and corne. In Garreth also is an hill called Doundore, that is to sale, the golden mountaine: for the sheepe that feed thereon are yellow, and their teeth of the same hew, resembling burnished gold. Their flesh moreouer is red as it were tinged with saffron, and so is their woll much after the same maner. There is furthermore in the same region, an heape of stones lieng togither in maner of a crown which yeeld a sound when one of them is stricken as if it were a bell. Some are of the opinion, that one idoll, temple or other stood heretofore in that place, while the Scotish nation was addicted to the worshipping of diuels. Many other regions are in Scotland, as Bradalbane, Strabraun, and Badzenoth, with diuers small territories and flouds, howbeit they are not so notable as those which we haue alreadie touched, and therefore I thinke it but follie to deale any further with them.

Of the great plentie of hares, red deer, and other wilde beasts in Scotland, of the strange properties of sundrie Scotish dogs, and of the nature of samon.

The eight Chapter.

HAuing made this speciall description of the realme of Scotland, now will I touch such things as concearne the same in generall. First of all therfore in the fields and wild places of the country there is great plentie of hares, red deere, fallow deere, roes, wild horsses, wolues and fores. These horsses are not gotten but by great slight and policie: for in the winter season the inhabitants tut ne certeine tame horsses & mares among them, wherewith they grow in the end to be so familiar, that afterward they go with them to and fro, and finallie home into their maisters yards, where they be taken and some broken to their hands. The woluts are most fierce and noisome to the heards and flocks in all parts of Scotland, sauing in one parrell of Angus, called Glenmores dale, where these beasts do no manner of hurt vnto the domesticall cattell, but prie onlie vpon the wild.

Fores do much mischefe generallie in all feilds, but cheeflie in the mountaines, where they be verie hardlie hunted, howbeit art hath deuised a meane to preuent their malice, and to preserue their pultrie. Certes there is almost no house that doth not for certeine dates cherish vp a young fox, which the Scots do call a Todde, and when killing the same, they mince the flesh thereof amongst such meat, as they giue vnto their foules and other little beastials, and by this meanes so many foules and cattell as rate heerof are preserued from crouncer of the fox, almost by two moneths after, so that they may wander whither they will, for the fores as it were winding or smelling the flesh of their fellowes yet in their crops will in no wise meddle with them, but eschew, and know such a one, although it were among an hundreth of other.

In Scotland also are dogs of maruelous condition; for beside the common nature and vniuersall properties of dogs of all other countries, there are three sorts with vs, which are not seene else-where in anie quarter of the world. The first is an hound of great swiftnesse, hardinesse, and strength, fierce and cruell vpon all wilde beasts, and eger against theeues that offer their maisters any violence. The second is a rach or hound verie requisite in following the fot, (which we call drawing) whether it be of man or beast, yea he will pursue any maner of foule, and find out what soeuer fish is cast vp, or lurketh among the rocks, by that excellent sense of smelling wherewith he is indued. The third sort is no greater than that of raches, in colour for the most part red, with blacke spots, or else blacke and full of red marks. These are so skilfull that they will pursue a theefe, or theefe stolen goods in most precise maner, and finding the trespasser, with great assurance they will make a raise vpon him. Or if it be so that he haue taken the water for his safegard, he shrinketh not to follow him, and entring and issuing at the same places where the partie went in and out, he neuer ceasseth to range till he haue nosed his foting, & be come to the place wherein the theefe is shrowded. The dogs of this kind are called sleuthhounds. Certes this report would seeme meere incredible, except it were dailie had in experience vpon the borders of England and Scotland, where pillage is good purchase indifferentlie on both sides. There is a law also among the borderers in time of peace, that whoso denieth entrance or sute of a sleuthhound in pursuit made after fellons and stolen goods, shall be holden as accessarie vnto the theft, or taken for the selfe theefe.

Of foules, such (I meane) as liue by preie, there are sundrie sorts in Scotland, as eagles, falcons, goshaukes, sparrowhaukes, marlions, and such like: but of water foules there is so great store, that the report thereof may seeme to exceed all credit. There are other kinds of birds also in this countrie, the like of which is no where else to be seene, as the capercailze or wild horsse greater in bodie than the rauen, and liuing onelie by the rinds and barks of the pine trees. We haue in like maner manie more cocks and hens, the which abstreining from corne, do feed vpon nought else, but the leaues of Cytisus, which the Scots do commonlie call Hadder.

These

Theſe two are verie delicate in eating. The third ſort is reddiſh blacke of colour, in quantitie comparable to the pheſant, and no leſſe delicious in taſte and ſauor at the table, our countrie men call them wild cocks, and their chiefe ſuſtenance is by wheat.

Beſide theſe, we haue alſo another foule in Mers more ſtrange and vncouth than all theſe afore mentioned, called a guſtard, fullie ſo great as a ſwan, but in colour of feathers and taſt of fleſh, little differing from a partridge, howbeit theſe birds are not verie common, neither to be ſéene in all places, ſuch alſo is their qualitie, that if they perceiue their egs to haue béene touched in their abſence by mans hand (which lie commonlie on the bare earth) they forſake thoſe nells, and laie in other places. All other our foules are common to vs and other nations. Samon is more plentifull in Scotland than in anie other region of the world, and becauſe the nature of this fiſh is ſtrange, I will ſet downe ſo much as I do know hereof at this preſent time as followeth.

The ſamon in harueſt time commeth vp into the ſmall riuers, where the water is moſt ſhallow, and there the male and female rubbing their wombe one againſt another, they ſhed their ſpawne, which forthwith they couer with ſand and grauell and ſo depart away. From henceforth they are gant and ſlender, and in appearance ſo leane that they appeare nought elſe but ſkin and bone, and therefore worthilie ſaid to be growne out of vſe and ſeaſon. It is ſaid alſo that if they touch anie of their full fellowes, during the time of this their leanneſſe, the ſame ſide which they touched will likewiſe become leane, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that a ſamon is oft ſéene to be fat on the one ſide of the chine, and leane on the other. But to proceed, the aforeſaid ſpawne and milt being hidden in the ſand (as you haue heard) in the nert ſpring doth yéeld great number of little frie, but ſo neſh and tender for a long time, that till they come to be ſo great as a mans finger (if you catch anie of them) you ſhall perceiue them to melt, and their ſubſtance to diſſolue and fade euen as it were gellie, or as yſe laid forth againſt the ſun. From henceforth they go to the ſea, where within the ſpace of 20 daies they grow to a maruellous greatneſſe, and then returning againe toward the place of their generation, they ſhew a notable ſpectacle not vnworthie to be conſidered.

Certes in Scotland there are manie linnes or poles, which being in ſome places among the rocks verie ſhallow aboue, are yet déepe beneath, with the fall of the water, and thereto the ſamon not able to pearſe through the chanell, either for ſwiftneſſe of the courſe, or depth of the deſcent of ſuch water as commeth againſt him, he goeth ſo neere vnto the ſide of the rocke or dam, if I may ſo call it, as he may, and there aduentureth to leape ouer and vp into the lin, if he leape well at the firſt he obteineth his deſire, if not, he aſſaieth the ſecond or third time, till he returne now vnto his countrie: a great fiſh able to ſwim againſt the ſtreame, that before was a litle hod, and maugre his reſiſtance, caried with the violent courſe of the water into the maine ocean. Such as aſſay often to leape, and cannot get ouer, do bruſe themſelues and become meaſelled: others that happen to fall vpon drie land, a thing often ſeene, are taken by the people (that watch their times) in caldrons of hot water, which they ſet vpon the ſhallow & drie plots with fire vnder them, in hope to catch the fatteſt, & ſuch as by reaſon of their weight do oftneſt leape ſhort. Certes the taſt of theſe is reputed to be moſt delicate, and therfore their price is commonlie greater than of the reſt. It is inhibited in Scotland to take any ſamon from the 8 of September, vntill the 15 of November. Finallie there is no man that knoweth readilie whereon this fiſh liueth, for neuer was anie thing yet found in their bellies, other than a thicke ſlimie humor.

Of the ſundrie kinds of muskles and cockles in Scotland, and of pearles gotten in the ſame: of the vncouth and ſtrange fiſh there to be ſeene, and of the nature of the herbe Cirſius, commonlie called Hadder.

The ninth Chapter.

HEre it reſteth that I ſhew the nature of muſkles and cockles, wherof we haue manie and ſundrie kinds among vs: of theſe alſo ſome are ſmall, and yet if they be eaten freſh, are not without a naturall delicacie in taſt. Others are greater and not vnlike in forme and quantitie to thoſe that haue the purple: and albeit that they are vtterlie void therof, yet is their meat and ſubſtance right pleaſant in the eating. There are of another ſort which are longer and greater than either of theſe, called Horſſe muſkles, to be had in Dœ and Done, and in theſe are the pearles ingendered. Certes they loue to be reſident in the déepeſt and cleareſt waters that are void of mud and filth, and ſuch is their eſtimation among the deintieſt kinds of food, that they were not vnworthilie called of old time, widowes luſtes. Their ſhelles alſo is as it were wrought euen from the verie tops, and thereto full of ſpots, wherein (as in yéeld of gaine) they farre exceéd all other. Theſe earlie in the morning, in the gentle, cleare, and calme aire, lift vp their vpper ſhelles and mouthes a little aboue the water, and there receiue of the fine and pleaſant breath or dew of heauen, & afterwards according to the meaſure and quantitie of this vitall force receiued, they firſt conceiue, then ſwell, and finallie produce the pearle.

Cardane denieth this, lib 7. de Subtilitate.

They are ſo ſenſible and quicke of hearing, that although you ſtanding on the braie or banke aboue them, do ſpeake neuer ſo ſoftlie, or throw neuer ſo ſmall a ſtone into the water, yet they will deſcrie you, and ſettle againe to the bottome, without returne for that time. Doubtleſſe they haue as it were a naturall carefulneſſe of their owne commoditie, as not ignorant, how great eſtimation we mortall men make of the ſame amongſt vs, and therefore ſo ſone as the fiſhermen do catch them, they bind their ſhelles togither, for otherwiſe they would open and ſhed their pearles of purpoſe, for which they know themſelues to be purſued. Their maner of apprehenſion is this, firſt foure or fiue perſons go into the riuer togither, vp vnto the ſhoulders, and there ſtand in a compaſſe one by another with poles in their hands whereby they reſt more ſuerlie, ſith they fix them in the ground, and ſtaie with one hand vpon them: then calling their eies downe to the bottome of the water, they eſpie where they lie by their ſhining and cléerenеſſe, and with their toes take them vp (for the deapth of the water will not ſuffer them to ſtoope for them) & giue them to ſuch as ſtand nert them.

The perls that are ſo gotten in Scotland, are not of ſmall value, they are verie orient & bright, light and round, and ſometimes of the quantitie of the naile of ones little finger, as I haue had and ſéene by mine owne experience. Almoſt ſuch another muſkle found on the coaſt of Spaine, the ſhels whereof are gathered by ſuch as go in pilgrimage to ſaint Iames, and brought into Scotland, but they are without pearls, because they liue in salt water, which is an enimie to the margarite: but Cardane also denieth it. In all the sea coasts also of Scotland are cockles and muskles of the same forme, but without this commoditie. Many vncouth and strange shapes of fish likewise are seene there, whereof some are armed with shels, some with hard skales, and diuers round as a ball skinned like an vrcheon or hedghog, hauing but one cundit both for purgation of their excrements, and reception of their sustenance. To shew euerie kind of fish that is in Scotland, it were but a vaine trauell, sith the same are knowne almost in euerie region.

In like sort we haue such plentie of fish vpon our seuerall coasts, that although millians and infinite numbers of them be taken on the one daie, yet on the next their losse will be so supplied with new store, that nothing shall be missing by reason of the yesterfang: so bountifull is God in these his benefits vnto vs. Furthermore, there is another gift bestowed vpon vs by the singular prouidence of God. For the greater dearth & penurie of flesh and corne is séene in Scotland, the greater store of fish is taken vpon our shores. In like sort, in the deserts and wild places of this realme, there groweth an hearbe of it selfe called Hadder or Hather verie delicat, as Columella lib.9.cap.4. saith, for goats & all kind of cattell to feed vpon, and likewise for diuerse foules, but bées especiallie. This herbe in June yéeldeth a purple floure, swéet as honie, whereof the Picts in time past did make a pleasant drinke, and verie wholsome for the bodie: but forsomuch as the maner of making hereof is perished in the hauocke made of the Picts, when the Scots subdued their countrie, it lieth not in me to set downe the order of it, neither shewed they euer the learning hereof to any but to their owne nation. Finallie there is no part of Scotland so barren and vnprofitable, but it produceth either iron or some other kind of mettall, as may be proued easilie throughout all the Iles that are annexed to the same.

Galen.lib.1.de Antidotis saieth that Citisus is no herb but a shrub, and so doth Plinie lib.12. cap.3. lib.13. cap.24. lib.16. chap.38. And Columella in the end of his 5. booke, where he accompteth it amõg trées.

Of the Iles of Scotland, and such notable things as are to be found in them.

The tenth Chapter.

BEing fallen at the last into mention of our Iles, I will addresse my selfe to describe the same, in maner and forme as followeth. In the Irish sea, betwixt Ireland and Scotland are fortie and three Iles, whereof some are thirtie miles long, diuers twelue, and others more or lesse. These are called by some writers Eubonie, and by other Hebrides. But the principall of them all is that of Man, which lieth ouer against Galloway, & was sometime the principall seat of the Druides, as Cornelius Tacitus, Cæsar in his commentaries, and other Romane writers do testifie at large. North from the Ile of Man lieth Arran, otherwise named Botha after S. Brandons time, who dwelled there in a little cottage, which (as all other the like were in those daies) was called Botha. From Arran we go to Hellaw and Rothesay, which later is so named of the Scot, which brought the Scots first out of Ireland into Britaine. Not far from this Ile is Ailsay, where there is such store of soland géese as they said before to be in Bas. Beyond Ailsay lie manie other distinguished by their seuerall names, but full of mines, as of iron, tin, lead, & sundrie other mettals. But the most notable Ile belonging to Scotland is Ila, that lieth beyond the promontorie of Nouant cliffe (in Scotish the tong of Lorne) within sight of Lochquhabre. Certes it is a rich parcell, thirtie miles in length, and full of corne and mettall, if the people were cunning to find and trim the same.

Not farre from thence is Cumbra, and Mula, fullie so large as Ila, both for length and breadth. In Mula is a faire spring two miles from the sea, from whence runneth a little broke or strippet, whereof you shall read more in the description of Britaine, lib.1.cap.8. Neere vnto this is Iona, otherwise called Columkill, in which is an abbie, wherin the kings of Scotland were commonlie buried from the time of Fergus the second, vnto Malcolme Cammor, who erected the monasterie of Dunfermelin, where since that time the most part of our kings haue béene of custome interred. Passing forward toward the northnorthwest seas, ouer against Rosse is an Ile named Lewis, 60 miles in length, in this Ile is but one fish riuer, & it is said that if a woman wade through the same at the spring of the yeere, there shall no samon be séene there for a twelue month after, whereas otherwise that fish is knowne to abound there in verie great plentie. Beyond Lewis lie the Sky and the Rona, in the later whereof, it is incredible to saie what of seale, of pellocke and porpasse is to be séene, which are nothing abashed at the sight of any man. The last and vttermost Ile is named Hirtha, where the eleuation of the pole is 63 degrées, and since the latitude of Man, is but 57.

I conclude, that from the Ile of Man the first Ile of Albion, to Hirtha the last Ile hereof are 377 miles, after 62 miles and an halfe to each degrée, as Ptolomie hath set downe. It is named Hirtha, which in Irish soundeth so much as a shéepe in English, for herein that kind of cattell aboundeth, each one being greater than any bucke, their hornes longer and thicker than of the bugle, and thereto they haue side tailes that reach vnto the earth. It is enuironed on euerie part with rochie or rockie crags, whereby few vessels may land there but at one place, where the working of the sea is oftentimes so terrible & rough, that no man dare aduenture thither without danger of his life. They that go thither therefore, do watch their times when the sea is calme and still. In the moneth of June also, a priest commeth vnto them out of Leuisa, and ministreth the sacrament of baptisme to all the children that haue béene borne there since that moneth in the yeare precedent: which being done, and a certeine number of masses said, he receiueth tithes of all their commodities, and then returneth home againe.

In the Ile of Lewis are two churches or chappels, whereof one is dedicated to saint Peter, another to saint Clement. The fame is, that so soone as the fire goeth out in this Ile, the man that is holden of most cleane and innocent life, goeth to the altar with great solemnitie, and there taieth a wisp of straw, which being done they fall all to praier, in the middest whereof fire commeth downe from heauen and kindleth or setteth the same on fire. Beyond this is yet another Ile, but void of people and all other liuing creatures, sauing a certeine kind of beasts like vnto shéepe, whose nature and forme I haue already touched in the description of Britaine, and therefore omit it here for haste and breuitie sake. Betwixt these Iles also is a right dangerous passage, sith the sea by working of opposite streames hath ingendred a gulfe, which sometimes taketh in all incomprehensible deale of water, and sometimes casteth it forth againe, by meanes whereof many ships that by rage of wind and weather are inforced to come that waie, are either swallowed vp by the waues, or throwne against the rocks to their vtter danger and ruine. The greatest rage of this confluence is at a place called Corebrecke, where it will either sinke, or at the least wise draw any ship vnto it, though it be a full mile distant from the same.

that

Of the nature of the Claike geese, and sundrie maners of their procreation, and of the Ile of Thule.

The eleuenth Chapter.

NOw it is come to hand that I intreat of those gése which are ingendred by the sea, whose procreation hath hitherto béen thought to haue bœne made vpon trées. But the opinion is false, and yet sith their generation is strange indeed, I haue not a little trauelled, and with no small diligence indeuoured to search out the truth héereof, wherby I learne that their ingendrure is rather to be referred to the sea, than any thing els, if my coniecture be onghts: for although that they are in sundrie wise produced, yet I find the same to be performed continuallie in the sea, and not elsewhere, as shall appéere hereafter. All trées cast into that element in processe of time become wormeaten, and in the holes thereof are the said wormes to be found, though verie little and small (in comparison to that they be afterward) to be perceiued at the first. In the beginning, these worms do shew their heads and feet, and last of all their plumes & wings. Finallie when they are come to the iust measure and quantitie of gése, they flie in the aire as other foules do.

This was notablie proued in the yeare of Grace 1490, in sight of many people, beside the castell of Pellego, whither the bodie of a great trée was brought by working of the sea. This trée being taken, it was carried to the lord of the soile, who sone after caused it to be slit in sunder with a saw: which being done, it is incredible to sée, what a multitude at wormes came out of their holes. Of these also some appéered as if they had béene but new shapen, diuers had head, feet and wings, but no feathers, the rest were formed into perfect foules. At last when the people had gazed theron by the space of an whole daie, they carried it to saint Andrewes church beside Tire, where the said blocke remains still to be séene. Within two yeares after there hapned such another trée to come into the firth of Tay beside Dundée, wormeaten and full of yong gése after the same maner: the third was séene in the hauen of Leith beside Edenburgh: and also within a few yéres, in like sort a ship named the Christopher, after she had lien three yéres at anchor in one of these Iles, was brought to Leith, where bicause hir timber was found to be rotten she was taken in sunder, and in hir kéele were found infinite holes as if they had bœne eaten with wormes, or bored with a wimble, and each one of them filled with such creatures as I haue said before.

Héere if any man will alledge that the Christopher was builded of such timber onelie as grew in these Iles, and that all roots and trees there growing, are of such nature as in their corruption do turne into these foules, I will disproue his assertion by one notable example shewed before mine eies. Maister Alexander Galloway parson of Kinkell, was with vs in these Iles, & giuing his mind with attentiue diligence to search out a full resolution with vs of these obscure and hidden matters, it hapned on a time that he tooke vp a branch of Alga, called in Scotish, Seatangle, which hanged full of muskle shels from the root euen to the verie top. Being also desirous to sée what was in them, he grew to be more astonished than before: for when he had opened one or two of them, he saw no fish but a foule perfectlie shapen, fullie answering to the capacitie of the shell.

Finallie, knowing that I was verie inquisitiue of these and the like rare nouelties, he came hastilie with the said hearbe & shewed it vnto me, who found no lesse by experience than I before reported. By these and many other reasons and examples I cannot beléeue that these Claiks (or Barnacls as I call them) are produced either by the qualities of the trées or the roots thereof, but onelie by the nature of the sea, which is the verie cause and productrix of só manie wonderfull creatures. Furthermore, bicause the rude and ignorant people saw oftentimes the fruits that fell from trées, which stood neuer in the sea, conuerted within short time into gése, they beléeued that these gése grew vpon trées, hanging by their nebs as apples and other fruit do by their stalks, but their opinion is vtterlie to be reiected. For so sone as these apples or fruit fall from the trée into the sea, they grow first to be wormeaten, and in processe of time to be conuerted into gése.

Thus haue I spoken sufficientlie of the Iles of the Hebrides adiacent vnto the realme of Scotland, and therewithall would shut vp my discourse of the same, were it not that I haue somewhat to say also of Thule, not vnknowne vnto the Romans, as may appeare by Tacitus, who telleth how the Romane nauie by the commandement of Agricola, was sent to view the coasts of the whole Iland of Britaine, and at their returne reported how they had séene the Thule, with other Ilands lieng about the same. Ptolome writeth that the Ile of Thule is one of the Shetland Iles, which lie néere vnto Norwey, and beyond the Orchades; but this cannot be proued so by late experience: for Thule is manie miles distant from Shetland. Some say that Thule is the same which we call Island: other write that it is the last Ile of the ocean sea, and so is Island, which lieth in the cold frostie sea, beyond the Artike circle toward the north pole. The people of Island because no corne groweth among them, liue onelie by fish, which they drie and powder so small as meale doth come backe from the mill, afterward they mix it with water, and worke it vp for bread.

Of the description of Orkeney, and Shetland, with sundrie other small Iles, and of the maners and conditions of the people dwelling in the same.

The twelfe Chapter.

BEyond the Iles of Scotland lie those of Orkeney, partlie toward the northwest, and partlie toward the Almain seas. The principall Ile of these is called Pomonia, wherein is a bishops sée, and two strong castels. In these groweth no wheat, they are in like sort void of wood, howbeit all other graine groweth there verie plentifullie, they be without all venemous beasts also, neither can such as are brought thither liue ante while, more than in Ireland, which sustaineth no creature that is aduersarie to mankind. Ouer and beside this, there are no frogs: as for eeles they are seldome found and to be seene in the Orchades. Hauing thus fallen into the mention of Ireland, I thinke it good among diuers other rare gifts of nature, to remember one thing that I haue proued by experience to be done there (although the tractation of Ireland and hir commodities apperteine not to this place) which farre passeth all that euer I haue read in bookes.

Certes there is a loch, lin, or pole there, neere vnto the which by manie miles, there groweth neither herbe nor tree; howbeit such is the qualitie of this water, that if a stake be pitched in the same, the nature thereof doth within one yeres space alter and change exceedinglie, for that part thereof which standeth in the ground is conuerted into hard stone, the same that is inuironed with water turneth into tough iron, onelie that portion which is aboue the said element reteining hir former woddie substance, whereby it is often seene how in one and the same bodie, three distinct substances are found, that is to say, stone, iron, and wood, which farre exceedeth all credit. But to returne againe to our Orchades, whereof things of little or no lesse importance are to be rehersed, for sith there is great abundance of barley whereof they make the strongest ale that is to be found in Albion, and thereto knowne, that they are the greatest drinkers of anie men in the world; yet was there neuer drunken or man disguised with drinke seene there, neither anie fole, or person otherwise bereft of his wits through frensie or madnes. There is herevnto small vse of physicke: for mankind liueth there most commonlie vnto extreame age in sound and perfect health, whose bodies also are of strong constitution and verie white of colour.

The ewes that are to be found in these Ilands haue for the most part two or three lambs a peece at euerie eaning, and therewithall they haue in this countrie such plentie of foules both wild and tame, as the like number againe is not to be found in Britaine. Their horsses are litle greter than the French asses, but in their labour they exceed all other. What should I speake of the plentie of fish there to be had, which passeth all credit: among which there is one sort greater than anie horsse, of a maruellous and incredible sluggish desire to sleepe. This fish when shee prouideth to sleepe, fasteneth hir huge teeth vpon some crag that lieth aboue the water, and then slumbreth or falleth into a most sound rest, which the seafaring men espieng, they forthwith cast anchor, and then letting downe their ship-boats, they conueie themselues to the fish, and bore a great hole through hir taile, wherevnto they put one end of a cable, and so make it sure; the other end is fastened to a great anchor, which is let fall of purpose into the sea, and thus is their enterprise attempted yer long to be atchiued. For after this wound, it is not long yer the fish awaketh, who feeling hirselfe to be hurt, leapeth at once into the sea, thinking to hide and shrowd hir in the deepes: but being staid by the weight of the anchor, and indeuouring in vaine to breake the cable, she laboureth so vehementlie, that at the last she windeth hir selfe out of hir skin (for the which she is commonlie taken) and sone after also turneth vp hir bellie, yeelding hirselfe vnto the waues, and hir bodie to the mariners, who make an excellent oile of hir grease, and passing strong cables of hir hide or skin. Certes such is the force of rope made of the skin of this fish, that they will hold at a plunge no lesse than the Spanish sparto. Herein also they exceed the same, in that they will continue verie long without fretting asunder.

An hundred miles beyond the Orchades are the Shetland Iles, whose chiefe commodities stand onelie by fish which is dried in the sun. There are brought also into Scotland out of these Ilands great store of sheepes felles, ore hides, gotes skinnes, and cases of martirnes dried in the sunne. And in the same maner the merchants of Holland, Zeland and Germanie, fetch them yerelie by barter and exchange for other common and necessarie wares, with the people of that nation, who for maners and conditions resemble much the Orchanois. The same in like sort that is said of the Orchanois, concerning drunkennes and frensie, is verified on them, as is also their length of life, although not in so rare maner: sith these in stead of strong ale, content themselues with water, and verie slender diet. Beyond the Shetlands there are diuerse other Ilands of like condition, but without corne and all maner of fleth to feed vpon. These drie their fish in the sunne, and when they are through stiffe, they grind them to small powder, which they worke vp with water into loaues, and so vse the same in lieu of other bread. Their firing consisteth of the bones of such fishes as they take, and yet they content themselues in such maner with this their poore kind of liuelode, that they thinke their estate most happie in respect of such as inhabit in the maine.

Certes there is no quarrelling amongst these for wealth or gaine, but each one prouideth such store of fish in summer which he taketh himselfe, as shall find his familie, or keepe his house in winter. They are void of all ambitious mood, and neuer troubled with ciuill or forren warres, as men that deeme sirne peace and quietnesse, with mutuall loue and amitie, to be the chiefe felicitie to be sought for in this life, and to remaine herein, each one to his power doth shew his whole indeuour. This finallie is to be added vnto their commendation, that they are simple, plaine, void of craft, and all maner of serpentine subtiltie, which endeth commonlie with mischeefe, and reigneth in the maine. Once in the yeere there commeth a priest vnto them from Orkeney, (of which diocesse they are) who ministreth vnto them the sacrament of baptisme, and after a certeine time (hauing taken vp in the meane time his tithes in fish, which is their sole increase, and verie trulie paid) he returneth home againe the same way that he came.

If anie gifts of nature are to be numbred as parcels of worldlie riches and renowme, they are not without these also: for the people of these Iles are lustie, faire, strong of bodie, and high of stature, so that nature hath not failed to indue them with these things, and that in most excellent maner. What should I say of their health, which is and may be preferred aboue all treasure, as they well know that are oppressed with long and greeuous infirmities? For here among these men, you shall very seldome heare of sickenesse to attach anie, vntill extreame age come that killeth them altogither, and this is that exceeding benefit naturallie appropried vnto their carcases. As for their quietnesse of mind, it is alwaies such as is constant, & vnchangeable, and therefore incomparable vnto any riches or huge masse of worldlie treasure.

Herevnto furthermore, if it be true riches (as it is in deed) for ech one not to couet other mens goods, but to content himselfe with that which is his owne, and not to stand in need of anie thing, can anie man be found in anie other region more rich and fortunate than the Shetland men and these Ilanders? Finallie, if those be the true honors, and reuerend duties which the obedient sonne with great sinceritie and void of all flatterie, doth shew vnto his good parents, and wherewithall the best sort do maruellouslie resolse and delite themselues: and that these are also not wanting in these regions, can we iustlie say that these men dw lacke anie thing, or shall we not rather affirme with great assurance, that they rather stand in nèd of nothing that anie mortall man can iustlie wish or desire?

lie

But if there be anie man that will accuse me of vntruth in the recitall of these things, as one that lieth lowd and by authoritie of a people dwelling far off, for so much as I my selfe was neuer in those Ilands, he shall vnderstand that I learned all these things of the reuerend father Edward bishop of the Orchades, with whome one of these Ilanders dwelled, who not onelie made a like rehearsall of these things with his owne mouth, but also verified the same in his owne person, for his height far passed the common stature of men, whereto he was excellentlie well featured in his limbs, so white of skin ouer all, that he might contend in beautie with anie ladie of the land, and finallie so white and strong of bodie, that no man in all those quarters durst run or wrestle with him. Hereby also we may see, how far they are deceiued which iudge them to be barbarous, and miserable creatures, that inhabit far from the tropike lines, for there are no people more happie than those that dwell in these quarters, as I haue proued alreadie.

See Matthiolus vpon the first booke of Dioscorides capite de populo alba & nigra.

Furthermore, among the rocks and crags of these Iles groweth the delectable amber, called Electrum, Chrysolectrum, or (as Discorides saith) Pterygophoron, indued with so vehement an attractiue force, that being chafed it draweth straw, flor, and other like light matter vnto it. This gum is ingendred of the sea froth, which is throwen vp by continuall repercussion of crags and rocks against the sea walls, and through perpetuall working of the waues groweth in time to become tough as glue, till it fall at the last from the rocke againe into the sea. Such as haue often viewed and marked the generation of this gum, whilest it hangeth on the rocke, affirme it to be like a froth and bubble of water without all massie sadnesse, because that as yet it is not sufficientlie hardened by the working of the element.

Alga.

Sometimes the Seatangle is found inuironed also withall, because it is driuen hither and thither by the working of the waues, and so long as it fleets to and fro in this maner, so long is it apt to cleaue to anie thing that it toucheth.

Two yeares before I wrote this booke, there came a great lumpe of amber into Buchquhane, in quantitie so big as anie horsse, which the heardmen that kept their cattell nære hand caught vp, & not knowing in dèd what it was, they caried it home, and threw a portion thereof into the fire: finallie, perceiuing a swèet and delectable sauour to proceèd from the same, they ran by & by to the priest of the towne where they dwelled, telling him how they had found a pèce of stuffe which would serue verie well in stead of frankincense, wherewith to perfume his saints or rather Idols in the church. These men supposed that sir John had bène more cunning than themselues, but contrarie to their expectation, it fell out that he was no lesse vnskilfull & void of knowlege than they; and therefore refusing the whole lumpe, he toke but a small portion thereof, and returned the rest vnto them, whereby it came to little profit and lesse gaine among the common sort, who suffered it to perish by reason of their vnskilfulnesse. Certes when they brake it in pèces, it resembled in color vnto the purest gold, & shined as if it had bène the laie or flame of a candle. Herein also the prouerbe was proued true, that the low recks not of balme. But so soone as I vnderstood of the matter, I vsed such diligence, that one portion thereof was brought to me at Aberden. And thus much of the Hebrides, Orchades, and Shetland Iles subiect vnto the Scotish regiment.

I might (no doubt) haue made rehersall of diuers other strange things worthie the noting in this behalfe: but I haue made choise onelie of the most rare and excellent, and so would finish this description, were it not that one thing hath staied me right pleasant to be remembred, as an vncouth & strange incident, whereof maister James Ogilbie ambassadour from James our king (among other) vnto the king of France, hath certified me, and whereof he had experience of late, at such time as he was constreined by tempest of wether to get to land in Norweie. Thus standeth the case, being driuen (as I said) vpon the shore of Norweie, he and his companie saw a kind of people ranging vp & downe in the mounteins there, much like vnto those which diuers pictures giue forth for wild men, hearie and vglie to behold. In the end being aduertised that they were sauage and wild beasts; yet neuertheless deadlie enimies to mankind: they vnderstood thereunto, that although in the day time they abhorred and feared the sight of man, yet in the night they would by great companies inuade the small villages & countrie townes, killing and sleaing so manie as they found, or where no dogs were kept to put by their rage and furie.

Certes such is their nature, that they stand in great feare of dogs, at whose barking and sight they flie and run away with no small hast and terror, wherefore the inhabitants are inforced to cherish great numbers of the said beasts, thereby to keepe off those wild men that otherwise would annoy them. They are moreouer of such strength, that sometimes they pull vp yong trées by the rots to fight withall among themselues. The ambassadours seeing these vncouth creatures, were not a little astonished, and therefore to be sure from all inuasion, procured a strong gard to watch all night about them, with great fiers to giue light ouer all that quarter, till on the morrow that they toke the sea, and so departed thence. Finallie, the Norwegians shewed them, that there was another people not far off, which liued all the summer time in the sea like fish, & fed of such as they did catch, but in the winter half (because the water is cold) they preied vpon such wild beasts as fed on the mounteins, which comming downe from the snowie hils to grase in the vallies, they killed with darts and weapons, and caried vnto their caues. In this exercise also they tie little boords to their fèt, which beare them vp from sinking into the snow, and so with a staffe in their hands they make the better shift to clime vp and come downe from the crags & mounteins, whereof in that region there is verie great plentie and abundance.

Of the maners of the Scots in these daies, and their comparison with the behauiour of the old, and such as liued long since within this Iland.

The xiij. Chapter.

FOrsmuch as diuers noble men haue desired me to shew apart the old maners of the Scots touched in my historie, to the end it may be knowne how far our nation in these present daies are different in their maners and behaui-behauiour from those of our forefathers, and hereunto although I assure my selfe alreadie that the reuealing of these things will procure vnto me the hatred of sundrie worthie or renowmed personages (of which few will yéeld to heare their doings touched or their errours reproued) yet because I owe such duetie and seruice vnto those that haue made this request vnto me, and least I should seeme ingrate not to hearken vnto them in this behalfe; I haue condescended to the performance of their desires, and so much the rather, for that they alledge how it will be verie profitable vnto all the readers, but especiallie such as are not immoderatlie giuen ouer vnto their owne affections, nor so wholie drowned in their owne sensualitie and pleasures, but vpon consideration of wholesome admonition will be verie willing to leaue whatsoeuer offendeth in them.

First of all therefore, I will declare what vsages haue béene among our elders both in time of warre and peace, and by what wisedome and industrie they haue preuailed so long time against such and so manie mightie aduersaries, as first the Britains, then the Saxons, next of all the Danes which haue entered into this Iland with huge armies to spoile and subdue the same. Furthermore, I will set downe with so much breuitie as I can, how the falling by little and little from the frugalitie and customs of their forefathers, their vertue and force also began in like order to decaie. And finallie how in these daies either by the clemencie of our neighbours, or by their delicat negligence rather than by our owne prowesse, we liue in securitie, and thereby as it were ouerthelmed and wrapped vp in all auarice and excesse, whereinto our want of exercise and martiall prowesse doth maruellouslie impell vs.

Certes I beléeue that by this meanes such as are of the more courragious sort (& yet reteining a sauour of the temperancie of their elders) will reioise to heare their manhod & great prowesse commended in this wise, as others of the contrarie sect (in seruile maner addicted to gather goods, and spend their times in idle excesse and riot) séeing their errors iustlie reprehended, and the dishonor gotten thereby openlie reuealed, will the rather addresse themselues to reformation of their estate, thereby to recouer the ancient renowme of their forefathers, in answering to their prowesse, than proue a reproch vnto their successours, through their lewd behauiours neuer to be forginen. This I protest before all men, that whatsoeuer I shall speake of the euill maners of our times, I do not meane it vnto all, but those onlie whome blind selfe-loue, couetousnes, intemperancie, excesse and abuse of all Gods good gifts haue so touched, that they deserue much more to be reprehended than I will vouchsafe to attempt in this my lateward treatise. Therefore if anie man shall thinke himselfe to be rubbed on the gall by me, I counsell him that he conceale not his infirmitie, by séeking reuenge on other men, but rather indeuour to procure the remedie in first acknowledging his misdemeanors, which is the one and better halfe of his cure.

Our elders although they were right vertuous both in warre abroad, and at home in peace, were yet neuertheless in conuersation & behauiour verie temperat, which is the founteine & originall of all vertues. In sléepe they were competent, in meate and drinke sober, and contented with such food as was readie at hand and prepared with little cost. Their bread consisted of such stuff as grew most readilie on the ground, without all maner of sifting and bolting, whereby to please the palate; but baked vp as it came from the mill without anie such curiositie, which is a great abasing of the force thereof vnto our dailie nourishment. The flesh whereon they chiefelie fed, was either such as they got by hunting, wherein they take great delight, and which increased not a little their strength and nimblenesse, or else such tame cattell as they bred vp at home, whereof béefe was accompted the principall, as it is yet in our daies, though after an other maner and far discrepant from the vse and custome of other countries. The stirkes or yong béefets vngelded, we either kill yong for veale, or geld, to the end that they may serue afterward for tillage in earing vp of the ground, but the cowcalfes and heifers are neuer killed till they be with calfe, for then are they fattest and most delicious to the mouth. The common meat of our elders was fish, howbeit not onlie or somuch for the plentie thereof, as for that our lands laie often waist and vntilled, because of the great warres which they commonlie had in hand. They brake also their fast earlie in the morning with some slender repast, and so continued without anie other diet vntill supper time, in which they had but one dish, whereby it came to passe, that their stomachs were neuer ouercharged, nor their bones desirous of rest through the fulnesse of their bellies. At such time as they determined of set purpose to be merie, they vsed a kind of Aquauite void of all spice, and onelie consisting of such hearbs & roots as grew in their owne gardens, otherwise their common drinke was ale: but in time of warre, when they were inforced to lie in campe, they contented themselues with water as rediest for their turnes. Ech souldier also had so much meale as might serue him for a daie which he made vp in cakes, and baked on the coles, as the Romans sometimes vsed to do, and the emperour Caracalla himselfe (as Herodian hath remembred.) Seldome did they eate anie flesh in their tents, except they got it from their aduersaries; such as they had likewise was eaten halfe raw, because they supposed the iuice thereof so vsed to nourish verie abundantlie. But fish was much more plentifull amongst them, especiallie when they wanted their vsuall preies, or could not atteine vnto them.

They brought furthermore from their houses to the field with them, a vessell of butter, cheese, meale, milke, and vineger tempered togither as a shot-anchor against extreme hunger, on which they would séed and sucke out the moisture, when other prouision could not be gotten. In like maner, whensoeuer they had entred into league and amitie with their enimies, they would not liue in such securitie, that thereby they would suffer their bodies & forces to degenerat, but they did keepe themselues in their former actiuitie and nimblenesse of lims, either with continuall hunting (a game greatlie esteemed amongest our ancestors) or with running from the hilles vnto the vallies, or from the vallies vnto the hilles, or with wrestling, and such kinds of pastims whereby they were neuer idle. Their heads were alwaies shauen after the maner of the ancient Spaniards, with a little tuft of heare onelie left on their forparts, and neuer couered, except when they were troubled with sickenesse, by which means it came to passe, that few of our nation in old time was séene to be bald and heareles. They went also barefoted, or if they had anie shoes, they dipped them first in the water yer they did put them on, especiallie in winter when sharpest weather shewed it selfe, to the end that the soles of their fét (which were well hardned in summer with heat and in winter with cold) might be more strong and able to sustéine great labor and dailie trauell.

Their apparrell was not made for brauerie and pompe, but as should séeme best to couer their bodies, and serue their appointed vses, their hosen were shapen also of linnen or woollen, which neuer came higher than their knees, their breeches were for the most part of hempe, clokes also they had for winter made of course woll, but in the summer time they ware of the finest that could be gotten. They slept moreouer either vpon the bare floore or pallets of straw, teaching their children euen from their infancie to eschew ease, and practise the like hardnesse; and sith it was a cause of suspicion of the mothers fidelitie toward hir husband, to seeke a strange nurse for hir children (although hir milke failed) each woman would take intollerable paines to bring vp and nourish hir owne children. They thought them furthermore not to be kindlie fostered, except they were so well nourished after their births with the milke of their breasts, as they were before they were borne with the bloud of their owne bellies, nay they feared least they should degenerat and grow out of kind, except they gaue them sucke themselues, and eschewed strange milke, therefore in labour and painfulnesse they were equall, & neither set regarded the heat in summer or cold in winter, but trauelled barefoted, and in time of warres the men had their cariages and victuals trussed behind them on their horsses, or else vpon their owne shoulders without refusall of anie labour inioined vnto them by their capteins.

and

If it hapened them at anie time to be vanquished, they fled with such speed to the mounteins, that no horsse might ouertake them, and verie oft escaped. The violence that was done to anie one of them, was reputed common to all, & such was their deadlie fude conceiued in these cases, that vntill they had requited the like with more extremitie, they would neuer be quiet nor let go their displeasure. The noblest and most couragious gentleman would soonest desire to be placed in the fore ward, where his vassalage or seruice & manhod should readilest be seene, and such was the friendship of the nobilitie amongst themselues, that whilst they contended which of them should be most faithfull and friendlie to other, they would oft fall out, and quarell one with another. Sometimes it hapened that their capteine was beset with extreme perill, or peraduenture some other of the nobilitie, in which cases they that were of his band would suddenlie rush in through the thickest of their enimies vnto him, and deliuer him, or else if they could not so do, they would altogither lose their liues with him, thinking it a perpetuall note of reproch to ouerliue their leader.

The graues and sepulchers of our noblemen had commonlie so manie obelisks and spires pitched about them, as the deceassed had killed enimies before time in the field. If anie souldier had beene found in the field without his flint and tinder box, or had walked or gone vp and downe with his sword at his side, and not naked in his hand, for then vsed they light armour for the most part, he was terriblie scourged: but he that sold or mortgaged his weapon, was forthwith cut from his companie, and banished as an exile; he that fled or went from the battell without leaue of his capteine, was slaine whersoeuer he was met afterward, without anie iudgement or sentence, and all his goods confiscated to the prince. Their light armour in those daies consisted of the lance, the bowe, the long sword which hanged at the side of the owner, and thereto a buckler, but afterward heauier armour came into generall vsage.

In these daies also the women of our countrie were of no lesse courage than the men, for all stout maidens & wiues (if they were not with child) marched as well in the field as did the men, and so soone as the armie did set forward, they slue the first liuing creature that they found, in whose bloud they not onelie bathed their swords, but also tasted therof with their mouthes, with no lesse religion and assurance conceiued, than if they had alreadie beene sure of some notable and fortunate victorie. When they saw their owne bloud run from them in the fight, they ware neuer a whit astonished with the matter, but rather doubling their courages, with more egernesse they assailed their enimies. This also is to be noted of them, that they neuer sought anie victorie by treason, falshod, or sleight, as thinking it a great reproch to win the field any otherwise than by meere manhod, prowesse and plaine dealing.

When they went forth vnto the wars, each one went with the king of his owne cost (except the hired souldior) which custome is yet in vse. If any were troubled with the falling euill, or leprosie, or fallen frantike, or otherwise was out of his wits, they were diligentlie sought out: and least those diseases should passe further by infectuous generation vnto their issue & posteritie, they gelded the men. But the women were secluded to some od place far off from the companie of men, where if she afterward happened to be gotten with child, both she and the infant were run through with the lance. Gluttons and raueners, dronkards, and egregious deuourers of victuals were punished also by death, first being permitted to deuoure so much as they listed, and then drowned in one fresh riuer or other.

Furthermore, as iustice in time of war was commonlie driuen to perke, so in daies of peace our countriemen that offended, were oft seuerelie punished and with inconuenient rigor. For they well considered that after their people should returne & come home againe from the warres, they would be giuen to so many enormities, that the same their excesse should hardlie be restreined but by extreame seueritie: such also was their nature, that so soone as they knew themselues guiltie of any offense committed against the estate or commonwealth, their first attempt was to set discord amongst the peeres and princes of the realme, neuertheless when they are gentlie intreated, and with courteous moderation, they are found to be verie tractable and pliant vnto reason: in priuate bargains & contracts they are so willing to giue euerie man his own, that they will yeeld the more. And so farre is it growne into a custome euen in these our daies, that except there be some surplusage aboue the bare couenant, they will breake off and not go forwards with the bargaine.

They vsed at the first the rites and maners of the Aegyptians from whence they came, and in all their priuate affaires they vsed not to write with common letters, as other nations did; but rather with ciphers and figures of creatures made in maner of letters, as their epitaphes vpon their tombes and sepulchers remaining amongst vs do hitherto declare. Neuertheless in our times this hieroglyphicall maner of writing (I wot not by what meanes) is perished and lost, and yet they haue certeine letters proper vnto themselues, which were somtime in common vse but among such as reteine the ancient speach, they haue their aspirations, diphthongs, and pronunciation better than any other. The common sort are not in vse withall, but onlie they which inhabit in the higher part of the countrie, and sith they haue their language more eloquent and apt than others, they are called poets; they make also poets with great solemnitie and honour, being borne out therein by the authoritie of the prince. Besides the skill also of many other arts and sciences, whose rules and methods are turned into the said language, are giuen by tradition from their elders, they chéeflie excell in physicke, wherein they go far beyond manie other, who learning of them the natures and qualities of such hearbs as grow in those quarters, do heale all maner of diseases euen by their onelie application.

are

Certes there is no region in the whole world so barren & vnfruitfull, through distance from the sun, but by the prouidence of God all maner of necessaries for the sustentation of mankind dwelling there are to be had therein, if the inhabitants were such as had any skill how to vse the same in order. Neuertheless our elders, which dwelled continuallie vpon the marches of England, learned the Saxon tong through continuall trade of merchandize and hazard of the wars long since, whereby it came to passe that we neglected our owne language, & our owne maners, and thereto both our ancient order in writing and speaking is vtterlie left among vs, that inhabit nere vnto them; whereas contrariwise those that dwell in the mounteins reteine still their ancient spéech and letters, and almost all their old rites, wherevnto in time past their forefathers haue béene accustomed. One thing hereof also may euidentlie be séene (for an example) in their boats which they call carrocks, for being made of oziers and couered with bull hides, they vse to passe and repasse with them ouer their riuers and waters in catching of samons, and when they haue done, they beare them on their backs vnto what place soeuer it pleaseth them.

But we will now leaue the maners of our ancient friends, and intreat of our later countriemen. In processe of time therefore, and chéeflie about the daies of Malcolme Cammor, our maners began greatlie to change and alter. For when our neighbors the Britons began, after they were subdued by the Romans, to war idle and slouthfull, and thereupon driuen out of their countrie into Wales by their enimies the Saxons, we began to haue alliance (by prorimitie of the Romans) with Englishmen, specíallie after the subuersion of the Picts, and through our dailie trades and conuersation with them, to learne also their maners, and therewithall their language, as I haue said alreadie. Hereby shortlie after it came also to passe, that the temperance and vertue of our ancestors grew to be iudged worthie of small estimation amongst vs, notwithstanding that a certeine idle desire of our former renowme did still remaine within vs.

Furthermore as men not walking in the right path, we began to follow also the vaine shadow of the Germane honor and titles of nobilitie, and boasting of the same after the English maner, it fell out per long, that whereas he in times past was accompted onlie honorable, which excelled other men not in riches and possessions, but in prowesse and manhod, now he would be taken most glorious that went loaden with most titles, wherof it came to passe, that some were named dukes, some earles, some lords, some barons, in which vaine puffes they fired all their felicitie. Before time the noble men of Scotland were of one condition, & called by the name of Thanes, so much in Latine as Quæstores regij, gatherers of the kings duties, in English: and this denomination was giuen vnto them after their desert and merit.

But how far we in these present daies are swarued from the vertues and temperance of our elders, I beléeue there is no man so eloquent, nor indued with such vtterance, as that he is able sufficientlie to expresse. For whereas they gaue their minds to doughtinesse, we applie our selues to drunkennes: they had plentie with sufficiencie, we haue inordinate excesse with superfluitie: they were temperate, we effeminate: and so is the case now altered with vs, that he which can deuoure and drinke most, is the noblest man and most honest companion, and thereto hath no pére if he can once find the veine, though with his great trauell to puruey himself of the plentifullest number of new fine and delicate dishes, and best prouoke his stomach to receiue the greatest quantitie of them, though he neuer make due digestion of it.

Being thus drowned in our delicate gluttonie, it is a world to sée, how we stuffe our selues both daie and night, neuer ceasing to ingorge & powre in, till our bellies be so full that we must néeds depart. Certes it is not supposed méet that we should now content our selues with breakefast and supper onelie, as our elders haue done before vs, nor inough that we haue added our dinners vnto their aforesaid meales, but we must haue thereto our beuerages and reare suppers, so that small time is spared wherein to occupie our selues in any godlie exercise, sith almost the whole daie and night do scarselie suffice for the filling of our panches. We haue also our merchants, whose charge is not to looke out, and bring home such things as necessarilie perteine to the maintenance of our liues, but vnto the furniture of our kitchen, and these search all the secret corners of our forrests for venison, of the aire for foules, and of the sea for fish, for wine also they trauell not only into France, whose wines do now grow into contempt, but also into Spaine, Italie and Créece: nay Affrike is not void of our factors, no nor Asia, and onelie for fine and delicate wines if they might be had for monie.

In like sort they gad ouer all the world for swéet and pleasant spices, and drugs (prouokers vnto all lust and licentiousnesse of behauiour) as men that aduenture their owne liues to bring home poison and destruction vnto their countriemen, as if the mind were not alreadie sufficientlie bereft of hir image of the diuinitie, but must yet more be clogged and ouerladen with such a franked case, therewithall to be extinguished outright, which alreadie dwelleth or is buried rather in such an vglie sepulchre. The bodie likewise being oppressed with such a heape of superfluous food, although otherwise it be indued with an excellent nature, cannot be able to execute his office, nor kéepe him selfe vpright, but must néeds yeeld as ouercome, and to be torne in péeces and rent with sundrie maladies.

Hereof also it commeth to passe, that our countrimen trauelling into the colder regions are now a daies contrarie to their former vsage taken sometime with feuers, whereby their inward parts do burne and parch as it were with continuall fier, the onelie cause whereof we may ascribe vnto those hot spices and drugs which are brought vnto vs from the hot countries. Others of them are so swollen and growne full of humors, that they are often taken suddenlie, and die of vehement apoplexies, and although here and there one or two recouer for a little while, yet are they but dead people, reuiuing againe, leading the rest of their liues like shadows, and walking about as if they were buried alreadie.

Our youth also following these vnhapie steps of their parents, giue themselues wholie to lust and licentiousnesse, hauing all vertue and knowledge in contempt, and eschewing the same as a pestilence and subuersion of their pleasures, wherevnto they aplie themselues as vnto the most excellent trade. But sithens they are now inured, and as it were haunted with these vices, when time doth come of seruice, and that our countrie shall stand in need of manhod, these will become so effeminate, that they must now ride on horsebacke as clad in heauie armor, for on foot they cannot go by reason of their fatnesse, neſſe which choketh vp their vitall forces, neither be able to performe anie thing at all in comparison of the ſouereigne manhood and prowesſe of their elders. So ſone alſo as they returne home, becauſe their poſſeſſions are not otherwiſe able to nourish them vp in pleaſure and pampering of their mawes, they muſt fall to couetous and greedie practiſes, thereby to inrich themſelues, or elſe proue ſtrong théeues, or finally ſowers of diſſention and diſcord among the noble men, thereby to preie ſome commoditie.

Certes theſe and other vices following them neceſſarilie, proceed generallie from none other fountaine than voluptuous life and intemperancie, the which if we would refraine, there is no region vnder the ſunne that would proue more wholſome, leſſe ſubiect to peſtilence, nor more commodious and profitable for the ſuſtentation of hir people. Certes I deſpaire not of the redreſſe of theſe things, but ſtill hope that in ſhort time theſe corrupt maners of my countriemen will be turned into better frame. We are not yet become impudent, neither altogither haue caſt off vnſhamefaſtneſſe, ſith that in a great manie ſome remainder of our ancient ſoberneſſe and manhood doth yet appeare, and thereto newneſſe of life with feruent deuotion increaſe euerie day, through the working of the zeale of our chriſtian religion in vs.

This alſo will I adde, without offenſe vnto other nations, that there was neuer people more ſtedfaſt to my knowledge in the chriſtian faith, nor more conſtant in their faithfull promiſes, than the Scots haue béene ſince their firſt beginning: and for a concluſion I will ſay more, not onelie for their praiſe, but alſo in exhorting them vnto perſeuerance, that as our people now liuing do paſſe their anceſtors in ſumptuous and curious attire, ſo they are more neat and fine in their houſes, better giuen to learning, and much more magnificent in building and decking of their churches. God grant them alſo to returne to their former frugalitie, and that with ſpéed, Amen.

¶ Hitherto haue I tranſlated Hectors deſcription of Scotland out of the Scotiſh into the Engliſh tong, being not a little aided therein by the Latine, from whence ſometime the tranſlator ſwarueth not a little, as I haue done alſo from him, now and then following the Latine, and now and then gathering ſuch ſenſe out of both, as moſt did ſtand with my purpoſed breuitie. Now will I ſet downe the deſcription of an ancient Pict, as I haue gathered it out of Herodian and other, and then I will giue ouer not onelie to write more at this preſent, but for euer hereafter of anie hiſtoricall matters, ſith I ſée that this honeſt kind of recreation is denied me, and all time ſpent about the ſame in theſe daies vtterly condemned, as vaine and ſauouring of negligence, and heatheniſh impietie.

The deſcription of an ancient Pict.

The 14 Chapter.

THe Pict (ſaith Herodian) hath generallie no vſe in apparell, howbeit the nobler ſort of them do wrap their heads and wombs in hoops of iron, which they take for great brauerie, eſteeming this kind of attire, in ſuch as weare the ſame, to be a token of wealth and riches, and ſo great an ornament, as if they had worne gold or any coſtlie iewels. Beſide this, and the ſhauing of their nether lip, they painted ouer their bodies with the images of all kinds of beaſts, ſo that he was the gaieſt man that had his ſkin moſt diſguiſed in this maner. Certes none of them regarded to weare anie apparell, becauſe they eſteemed it a great glorie to haue theſe paintings ſéene. In warres they were bold, and deſirous to ſhed blood, contenting themſelues (in ſtéed of other armor) with a ſhort lance, and narrow target or buckler, their ſwords were tied to their naked ſides with a thong, and as for iacke, ſhirt of male, or helmet, they made no regard of them, becauſe they would trouble them in ſwimming, or otherwiſe at a pinch, when they ſhould be compelled to wade.

Dion writing generallie of the whole countrie, diuideth it with Herodian into the Caledons & Meats, ſaieng that the ſaid countrie is verie ſauage, their cities void of walles, and fields without townes: they liue moreouer (ſaith he) by hunting and preie, and oftentimes with the fruit of their trées: and albeit that they haue exceeding plentie of fiſh, yet they eat not of it. They liue naked in tents, and without ſhoes on their feet, their wiues are common, and children generallie loked vnto: they haue moreouer a populous regiment, and are verie readie to ſteale: they fight in wagons, and haue little light and ſwift horſſes, which run alſo verie ſwiftlie, & ſtand at their feet with like ſtedfaſtneſſe. In the nether end of their lances they haue hollow bullets of braſſe, in each is a little péece or two of iron, which ratleth when they ſhake it, and maketh a ſtrange noiſe where manie of them are togither. They haue alſo narrow daggers, but chéeflie they can ſuſteine hunger and cold beſt of all men, and likewiſe ſore labour: and if it happen them to hunger and haue no meat at hand, they will ſit in the marriſhes vp to the chins by manie daies togither. In the woods they féed on roots or barkes of trees, and they haue a kind of meat among them, whereof if they take but ſo much as a beane, they neither hunger nor thirſt in a long time after. And thus much of the Meats (which were the néereſt vs) and the Caledons that dwelled beyond the wall, and both in their prouince called Maxima Ceſarienſis, thereof let this ſuffice.

The number of biſhops in Scotland.

The xv Chapter.

THe archbiſhoprik of S. Andrewes
Glaſco
Dunfalden
Dunblanen
Aberden
Brechen
Morauie
Ros
Whitherne
Cathnes
Argadie
Orkenie
Mor one of the Iles which are exempt and perteine vnto the pope.

Vniuerſities.
S. Andrews
Aberden
Glaſco.

Dukedomes.
Rothſay
Albanie.

Earledomes.
Cathnes
Sotherland
Roſſe
Morauie
Buchquhan
Garuiach
Garmoran
Mar
Mernis
Angus
Gowri
Fiffe
Marche
Athole
Stratherne
Menteth
Leuenor
Wigton
Duglaſſe
Carrike
Crawford
Annandale
Durmonth
Huntley.

Viſcounties.
Berwike alias north Berwike
Rorborow
Selkirke
Twedale
Dunfriſe
Niddiſdale
Wigton
Are Lanarke
Dumbritten
Sterueling
Louthian
Clakmanan
Kimos
Fiffe
Perth
Angus
Mernis
Aberden
Banph
Fores Inuernes.

FINIS.

1585

THE

Hiſtorie of Scotland,

conteining the beginning, increaſe, proceedings, continuance, acts and gouernement of the Scotiſh nation, from the originall thereof vnto the yeere 1571, gathered and written in Engliſh by Raphaell Hollinſhead: and continued from 1571, to 1585, by others:

With a table of the principall particularities herein conteined.

M. Pal. in Ari.

Hiſtoriæ placeant noſtrates ac
peregrinæ.

Cum priuilegio Regiæ
Maieſtatis.

THE

History of Scotland, containing the beginning, increasings, continuance, and gouernament of the Scotish nation, from the original thereof vnto the yeere 1571. Gathered and written in English by Raphael

Hollinshed: and continued from 1571. to 1585. by others:

With a table of the principall

particularities therin contained.

Psal. 119. 111.

Historiæ placeant nobis tuæ ac

peregrinæ.

Cum priuilegio Regiæ

Maiestatis.

To the Right Honorable the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leiceſter, Baron of Denbigh, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, Maiſter of the Queenes Maieſties horſſe, and one of hir Highneſſe priuie Councell.

I may ſeeme (Right Honorable) a great preſumption in mee, to haue taken in hand the collection of this Scotiſh hiſtorie, and other of diuers regions, conſidering ſo many ſufficient men as liue in theſe daies, farre more able to performe the ſame. But where at the motion of a ſpeciall friend, I vndertooke to deale therein, more vpon truſt of his promiſed aid than of mine owne abilitie, it pleaſed GOD to call him to his mercie before the worke could be fullie brought to an end: but yet to anſwer the expectation of his friends, and truſt which he had committed to them and me in this behalfe, I haue doone my good will to accompliſh part of that, which in his life time was intended, although not to my wiſhed deſire, by reaſon of ſuch wants as had beene ſupplied if he had liued to haue ſeene it publiſhed himſelfe.

It reſteth (right noble Earle) that it may pleaſe your Honor to accept my dooings in good part, to whom I offer this parcell of my trauels in this hiſtorie of Scotland, in regard of the honor due to your noble father, for his incomparable valure well knowne and approoued, as well within that realme as elſe-where in ſeruice of two kings of moſt famous memorie, Henrie the eight & Edward the ſixt, ſounding ſo greatlie to his renowme, as the ſame cannot paſſe in ſilence, whileſt any remembrance of thoſe two moſt peereleſſe princes ſhall remaine in written hiſtories. I therefore moſt humblie beſeech your Honor, to beare with my boldneſſe in preſen- ting you with so meane a gift, proceeding from one, although vnknowen to your Lordship, yet not without experience of your bountifull goodnesse extended towards those, to whome I reckon my selfe most beholden. As what is he within this realme almost of anie degree, which findeth not himselfe bounden to your Honor, either in his owne causes or his friends? For such is your inclination to pleasure all men, as the same may seeme a peculiar vertue planted in your noble heart, mouing you so much to delight therein, as no time is thought by your Honor better spent, than that which you employ in dooing good to others.

But least I should enter into so large a discourse, as might be framed of this and other your excellent vertues (a matter far exceeding my simple knowledge) I will ceasse to speake further thereof, sith the same is spread ouer all, aswell this as other regions: for no where doo want great numbers of such as haue abundantlie tasted of your exceeding courtesies. In making you owner therefore of this abstract of the Scotish histories, I most humblie beseech your Honor, if anie thing be amisse, to impute the same to the imperfection and defect of better instructions, and with your benigne and fauorable interpretation to haue me therein excused. Such as it is, I addresse it to your good Lordship with so dutifull a mind as may be imagined, beseeching God to preserue your Honor with plentifull increase of wisedome, vertue, and all wishfull prosperitie.

Your Honors most humble to be commanded Raphaell Hollinshed.

THE HISTORIE OF Scotland.

THe Scotish men, according to the maner of other nations, esteeming it a glorie to fetch their beginning of great ancientie, say that their originall descent cam frō the Grēks and Aegyptians: for there was (as the old Scotish historiographers haue left in writing) a certeine noble man among the Grēks, named Gathelus, the sonne of Cecrops, who builded the citie of Athens: or as some other would, he was the sonne of Argus Nealus, the fourth king of the Argiues. This Gathelus plaieng in his youth manie wild and vnrulie parts in the countrie of Macedonia and Achaia, was diuers times sharplie rebuked by his father and other of his friends: so that in fine disdaining their correction and wholsome admonitions, he was banished by his father: after which he got togither a number of strong and lustie yong men, such as had vsed the like trade of liuing, and with them fled ouer into Aegypt; and comming thither in the 33 yeare of Pharao Orus as then king of that countrie, was receiued of him in most gladsome wise, for that his seruice (as was thought) might stand in great stead in those warres, which the Aegyptians held at that time with the Aethiopians that had inuaded the realme of Aegypt, euen vnto Memphis. This Gathelus, to be short, went forth with his bands against the same Aethiopians, vnder Moses the capteine generall of the armie, chosen thereto by diuine oracle (as Iosephus writeth) which Moses obteined the victorie, and conquered Saba by force being the chiefest and principall citie which stood in the Ile Meroe.

Gathelus.

Gathelus giuen to will and pleasure.

Gathelus went into Aegypt, Anno mundi 2416.

Gathelus was interteined of Pharao.

Gathelus went against the enimies.

Moses capteine generall vnder Pharao.

Ios. lib. 2. cap. 7.

For such tokens of valiancie and worthie prowesse as Gathelus shewed, both in this countrie, and in other places, he grew also into such estimation with Pharao, that he gaue him his daughter in mariage. But Moses was rather enuied than honored for his doing, because the Aegyptians doubted least the Israelites should increase to such a puissant multitude, that in the end they might vsurpe and challenge the gouernance of the whole realme, and bring it by rebelling into their owne hands: wherefore diuers informations were made to the king against him, so that when he once perceiued himselfe to be in danger of the lawe, and looked for no mercie at their hands, he fled from thence out of the countrie, & got him into the land of Madian. Vnto Gathelus and his people there was giuen a citie called Thebes [Aegyptiaca] beeing taken from the Israelites. ¶ Here you must vnderstand, that Pharaos daughter which Gathelus thus maried, was called Scota, of whome such as came of the posteritie of that nation were afterwards, and are at this present day called Scoti, that is to say Scotishmen, and the land where they inhabit Scotia, that is to say, Scotland.

Gathelus dwings advanced.

Moses dwings not allowed.

Moses fled.

The citie of Thebes was giuen vnto Gathelus.

Scota daughter to Pharao.

Gathelus thus being aduanced by such honorable mariage, liued all the daies of his father in law Pharao Orus, in great honor. But after his decease, and in the third generation, an other king named Pharao Chencres succeeded in his throne, who oppressed the people of Israell then abiding in Aegypt, with more bondage than euer his father or grandfather had done before him. Neither was there hope of anie redresse, till Moses returned by Gods appointment from amongst the Madianites (where he had remained in exile) into Aegypt, and there declared vnto this Pharao, Gods commandement, touching the deliuerance of his people.

The credit of this historie of Gathelus we leaue to the authors.

Israel oppressed.

Moses called out of Madian into Aegypt.

But forsomuch as his words were regarded, neither with the king, nor with his subiects, that land was plagued in most horrible maner; and moreouer it was signified vnto such as sought to know what was meant by way of oracles, that sorer and more grieuous plagues should after follow, if remedie were not found the sooner. Gathelus therefore being certified hereof, and giuing credit to the oracles aforesaid, determined out of hand to forsake the countrie, and seeke him a new place of abode in some other parties of the world. Wherefore he caused a number of ships to be rigged, and all necessarie purueiance to be prouided, and when the same was once readie, and all things set in order, he tooke with him his wife and children, and a great multitude of people both Grēkes and Aegyptians, whom he imbarked in those ships, and hoising vp sailes, departed out of the mouth of the riuer Nilus, in the yeare of the worlds creation 2453, when he had dwelled in Aegypt 39 yeares and more. Being thus departed, after some trouble in the voiage, they arriued first on the coasts of Numidia, which is one of the regions of Affrike, now called Barbarie: but being put backe from thence by the stout resistance of the inhabitants, they tooke the seas againe, and landed in a part of Spaine, which long after was called Lusitania.

Moses not regarded. Exodus 5.

Gathelus leauing Aegypt, seeketh other countries.

Gathelus departing was, Anno mundi, 2453. W.H. 3643. H.B.

He was repelled from Barbarie.

There be that haue written how it should be cleped port Gathele of this Gathelus, and certeine yeares after Lusitania, and eftsones againe in a maner to haue got the former name, being somethat corruptlie called Portingale. But who is able in a matter of such anciencie to auouch anie thing for truth?

He landed in Portingale.

Gathelus with his companie being thus come to land, sought abroad in the countrie for victuals, and such other necessarie things as they wanted (for their long being on the seas had wasted all their purueiance:) whose arriuall being once knowne in the countrie, the people assembled togither, and fiercely incountring with the strangers, after sharpe and cruell fight, in the end the Spaniards were put to the worst and chased out of the field. This victorie put Gathelus and his folks in hope of good successe to haue there a place for them to inhabit in, and so to end their long wandering in strange and vncerteine places. And to the intent they might bring their purpose the more easilie to passe, they found means by way of communication to ioine in friendship with the Spaniards, and obteining of them a plot where they might build a place for to inhabit in; shortlie after they began the foundation of a citie nere to the banks of the riuer called of ancient time Mundus, and afterwards Bracchara.

The inhabitants resist Gathelus.

A communication.

Gathelus buildeth the citie Bracchara.

It chanced after this, that the Spaniards (perceiuing these strangers to increase further in puissance than, as they thought, stood well with their securitie) sought diuerse occasions to fall at debate with them, and to make warres vpon them: but when they vnderstood that Gathelus was as readie to defend, as they were to inuade, they eftsoones fell to a communication, & persuaded with Gathelus, that it should be best for him and his people, for the auoiding of variance, to remoue vnto the northside of Spaine, lieng vpon the coasts of the Cantabrian seas, now called Galitia (where he should find much void ground, by reason of the small number of inhabitants) adding that if they would so do, they would aid them to the vttermost against all such as should attempt to disquiet their indeuours in anie maner of wise. This offer Gathelus gladlie accepted, and causing publike sacrifice to be celebrated in honor of the gods, he departed with all his people into Galitia, and there concluding a league with the inhabitants, builded a citie which he named Brigantia, but after it was named Nouium, and now Compostella.

A communication.

Gathelus left Portingale, and went into Galitia.

He builded a citie called Brigantia, and now Compostella.

Gathelus.

HEre Gathelus being intituled by the name of a king, deuised and ordeined lawes for his people to liue by, that the citie might not onelie be fensed with strong walles, but also with good and holsome statutes and ordinances, the chiefest fortifications that may be for all cities and countries. And because he would not onelie haue his said people to liue vnder one law, but also to be knowne and called by one name, he gaue commandement that they should be all called Scotishmen (as before is said) of his wife Scota. In continuance of time, this nation grew to a wonderfull multitude, so that the Spaniards doubting the worst, determined to foresee remedie in time, and herevpon purposing vtterlie to destroie them, got them againe to armour, and with their whole puissance comming vpon the Scotishmen, gaue them a sore battell, though in the end they were put to flight, the victorie remaining with the Scotishmen, albeit not without great bloudshed on either part, as the Scotish historie saieth. At length a necessarie peace was agreed vpon betwixt both parties, the conditions whereof were these: that aswell Scotishmen as Spaniards should liue after their owne lawes, and neither of them to inuade other.

He maketh lawes and ordinances.

The Spaniards fight with the Scots infortunatlie.

A peace concluded.

Gathelus hauing peace thus with his neighbors, sat vpon his marble stone in Brigantia, where he gaue lawes, and ministred iustice vnto his people, thereby to mainteine them in wealth and quietnesse. This stone was in fashion like a seat or chaire, hauing such a fatall destinie, as the Scots say, following it, that whersoeuer it should be found, there should the Scotishmen reigne and haue the supreme gouernance. Hereof it came to passe, that first in Spaine, after in Ireland, and then in Scotland, the kings which ruled ouer the Scotishmen, receiued the crowne sitting vpon that stone, vntill the time of Robert the first king of Scotland. The inscription also of the stone, though ingrauen long time after, as should appeare, was this:

Gathelus ministred iustice. A description of the seat.

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunq; locatum
Inuenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.

Which may be thus translated:

Except old sawes doo faile,
and wisards wits be blind,
The Scots in place must reigne, where they this stone shall find.

But to returne where I left touching Gathelus. When he perceiued that his people multiplied in such wise, as the countrie which was appointed him by the last agreement, was not able to susteine them, he was loth to breake the peace which he had established with the Spaniards, by seeking to inlarge the bounds of his dominion with breach of couenant: and therefore vnderstanding that there was an Iland lieng north ouer against Spaine, wherein were but few inhabitors, he caused all such ships as he was able to make, to be brought togither into an hauen nere vnto Brigantia, and commanding a great armie of his owne people and subiects to be assembled, he appointed his two sonnes whome hee had by his wife Scota, the one named Hiberus, and the other Himecus, to conueie them ouer into that Iland, which afterwards they named Hibernia, after Hiberus, but now it is commonlie called Ireland.

Galitia not sufficient to find the Scots.

The Scots seeke new seats.

At their first arriuall there, they came into the hauen of Dundalke, where getting on land, they first incamped themselues nere the shore, and then sent forth certeine of their folks to search if they could learne what people inhabited in the countrie, by whome at their returne, and by such as they had happened vpon and brought with them, they vnderstood how there was no great number of inhabitants in that Ile, and that they which dwelled there were verie simple, such I meane as liued onelie by milke and herbs, with other the like things as the earth by nature brought forth of hir owne accord, without mans helpe or vse of anie tillage. Herevpon Hiber with his brother Himecus, went not about with force, but by gentlenesse to win those people, minding to ioine them in friendship so with their Scotishmen, that both the people might be made as one. Neither was this hard to be done, sithens the inhabitants (perceiuing the Scotishmen not to go about to harme them) came flocking in wholie about them, submitting themselues into their hands with gladnesse.

The Scots arriue in Ireland.

Irishmen liue by milke and heerbes.

Irishmen are gentlie intreated.

Hiber.

WHen things were once set here in a stay, and that orders were giuen how the land should be conuerted vnto tillage, and manured for the better bringing forth of such things as serue for mans sustenance, Hiber (leauing his brother in charge with the gouernance of all those which were appointed to abide there in Ireland) with the most part of the ships and residue of the companie, sailed backe into Spaine, where finding his father Gathelus dead, he succeeded in his place of gouernement, to the great reioising of all the people there.

Hiber returned into Spaine.

Hiber succeeded his father Gathelus.

This Hiber was a man of great courage, and more giuen to the wars than his father before him, so that where his father contenting himselfe with the bounds and limits of the countrie assigned him by composition, sought no further (as is said) to inlarge the Hiber a conquerour.

the same: Hiber ceassed not to conquer cities and townes nere adioining to the borders of his subiects, by reason whereof his fame spred ouer all those parties; and in the end constreined his enimies to seeke for peace, which he willinglie granted: so that a league being concluded betwixt the Scots and Spaniards, the same tooke such good successe, that within certeine yeres after, both the nations, what by mariage and other contracts, which they exercised togither, became one. The succession also of kings continued after Hibers decease in his posteritie a long season; amongst the which, Hetellus, Hermoneus, Ptolomeus, Hibertus, and Simon Brechus were of most worthie fame, as is recorded by such as haue written the histories of that nation more at large.

Peace.

Spaniards & Scots becom one people.

Hemecus.

Hemecus K. of Ireland.

IN the meane while that these things were thus a doing in Spaine, Himecus being left, as is before remembred, in Ireland, to haue the gouernance there, ruled both the people of Scotishmen, and the former inhabitans, with as much indifferencie as was possible: yet could he not ioine them so in one, but that after his decease either of them would haue seuerall rulers of their owne nation to gouerne them: by reason whereof, falling eftsones at discord amongst themselues, there insued sharpe and cruell warres betwixt them, which being ended sometime by truce (when both parties hapilie were throughlie wearied) they renewed notwithstanding their malicious strife againe, so soone as they had once recouered their decaied strengths, so that the one seeking the others destruction, they continued in great disquietnes for a long time. These Scotishmen being thus troubled in Ireland, finallie addressed an ambassage vnto Hetellus, who as then reigned amongst the Scotish men in Spaine, requiring him of aid and succor against their enimies, who went about with toth and naile to expell all the Scotish nation out of Ireland, which they were like inough to bring to passe, if in time there were not spedie remedie through his aid prouided for the contrarie.

Dissention.

The Scots send an ambassador vnto Hetellus in Spaine.

Aid sent to assist the Scots in Ireland.

Hetellus hearing these newes, as a man moued with a naturall zeale toward all the Scotish linage, gaue eare to their request, supposing it should be his part to defend his kinsfolke from all wrong and iniuries: immediatlie therefore he sent his three sons, Hermoneus, Ptolemeus, and Hibertus, with a chosen power of warriors ouer into Ireland, where vanquishing the enimies with fierce and cruell battels, they set the Scotishmen in sure and quiet possession of all their lands and liuings. This done Ptolomeus and Hibertus remained there to rule and inhabit the countrie. But Hermoneus, who was the eldest brother, returned backe againe to Spaine, there to succeed his father when time should serue thereto.

Hermoneus returned into Spain againe

After this the Scotish estate continued many yeares in good quiet in Ireland, the people still increasing in wealth and puissance, till prosperitie the mother of contention, stirred vp grudge and partialities amongst them, which shortlie would haue decaied the force of the Scotish nation, if the ancient lords had not prouided redresse in time, which was to persuade the people to haue a king of their owne, who being partaker with none of them in their factions, might haue the absolute gouernance of the whole, so that by common consent they sent into Spaine for one Simon Brech, whose name was right famous amongst them in that season, both as well for that he was lineallie descended of the bloud rotall, as also for that he had shewed many proues of his noble valiancie in sundrie affaires and businesse. This Simon being glad of these tidings, sailed quicklie into Ireland, and brought thither with him amongst other princelie iewels and regall monuments, the fatall stone of marble, wherein he caused himselfe to be crowned, in token of his full possession and establishment ouer that kingdome.

Simon Brech.

Brechus came into Ireland.

Brechus.

BRechus being thus crowned, was the first king that reigned ouer the Scots in Ireland, who began his reigne there, in the yere from the creation of the world 3270, which time by maister Harisons, account is after the floud 1616, from the first building of Rome 55, after the entrie of Brutus into Britaine 870, and before the incarnation of our sauiour 697. And hauing ruled his subiects with great iustice by the space of fortie yeres or thereabout, he died, after whose decease succeeded Fandufus, who had issue Ethion, and he begat Glaucus, which Glaucus begat Noitafilus, the father of Rothsay: all of them reigned successiuelie ouer the Scotishmen in Ireland, as in the description of that land more plainelie may appere.

4504 H.B.

60 H.B.

696 H.B.

Fandufus.

This Rothsay (perceiuing the Scotish nation increased to a greater multitude in Ireland than the countrie was well able to susteine) transported ouer certeine numbers of them into the Iles ancientlie called Ebonides, afterwards Hebrides, but now by the Scots, the westerne Iles, bicause they lie on the west halfe of Scotland: and there they placed them to inhabit. He named also that Ile which he first began to possesse Rothsay, after his owne name. Which translation of these Scotishmen into those Iles was 133 yeres after the coronation of Brechus.

Rothsay. The Scots ferrie ouer into the westerne Iles.

They inhabit the Ile of Rothsay.

This Rothsay had not beene long in those Iles, but that hearing of his fathers decease, he returned into Ireland to succeed in his place. Where the Scotishmen perceiuing the fertilitie of the Iles, and how the same serued well for the breeding of cattell, became so desirous to inhabit there, that they went ouer thither dailie in great numbers, with their wiues, children, and whole families, so that within a short time they multiplied in such wise, that the Iles were not large inough to find them sustenance, by reason whereof diuers companies of them got them ouer into the maine land of the north part of this our Britaine, called as then Albion, where they first inhabited a waste and desert portion thereof, lieng toward the west, ouer against the foreremembred Iles, by them alreadie inhabited, Anno 3383. That part where they first began to settle themselues, they named Argathelia, after the name of their first captein and guide Gathelus, but the inhabitants at this day call it Arguile.

The Scots inhabit the maine land of Scotland.

4617 H.B.

They inhabit the countrie called Arguile

At their first comming, bicause they perceiued they could not liue without lawes and ciuill gouernment, they seuered themselues into tribes, or as it were into hundreds, or wapentakes, euerie of the same hauing a speciall gouernor to see their lawes ministred, and iustice mainteined: which gouernors were had in such reuerence, that they were as much afraid to sweare by the name of any one of them, as they were by the gods. In this state they continued many a yeere, increasing in processe of time vnto a mightie nation, and liued in good rest without trouble of warres or inuasion made vpon them by any forren enimie. In this meane time also, the Picts, which were a certeine people of Germanie, as most writers do agree, came and set fot also in another part of Britaine, which now is comprehended likewise within Scotland.

They make lawes and ordinances.

Gouernors had in reuerence.

They liue in peace.

The Picts came into Scotland out of Germanie.

Some saie that they came forth of the hether part of Scithia, and other there be which hold opinion, that they descended of the people named in old time Agathyrsi, which inhabited in a part of Sarmatia, and were called Picts, bicause they vsed to paint and colour their faces, or (as some suppose) for that they vsed vsed gaie apparell of diuers and sundrie colours: but the same writers generallie confesse, that they first came into Germanie or hither Scythia (that is to meane Denmarke) many yéeres before they entred into Britaine. Truth it is that they first came out of Germanie, into the Iles of Orkeney, and there inhabiting for a season, ferried ouer into Cathnesse, whereof it came to passe, that the streict there at this present is called Pictland firth: and so in continuance of time increasing in number, they passed further into the land, and got possession of Rosse, Murrey land, Perne, and Angus, and after that, entring into Fife and Louthian, they droue such Britains from thence as inhabited there before, which were but a simple kind of people, as those that applied nothing but onelie nourishing and bréeding of cattell.

The Picts came first into Orkeney, and changing their seats came into the maine land of Scotland, Pictland, Firth.

These Picts, as by conference of times may appéere, entred first into Scotland, about the yeare after the creation of the world 3633, and being once arriued, they began to erect and build certeine forts, wherein they might defend themselues, if any force of enimies should chance to put them to such shifts; but perceiuing they could not continue any time without wiues to mainteine their stocke and progenie by bringing forth issue, they thought it expedient to require of the Scotishmen some number of women to marrie with, that thereby a sure alliance might be had betwixt both nations, & that if néed required, they might the better defend them from their common enimies the Britains, whom they knew would be loth to sée the increase of either Scots or Picts, as those that were strangers to them, and vsurpers vpon their confines.

4867 H. B.

The Picts make strong holds.

The Picts require wome of the Scots.

This request was granted, and a full league ratified betwixt the Scotishmen and Picts, with couenants, that neither of them should sèeke to vsurpe any péece of that which the other held, but content themselues with their owne marches. And further, he that attempted to wrong the one, should be accounted an enimie to both: and against whom they should be readie to ioine their powers in either others defense. Also it was accorded, that if at anie time it were doubtfull who ought to succéed in the gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, some one descended of those Scotish women should be admitted to the throne.

A league made.

The succession of the gouernement.

This aliance was euen at the first misliked of the Britains, who doubted, that if these two nations should once be ioined inseparablie togither, they might in time to come increase to greater puissance than should stand well with the suertie of their estate. Therefore studieng how to preuent that danger, they thought the readiest meane to destroie both those nations was (if they might bring it to passe) to set them first togither by the eares amongst themselues, that afterwards when their powers were by such meanes sore abated, they might the more easilie subdue them at their pleasures. This deuise the Britains kept secret for a time, till occasion serued to worke their intent. In which meane while the affinitie betwixt the Scots and Picts increased to the wealth of both nations, and for the issue sake great loue and friendship was mainteined among them.

Their aliance misliked.

Dissention a present destroier.

The Picts good husbandmen.

The Scots giuen to hunting and fouling.

The Picts applied themselues to tilling the ground, and building of fortresses: the Scots set all their delight in hunting and fouling, vsing about the same to go armed in tacks and light iesternes with bow and arrowes, no otherwise than if it had bene in open warre: for in this exercise they placed all the hope of the defense of their possessions, lands and liberties.

The Britains send ambassadors vnto the Picts.

A craftie suggestion.

Prophesies.

The Britains send

At length, the Britains perceiuing happilie some grudge or ennie to be entred amongst them, they sent solemne ambassadors vnto the Picts, declaring that it were more honorable for them to ioine in league with the Britains, than with the Scots: which Britains were knowne to be famous, both in peace and war, and inhabited a countrie most fruitfull and replenished with all commodities necessarie hauing therein rich mines of diuers kinds of mettall, where the Scots being a rude nation, wild and sauage, inhabited a barren countrie, full of rough and fruitlesse mounteins, delighting thereto in nothing but in the slaughter of men and beasts. And hereunto they added that (which most moued the Picts) how it was foretold them by prophesies, that the Scots through treason should vtterlie in time to come extinguish and destroie all the Pictish bloud. Which persuasions induced the Picts at the last, to make a league with the Britains, who promised their aid at all times, in whatsoeuer enterprise the Picts should take in hand against the Scots, and as often as occasion should require.

The Picts become enimies to the Scots.

This league thus being confirmed with the Britains, incouraged the Picts so, that they sought dailie how to picke quarels, and fall out with the Scotishmen: whereupon making proclamation that no Scotishman should enter into their borders, vpon paine of death: some such as they tooke within the same, they cruellie slue; other they ransomed at excessiue summes: whereupon the Scots being kindled with iust displeasure, on the other side requited them with the like, euer as they caught any of the said Picts by hap or otherwise amongst them, or in their walks.

The Scots reuenge the in iurie done vnto them.

The one nation séeking thus to be reuenged of the other, there insued open war betwixt them: whereupon the Scotishmen, to the end they might be the better able to mainteine their quarell, sent ouer their ambassadors vnto their kinsmen in Ireland, requiring them of aid in that present danger, as hauing now not onelie warres with the Picts, but also with the Britains, who minded nothing but the vtter destruction of them and their linage, except spèedie remedie were found. And for that they saw it néedfull to haue one onelie head and gouernor, they made sute also to haue some captaine of honor with them into Albion, vnto whom as to their king they would submit themselues. In that season amongst the Irish Scotishmen, there reigned a king named Ferguhardus, who inclining to the petition of the British Scots, caused an huge armie forthwith to be leuied, and thereto he appointed his owne sonne Fergusius to be generall of the same, a worthie yong gentleman, and an expert warrior: whome hee sent ouer with his puissant companie, in such speed as was possible. He had also with him the marble stone, that he might conceiue the better hope to reigne there as a king, bicause he went forth vnto such a dangerous warre.

They require a gouernor.

Ferguhardus king in Ireland.

Fergusius sent into Scotland.

The marble stone.

Such also as went with him in this iournie, had their wiues, their children, and all their substance with them, as the maner of the nation then was, when they went forth into any forren countrie. Now it came to passe that this Fergusius was no sooner come into Albion among the Scotishmen there, but that in a parlement called and assembled in Argile for the purpose, they first consulted after what sort they might mainteine themselues against their enimies, and what order for gouernment should be obserued amongst them. Where finallie for auoiding of such inconueniences, as might rise through manie gouernors, they decréed to chose onlie one, whome in all things, as their king & head, they would from thencefoorth follow and obeie.

Fergusius landed in Albion.

A parlement.

A king is for to be obeied.

BVt bicause there was none thought so mét to beare that office, as Fergusius, and that the

Fergusius

chaire

chaire of hope was also brought with him: they concluded by whole consent to commit that charge vnto him, and so to the great reioising of the people, he was placed vpon his marble stone, and crowned king, being the first of the Scotish nation that euer ruled in Albion as absolute gouernor, who began his reigne in the yeare after the creation of the world 3640, which is (as Harison saith in his chronologie) before the incarnation of our sauiour 327, after the building of Rome 420, and after the entring of Brutus into Britaine 790.

The kingdome of the Scotishmen being thus begun in Albion, Fergus take vpon him to rule as king, making prouision on all sides to resist his enimies: who whilest these things were a doing in Argile, had assembled their powers: vnto whom also the Britains had ioined themselues, and were now entred into the Scotish borders. Fergus hauing hereof knowledge, speedilie got togither his people, and came with banners displaied to encounter his enimies. In king Fergus banner, there was a red lion portraied rampant, with his taile folden towards his backe, as though he did beat the same, which is the maner of them when they be moued to displeasure. Fergus was the first that bare this cognisance in Albion, which euer since hath beene borne by those kings that haue successiuelie reigned after him there.

The Britains aid against the Scots.

Both the armies were now come within sight of other, and readie to haue giuen the onset, when there went a murmuring amongst the Picts, that their companions the Britains were gotten to a hill a little beside them, minding to see the end of the battell before they did stir, and then if occasion serued (as their hope was it should) they purposed to fall vpon both parties, as well Picts as Scots, and so to destroie them both, the vanquishers togither with the vanquished, as they found them out of araie in following the chase. The like report was brought vnto Fergus by one that fled to his side from the enimies campe, touching this treason of the Britains, conspiring the extermination of both the people.

The Britains are about to deceiue the Picts.

Treason reuealed vnto Fergus.

By reason whereof, either part being put in feare of that which might insue through the malicious purpose of the Britains, they kept their tents certeine daies togither, without making any hast to battell. And in the meane while Fergus sent a messenger vnto the king of the Picts, requiring him to come to a communication before they should fight, for that he had to informe him of such matters as pertened no lesse to the safegard and preseruation of the Picts, than of his owne people the Scots. The king of the Picts willinglie gaue eare to this message, and so a little beside both the armies standing in battell araie, the two kings accompanied with a few of their nobles met togither, where in the end the danger in which they both stood, being plainelie disclosed and throughlie weied, they condescended to haue a further treatie of peace, which the king of the Picts alleged he might not conclude without the publike consent of his subiects; and therefore he appointed on the daie following to returne to the same place againe, there to giue a resolute answer, after he had vnderstood the minds of his lords and commons in the same.

Fergus sendeth to the Picts.

A peace to be concluded.

Herevpon therefore returning to his campe, he called his councell afore him, declaring the substance of the communication which had beene betwixt king Fergus and him, which was in effect tending to this end. First considering the present deuises of the Britains, there was nothing more expedient than a peace to be agreed vpon, as well for the commoditie of the Picts as Scots, if they would yeeld withall to auoid the imminent perill of their vtter ruine and common destruction intended by the Britains.

The king of the Picts called his councell and commons.

Herevpon also he required their aduise what they thought good to be done; declaring that according as they counselled him, he would worke therein. This matter being thus proposed, as there were diuerse heads, so were there sundrie opinions. Some iudged that in no case they could enter friendship againe with the Scots, who had so cruellie slaine and murthered a great number of the Pictish nation; and had shewed such tokens of a beastlie furious nature, that there was no hope to continue long in amitie with such a raging kind of people: and hereto they held that it was not vnknowne how the prophesie went, that the Scots should in the end destroie all the Pictish progenie. So that it were wisdome to keepe their power vnder, so long as was possible, and not to increase the same by ioining with them in friendship.

A prophesie.

Other were of a contrarie mind, esteeming that in no wise the Scotish mens friendship ought to be refused, vnlesse they would determine to seeke new dwellings in some other forraine parties; sith the Britains would not faile, but vpon occasion take what vantage they could to expell them both, as well Scots as Picts, out of the countries now by them possessed. And as for that, which was alledged touching the prophesie, if the gods had so determined, then might no policie of man preuent it: and if there were no such thing appointed by the same gods, what follie then were it to call such dreadfull doubts where no cause was? Ouer and besides this, they had taken them wiues of the Scotish nation, and thereby ingraffed their seed (the hope of their posteritie) in that stocke, which is the nerest meane and forceablest occasion to nourish friendship amongest people, that is or may be deuised; therefore it should not be onelie profitable but necessarie also to haue peace with the Scots, to renew againe with them the former league, to the perpetuall strengthening and aduancement of both the nations.

The Picts admonished by their wiues to peace.

Whilest the Picts were thus in debating the matter, their wiues also being present there in the armie, came in amongest them with their children, and in most lamentable wise besought their husbands to haue pitie vpon them, in their so sorowfull case, and not to suffer their hands to be defiled with vnnaturall murther, sith it were lesse discomfort to them with their sillie little ones to die anie kind of death whatsoeuer it were, rather than to behold their husbands with their fathers, their brethren, and their kinsfolke ioine togither in battell, and there to kill one another without all mercie and compassion. The nobles and gentlemen of the Picts hearing the cries of these women, and being now somewhat moued to pitie, consented at last to haue peace with the Scotish men, and to renew againe the old league that was heretofore betweene them: and for mutuall iniuries heretofore committed, that there should be a mutuall recompense, according as might stand with equitie and reason. So that where the Britains had beene the chiefe procurers of all that mischiefe and discord betwixt them, in hope thereby to destroy both the parties, they should now be reputed from henceforth as common enimies to them both. As for all other articles & conditions of agreement, it was ordeined that their king should do therein as vnto him might seeme good.

The Picts are moued to pittie.

Britains reputed as enimies.

In the morning therefore, as was appointed, the king of Picts meeting with king Fergus, declared what his subiects were agreed vpon: and further opening his mind touching the establishment of the peace, thought it conuenient to haue a day of meeting betwixt them to ratifie the same. Wherewith

The meeting of the two kings.

Fergus

An other day taken for the ratification of the peace.

The Britains go homward disappointed of their purpose.

The Scots and Picts returne home in peace.

This Coilus by the circumstance of the time, and other considerations, should seeme to be the same whome the Britains name Gutteline.

Coilus his subtiltie.

The Britains rob the Scots and the Picts for to stirre discord.

The Scots and Picts inuade the Britains.

Coilus entred into Scotland with an armie.

Fergus assembled a great power of Scotishmen.

Fergus being well contented & glad that through his motion a peace should thus ensue, a day was apointed betwirt them and kept accordinglie, so that comming togither, the ancient league was in all points renewed, with some conditions added thereto, auailable (as was thought) for the stronger confirmation thereof. Before this, and after the first meeting betwirt the Scots and Picts, I meane so soone as the Britains had vnderstanding of this agreement, they had no lust to tarie longer in the field, but raising their power, they departed their waies homewards, doubting least the said agreement might turne smallie to their gaine. The Picts and Scotishmen also after they had thus fullie ratified the peace and league betwirt them, brake vp their camps, euerie man repairing to the place of his abode.

The king also of the Britains named Coill (sojourning in that season neere about Yorke) being informed of this sudden renouation of the league betwirt the Scotishmen and Picts, was nothing ioyfull of the newes: for he doubted least in time to come their confederacie might be occasion of their further increasing in puissance, and after that some new occasion of his trouble. Wherefore studieng by what waies and meanes he might best prouide remedie for such inconueniences as might insue, he attempted nothing openlie for the space of two years, but onelie watched his time, to the end that if he might in that season chance (thorough the insolent courage of either nation) to espie anie occasion seruiceable for his time, he might set vpon and be a plague vnto them both.

At length also he caused his subiects (such I meane as bordered neere to the marches of both the people) to fetch preies and booties out of the Pictish confins. So that when the Picts sent thither with request to haue restitution made, it was by and by answered, that the Scots had done such trespasses (being a people inured vnto such feats by nature, and not the Britains, who were nothing guiltie in that kind of matter; and thus would the Britains do in like sort when they had robbed the Scots, so that with such iniurious dissimulation, aswell Scots as Picts being not a little offended, they entred soone after into the British confins, robbing & spoiling the same, as their custome is, with all maner of crueltie. When Coill of Britaine had notice of these doings, he toke grieuous indignation thereat, and thereupon determined to proue whether he might with open warres atchiue his purpose, which he could not bring to passe by his former cloaked practise. And herewith assembling an armie, he entred into the Scotish borders lieng towards the Irish seas, wasting & spoiling with fire and sword what soeuer he found in his waies, till he came euen to the riuer of Dune, where incamping himselfe vpon the banks thereof, he sent forth companies of his souldiers to destroie the countrie, and to bring in all such prisoners as they should lay hands vpon.

But in the meane time, and so soone as Fergus heard of the approch of the Britains, he caused all the people in the countrie to get them with their goods & cattels vnto the mounteins, except such as were able to beare armour: whome he apointed to attend vpon him, to defend the countrie as occasion serued. Whereof Coill hauing knowledge brought by an espiall, he sent forth about fiue thousand nimble men, and such as had beene vsed to clime craggie hilles, to go before and win the passages, purposing the next day to follow himselfe with the whole armie. But the Scotishmen and Picts being now assembled togither, and certified hereof also by their spies, they first fell in consultation what they were best to do; and in the end agreed that the same night they should set vpon the British campe: Fergus with his Scotishmen on the one side, and the king of the Picts on the other; so that in the dead of the night the Scotishmen killing the watch, were entered into the British campe, yer Coill had knowledge of anie such thing.

Whereby it came to passe that whilest the Britains (awaked with the noise) drew vnto that part where the alarme rose, to beat backe the Scots; the Picts comming ouer the riuer of Dune, by a certeine blind ford, assailed them on the backs, to the great confusion of the whole armie, by reason whereof the Britains (seeing none other remedie but to saue themselues by flight) turned their backs and fled, in which turmoile they were trodden downe and fell by heaps one vpon an other, and were not able to helpe themselues, nor yet to make shift to auoid the hands of their aduersaries. In this businesse also Coill himselfe chanced to be oppressed amongest the rest, so that he was found dead in the search of such as were slaine, and after solemnlie buried according to his estate in Troinouant, leauing the kingdome vnto his sonne Sisillius, who with his mother Mertia gouerned the same togither by the space of manie yeares.

Coill was slaine and his whole armie discomfited, of whome as Hector Boet. saith, their countrie of Coill toke name.

Such Britains also as escaped out of their enimies hands, got them togither in the next morning, & perceiuing what losse they had susteined not onlie by the death of their prince, but also in the slaughter of a great part of their whole armie, sent an herault vnto the Scots and Picts to require a peace: which though the most part of the people were not in will to haue consented vnto, yet persuaded in the end by their princes, they were contented to yeeld thereto: so that a generall peace was concluded, and speedilie published betwirt them.

Peace concluded.

Immediatlie hereupon, the Picts with their part of the spoile gotten at this iournie, departed to their homes, and Fergus returned into Argile; where studieng dailie for the quiet aduancement of the Scotish commonwealth, he called a parlement of his nobles, and first declaring to the assemblie how much bound they were to the gods for giuing them this victorie ouer so puissant enimies as the Britains were, he exhorted them to liue in friendlie concord amongest themselues, and to abstaine from violating the leagues now concluded, aswell with the Britains as before hand with the Picts.

A parlement

Exhortation vnto quietnesse and peace.

Also for the auoiding of enuious contention, and for the better assurance of euerie mans estate, he iudged it necessarie to haue a partition made of all the lands belonging vnto the Scotish dominion. For before they occupied the whole as in commune, without knowing to whome this peece or that did belong. Which politike aduise of Fergus, the Scotishmen praised most highlie, promising not onelie to follow his counsell herein in all that he should wish, but also in all that he should otherwise command.

The land is parted.

Obedient subiects.

Whereupon shortlie after there were chosen by his aduise seuen ancient personages, men of good conscience and great experience, which were apointed to be surueiors of the whole countrie, and to diuide the same as neere as they could into a set number of equall portions (but with this consideration, that according as the fruitfulnesse or barrennesse of the soile required, so they should inlarge or diminish the circuit of their bounds.) When they had viewed the countrie, and according to their commission seuered forth the same into parts, they returned into Argile, where Fergus then sojourned, and there in his presence, the names of all his noble men that were reputed as gouernors were put in lots, euerie of them to haue such part of the realme for his owne,

Men diuide the land into portions.

The gouernment is giuen vnto the nobles by lots.

as

as ſhould fall to him by good lucke and preſent hap.

By this meanes each of them being placed as his chance fell, they inhabited their quarters with ſuch people as they had the leading of, ſo that afterwards the countries toke their names of thoſe the firſt gouernors: which names for the more part (being a little changed) remaine amongſt them euen vnto this day. Fergus hauing thus without occaſion of enuie diuided his countrie amongſt his nobles and ſubiects, ſtudied further more to deuiſe lawes for the maintenance of common quiet amongſt them. And therefore amongſt other ordinances he made ſtatutes againſt murther, robberie, burning of houſes, and eſpecially againſt theft.

Statutes and lawes are made.

He builded alſo the caſtell of Beregonium in Loughquhabre on the weſt ſide of Albion, ouer againſt the weſterne Iles, where he appointed a court to be kept for the adminiſtration of iuſtice: that both the Albion Scots, and alſo thoſe of the ſame Iles might haue their acceſſe & reſort thither for redreſſe of wrongs, and ending of all controuerſies. The reſidue of his life he paſt in reſt and peace with his neighbors the Picts and Britains, indeuouring by all meanes to knit and couple the hearts of his ſubiects in one friendlie bond of inward loue and amitie. Finallie, ſailing afterward into Ireland to be arbitrator in a matter of variance betwixt the nobles of that land, as he returned homewards by force of tempeſt, the ſhip wherein he was imbarked, was driuen vpon a rocke, where he periſhed, after he had reigned as king amongſt the Scotiſhmen in Albion about 25 yeares. The rocke where he was thus caſt away, hath béene euer ſince called rocke Fergus, after his name.

Beregonium.

A place appointed for iuſtice.

Fergus went into Ireland and in his returne was drowned.

Rocke Fergus, otherwiſe knocke Fergus.

In the ſame ſeaſon there reigned amongſt the Britains one Enanius, named by Hector Boetius Eſdadus, and amongſt the Picts one Cruthneus Camelonus that builded a famous citie vpon the banke of the riuer called Caron, as the Scotiſh writers affirme, appointing it to be the chiefe citie of all the Piciſh kingdome, where in times paſt there was a faire commodious hauen apt to harbour ſhips in at all ſeaſons, but now it is damned vp in ſuch ſort, that vneath there appeareth anie token where that hauen was: and the citie it ſelfe was finallie ſubuerted by Kenneth king of Scotland, as after ſhall appeare. The forenamed Cruthneus builded alſo the towne of Agneda, afterwards called Edenbrough, of Ethus king of the Picts, the caſtell was named the caſtell of Maidens, for that the daughters of the Piciſh kings were there kept vnder ſtrait cuſtodie, appointed to learne to ſow & worke, till they came to yeares of mariage.

Eſdadus.

Cruthneus Camelonus.

This citie the Scotiſh writers take to be Camelodunum, of the which there is ſo often mention made in the Roman writers: but verelie herein they doo greatlie erre.

Agneda now called Edenbrough.

The caſtell of Maidens.

But now to returne to the Scotiſhmen. After the death of Fergus, the nobles of the realme aſſembled togither, to take counſell whome they might chooſe to ſucceed in his place. Manie of them, in reſpect of the high benefits which their nation had receiued by the politike gouernement of king Fergus, would not in anie wiſe that his ſonnes, though yong of yeares, ſhould be forgotten; but that according to reaſon and equitie, the eldeſt of them ſhould be elected, ſith they might not otherwiſe deliuer themſelues of the note of ingratitude towards his father, vnto whome they were more bound than with tong can be well expreſſed.

The Scots conſult about an other election of a king.

Other hauing a ſpeciall regard to the quiet of their commonwealth, doubted leaſt if they crowned a child to their king, during his minoritie, it could not be but that there ſhould follow ſtrife, enuie, and contention for the gouernance of his perſon and realme amongſt the nobles; and that in ſuch wiſe, as the people being diuided into ſundrie factions, the due adminiſtration of iuſtice ſhould be neglected, the nobles bearing and bolſtering vp all kinds of iniuries done or committed by anie of their partakers.

And though it might ſo happen that they agréed vpon one ſpeciall gouernor, as reaſon was they ſhould; yet ſhould he ſéeke to aduance his kinſfolkes more than reaſon happilie required, and peraduenture do things otherwaies much diſpleaſant to no ſmall number of them by that his priuate authoritie. And againe, the king ſhould no ſooner come to yeares of anie diſcretion, but one or other would put him in mind to take vpon him to rule the whole himſelfe, before he vnderſtood what charge he had in hand: and by reaſon of his fraile youth he lightlie would not follow the counſell of anie, but ſuch as conſented vnto him in his ſenſuall luſts and inordinate fanſies, which commonlie reigne in ſuch princes as take vpon them gouernance of realmes, before they know (through want of ſufficient yeares) how to gouerne themſelues.

For theſe and the like conſiderations, alledged by ſome of no ſmall authoritie amongſt them, it was agréed in the end, that one Feritharis the brother of the late deceaſſed Fergus ſhould be crowned king, and haue the gouernance of the realme during his life: and herewith in the meane time to ſee his nephues king Fergus his ſons brought vp in princelie nurture and diſcipline, as apperteined to the ſons of a king: that after his deceaſſe, if he liued till anie of them were come to ripe yeares, they might ſucceed him in the eſtate and kingdome.

Feritharis choſen king.

This ordinance alſo they decréed to be obſerued as a law from thenceforth euer after, that if the king died leauing no iſſue, but ſuch as were vnder age to ſucceed him, then ſhould one of his néereſt couſins, ſuch as was thought méeteſt to occupie the rome, be choſen to reigne as king during his life, and after his deceaſſe the crowne to reuert vnto his predeceſſors iſſue without controuerſie, if the ſame were once growne vp to lawfull age.

The choſing of kings was not allowed.

By this meanes then were children excluded from obteining the crowne, leaſt the publike libertie of the realme might chance to be put in danger. But yet was it afterwards perceiued that this deuiſe for choſing of kings, miniſtred occaſion ſometimes to the vncle to ſéeke the deſtruction of the nephue, and likewiſe to the nephue to procure the diſpatch of the vncle and vncles ſonnes, with the committing of manie heinous murders of right worthie princes, to the no ſmall danger of ouerthrowing the whole ſtate of the commonwealth, ſo that finallie that ordinance was clearelie abrogated, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

But now to my purpoſe. After Feritharis with the full conſent of all the people was thus elected king, he was inthronized with all ſolemnitie in receiuing his kinglie ornaments, as his two edged ſword, his ſcepter roiall, and his crowne of gold faſhioned in forme of a rampire made for defenſe of a towne or fortreſſe, ſignifieng that he toke vpon him to preſerue the libertie of his countrie, to ſée offendors dulie puniſhed, and the execution of lawes with equall puniſhment truelie miniſtred.

Feritharis

A two edged ſword.

These ornaments of inueſture remained vnto the Scotiſh kings, without being in anie point changed, till the daies of Achaius king of Scotland, who eſtabliſhing a perpetuall league with Charles the great, emperour and king of France, to indure for euer betwéene the Scots and Frenchmen, added vnto the crowne foure flower de lices, togither with foure croſſets, diuided in ſunder with equall ſpaces, riſing ſomewhat higher than the flower de lices: that thereby the obſeruing of the chriſtian religion and ſincere faith, maintained by the Scotiſh nation, might

The crowne changed.

The league with the Picts confirmed.

might be the more euident to all men that beheld it. But now as touching Feritharis, shortlie after he was thus inuested king, he came to an interuiew with the king of the Picts, where manie things being communed of touching the wealth of both nations, the league was in solemne wise confirmed, and such punished as had done anie thing sounding to the breach of the same.

After this, being returned home, he ordered himselfe in the administration of his charge verie vprightlie, without giuing iust occasion vnto anie to find himselfe greeued: and thus continued he certeine yeres in such loue of all the estates of the realme, that afterwards when his nephue Ferlegus the eldest sonne of king Fergus, being now come to full age, through instigation of some insolent persons, and such as by alteration hoped for aduancement, required (contrarie to the ordinance before established) to haue of him the crowne: the matter was taken in such ill part, that where before the same Ferlegus was highlie beloued and honored of all the people, they were now readie (if Feritharis had not with authoritie and gentle persuasions staied them) to haue torne him all in peces: but although their rage was somewhat appeased by Feritharis, as is said, yet would they not be pacified throughlie, till that all such as had béene of counsell with him in that practise, had suffered death, and new gouernors appointed to haue the ouersight of him.

Feritharis liued not passing three moneths after this businesse, but died suddenlie in the night, the truth not being knowne whether by naturall death, or through treason of Ferlegus and certeine of his complices (whereof there was no small suspicion) for that he togither with them found meanes to flée first to the Picts, and after to the Britains, where he passed the residue of his life in great shame and ignominie. Feritharis being thus dead in the 15 yeere of his reigne, the nobles assembled togither for the election of a new king, and in the end they agreed vpon Mainus the yonger sonne of king Fergus, as then being about 24 yeres of age.

Feritharis suddenly died.

Ferlegus exiled.

An election of a new king.

Mainus.

This Mainus being of contrarie conditions to his brother Ferlegus, was thus aduanced to the crowne by the whole consent of the nobles and commons, who yet kept in fresh memorie the noble gouernement of his father Fergus. He therefore studieng to answere the peoples expectation in following his said fathers worthie acts, mainteined iustice in all points, without suffering anie bearing or bolstering of wrong. If there were anie controuersie risen betwixt neighbour and neighbour within one hundred or cantred, he willed that the same might be taken vp and ended amongest them at home by order of some authorized court there. But if the matter were of such importance, as that it could not well be decided without authoritie of some higher court, he would then haue the hearing thereof, at such time as he vsed euerie yere once to haue a publikie out of all parts of his realme, to conferre togither for such purposes; at what time also such as were notorious offendors were arreigned and punished by death or otherwise, according to the fault which they earst had committed.

Justice mainteined.

Small matters redressed among neighbours.

Great matters determined by the king.

Also for the more quiet of his subiects, he confirmed the ancient league with the Picts, their king named Chinus requiring the same by his ambassadors sent vnto him. Moreouer this Mainus vpon a religious deuotion toward the gods, hauing an assured beliefe, that without their fauours all worldlie policies were but vaine, deuised sundrie new ceremonies to be added vnto the old; and also caused certeine places in sundrie parts of his dominion to be appointed out, and compassed about with great huge stones round like a ring; but towards the south was one mightie stone farre greater than all the rest, pitched vp in maner of an altar, whereon their priests might make their sacrifices in honor of their gods.

Mainus confirmed the league with the Picts.

Mainus a deuout man in his religion.

In witnes of the thing, there remaineth vnto this day certeine of those great stones standing round ringwise, which places are called by the common people, The old chapels of the gods. A man would maruell by what shift, policie, or strength such mightie stones were raised in that maner. Amongst other the gods also, which the Scotishmen had in most reuerence, Diana was chiefe, whome they accounted as their peculiar patronesse, for that she was taken to be the goddesse of hunting, wherein consisted their chiefest exercise, pastime and delite. Vnto hir therefore he instituted monethlie sacrifice, by reason whereof this vse was taken vp, that so sone as anie of them got sight of the new mone next after hir change, he saluted hir with certeine praiers or salutations most reuerentlie. Which custome indured amongst them manie hundred yeres after. Mainus did also appoint forth liuings for the priests to be taken of such sacrifice as was offered vp to the gods. Finallie, when he had thus instructed his people in lawes and ordinances, aswell touching the religious seruice of the gods, as also for politike gouernment of his countrie, he ended his life, after he had reigned about 29 yeres, leauing the estate to his sonne Doruadille, Elidurus reigning at the same time in Britaine, and Thaara amongst the Picts.

Diana honored of the Scots.

Diana goddesse of hunting.

The new mone is worshipped.

A liuing prouided for the priests.

Doruadille.

Doruadille being crowned king of the Scots, established a new league with the Britains, by sending his ambassadors vnto them: and with the Picts he renewed & confirmed the ancient alliance. He set all his pleasure on hunting and keeping of hounds & greihounds, ordeining that euerie housholder should find him two hounds and one greihound. If a hunter chanced in following the game to lose an eie or a lim, so that he were not able to helpe himselfe after that time, he made a statute that he should be found of the common treasurie. He that killed a woolfe should haue an ore for his paines. This beast in deed the Scotishmen, euen from the begining, vsed to pursue in all they might deuise, because the same is such an enimie to cattell, wherein consisted the chiefest portion of all their wealth and substance.

Doruadille louer of peace.

Doruadille had pleasure in hunting.

The reward for killing of a woolfe.

Thus the Scotishmen in this season, setting all their delite on hunting, began also to vse lawes and statutes in proces of time concerning the same. And first it was ordeined, that he whose dog did teise and go through to the end of the course with the deare, so that he were séene to be at the fall, should haue the skin; the head & hornes to remaine to him whose dog did best nert. The body being drest & broken vp, should be distributed at the pleasure & discretion of the master of the game. The bowels and panch were cast to the dogs as the case required. And if there rose anie doubt in ante of these points, they should chose by common consent, a iudge to determine of the matter. But whether these deuises were lawes made by the king as then for the further aduancement of his pleasure, or rather customes growne and ratified by long continuall vse, I cannot tell, but certeine it is, they were obserued through all the Scotish regions, as hauing the force of lawes, and so are vsed euen vnto these daies.

Lawes made for hunting.

The dogs rewarded.

Beside these ordinances for hunting, Dorsadille commanded also, that all such statutes as Fergus had made, should be kept and obserued: whereunto he added certeine new, namelie diuerse sorts of punishments for sundrie kinds of transgressions, according to the qualities of the same: which he caused to be ingrossed in books of record, and committed to the Old lawes allowed, and new established.

the cuſtodie of a graue councellor, who by a common conſent ſhould haue the interpretation of thoſe lawes if anie doubt aroſe, and that when anie offendor ſhould come before the iudge, and heare the ſentence read by him, the ſame offendor might vnderſtand that he receiued nothing but right at the iudges hands: by reaſon whereof it came to paſſe, that ſuch offendors without repining willinglie were contented to ſuffer anie puniſhment whatſoeuer it was that the law did ſo appoint them. This cuſtome grew into ſuch force, that it neuer might yet be abrogated amongſt them of the weſterne Iles, but that euen vnto this day they haue their lawiers amongſt them, without whoſe denuntiation or decree taken out of the regiſter, no iudgement is reputed lawfull.

These were the acts and doings of king Dorsadille, who in the 28 yeere of his reigne departed this world at Beregonium, now called Dunſtafage, leauing behind him a ſonne called Reuther as yet not of ſufficient age to ſucceed in the eſtate. By reaſon whereof Nothatus the brother of Dorsadille, a man of comelie perſonage and wit, apt (as was thought) to haue a realme in gouernance, was crowned king by force of law aboue remembred, debarring children vnder age to inherit the ſucceſſion of the crowne.

Nothatus.

Nothatus

THis Nothatus had vneath reigned two yeeres, when all the people began to crie out vpon him, for ſuch tyrannicall parts as he practiſed as well againſt the meane eſtates as the high. And forſomuch as he being admoniſhed of his duetie, and required to reforme certeine diſhonorable vſages by him exerciſed, he would giue no eare thereto: therefore one Donalus gouernor of Vzigantia, conſpiring with other nobles of the realme to depoſe him, intiſed Reuther king Dorsadilles ſonne, to take part with them, and to claime the crowne as due to him by deſcent from his father. And ſo aſſembling a companie of their faction ſufficient for their enterpriſe, they entered the palace where Nothatus lay, and after reaſoning with him of certeine points touching his miſgouernment in the eſtate, diuers of their companie not tarieng till they were commanded, raſhlie fell vpon him, and murthered him togither with diuers of ſuch nobles and gentlemen, as they knew to be enimies to Donalus and his friends.

Vzigantia, now called as the Scots lay Galloway.

Nothatus murdered.

Reuther.

After this they proclaimed Reuther king, and crowned him with all due ſolemnitie, diuers of the nobles of the realme being highlie diſpleaſed therewith, for that they iudged it not onelie a great offenſe to haue the king thus traitorouſlie murthered, but alſo ſaw hereby the ancient ordinance of chooſing their king through conſent of the people, to be broken by the wicked attempt of a priuat perſon, & an vnſkilfull yong man aduanced to the crowne, contrarie to the decree of an autentike law. Among other one Ferquhard the ſonne in law of Nothatus gouernor of Lorne and Cantir, called an aſſemblie of the people, and began to declare what enormities were like to inſue through this tyrannicall attempt of Donalus. Donalus hearing whereabout Ferquhard went, haſtilie came to the place where this aſſemblie was made, and there ſleaing diuers of the chiefe, he did put Ferquhard alſo in great hazard of his life, who by flieng yet eſcaped his hands, and got him ouer into the Ile of Ila, whither reſorted vnto him diuers of the nobles (that fauored not Donale) with a great number of the commons.

Reuther crowned king. Diuers lords offended.

Monantia.

A conſpiracie of Ferquhard againſt Donalus. Ferquhard fled into Ila.

In the end, Ferquhard perſuaded his companions to ſet all feare apart, and to returne with him into Scotland to take reuenge of Donale and his complices, being traitors and enimies to the realme and common-wealth, ſo that firſt ioining hands, which they did wet in mans bloud (according to the cuſtome then vſed) they promiſed one to another to liue and die in the quarell, and after imbarking themſelues in certeine veſſels, they entred the ſea, and paſſed ouer into Scotland, where gathering togither no ſmall number of ſuch as willinglie reſorted vnto them to their aid, they encountred with Donale in battell, whoſe hoſt twiſe in one daie was put to flight neere to the citie Beregonium with the loſſe of eight thouſand men.

Ferquhard returneth into Scotland for to reuenge his iniurie.

The night parted the fraie, but in the next morning, Donale and his partakers through great indignation conceiued, for that they were ſo beaten backe by Ferquhard (hauing in all his hoſt not paſt 10000 perſons) fiercelie came forth of their tents to giue battell afreſh, and finding their enimies readie to receiue them, there was fought ſo cruell a battell betwixt them, that in the end either part being ſore trauelled with ſlaughter and long fight, was glad to giue place to the other, not paſſing an eight hundred of all thoſe that were preſent that daie in the field as then being left aliue. Vpon Donales part there was ſlaine Gethus king of Picts, whoſe daughter king Reuther had married, with a great number of his people: alſo Donale himſelfe with diuers of the nobles of Scotland, beſide gentlemen & cõmons that tooke part with him. On the contrarie ſide there died alſo Ferquhard himſelfe with diuers gouernors of tribes, beſide the reſidue of the nobles, gentlemen & cõmons of Roſſe, Cathenelle, Marne, Argile, Cantire, and Lorne, with them of the weſterne Iles which were there with him.

Donale is ſlaine.

Ferquhard is ſlaine.

Reuther eſcaping with life from this bloudie encounter, in the night following departed his waies with ſuch of his people as were left aliue. Whereof his enimies being aduertiſed in the next morning, purſued after him with ſuch diligence, that in the end they tooke him within a caſtell in Cathnelle whither he was fled for ſuccor: he was pardoned of his life, partlie in reſpect of his fathers merits, and partlie againe for that it was knowne how his tender youth was ſuch as had not deſerued death by any fact, otherwiſe than in that he had followed the counſell of malicious perſons. By this cruell murther and huge ſlaughter thus committed betwixt theſe two nations of Scotiſhmen and Picts, both their forces were ſo greatlie infeebled, that they became an eaſie prey to their ancient and common enimies the Vzitains, who in ſuch opportunitie of occaſion thought not to ſit ſtill till the ſame might haplie be paſt and gone.

Reuther the king fled.

Reuther purſued & taken. He is pardoned of his life.

Firſt therefore with a mightie armie the Vzitains inuaded the Picts: the nobles of which nation perceiuing themſelues not able to make reſiſtance, fled with their wiues, their children, and the moſt part of their goods, ouer into the Iles of Orkenie, and there aſſembling togither, they created them a new king to haue the gouernance ouer them, who was alſo named Gethus, and brother to the other Gethus a little before mentioned. Heere alſo they remained certeine yeares after, liuing in peaceable manner with the former inhabitants, whom they found there, wronging them by no iniurious dealing at all (if the Scotiſh hiſtorie be true.) Hereof moreouer as ſome ſuppoſe it came to paſſe, that theſe Ilands of Orkenie are named by diuers writers the ancient kingdome of the Picts.

Gethus king.

why Orkenie was called Pictland as ſome ſuppoſe, but the truth ſhould ſeeme to be that they were ſo called becauſe the Picts inhabited there before they ſet foot in Vzitaine.

In the meane while the Vzitains ſeizing vpon ſuch countries as theſe Picts had forſaken, that is to ſaie, the Mers, Louthian, and others, they left in diuers places where they thought expedient, garriſons of men of war, to keepe the ſame in due ſubiection: and after entred into the confines of the Scotiſh kingdome, burning & waſting all afore them, wherewith ſuch Scots as yet remained aliue, being high-lie moued to indignation, came ſtoutlie into the field to defend their countrie, and incountring with their enimies neere to Kalender wood, they loſt two thouſand of their companie: the reſidue alſo being ſore chaſed, fled into ſundrie parties for ſafegard of their liues.

The Scots ouerthrowne.

This diſcomfiture put the Scotiſh nation into ſuch feare and terror, that they vtterlie deſpaired of all recouerie, where contrariwiſe the Britains were ſo aduanced (in hope vtterlie to expell all aliens out of their Ile) that purſuing the victorie in moſt earneſt wiſe, they forced Reuther and all the nobilitie of the Scotiſh nation that was yet left aliue, to flee for ſafegard of their liues into the caſtell of Beregonium, where they held themſelues as in the ſureſt hold. The Britains being certified of the repaire of their enimies to Beregonium, enuironed the caſtell with a ſtrong and vehement ſiege, vntill that the Scots within were conſtreined through want of vittels to eate each other, according as the lots fell by a common agreement made amongſt them.

Scots beſieged deuoure one another.

But when it came to paſſe, that euen thoſe that were reputed as heads and gouernors, and in whom conſiſted the hope of their whole defenſe, did now and then come to the ſhambles as well as other of leſſe reputation, they thought it beſt to trie by iſſuing forth, if any of their haps might be ſo good as to eſcape the danger preſent, whereas by tarieng ſtill within the fortreſſe, they ſhould but deuoure one another without any reuenge for loſſe of their liues had vpon their fierce and cruell enimies. Whereupon by common conſent there iſſueth forth, firſt one Colane lord of Cantire with an hundred of his owne ſouldiors, and fiercelie ſkirmiſhing with the Britains, defended himſelfe a good ſpace right manfullie, though in the end both he and his whole band were borne downe and ſlaine with preaſe and multitude of his enimies that aſſailed him on each ſide.

The Scots come forth and fight.

In the meane ſeaſon, whileſt he thus occupied the Britains in fight on one ſide, Reuther with the reſidue of his people brake forth by another waie, and eſcaping to the ſea ſide, got ſhips and fled ouer into the weſterne Iles, where he found a great number of other Scotiſhmen that were gotten thither, being compelled by Denus king of the Britains to auoid forth of the countries, which they before inhabited.

Reuther eſcapeth.

Reuther remained not long in the Iles, but paſſed ouer into Ireland. The Britains not a little moued for his eſcape with the other of the Scotiſh lords, reuenged their diſpleaſure on ſuch commons and other meane people as fell into their hands, ſo that ſuch as might eſcape, got them into the mounteins, and liued there by roots, berries, & other wild fruits in ſummer, and in winter by ſuch veneſon and fleſh of wild beaſts as they killed in the wilderneſſe: and ſometimes they came downe and made raiſes vpon the Britains that occupied their houſes and lands, fetching great boties verie often from amongeſt them.

Reuther paſſeth into Ireland.

They inhabit the mounteins.

This cruell warre laſted twelue yeares, vntill in maner all ſuch Scots and Picts as remained in Albion were brought vnder ſeruitude to the Britains. In which meane while, Gethus king of the Picts kept his ſiege roiall in Pomonia the cheefeſt Ile of the Orkenies. Reuther alſo begot of his wife a ſonne named Thereus, and ſhortlie after being procured by letters and meſſengers ſent vnto him from the foreſaid Gethus and ſuch Scots as were yet remaining in Albion, he aſſembled a number of ſhips togither, and firſt with a choſen power of warriors ſailed to the weſterne Iles, where increaſing his numbers, he paſſed ouer into Albion, landing on the weſt halfe of Roſſe at Lough Brunn, and there Reuther is ſent for out of Ireland.

comming on land, the firſt perſon that they met with (according to a cuſtome vſed amongſt them in thoſe daies) they ſlue, and wetting the points of their weapons in his bloud, they firſt taſted thereof after their maner, then holding vp their weapons into the aire, they deſired of the gods that they might reuenge the bloud of their elders with happie battell againſt the Britains their enimies. After this, hearing that Gethus king of the Picts was alſo entred the land with a mightie power of Germans, which were come to his aid, and was not paſt thirtie miles off, he ſtaied there abiding for his comming, to the intent that ioining their powers togither, they might be the better able to furniſh their enterpriſe.

A cuſtome.

The Germans in aid of the Picts.

The third daie after they met togither with great ioy and congratulations, vnto whom with all ſpeed a great number alſo of thoſe Scotiſhmen and Picts that had ſtill continued in the countrie (during the time of the perſecution by the Britains) dailie reſorted and came flocking in from each ſide vnto them. Siſillius king of the Britains, who ſucceeded after Denus, as then latelie deceaſſed, hauing knowlege hereof, aſſembled a great armie of his ſubiects, and hearing that the Scots and Picts were entred into the borders of his realme, he haſted forth to incounter with their powers, and ſo ioining with them in battell, after long and cruell fight, in the end the victorie remained with the Scotiſhmen and Picts, by the great valiancie and manfull proweſſe of Reuther: whereupon the place where that battell was fought hath beene euer ſince called Reuthirdale, as ye would ſay Reuthers vallie.

Reuther and Gethus meet and ioine their powers togither.

The Britains are diſcomfited by the Scots and Picts.

wherof Reuthirdale tooke the name.

This victorie was not very pleaſant to any of the parties, by reaſon of the great numbers of men ſlaine on both ſides, inſomuch that they were glad to fall to agreement immediatlie after, and concluded a peace, with conditions that the Scotiſhmen and Picts ſhould be reſtored againe vnto their ancient poſſeſſions and lands in Albion. This peace continued a long time after inuiolate betwixt theſe nations. The yeare that Reuther returned thus into Albion, was before the birth of Chriſt 216, after the building of Rome 529, and from the creation of the world 3750. Reuther by Beda in his eccleſiaſticall hiſtorie of England is named Reuda, who alſo ſuppoſeth him to be the firſt of all the Scotiſh princes, that ſet any foot in Britaine there to inhabit: his comming thither was (as ſeemeth to ſome) long after the ſuppoſed time here before alleged. And verelie there is great cauſe to moue a doubt of the truth of that which Hector Boetius hath written, in following (as he ſaith) other authors, touching the firſt comming into Britaine, as well of the Scots and Picts. For if it were true, that ſo long before the comming of the Romans into this Ile, they were here planted and growne to ſuch puiſſance; it is ſtrange that no mention is made of them in any of their writings, till about the yeare 360 after Chriſt; as in place conuenient it ſhall more plainelie appeare. Reuther paſſed the reſidue of his daies without any further warres, forren and ciuill, and ſo departed this world at Beregonium, in the 26 yeare of his reigne.

A peace concluded.

240 H.B.

4995 H.B.

Reuther by Beda is named Reuda.

4997 H.B.

Reutha.

After Reuther his deceaſſe, his vncles ſon called Reutha ſucceeded in the kingdome, choſen thereto by the common agreement of all the ſtates, becauſe that Thereus ſonne to Reuther vncath come to the age of ten yeares, was thought vnable to take the charge vpon him. Reutha therfore being thus elected to reigne as king ouer the Scotiſhmen, ordeined that ſuch noblemen as had atchiued anie notable exploit in defenſe of their countrie, ſhould be had in perpetuall memorie, and buried in ſolemne wiſe in ſepulchres aloft vpon hils or mounteins,

An ordinance for buriall of their princes. Obeliſks or pointed ſtones

vpon

vpon the which were ſet ſo manie obeliſks or long pointed ſtones, as they had ſlaine enimies in the wars: whereof ſome remaine there to be ſeene euen to this daie.

Craftſmen brought into Scotland to inſtruct the people.

This Reutha alſo vnderſtanding of the lacke of all maner of craftſmen in his realme, and of ſuch as were expert in the liberall ſciences, cauſed a great number of moſt perfect artificers to be ſent for, to inhabit amongeſt his people, the better to inſtruct them in their occupations. Vnto theſe alſo as vnto other profeſſing anie liberall art, were appointed honeſt liuings, by way of fees, aſſigned to be receiued of ſuch droue and beaſts as were killed, to euerie man of ſcience and artificer his part. And further, ech of them had certeine meaſures of otes and barlie in ſtead of yearelie annuities. For as yet the vſe of coine was not knowen amongeſt the Scotiſhmen. The which cuſtome of diſtributing their beaſts, which they killed in this wiſe, is ſtill vſed in the weſterne Iles euen to theſe our daies.

Liuings appointed forth vnto thoſe craftſmen.

A law for phiſicians and ſurgians.

Reutha perceiuing furthermore that through vnſkilfull ſurgians and phyſicians manie wounded and diſeaſed perſons were oftentimes caſt awaie, ordeined by the aduiſe and conſent of his councell, that none ſhould take vpon them as a ſurgion or phyſician, vnleſſe they were by long experience well practiſed aforehand in thoſe ſciences. For before that time they vſed to carie forth ſuch perſons as were ſicke or otherwiſe hurt, and to lay them in ſome open place in the ſtreets or market ſted, that all ſuch as came by, might according to their knowledge declare their aduiſe, and ſhew (if they had beene vered with the like diſeaſe) by what means they had eſcaped the danger, and recouered againe their health. For no man might without the note of high reproch paſſe by, keeping ſilence in this behalfe. And this was according to the cuſtome of the old Aegyptians.

Reutha thus ſtudieng for the aduancement of the commonwealth of his ſubiects, continued in the eſtate with great proſperitie, till finallie perceiuing himſelfe farre growen in age, and not ſo able to trauell in the affaires of the realme as he was before, he cauſed a parlement to be aſſembled, and there in preſence of all the eſtates, required to be diſcharged of the gouernement: and that the ſame might be committed vnto his coſin Thereus, who as then was not onelie of ſufficient age to take it vpon him, but alſo of ſuch towardneſſe, as that in each mans opinion he was thought likelie to atteine vnto the proweſſe of anie of his noble progenitors. Thus Reutha, after he had reigned 17 yeares, returned to a priuat life, reſigning the whole rule of his realme vnto the aforeſaid Thereus, being through his perſuaſion receiued as king of all eſtates by common conſent there in that preſent aſſemblie.

Reuthi reſigned the eſtate vnto his coſin Thereus.

Thereus.

This Thereus for the firſt ſix yeares was equall in all points of princelie gouernement to anie of his predeceſſors, but afterward he changed his copie in ſuch maner, that iuſtice and all other kinds of vertue being ſet apart, he neither regarded the lawes of the gods, nor yet of men; but gaue himſelfe to all ſorts of filthineſſe and moſt deteſtable vices, ſo farre forth, that his ſubiects (as their cuſtome is in following the maners and vſages of their princes) became ſo outragious in their licentious liuings, and namelie the nobles and gentlemen, that thereof inſued theft, murther, rape, ſpoiling, and all kinds of oppreſſion of thoſe ſillie ſoules that had no meanes to reſiſt, ſo as in fine, diuers gouernours of the tribes perceiuing no hope of amendment while Thereus ſhould reigne, conſpired togither, deuiſing meanes how to depoſe him of all kinglie authoritie. But he hauing notice of their purpoſed intentions, and doubting the ſequele thereof, conueied himſelfe

Iuſtice neglected and vice imbraced.

The nobles conſpire againſt Thereus.

out of the way in moſt ſecret wiſe, fleeing for ſuccour vnto the Britains, vnto whome though he made earneſt ſute for aid to be reſtored home againe, yet could he purchaſe no ſuch fauour amongſt them: ſo that leding a miſerable life a long time after within the citie of Yorke, he finallie there ended his daies. He reigned in Scotland about 12 yeares or more.

Thereus fled to the Britains.

Conanus.

Immediatlie after this his auoiding the realme, the nobles and peeres choſe one Conanus lord of Galloway to rule the eſtate as gouernour, whoſe authoritie had beene euer great amongeſt the people. His ſtudie was chieflie imploied how to reduce the lords and nobles of the realme into concord and friendlie amitie, where before through the negligence of Thereus each ſought others deſtructions. Alſo he cauſed due puniſhment to be executed vpon all ſuch as liued by robbing and reuing, of whome in the beginning of his gouernement there was no ſmall number: but he weeded them forth, in ſuch wiſe that yer he left off, there was not one of them to be found. At length, after it was vnderſtood that Thereus was dead, this Conanus renounced the adminiſtration in preſence of all the eſtates aſſembled in parlement at Weregonium, where by common conſent Joſina brother of Thereus was choſen to reigne as king, for that Thereus had left no iſſue behind him to ſucceed.

Conanus is choſen king.

Conanus perſecuteth offendors.

He renounceth the eſtate.

Joſina elected king.

Joſina.

This Joſina being proclaimed king, renewed the ancient leagues with the Picts and Britains. He had phyſicians in great eſtimation; for that during his abode in Ireland, he was nouriſhed of a child amongeſt them, and by reaſon thereof had ſome knowledge in the facultie, ſpeciallie he vnderſtood the vertues and properties of herbes, wherewith in thoſe daies the Scots vſed to heale and remedie all maner of ſores and diſeaſes, which as then were few in number, in reſpect of the ſundrie kinds which are now knowen amongſt vs; and all by reaſon of the ſuperfluous feeding and exceſſe of meats and drinks vſed in our time, whereas our elders ſufficed with a little, liued without ſurfeting, the chiefeſt breeder of ſuch ſtrange and manifold ſicknеſſes. In this Joſina his daies it chanced that a Portingale ſhip was driuen and drowned by force of a ſtreinable tempeſt neere vnto the ſhore of one of the Scotiſh Iles, where diuerſe of thoſe that were within the ſame ſhip, mariners and other eſcaped to land, amongeſt whome were two ancient and fatherlie old men of right reuerend aſpect and countenance.

Surfeting the cauſe of ſtrange diſeaſes, which ſo commonlie now reigne.

Two ancient philoſophers through ſhipwrack arriue in Scotland, and are ioifullie receiued of the king.

These two in companie with ſome of the inhabitants of that Ile came ouer into Weregonium, where the king as then ſoiourned. They were Spaniſh prieſts of the pagane religion, whoſe purpoſe was to haue gone vnto Athens in Grecia (as ſome write) but whence ſoeuer they were, and what purpoſe ſoeuer they had, certeine it is they were philoſophers; and therefore the king receiued them moſt ioifullie, doing them all the honor he could deuiſe, and commanding that they ſhould be lodged within his owne palace, where they had all things needfull, and accordinglie miniſtred vnto them.

These philoſophers, after they had refreſhed themſelues at their eaſe for the ſpace of 14 daies, the king cauſed them to come before him, requiring them to ſhew their opinion what they thought by the nature of the ſoile, the maners and cuſtoms of his people, ſo far forth as they had ſeene and heard. They without pauſing for anſwere declared, that as yet they had not had time to learne thoſe things, but onelie thus far by coniecture they ſuppoſed, that the ground was more like to be fruitfull of mettall mines, than of corne and graine, as conteining far more riches vnderneath the earth than aboue: & this they ſaid that they gathered by the influence of the heauens vnder the which it laie. And as for the rites and vsages of the people, in one point they could in no wise commend them, for that in religion they followed the superstitious rites of the Aegyptians, worshipping the immortall gods in the shape of beasts and fouls; whereas God was euen the same that did comprehend both heauen and earth, with the waters and all things in them conteined, whome they named nature, and as it were the primordiall cause or beginning of all things, vnto whome it was not possible to deuise anie similitude of liuing thing that might in anie wise represent him. Therefore (said they) men ought to worship the liuing God with fire and deuout praier, building him a temple for that purpose, and onelie vnto him to burne incense, and to performe vowes: at whose hands such as liued chastlie, vprightlie, and according to the rules of iustice, ought euer to looke for some high benefit, where other that liued contrarilie might euer stand in doubt of contrarie reward.

The Scotish religion reproued.

Vpright liuing well rewarded at Gods hands.

With these their sensible instructions they perswaded manie of the Scotish nation vnto their opinion, though the greatest part would by no means follow anie other kind of religion, than that which they had receiued from their elders: neither could anie of them be brought to thinke otherwise of the sun, the mone, and stars, but that there was a certeine diuine power or godhead in euerie one of them. And thus much of these strangers briefflie and by the way, who came into Scotland at this present: but now to proceed with our purpose. When Iosina had reigned 24 yeares, he departed out of this world at Beregonium, being a man of verie great age. He left behind him a sonne named Finnanus, who a little before his fathers decease was by consent of the people proclamed king of Scotland.

Iosina departeth this life.

Finnanus.

THis Finnanus had the nobles of his realme in such estimation, that he ordeined that nothing should be decreed or practised touching the publike affaires of the realme, except they were first made priuie and of counsell in the same. He sought also to win the fauour of his people by meekenesse and gentle intreating of them, insomuch that though he went about to restore the old religion somwhat defaced by his father through information (as is said) of the two aboue mentioned sage philosophers, yet did he not constreine anie man to worship the gods, otherwise than his fansie serued him. He was the first that instituted those prelats, which gouerned after the maner of bishops, in all matters perteining to religion, and were called in the Scotish tong Durceglijs in Latine Druides. These Druides were appointed to be resident within the Ile of Man, as the Scotishmen hold opinion: but other thinke rather that they were resident in Angleseie, in the British tong called Mon. Vnto these also hauing great liuings assigned them, were the inferiour priests subiect, as receiuing at their hands all iniunctions and orders for the vse of their sacrifices and other ceremonies.

Prelats ordered in religion.

Druides in the old Scotish tong called Durceglijs.

The Scots mistake Man for Angleseie.

These Druides afterwards applied themselues so earnestlie to the studie of philosophie, aswell natturall as morall, that they were had in no small reuerence of the people, as they that were both accounted and knowne to be men of most perfect life and innocencie: by meanes whereof their authoritie dailie so far forth increased, that finallie iudgements in most doubtfull matters were committed vnto their determinations, offendors by their discretion punished, and such as had well deserued accordinglie by their appointments rewarded. Moreouer such as refused to obeie their decrees and ordinances, were by them excommunicated, so that no creature durst once keepe companie with such, till they were reconciled againe, and clearelie by the same Druides absolued.

The authoritie of the Druides increased.

Plinie, Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Iulius Cæsar; with diuers other approued authors, make mention of these Druides, signifieng how the first beginning of their religion was in Britaine (which some comprehend all wholie vnder the name of Albion) and from thence was the same religion brought ouer into France. Finnanus was not onelie praised for his setting forth of that heathen religion, but also for his politike gouernement of the estate in ioifull rest and quietnesse. Neither was his fame a little aduanced for the mariage concluded and made betwixt his sonne Durstus and Agasia daughter to the king of Britains, for by that aliance he wan diuers of the British nation vnto his friendship. Finallie, this Finnanus died at Camelon, being come thither to visit the king of Picts as then sore diseased, after he had reigned about the space of thirtie yeares. His bodie was conueied vnto Beregonium, and there buried amongest his predecessors.

Durstus.

AFter him succéded his sonne the forenamed Durstus, farre differing from his noble father in all vertuous demeanour; as he that was altogither giuen to banketting and excessiue drunkennesse. Such of the nobles as his father had in high reuerence he made light account of; accepting onelie those that of their wicked deuises could find out new kinds of voluptuous pleasures, through whose persuasions some of his peeres he confined, some he spoiled of all their substance & inheritance, other he put to death without iust cause or anie kind of lawfull means. Furthermore he forsoke the companie of his lawfull wife Agasia, causing hir to be forced and abused by diuers vile persons in most villanous maner.

wicked counsellors.

With these and the semblable inordinat practises he procured the indignation of his people so far forth against him, that those of the westerne Iles with them of Cantire, Lorne, Argile, and Rosse, conspired togither in the reformation of such disorders as were dailie vsed in the administration of iustice, by the wicked suggestion of euill disposed councellors, against whome they pretended to make their war, and not against their king. There were also so manie that fauoured them in this quarell, and so few that leaned to the king to aid him against them, that he was constreined to dissemble with them for a time, in promising not onelie to remoue from him such as they would appoint, but also to be ordered in all things according as they should thinke good. And to put them in beléefe that he ment as he spake, he committed some such councellors as he had about him vnto ward, and other some (of whome he little passed) he sent vnto them as prisoners, to receiue such punishment by death or otherwise, as they should thinke conuenient.

A conspiracie.

A craftie and cloked dissimulation.

He further also in presence of Doro the gouernour of Cantire, sent to him for that purpose, sware in solemne wise afore the image of Diana, to performe all such promises and couenants as he was agréed vpon, and had made vnto the conspirators. With which cloked dissimulation they being deceiued, came without suspect of further guile vnto Beregonium, where at their first comming he was readie to receiue them (as séemed by his feined countenance) with gladsome hart and most friendlie meaning; but they were no sooner entred the castell, but that a number of armed men appointed for the purpose fell vpon them, and slue them all without mercie.

Craftie dissimulation.

A cruell murther.

This heinous act being once signified abroad in their countries amongst their friends and kinsfolke, caused

A new tumult.

King Durstus besieged.

caused a new commotion, so that within a few daies after, manie thousands of men in furious rage came before the castell, and besieged the king most straightlie therein. Who perceiuing himselfe in such danger as he knew not well how to escape, came forth with such companie as he had about him, and incountring with his enimies, was straightwaies beaten downe among them, and so at once lost there both kingdome and life in the ninth yeare of his reigne. Durstus being thus dispatched, his children doubting the indignation of the people conceiued against them for their fathers fault, to auoid the perill fled ouer into Ireland, and immediatlie the nobles of the realme assembled themselues togither for the chosing of a new king, in no wise minding to haue anie of Durstus his race to reigne ouer them, least they would seeke by some means to reuenge his death: howbeit at length when they were at point to haue fallen at variance in susteining of contrarie opinions about the election of their prince, through a wittie oration made by Corranus gouernour of Argile, who alledged manie weightie reasons for the auoiding of sedition, they all agreed to commit the free election vnto the same Corranus, promising firmelie to accept whomesoeuer he should name. Herevpon Corranus consulting a little with the peeres of the realme, named one Ewin the vncles sonne of Durstus, who as then remained in Pictland, whither he had withdrawen himselfe in Durstus his daies, being banished the realme by him, for that he could not awaie with his corrupt maners. This election was acceptable to all estats, for that thereby the administration of the kingdome continued in the line of their former kings.

Durstus is slaine.

Ewin is chosen king.

Ewin.

And Ewin shortlie after was brought forth of Pictland with all regall solemnitie, and at Beregonium placed vpon the stone of marble, to the great reioising of the people there assembled. Herewith also the nobles of the realme, putting their hands in his, bound themselues by oth to be loiall and faithfull subiects vnto him in all points, which custome of swearing fealtie then first by Ewins commandement, begun and continued manie hundred yeares after amongst his and their posteritie; in so much that the capteins of the tribes also required the same kind of oth of them that inhabited within their liberties, which in part remaineth yet vnto this day amongest those of the westerne Iles, and such as inhabit in the mounteins. For at the creation of a new gouernour, whome they name their capteine, they vse the like ceremonies; which being ended, at the next faire kept within that countrie, proclamation is made, that no man inhabiting within his iurisdiction, shall name this new gouernour by anie other name from thenceforth, than by the ancient & accustomed name as such rulers aforetime haue beene called by. And that so oft as they heare him named, they shall put off their caps or hats, and make a certeine courtesie in signe of honour due to him, in such maner as we vse in hearing diuine seruice, when anie holie mysterie is in doing, or anie sacred name of the almightie creator recited.

Swearing of fealtie first begun.

Humble reuerence.

But now touching king Ewin, his chiefest studie was to mainteine iustice throughout his dominion, and to weed out such transgressours as went about to trouble the quiet estate of his subiects. Furthermore, considering what inconueniencies proceeded through the vse of voluptuous pleasures & wanton delites, he ordeined that the youth of his realme should be trained to endure hardnesse, paine, and trauell, as to lie vpon hard boords without anie featherbeds or pillows vnder them. Also to exercise themselues to throw the dart, to shot, to wrestle, and to beare armour aswell in time of peace as of warre; that when need required, trauell and such kind of exercises should be no paine but pleasure vnto them; where otherwaies lacke of vse might make the same intollerable. Whilest Ewin is thus occupied about the setting forth of necessarie ordinances for the wealth of his realme, the king of the Picts did send vnto him ambassadours to require his aid against the Britains, who were entred his countrie in robbing and spoiling the same.

The duetie of a good prince.

A notable ordinance.

Ewin consenting quicklie to that request, leuied an armie forthwith, and with all speed passed forward to ioine with the Picts, in purpose to reuenge the old iniuries done to his nation by the Britains, who likewise were as readie to receiue battell, as the Scots and Picts were desirous to giue it, so that both the armies incountring togither (the Scots and Picts on the one side, and the Britains on the other) there insued a sore conflict betwixt them, continued with vnmercifull slaughter till night parted them in sunder; no man as then able to iudge who had the better, but either part being priuie to their owne losses, withdrew themselues further off from the place of the battell, so that the Scots and Picts the same night got them into the mounteins of Pictland, and the Britains so soone as it was day made homewards with all speed towards their countrie, leauing no small preie and bootie behind them, which the Scotishmen and the Picts recouered, comming downe with all speed from the mounteins, when they once heard that their enimies were departed.

A doubtfull battell.

King Ewin being returned from this iournie, determined to passe the residue of his life in rest and quietnesse, appointing iudges in euerie part of his realme, for the ministring of iustice and executing of lawes, according to the due forme and ordinance of the same. He appointed also such as should watch for the apprehension of theeues and robbers by the high waies, assigning them liuings of the common treasurie to liue by. And there be euen vnto this day that hold still such liuings, though the office be worne out of vse and forgotten.

After this, he builded a castell not farre distant from Beregonium, which he named after his owne name Euonium: but afterwards it was called Dunstafage, which is as much to say, as Stéeuens castell, which name it beareth at this present. Finallie, this Ewin, after he had reigned to the great weale of the realme, about 19 yeares, he departed this life, leauing behind him a son base begotten, named Gillus, who causing his fathers funerals to be executed with all solemne pompe and ceremonies, raised vp sone after sundry obelisks about his graue neere vnto Dunstafage, where he was buried.

Dunstafage is builded.

There were present also at the buriall, two of Durstus his sonnes, whome Ewin in his life time had reuoked home out of Ireland, where they were in exile. Both these, as well the one as the other, because they were twins, and not knowne whether of them came first into the world, loked to be king after Ewin: their names were Dothan and Dorgall. And such malicious emulation and enuious spite rose betwixt the two brethren, for the attelning of their purpose, that greater could not be deuised; which Gillus, like a craftie & subtill fox, by couert means sought still to augment; and in the end causing them to come togither for some conclusion of agréement, at length when he had set them further at ods than they were before, he procured a number of souldiers appointed for the purpose to raise a tumult (as though it had bene in taking of contrarie parts) and there to slea them both.

The craftie working of Gillus.

Thus Gillus hauing brought to purpose that he came for, shewed in countenance as though he had béene much offended therewith, and done what hée could to haue appeased the matter, and herewith he commeth running forth with a high voice, declaring to his companie, that if he had not made good shift for himselfe, he had beene slaine by the hands of Dothan and Dorgall, who fell into such mischéefe themselues, as they had prepared for other. Herevpon also he required his friends and seruants most earnestlie to conueie him into some sure place, where he might be out of danger, and in better securitie: in somuch that manie of those that heard him, giuing credit to his words, went with him with all speed vnto Dunstafage, where being receiued into the castell with diuers of the nobles that followed him, he got him into a gallerie, and there making an inuectiue oration against the sonnes of Durstus, and touching by the way what perill might insue to the commonwealth by ciuill diuision, he persuaded them to commit the rule into his hands, vntill it might be certeinlie knowen, vnto whome the same of right apperteined.

Durstus two sonnes are slaine.

The nobles through feare consented to create Gillus king.

Those that were present, perceiuing to what issue his painted processe tended, and doubting lest if they should séeme to stand against him at that instant in this his demand, they might happilie be the first that should repent the bargaine, consented to proclaime him king: whereupon he required all such as were present, to sweare vnto him fealtie, and to do him homage according to the custome. And herewith agréeablie as he had before promised, and according to his fathers will (as he alledged) he distributed among them all such cattell as belonged to his said father. Whereby he wan the greater fauour of manie, but yet not iudging himselfe altogither in suertie, by reason that Dothan had left behind him three sonnes, as then remaining in the Ile of Man, in the bringing vp of the Druides, he purposed therefore to dispatch them also for the better assurance of his estate, and therevpon he made a iournie thither himselfe, feigning as though he meant nothing but all loue and frendlie affection towards the children, by which meanes he gat two of them into his hands, the one named Lismorus, being about twelue yeres of age, and the other Cormacus that was two yéres yonger. The yongest of the three named Ederus, being about seuen yéres old, as his better hap was, chanced to be sicke at that time, by reason whereof he escaped his hands: Gillus feigning as though he wished to haue the other two brought vp like the children of a prince, he led them away with him into Scotland, leauing certeine of his seruants behind him, to rid Ederus the yongest out of the way at leisure; and as for the other twaine, the night following after his comming home to Dunstafage, he caused them to be murthered, euen in their tutors armes, whose aid most pitifullie they besought and required. But the woman that had the kéeping of Ederus now in his sickenesse, prouided more warilie for his safegard, for she smelling out what was the kings purpose, in the dead of the night got hir selfe togither with Ederus into a ship, and passed ouer into Argile, where being set on land, she caried him on hir shoulders vp into the mounteins, and there within a secret den susteined his languishing life for certeine moneths in great care and miserie.

Gillus goeth about to murther Dothans sonnes also.

A detestable murther.

Ederus escapeth.

Gillus notwithstanding these his cruell acts, shewed yet in outward apperance that no man was more desirous of the quiet state and prosperous successe of the commonwealth than he: euer reasoning among his nobles, and that in the presence of his commons touching the maintenance of iustice, & punishment of misdoers, whereas he himselfe thirsted continuallie, and most of all after the bloud of those whom he doubted anie thing likelie to attempt the reuenge of his wicked misgouernance; insomuch that he caused in one place and other, all such to be murthered and slaine as bare anie good will toward the lawfull line of Durstus.

Gillus counterfeiteth a zeale to iustice.

Now the people séeing the dailie slaughter of the nobilitie, and at the last growing to be verie sore moued against him, namelie those of Galloway, Kiley, Carrike, and Coningham, with them of Cantire, Lorne, and Argile, they assembled their powers togither, and with all speed marched forth towards the place where they thought to find the tyrant: who hearing of this their conspiracie, assembled such puissance as he could make, & hauing no other refuge but to trie the matter by battell, made towards his enimies with more spéed than good successe: for yer the two armies came to ioining, a great number of Gillus his friends fled to the contrarie part, so that herevpon doubting the issue if he were constreined to fight, he stale priuilie from amongst the residue of his folks, and getting into a fishers bote, conueied himselfe ouer into Ireland: whose departure being once knowne, his souldiors yelded themselues vnto Cadall gouernor of Galloway, who was capteine generall of all the conspirators, and now by the consent of all the estates created gouernor of the realme till they had chosen a king.

The Scots rise against Gillus.

Gillus departeth secretlie and getteth ouer into Ireland.

Cadall of Galloway is chosen gouernor of the realme.

This Cadall, immediatlie vpon the great authoritie giuen him, gat first all the best fortresses into his hands, as Beregonium, Dunstafage, and other: then he passed ouer into the Ile of Ila, to prouide the better for the resisting of Gillus, if he shuld attempt anie thing by purchasing aid amongst them of the westerne Iles. Thither was brought vnhimto also, the yong Ederus (by such of Durstus his friends as had escaped the cruell hands of Gillus) whome Cadall caused to be honorablie conueied vnto Epiake the chiefest citie of Galloway, there to be brought vp in princelie nurture, that comming to full age, hee might the better be able to take vpon him the gouernance.

Leland and other take Epiake not to be so farre north.

In which meane while Gillus made all the friends in Ireland that he could, insomuch that vpon such golden promises as he made vnto the chiefest gouernors there, they consented to aid him with all their forces. Wherof Cadall being aduertised, he thought it best that a king should be chosen, and thereby an vnitie to be framed amongst all the estates of the realme, whereupon causing a councell to be assembled for the same intent, by common agréement, one Ewin, a man of worthie fame, nephue to king Finnan by his brother Douall, was in the end proclaimed king: who was latelie come from the Ile of Gowere into Albion, in companie with Cadall, and kept himselfe close hitherto within the said Ile, for doubt of Gillus that sought amongst other to haue destroied him also.

Gillus purchaseth aid in Ireland.

Ewin the second of that name chosen king.

Ewin.

THis Ewin, being the second of that name, made great prouision in the beginning of his reigne to resist the said Gillus his enimie. And hearing that he had béene in the Ile of Ila, and put the same to fire and sword, he prepared an armie and ships also, to transport therewith ouer into Ireland, there to reuenge that iniurie vpon such as had aided Gillus therein to the hinderance of his countrie. The forenamed Cadall gouernor of Galloway, was appointed also to haue the leading of this armie: who taking the sea at Dunstafage, directed his course streight ouer vnto the coasts of Ireland, where taking land and encountering with his enimies, he put them to the worse, insomuch that Gillus fearing to fall into his aduersaries hands, fled out of the field into the next wood, where he thought to haue saued himselfe. His souldiers also perceiuing him to be fled, gaue ouer the field, and yélded themselues vnto Cadall, who toke them to grace, and forthwith

Cadall with an armie is sent into Ireland.

sent

Gillus taken.

Gillus beheaded,

A ſhipwrack by a tempeſt.

Cadall for his good & faithfull ſeruice is rewarded.

In interview betwixt the kings of Scots and Picts.

The people of Orkney inuade Cathneſſe.

Bladus king of Orkeney ſleeth himſelf.

Enuerlochtey is builded.

Enuerneſſe builded.

ſent out certeine companions to ſéeke Gillus, who found him in a den cloſed about with thicke woods and buſhes, where he had lien hid certeine daies, and was almoſt ſtarued for hunger. Thoſe that found him immediatlie ſtroke off his head, and preſented the ſame vnto Cadall, to the great reioiſing of all the companie.

Thus after that Cadall had atchiued his enterpriſe with good ſucceſſe, he toke the ſea againe to returne into Scotland, but by meanes of a grœuous tempeſt, he loſt the greateſt part of his armie, with all the ſpoile and riches that they had gotten in that voiage. Which miſchance ſore blemiſhed the glorie of ſo famous a victorie, ſo that the reioiſing of manie was turned into dolefull mourning for the loſſe of their friends and kinſfolke, but namelie Cadall toke it ſo grœuouſlie, that nothing could be more ofenſiue vnto him. Howbeit, after he was come on land, the king and other of the nobles recomforted him in all that they might, and the king gaue him alſo much faire lands, with diuers caſtels in Galloway, in recompenſe of his good faithfull ſeruice at ſundrie times ſhewed in defenſe of his countrie, and made him gouernor of Galloway alſo, which he verie thankfullie accepted.

After this king Ewin came to an interuiew with the king of Picts in the borders of Galloway, and there renewed th' ancient leage betwixt the Scotiſh men and the Picts. For more corroboration wherof Sybra the daughter of Gethus the third king of the Picts, was ioined in marriage with Ederus, the ſolemnization being kept at Eptake. Theſe things thus accompliſhed, Ewin returned to Duſtafage, where being certified by letters from the lieutenant of Roſſe, that the Ilanders of Orkney had paſſed Pictland firth, and were entred into Cathneſſe, robbing and ſpoiling that countrie with a great part of Roſſe, he leuied an armie with all ſpéed, and haſted towards the enimies, conſtreining them by his ſudden comming to fight whether they would or not, hauing no leiſure to get awaie, ſo that with ſmall reſiſtance they were vanquiſhed and chaſed, ſome into the mounteins, and other to the ſea ſide: of whom part eſcaped by botes ouer into their countries, the reſidue of them in this their ſudden ouerthrow being either ſlaine, drowned, or taken. But Bladus the king of Orkeney, for that he would not come into his enimies hands, ſlue himſelfe. And thus ended this enterpriſe againſt the enimies of Orkeney: greatlie to the increaſe of Ewins fame amongſt the Scotiſh nation.

After this he viſited the weſt parts of his realme, and at the mouth of the riuer of Lochtey he builded a citie which he named Enuerlochtey, infranchiſing the ſame with a ſanctuarie for the refuge of offendors. This citie afterwards was much frequented with merchants of France and Spaine, by reaſon of the great abundance of ſamons, herrings, and other fiſh which was taken there. The old ruines of this citie in part remaine to be ſéene in that place where it ſtood, euen to this day. He likewiſe built an other citie in the eaſt part of the realme néere to the water called Lochneſſe, which he named Enuerneſſe, after the name of the water. Whither in times paſt there reſorted manie merchants of Germanie, with ſuch merchandize as the inhabitants of the countrie there ſtood in néed of, exchanging the ſame with them for marterne ſkins, and other ſuch furres, wherewith they made their returne. This citie is as yet remaining, and beareth the old name, rich and well ſtored with diuers kinds of merchandize, ſo that this Ewin proued a moſt famous prince for his worthie exploits right fortunatelie atchiued both in peace and warre. And finallie vnderſtanding the death of his verie déere and intirelie beloued friend Cadall, he repaired vnto Eptake, as well to giue order for the pacifieng of his ſonnes being at variance for their fathers inheritance, as alſo to doo the more honor to his friend now deceaſed, by erecting ſome monument néere vnto his ſepulchre. Comming therefore to Eptake, and ſetting an accord betwixt the yong men, he cauſed an image to be made in all points reſembling the perſonage of Cadall, as néere as might be: which he placed in the middeſt of the market ſtéed, commanding the ſame to be honored with burning of incenſe and other diuine ceremonies. Within a few daies alſo, through inward ſorrow, as was thought, for the loſſe of ſo déere a friend, he began to wax ſicke himſelfe, and at length perceiuing he ſhould not eſcape preſent death, he cauſed Ederus (of whom before mention is made) to be brought vnto him, into whoſe hands with manie wholſome aduertiſements how to vſe himſelfe in gouernement of his ſubiects, he wholie reſigned the eſtate, the which after his deceaſſe he knew to be due vnto him without all queſtion and controuerſie: and afterward departed this world, when he had reigned ſeuentéene yeares continuallie for the moſt part in high wealth and felicitie.

Cadall deceaſed.

Ewin reſigneth the eſtate.

Ewins deceaſe.

Ederus.

AFter the deceaſe of Ewin, Ederus was, in maner before expreſſed, receiued for king by the whole aſſent of all the Scotiſhmen. Whoſe chéefe delight was altogither in hunting and kéeping of hounds and greihounds, to chaſe and purſue wild beaſts, and namelie the woolfe the heardmans foo, by meanes whereof his aduancement was much more acceptable amongſt the nobles, who in thoſe daies were wholy giuen to that kind of pleaſure and paſtime. In the beginning of his reigne there was no trouble towards, the publike ſtate of the realme being mainteined by vpright iuſtice, and all tranſgreſſions through terror of due puniſhment politikelie repreſſed.

Bzedus inuadeth the Scots.

The firſt that went about to put him to any notable trouble, was one Bzedus of the Iles, néere of kin to Gillus that vſurper and murtherer, who with a power of Iriſhmen, and other of the weſterne Iles landed in Argile, waſting & ſpoiling the countrie with fire & ſword, wherof Ederus being aduertiſed (who was at the ſame time in thoſe parts hunting amongſt the mounteins) gathered an armie with all ſpéed, and haſting to the place where his enimies ſhips laie at anchor, he firſt burned the ſame, to take awaie all meanes from them to eſcape by flight. The morning next following he did ſet vpon them alſo at vnwares: of whom ſome he ſlue, and the reſidue being taken, either in the fight or chaſe by his commandement were hanged, and cruellie executed to the example of all others.

Ederus burneth his enimies ſhips.

After this, he paſſed ouer into the weſterne Iles, where he did execution vpon ſuch as had aided Bzedus, putting ſome to death, and cauſing other to fine at his pleaſure, and depriuing ſome vtterlie of all that euer they had. At his returne againe into Scotland, there met him ambaſſadors ſent from Caſſibilane king of the Britains, requiring him of aid againſt Julius Ceſar, who (as the ſame king had perfect vnderſtanding) was appointed verie ſhortlie to paſſe the ſeas from France, ouer into this Ile, with a mightie power of Romans, to ſubdue the inhabitants vnto the ſeignioric and iuriſdiction of Rome.

Caſſibilane king of the Britains requireth of the Scotiſhmen aid againſt the Romans.

Ederus receiued theſe ambaſſadors verie courteouſlie: and forſomuch as their maiſters requeſt required counſell, he cauſed his lords which were then preſent, to aſſemble togither the next daie, afore whome he willed that Androgeus, chéefe of the Britiſh ambaſſadors, ſhould declare the effect of his meſſage, Androgeus chéefe ambaſſador of the Britains declareth the effect of his meſſage.

sage, which he did so eloquentlie, and vttering such sensible matter, how it stood the Scotishmen vpon to aid the Britains against such common enimies to all nations as the Romans were, that in the end it was concluded by the king, with the aduise of his nobles, that he should not onlie send a power to aid the Britains against the Romans, but also send some of his lords with Androgeus and his associats vnto Gethus king of the Picts, to moue him to do the like: who hearing how reasonable their demands were, promised further to accomplish the same.

The Scots grant to aid the Britains against the Romans.

Thus the British ambassadors hauing sped according to their desires, repaired homewards: immediatlie vpon whose departure, both the kings Ederus & Gethus leuied their armies, & sent them forth towards London, whereas then Cassibilane soiourned. I find that the Scots were ten thousand men vnder the leading of Cadallane gouernor of Galloway, the sonne of Cadall before remembred, and one Douald gouernor of Argile. But what successe followed of this first iournie which Cesar made into Britaine, ye shall find the same in the historie of England more at length expressed. The yeere that Julius Cesar came to inuade Britaine, was the fourth of Ederus his reigne, from the creation of the world 3912 complet, which is after Maister Harisons account 54 before the comming of our Sauiour, and 692 after the building of Rome.

Cadallane & Douald with ten thousand Scotishmen send to aid the Britains.

1129 H.B.
60 H.B.

The Scotishmen and Picts hauing their part of the spoile which the Romans at their departure left behind them, were sent home to their countries with great thanks and rewards for their pains, but the Britains were so exalted in pride by the departure of the Romans, that they beléued verelie they should haue no more to do with those enimies, or if they had they thought themselues strong inough to repell them without aid of other. By meanes wherof when king Ederus was informed how the Romans prepared to inuade them afresh, and had sent them word thereof, offering to them his aid: they made no account of that offer, but answered that it was not necessarie, for euerie light inuasion of forren enimies, to séeke helpe at other mens hands, being of puissance sufficient of themselues to resist the same well inough.

The Britains refuse aid being offered them.

But of this refusall of so friendlie an offer, it was not long yer the Britains sore repented them. For shortlie after Julius Cesar with a farre greater power than that which he brought with him at the first time, landed here in this Ile amongst them againe: and being at three sundrie times fiercelie incountred by king Cassibilane, at length he put the same Cassibilane with his Britains to flight, slaieng and taking a great number of them. Amongst other of the prisoners were three of their cheefest capteins, Androgeus, Ciscentoriges, and Tenantius. By reason of which ouerthrow Cassibilane was so discouraged, that doubting further mischéefe, he yelded himselfe vnto Cesar, accepting such conditions of peace as were appointed him, and for performance of couenants, deliuered sufficient pledges.

Julius Cesar inuadeth this land the second time.

The Britains are ouerthrowne.

Julius Cesar his message to the Scots and Picts.

Cesar hauing thus conquered the Britains, sent his ambassadors vnto the kings of the Scotishmen and Picts, requiring them to submit themselues as Cassibilane had done, or else he bad them looke for open warres at the Romans hands, which they might assure themselues they should in no wise be able to susteine, considering their mightie and huge puissance, hauing the most part of the whole world at their commandement alreadie. Whereunto aswell the one king as the other made this or much-what the like answer, that they were bent sooner to lose their liues than their libertie. Which their resolution, if they were put to the triall, should be euidentlie proued by the deed it selfe.

The answer of the Scots and Picts vnto Cesar his ambassadors.

Cesar hauing receiued this answer from these two nations, he sendeth new messengers vnto them with a more rough message, who not onlie by threats but also by great reasons went about to persuade them vnto submission. But they persisting in their former opinion for defense of their liberties, and vtterlie refusing all maner of bondage, would incline by no meanes to come in any bond of friendship with the Romans. After the returne of these last messengers, Cesar was fullie resolued to enter into their countries, to force them vnto that by dint of sword, whereunto by treatie he might not induce them: and had set forward on that iournie shortlie after indéed, if he had not béene called backe into France, to pacifie sundrie commotions there raised by the reuolting of the people inhabiting in those countries, where the Picards and Normans, with other the inhabitants néere about Chartres do now dwell.

Cesar sendeth new messengers vnto the Scots and Picts, but they sped much like to the former.

The common Scotish chronicles record, how Julius Cesar came as far as Kalendar wood, and there wan by force the citie of Camelon, where the Picish kings vsed most to soiourne. Hereunto the same chronicles adde, that Cesar builded a great stone-house of 24 cubits in heigth, & of 12 cubits in breadth, of square hewen stones, right workemanlie framed, which house they saie Cesar caused to be vsed in steed of a iudgement hall, and here placed it néere the riuer of Caron, ouer against the forenamed citie of Camelon, as a witnesse that the Romans armie had béene so far forward within that countrie. Such an house there remaineth to be séene euen vnto this daie, and is called Julius hoff, that is Julius hall, or Julius court. Howbeit, other more agréeable to the likelihood of a truth, write that this house was sometimes a temple builded to the honor of Claudius Cesar, and of the goddes Victoria, by the Romane capteine Uespasian, at such time as he made wars in that countrie, before his aduancement to the empire.

Kalendar or Caledon wood. This cannot be true, for Cesar came not nér Scotland, as in the historie of England it appéereth.

Julius hoff.

But to returne vnto Ederus. About the same time, in which he looked to be inuaded by Julius Cesar and the Romans, and for that purpose had sent for them of the westerne Iles to reinforce his host, he was now inforced to conuert it another waie, for there was one Murketus, nephue vnto the aboue remembred Gillus, that came with a nauie out of Ireland to rob and spoile those Iles, being destitute as then of men to resist him. But Ederus hearing thereof, dispatched Cadallanus with an armie into those parties for defense of his subiects: which Cadallanus behaued himselfe so politikelie in this exploit, that setting vpon the enimies as they laie at anchor, he tooke them in the night season, without making any great defense, and after hanged them vp along the shore side within the Ile of Gowre: Murket himself being honored with an higher place to hang in than all the rest, as due to him that was their cheefe head and leader in that voiage. The remnant of Ederus his reigne passed without anie other notable trouble: and so after he had reigned 38 yeeres, he deceased a verie old man, about the 23 yeare of the empire of Augustus Cesar. He was buried also at Dunstafage with all due pompe & solemnitie, hauing diuers obelisks (as the custome then was) erected and set vp about the place where he was so intumulate.

Murketus nephue vnto Gillus inuadeth the westerne Iles.

Murketus hanged with manie more.

48 HB.
26 H.B.

Ederus departeth this life.

AFter him reigned his sonne Ewin, the third of that name, nothing like in any princelie qualitie vnto his noble progenitors, but contrariwise infamed by all kind of vices. In the first yeeres of his reigne he was wholy drowned in lasciuious lecherie, abandoning himselfe altogither to lie weltering amongst amongst a sort of vile strumpets, his lust being neuer throughlie satisfied, though neuer so often wearied. The nobles of the realme he had in no regard at all, of whom some he confined, and some he caused to be murthered, onlie because he might the more freelie without gainsaieng haunt his vile trade of liuing with their wiues and cosins. Such delight he had also in his filthie and abhominable ribaldrie, that he made lawes for maintenance of the like amongst his subiects, as thus: That it might be lawfull for euerie man to marie diuers & sundrie wiues, some six, some ten, according to their substance and qualities. And as for poore mens wiues, they were appointed to be common vnto the lords of the soile: and further, that the same lords should first defloure the bride after hir marriage: which last ordinance tooke such effect, that of manie hundred yeres after it could by no meanes be abrogated, though the two former liberties were by authoritie of the kings succeeding, shortlie after this Ewins decease, taken awaie and remoued.

Ewin.

Licentious king.

Filthie lawes

But now to conclude touching the doings of this Ewin, ye shall vnderstand, that at length such lords as greatlie abhorred his vile conditions & vsages, conspired against him, and raising an armie of their friends and partakers, incountred with him in the field, and there tooke him prisoner, being destitute of all aid and succors: for such as he brought with him, not once offered to strike one stroke in his quarell. Ewin being thus taken, was by and by condemned to perpetuall prison; and Cadallan, of whom ye haue heard before, immediatlie proclamed gouernor of the realme. Howbeit the night following, after that Ewin (according to the iudgement pronounced against him) was committed vnto ward, a presumptuous young man, in hope to haue thanks of Cadallan, entred into the chamber where he was inclosed, and there strangled him. But in steed of thanks he was recompensed with death: for Cadallan detesting such a wicked deed, caused him to be hanged in open sight of all men. Such was the end of Ewin, being thus dispatched in prison, in the seuenth yere after he began his reigne ouer the Scotishmen, being the 9 yere of Augustus Cesar his gouernment of the Romane empire.

Ewin is pursued and forsaken of his subiects.

Ewin condemned to perpetuall prison

Ewin is strangled.

32 H.B.

Metellanus.

After Ewin succeeded Metellanus, son to one Carren, the brother of Ederus a prince of most gentle behauiour. This Metellanus mainteined his subiects in great quietnesse and rest, without anie maner of wars, either forren or ciuill. Such wicked lawes as his predecessor had established, he did what he could to abolish. But such young gentlemen as delighted in sensuall lust, and licentious libertie, stood so stiffelie therein against him, that in the end he was glad to leaue off his purpose. About the same time also there came vnto Kimbaline king of the Britains an ambassador from Augustus the emperor, with thanks, for that entring into the gouernement of the British state, he had kept his allegiance toward the Romane empire: exhorting him to keepe his subiects in peace with all their neighbors, sith the whole world, through meanes of the same Augustus, was now in quiet, without all warres or troublesome tumults.

Kimbaline king of the Britains.

These ambassadors went also vnto Metellanus the K. of the Scotishmen, exhorting him to acknowledge a superioritie in the Romane emperour, vnto whome the people inhabiting in the furthest parts of the east, had sent their ambassadors with rich iewels to present his person withall. Wherwith Metellanus being partlie moued to haue a friendlie amitie with the Romans, he sent vnto Rome certeine rich presents to the emperour, and to the gods in the capitoll, in signe of honour, by which means he obteined an amitie with the Romans, which continued betwixt them and his kingdome for a long time after.

Metellanus becommeth friend to the Romans.

Thus a generall peace as then reigning throughout the whole world, it pleased the giuer and author of all peace to be borne at the same time, of that blessed virgin Marie, in the citie of Bethlem in the tribe of Juda. Which most blessed and salutiferous birth did come to passe in the 12 yeare of Metellanus reigne, and in the 42 of Augustus his empire: from the first establishing of the Scotish kingdome by Fergusius 324 yeares, and after the creation of the world 3966, as Harison in his chronologie doth manifestlie conclude. After this, Metellanus reigned certeine yeares in continuall peace and quietnes, euermore readie to doo the thing that might be to the contentation and the weale of his people. Finallie, he passed out of this life in the 29 yere of his reigne, which was the 28 after the birth of our Sauior, and 13 of Tiberius the emperor. Howbeit he left no issue alliue behind him to succeed in the gouernment of the kingdome: for those children which he had begotten, he buried in his life time, by meanes whereof, one Caratake, sonne to Cadallan, and nephue to king Metellan by his sister Europeta, was proclamed king; as he that excelled in riches and puissant authoritie aboue all other the peeres and high estates of the realme, and had not a little to doo in the administration of publike affaires in the latter daies of his vncle Metellane.

The birth of our Sauior Christ.

10 H.B.

330 H.B.

5199 H.B.

Metellane departeth this world.

29 H.B.

14 H.B.

Caratake is proclamed K.

This Caratake all the British and English writers take to be a Britaine, and inhabiting within that portion of the Ile now called England.

The first thing he did after he was established in the estate, he sailed into the westerne Iles, to appease a rebellion moued by the gouernour there. Which doone, and the authors punished, he returned into Albion, and came into Caricoulum, which was sometimes a famous citie, and metropolitane of Scotland, situat within the countrie cleped Carrike, as it appeareth by the ruines there remaining euen vnto this day. In this citie was Caratake borne, & therefore fauouring it the more, he lay there most commonlie, and did what he could to aduance the wealth and state thereof. Whilest these things were a doing in Scotland, Kimbaline king of the Britains died, who for that he had beene brought vp in Rome, obserued his promised obedience towards the empire; but Guiderius succeeding, disdained to see the libertie of his countrie oppressed by the Romans, and therefore procuring the Britains to assist him, assembled a power, and inuaded the Romans with such violence, that none escaped with life, but such as saued themselues within castels & fortresses.

Caratake.

Caratake was borne in Carrike.

Kimbaline king of the Britains dieth.

Guiderius the British king rebelleth against the Romans.

The emperour Claudius that then gouerned the Romane empire, aduertised hereof, sent two capteins, Aulus Plancius, and Cneus Sentius to appease that rebellion. They landing in Britaine with their armie, vanquished Guiderius in battell, so that he was constreined to send to Caratake king of Scots for aid against the common enimies of both nations. Caratake hauing considered the effect of this message, gaue counsell to the Britains to send into France then called Gallia, to practise with the people there to moue some rebellion against the Romans, in hope of helpe, which they were assured to haue by the Britains. This counsell was followed, for immediatlie vpon the ambassadours returne, there were sent ouer into France certeine intelligenciaries to moue some conspiracie which had taken effect (by reason of the generall hate of seruitude, wherein the Romans kept the people subiect to them in those daies) if Guiderius had not beene constreined to giue battell, and chanced to be slaine in the same, yer the Galls could be resolued vpon anie determinat purpose.

Plancius otherwise Plautius.

Guiderius sendeth to Caratake for aid.

France in those daies Gallia.

Guiderius slaine.

This ouerthrow being reported in France, caused the Galls to staie their intended rebellion. Shortlie lie after Claudius himselfe came ouer into Britaine, and receiuing the Britains vnder his obeisance, ordered things among them at his pleasure. And after preparing his nauie and armie with all purueiance conuenient, he set forward towards the Iles of Orkneie, purposing to conquere the same, for that they had aided the Britains in these last warres against the Romans. But approching neere to those Iles, he was in danger to haue beene cast awaie by a tempest rising by chance, euen as he was entred the streict betwirt the Orkenies and Dungisbie head in Cathnesse called Pictland frith; yet at length getting to land, he found in that Ile where he first arriued, no bodie at home, all the people through feare vpon the first sight of the great multitude of ships being fled to hide themselues in caues and dens amongest the rocks & mounteins.

The emperour Claudius commeth into Britaine.

Claudius tarieth into the Orkenies.

Claudius therefore leauing this Ile, passed into Pomonia the chiefest of all the Orkenies, where discomfiting such as appeared abroad to make resistance, he besieged the king of those Iles named Ganus, within a castell where he was withdrawen, and finallie causing him to yeeld himselfe prisoner, led him with other nobles of Britaine (whome he had for pledges) vnto Rome, the more to set forth the glorie of his triumph at his returne vnto the citie.

Now Kirkewale.

Claudius taketh the king of the Orkenies.

¶ But whatsoeuer Hector Boetius and others write of this passage of Claudius into the Orkenies, it is not like that he came there at all, for if he staied not past 16 daies in Britaine, as by Dion Cassius it appeareth that he did not in deed; how should we imagine that he could both pacifie the south parts of Britaine, and after go into Orkenie and conquere the same within so small a time, being readie to returne towards Rome at the end of those 16 daies, as the said Dion affirmeth? But this discourse haue I made according to their owne historiens, least I should seeme to defraud them of whatsoeuer glorie is to be gotten by errours, as the maner is of them as well as of other nations, which to aduance their antiquities and glorie of their ancestors, take the aduantage oftentimes of writers scant worthie of credit.

The doubt of Claudius going into the Orkenies.

Dion Cassius.

But now againe to our purpose. Aruiragus being established in the kingdome of Britaine, vpon some priuat displeasure forsoke his wife named Voada, the sister of Caratake king of the Scotishmen, and maried Genissa a Romane ladie, which act manie of the Britans disallowed; the more in deed, because he had faire issue alreadie by Voada, as a son and two daughters. But this was done, as all men iudged, by the counsell of Aulus Plancius, thereby to breake all friendship and aliance betwirt the Britains and the Scots, to the end that in no case of rebellion they should ioine their powers togither.

Aruiragus forsaketh his lawfull wife.

Neither did he onelie refuse Voada, whome all men knew to be his lawfull wife, but also caused hir to be kept in prison, till that the Britains (hauing indignation thereat) got hir out of the place where she was kept, and conueied hir into Wales togither with hir children.

Voada imprisoned.

Voada is deliuered out of prison, and conueied into Wales.

With which dealing Aruiragus being highlie moued, determined with force of armes to punish them that had thus misused him: but perceiuing that not onelie those people which inhabited the countrie, now called Wales, and other that adioined on the north marches thereof were readie to defend the queene against his malice, he was faine to require aid of the Romans, who with their capteine Aulus Plancius assembling togither with such of the Britains as toke part with Aruiragus, set forward toward the enimies, and ioining with them in battell, did giue them the ouerthrow. The nert day after this victorie thus gotten, word was brought that the people inhabiting in the countries which we now call Lanchashire, Yorkeshire, and Darbishire, were vp in armour against the king and the Romans, by reason whereof Aruiragus and Aulus Plancius withdrew towards London, that defending the sea coasts towards France, they might yet haue the sea open at all times whatsoeuer chanced. And to reenforce their power, Aulus Plancius sent ouer for two legions of souldiers into France, to come with all speed to his aid.

Aruiragus giueth his enimies an ouerthrow.

A commotion against Aruiragus.

The Britains, who had gone so farre in the matter that they could not well withdraw themselues, now being certified of all their enimies doings, thought best to make themselues so strong as was possible. And to the end that they might proceed in some orderlie meane, all the greatest lords and estates assembled togither at Shrewsburie, in those daies called Coriminum, where they concluded vpon a league to aid one another with all their might and maine against the Romans & Aruiragus, who went about to bring them wholie vnder seruile subiection and thraldome of the same Romans. They being thus agreed to make warres in this quarrell, and for the same purpose to ioine their whole puissance togither; there rose a doubt whome they might chose for their generall capteine, for that it was feared least there might grow some secret enuie amongest the nobles being of equall power, if one should be in this case preferred before an other. For the auoiding of which mischiefe, by the graue admonition of one Comus a noble man of the parties of Wales, they accorded to send messengers vnto Caratake the king of Scotland, requiring him to aid them in their right and iust quarrell against Aruiragus and the Romans, whereby he might reuenge the iniurie done to his sister queene Voada and hir issue, whome the father through counsell of the Romans purposed to disherit, to the end such children as he had by Genissa (for that they were of the Romane bloud) might inioy the kingdome. They further declared, that all the British lords which were confederat in this enterprise, had chosen him by common assent to be their generall and chiefe leader, if it might so please him to take it vpon him, as their trust was he would: considering the iust causes of their warre, and the suertie which by victorie gotten might insue vnto all the inhabitants of the whole Ile of Albion.

The Britains make themselues strong.

The Britains assemble themselues at Shrewsburie.

They confederat themselues togither.

Caratake chosen to be capteine of the Britains.

Aruiragus would disherit his owne children which he had by Voada.

Caratake hauing heard the summe of their request, and throughlie weieng the same, promised them to be readie with his whole puissance in the beginning of the nert spring, to come to their aid, vnto what place soeuer they should thinke expedient: and thereof he told them they might be most assured, willing them in the meane time so to prouide for themselues, as their enimies might haue no aduantage at their hands. With this agreeable answere the British messengers returned to Shrewsburie to the confederats, who reioising at the news, made prouision against the nert spring to go against the Romans, in hope of good successe, speciallie through aid of the Scots and Picts, who also with their king called Conkist were willing to helpe towards the deliuering of the land from bondage of the Romans, whose nestling so neere their noses they were loth to see or heare of. So soone therefore as the spring approched, all those three people, Britains, Scots, and Picts, gathered their powers togither, and met in Yorkeshire, in purpose to incounter with their enimies in battell, whersoeuer they found them.

Caratake promised aid to the Britains.

The Picts ioine with Scots and Britains against the Romans.

Aruiragus and Aulus Plancius hauing knowledge of all the doings of the confederats, likewise assembled their power, & comming towards them, for a while forbare to ioine in battell, through counſell of Planctius, who perceiuing the moſt part of the Britains and Scots to be but new ſouldiers, taken vp of late to fill the numbers, knew that by protracting time they would be ſone out of heart, through watching and euill harborough, in ſuch ſort that in the end they ſhould be eaſie inough to deale with; and euen ſo it came to paſſe. For the Romans refuſing to fight a generall battell, yet ſcoured ſo the fields on ech ſide abroad, that neither the Britains nor Scots could go forth anie waies for forage or vittels, but they were ſtill ſnatched vp, ſo that what through hunger, lacke of ſléepe, and other diſeaſes, manie of the Britains began to conueie themſelues from the campe home to their houſes, of whome ſome being taken by the enimies, declared that the whole armie of the confederats was in great diſtreſſe, and ſore infeebled by ſuch vnaccuſtomed trauell and diſeaſes as they were inforced vnto in the campe. Wherevpon Aruiragus and Aulus Planctius determined the nert day to giue battell. And ſo in the morning they arraied their people, & marched forth betimes towards the campe of the confederats.

for

The Britains wearied through trauell.

The Romans giue battell to the Britains.

Caratake, who (as ye haue heard) was generall of all the confederates, vnderſtanding the enimies intent, was as readie to receiue battell as they were to offer it; wherevpon there inſued right great and vnmerciſull ſlaughter betwixt them on both parts, without ſparing any at all, till ſuch time as the night parted the fraie, with ſuch loſſe on either ſide, that after they were once got in ſunder, neither part had anie haſt afterwards to ioine againe: ſo that in the morning there appeared none in the field but onelie the dead bodies, thoſe that were left aliue as well on the one part as the other being fled and ſcattered into the woods and mounteins. Aruiragus and Planctius got them vnto London: and Caratake commanding his people home each man into his countrie, he himſelfe withdrew firſt towards Yorke, and after vnto the citie of Carrike; whither ſhortlie after there came vnto him ambaſſadors from Aulus Planctius, ſent to know vpon what occaſion he did aid the Britiſh rebels againſt the Romane empire, declaring that if he would not be conformable to make a worthie amends for ſo preſumptuous an enterpriſe, he ſhould be ſure to haue the Romans his enimies; and that in ſuch wiſe, as he ſhould perceiue it were much better for him to ſéeke their friendſhip, than to abide their enimitie.

Night parteth the fray.

Caratake returneth home to Caricotium.

Ambaſſadors are ſent vnto Caratake from Aulus Planctius.

Herevnto Caratake anſwered, that he had iuſt cauſe to do that which he did, conſidering the iniuries which his ſiſter Voada with hir ſonne Guiderius had and were like to receiue by their counſell and meanes: and therefore he was ſo little minded to make anie amends for that was done, that hée thought it more reaſon that the Romans ſhould clearelie auoid out of the whole poſſeſſion of Britaine, either elſe they might aſſure themſelues to haue aſwell the Britains, as alſo the Scots & Picts to be their perpetuall enimies, and that onelie for the chalenge of their ancient liberties and frédome. The Romane ambaſſadors being returned with this anſwer, Planctius toke no ſmall indignation thereat, ſore menacing to be reuenged of ſo high and contumelious words pronounced againſt the maieſtie of the Romane empire.

Caratake his anſwer vnto the ambaſſadors.

About the ſame time Aruiragus, vpon truſt conceiued by ioining his power with the other confederate Britains, to expell the Romans quite out of the realme, and ſo to recouer the intire eſtate, reuolting from them, fled into Shrewſburie, where, at the ſame time ſuch Britiſh lords as were enimies to the Romans, were aſſembled againe in councell, by whom Aruiragus was receiued with great gladneſſe (ye maie be ſure) of thoſe lords, truſting by his meanes to haue their force in maner doubled. His wife Genilla being at the ſame ſeaſon great with child, toke ſuch thought for this reuolting of hir huſband, that trauelling before hir time, ſhe immediatly died therwith. But Aulus Planctius, perceiuing now thoroughlie how little truſt there was to be put in the Britans, diſpatched a meſſenger in all haſt with letters vnto Claudius the emperour, who as then ſojourned at Rome, ſignifieng vnto him in what danger the ſtate of Britaine ſtood, if timelie proviſion were not the ſoner made.

Aruiragus reuolteth.

Genilla the wife of Aruiragus dieth.

A meſſenger ſent vnto Claudius the emperor from Planctius.

Claudius weieng the matter by good aduiſe of councell, ordeined by decrée of the ſenate, that Veſpaſian (of whome ye haue heard before) ſhould be ſent hither with an armie, to tame the proud and loftie ſtomachs of the Britains, with their confederats the Scots & Picts. Veſpaſian herevpon departing from Rome, came into France, & increaſing his legions, with a ſuplie of ſuch ſouldiers as he found there, paſſed ouer into this our Britaine, where contrarie to the report which he had heard afore his comming, he found euerie fortreſſe ſo well furniſhed after the warlike order of the Romane vſage, and moreouer all ſuch companies of men of warre as kept the field ſo well appointed and ordered, that he could not but much praiſe the great diligence and politike gouernement of Planctius.

Veſpaſian commeth into Britaine.

Now when Veſpaſian had a little refreſhed his men, and taken order how to proceéd in the reducing of the Britains to their former obedience, he ſet forward toward Aruiragus & other the enimies, whom he vnderſtood as then to be at Yorke, making their aſſemblie, not generallie of all that were able to beare a club, as they did the yeere before; but out of all parties a choſen number of piked men were ſent for, as out of Deuonſhire & Cornewall there came 6000, forth of Wales and the marches 12000, and the like number out of Kendall, Weſtmerland, and Cumberland. Out of Oxfordſhire and other the parties of Britaine ſubiect vnto Aruiragus, there came 35000. All which numbers aſſembled nere vnto Yorke, euerie man bringing his proviſion with him to ſerue him for two moneths ſpace. Vnto the ſame place came alſo Caratake with 30000 Scotiſh men: and Illithara otherwiſe called Tharan, king of the Picts, with almoſt as manie of his ſubiects.

The Britains gather an armie.

Iceni.

The Scots & Picts come to aid the Britains.

Illithara or Tharan king of Picts.

Veſpaſian being certified ſtill from time to time of all the doings of his enimies, haſted with all ſpéed towards them; and by the leading of truſtie guides comming to the place where they were incamped within a mariſh ground not paſſing 12 miles from Yorke, he fiercelie vpon a ſudden ſetteth vpon them within their campe, yer they thought he had béene néere them. But yet notwithſtanding they manfullie ſtood to their defenſe: inſomuch that thoſe in the right wing of the Romans armie were like to haue béene diſtreſſed, if Veſpaſian perceiuing the danger, had not ſent a legion to their aid in time, wherby the battell was newlie in that part reſtored. The captains on either ſide did what they could to incourage their folkes to ſticke to their tackle, without giuing ouer by anie meanes, conſidering what gaine came by victorie, and what loſſe inſued by receiuing the ouerthrow.

Veſpaſian aſſaileth the Britains in their campe.

The Britains, Scots, and Picts, like inraged lions, ran vpon the Romans, with ſuch cruell deſire of reuenge, that euen when they were thruſt through vpon the point of any weapon, they would run ſtill vpon the ſame, to come vnto him that held it, that they might requite him with the like againe. But yet would not all that their fierce and deſperate hardineſſe preuaile, for fortune by fatall appointment being bent to aduance the Romans vnto the domi-

The deſperat hardineſſe of the Britains and Scotiſhmen.

Fortune fauoureth the Romans.

nion

nion of the whole world, chewed hir ſelfe ſo fauourable vnto them in this battell, that in the end, though the Britains with the confederats did what lay in men to dow for atteining of victorie, yet were they beaten downe and ſlaine euerie mothers ſonne, a few onelie excepted, which eſcaped by flight.

The Britains receiue the ouerthrow

Aruiragus ſeeing the ſlaughter of his people, would haue ſlaine himſelfe, but that ſome of his ſeruants caried him by force out of the field, that hee might be reſerued yet vnto ſome better fortune. Caratake eſcaping by flight, fled into his countrie, but Tharan king of the Picts, not coueting to liue after ſuch loſſe of his people, threw away his armor with all his kinglie ornaments, and ſitting downe vpon a ſtone, as a man paſt himſelfe, was there ſlaine by ſuch as followed in the chaſe. Aruiragus being conueied out of danger, and gotten into Yorke, conſidered how by reaſon of this great diſcomfiture, it was vnpoſſible to reſiſt the Romane puiſſance, and therefore with conſent of the reſidue of his nobles that were eſcaped from the battell, he ſent an herald vnto Veſpaſian, offring to ſubmit himſelfe in moſt humble wiſe vnto anie reaſonable conditions of peace and agréement. Wherupon Veſpaſian commanded that Aruiragus ſhould in priuate apparell come in vnto him, for he would not talke of anie peace, except he had Aruiragus preſent, and therefore he ſent vnto him his ſafe conduct to aſſure him ſafetie both to come and go.

Caratake eſcapeth. Tharan king of the Picts is ſlaine.

Meſſengers ſent by Aruiragus vnto Veſpaſian with ſubmiſſion.

Aruiragus ſeeing no other remedie, came in vnto Veſpaſian, according to his appointment, and vpon his ſubmiſſion was pardoned of all his treſpaſſe, and placed againe in the kingdome. The cities and good townes alſo that were partakers in the rebellion, were in ſemblable wiſe forgiuen without fining or other indemnitie, and ſo likewiſe were all the nobles of the countrie. Howbeit, for the better aſſurance of their loialtie in time to come, they deliuered new hoſtages. Their ancient lawes alſo were abrogated, and the Romane lawes in their place eſtabliſhed. For the adminiſtration of the which, in euerie prouince was appointed a Romane iudge to ſee good orders obſerued according to the forme thereof. By which meanes the Britiſh nation eftſoones returned vnto hir former obedience of the Romane empire. All the winter following, Veſpaſian laie at Yorke, making his appreſts againſt the next ſpring to go againſt the Scots and Picts. So ſone therefore as the ſummer was come, Veſpaſian ſetteth forward with his armie, and entering into the marches of his enimies, he did put them in ſuch feare that the Picts were glad to yéeld themſelues vnto him, a few of the nobles & ſome other excepted, which were withdrawne into Camelon, in hope through ſtrength of that town to defend themſelues from all aſſaults. Veſpaſian being certified therof, came & beſieged them within the ſame citie, not minding to depart till he had them at his pleaſure. This ſiege continued till they within, being in danger to famiſh through want of vittels, ſurrendred themſelues with the town into Veſpaſians hands. In this town were found all the regall ornaments, as the crowne & ſword, with other iewels belonging to the kings of the Picts. The ſword hauing the haft of gold, & a purple ſcabberd very finely wrought & trimmed, Veſpaſian vſed to weare in all the warres wherin he afterwards chanced to be, in hope (I wot not) of what good ſucceſſe and lucke to follow therof. The Pictiſh lords which were within Camelon, were commanded to deliuer pledges: and after licenced to depart without anie other damage. Veſpaſian himſelfe remaining at Camelon, tooke order for the peopling of the towne with Romans, granting them the vſe of the liberties and priuileges which the Romans inhabiting in Rome inioied. Alſo ouer againſt the towne vpon the banke of the riuer of Caron, he builded a temple in honor of the emperor Claudius, wherein he ſet vp two images, the one repreſenting Claudius, and the other the goddeſſe Victoria.

Aruiragus commeth in vnto Veſpaſian.

Aruiragus is reſtored again to his former dignitie.

The Britains are pardoned, but yet deliuer new hoſtages.

Their lawes abrogated.

New lawes.

Camelon beſieged by Veſpaſian.

Camelon ſurrendred.

The kings regall ornaments taken.

Camelon peopled with Romans.

Iulius Hoſſ. This was at Colcheſter, as the Britiſh & Engliſh writers dow geſſe.

Whileſt he was thus occupied, tidings came to him, that Caratake king of the Scottiſhmen had aſſembled in Galloway a great armie of Scots, Picts and Britains, in purpoſe againſt the Romans, to reuenge the laſt ouerthrow. Wherupon Veſpaſian with all ſpéed ſent forth a ſtrong power vnder the leading of Aulus Plancius to incounter the enimies. Plancius being approched within foure miles of them, incamped himſelfe in a ſtrong place, as though he minded not to paſſe further, till Veſpaſian with the reſt of his whole puiſſance were come to his aid. Neuertheleſſe, night was no ſooner come on, but that he gaue generall commandement through his hoſt, that euerie man ſhould make him readie to depart at a certeine houre vnder the ſtandards of their capteins in order of battell.

Caratake aſſembleth an armie.

Plancius ſent forth with an armie againſt Caratake.

Then in the ſecond watch of the night he ſet forward, following certeine guides (which knew all the ſtraits and paſſages of the countrie) till he came to the place where Caratake with his armie was lodged: and firſt killing the watch which ſtood to defend his entrance, till the armie was raiſed, he ſet vpon the whole campe, and though he found ſuch reſiſtance that the battell continued right fierce & cruell from the dawning of the day, till it was hie none, yet in the end the victorie remained with the Romans; and the Scots with the Picts, & ſuch Britains as were on their part, put to flight and chaſed. Caratake eſcaping out of the battell, fled into Argile, and got him to the caſtell of Dunſtafage. Diuerſe of the Britains & Picts, which as yet had not ſubmitted themſelues, were put in ſuch dread through bute of this ouerthrow, that immediatlie therupon they came in and yéelded themſelues vnto Veſpaſian. And in ſemblable wiſe the people of Galloway vtterlie deſpairing any longer to defend their countrie againſt Plancius (who was now entred into their confines, and had taken the citie of Carrike) offred to become ſubiects vnto the Romans, which they might neuer be brought vnto before that time.

Plancius fetteth vpon the Scotiſh campe.

Caratake fleeth vnto Dunſtafage.

The people of Galloway ſubmit themſelues to the Romans.

These newes being certified vnto Veſpaſian by a purſeuant, he rode ſtreightwaies vnto Carrike, & there receiued the oths of the nobles, and other the inhabitants of the countrie. That done, he ſent ambaſſadors vnto Caratake, to trie if he might by anie meanes to become friend vnto the Romane empire, in acknowledging ſome maner of ſubiection therevnto: but this deuiſe was to ſmall purpoſe, for Caratake was determined rather to end his life as a frée Scotiſhman in defenſe of libertie, than to become thrall vnto anie forreine nation, in hope to liue long time in ſeruitude, doubting leaſt if he came anie waies forth into danger of the Romans, they would vſurpe the whole dominion vnto themſelues. Whoſe mind when Veſpaſian vnderſtood by his anſwer made to the ambaſſadors which were ſent vnto him, he was minded to haue gone with an armie vnto Dunſtafage where Caratake lay, but that he was informed what dangerous paſſages he muſt march thorough, all full of deſart mounteins, bogs, and quauemires, without anie prouiſion of vittels or forrage to bée found by all the way as the armie ſhould paſſe.

Ambaſſadors ſent vnto Caratake.

Caratake vtterlie refuſeth to become a ſubiect.

Leauing therfore this enterprize, he cauſed ſo manie veſſels to be aſſembled, as could be prouided on all parts, purpoſing to haue paſſed ouer into the Ile of Man, into the which there were gotten togither a great ſort of Britains and Picts, that had eſcaped the Romans hands. But this iournie alſo was broken

The Ile of wight reuelleth.

ken by another incident, for euen at the ſame time, newes were brought that the Britains of the Ile of Wight, with the Kentiſhmen, and diuerſe others the inhabitants vpon the ſouth coaſt, were reuolted, and had ſlaine diuerſe Romans, which lay in garriſons in thoſe parts. Veſpaſian therefore minding to cure this wound yer it ſhould throughlie feſter, haſted thither with all ſpéed, and with litle a do pacifieng the rebels, cauſed the chiefe offendors to be puniſhed according to their deſerts.

Veſpaſian appeaſeth the rebels.

Shortlie after being ſent for by the emperour Claudius, he returned vnto Rome with great glorie for his noble and high atchiued victories. Aulus Plancius was left in charge with the gouernement of Britaine after Veſpaſians departure: who hearing that Caratake had aſſembled a great armie of Scots, and other ſuch Britains and Picts as had not yet ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Romans, in purpoſe to recouer againe thoſe countries which Veſpaſian had latelie conquered, he likewiſe prepared to meet them, ſo that both the armies incountering togither, there was fought a right terrible battell with great ſlaughter on both parties, till finallie the victorie inclining to the Romans, more through ſkilfull policie than puiſſant force, the Scots, Picts, and Britains were diſcomfited and chaſed into the bogs and mariſhes, the common refuge in thoſe daies for the Scots, when by anie aduenture they chanced to be put to flight.

Veſpaſian returneth to Rome.

Plancius left gouernor. Plancius prepareth to meet the Scots.

The Romans through policie banquiſh the Scotiſhmen.

After this ouerthrow the warre was continued for two yéers ſpace, by rodes and incurſions made one vpon another in the confines of Kile and Galloway. In which meane while Plancius fell ſicke of the flix, which ſtill continuing with him, brought him at length in ſuch caſe, that he was not able to trauell at all in the publike affaires of his office. So that he wrote his letters vnto the emperour Claudius, ſignifieng vnto him in what caſe he ſtood, and therevpon required that ſome ſufficient perſonage might be ſent to occupie his rome. Claudius hauing receiued his letters, and vnderſtanding the effect of the ſame, ſent one Oſtorius Scapula, a man of high linage, and of good experience both in peace and war, to haue the gouernance in Britaine.

Plancius falleth ſicke.

Oſtorius Scapula is ſent into Britaine.

About the time of whoſe arriuall into Britaine, Aulus Plancius departed out of this world at Camelon, where he then ſoiourned. His bodie was burned, and according to the vſage of the Romans in thoſe daies, the aſhes were cloſed in a cheſt, and buried within the church of Claudius and Victoria, which (as is ſaid) Veſpaſian builded nére vnto Camelon, vpon the riuers ſide there. Hereof was a cuſtome taken vp amongſt both Scots and Picts (as ſome thinke) to burne the bodies of the dead, and to burie the aſhes: whereof there haue bene found diuerſe tokens and monuments in this our age. As in the yere 1521 at Findor a village in Merne, fiue miles diſtant from Aberdine, there were found in an old graue two cheſts of a ſtrange making full of aſhes, either of them being ingrauen with Romane letters, which ſo ſone as they were brought into the aire, fell to duſt. Likewiſe in the fields of another towne called Kenbacten in Marre, ten miles diſtant from Aberdine, about the ſame time were found by certeine plowmen two ſepulchres made of cut and ſquared ſtones, wherein were foure cheſts, of workemanſhip, bigneſſe and inſcription like to the other two. Manie the ſemblable monuments haue béene found in diuerſe places in Scotland in times paſt: but it is to be thought, that in theſe ſepulchres there were Romans buried, and neither Scots nor Picts.

Aulus Plancius dieth.

The vſage amongſt the Scots to burne the dead bodie.

But now to our purpoſe. Immediatelie vpon the comming of Oſtorius into Britaine, the people of the weſt countries rebelled, procuring the northerne men with the Scots of Galloway, and all the Picts to do the like. They ſent alſo vnto Caratake, requiring him in this common quarell againſt the Romans to put to his helping hand for recouerie of the ancient libertie of the whole land of Albion, conſidering it was like they ſhould match well inough with this new Romane captaine Oſtorius Scapula, that vnderſtood little of the maners and vſages of the Britains. But this notwithſtanding, Oſtorius being informed of all theſe practiſes, and remembring what furtherance it were for a captaine in the begining to win a name by ſome praiſeworthie enterprize, he made firſt towards the weſterne Britains, whome he thought to ſurpriſe yer they ſhould aſſemble with the other rebels, and ſo meéting with them, he chaſed and toke a great number of them, as they fled here and there out of all order.

The Britains yet eſtſoones rebell. The Britains require aid of Caratake.

The Britains of the weſt part are chaſed.

After this, he went againſt the people called Iceni, which (as ſome thinke) inhabited the countrie now called Oxfordſhire, but other take them to be Northfolke men, who being gathered togither, were gotten into a ſtrong place, incloſed about with a great ditch as they vſe to fenſe paſture grounds, that no horſſemen ſhould breake in vpon them: yet this notwithſtanding, Oſtorius aſſailed them within their ſtrength, & in the end breaking downe the rampire, with ſuch aid as he had, burſt in at length amongſt them, ſleaing and taking the moſt part of them: for few or none eſcaped, they were ſo kept in on ech ſide. But of this battell, and likewiſe of other enterprizes, which Oſtorius and other of the Romane lieutenants atchiued here in Britaine, ye ſhall find more thereof in the hiſtorie of England according to the true report of the Romane writers, the which verelie make no mention either of Scots or Picts till the yéere of our Lord 320, at the ſoneſt. And as for the Silures and Brigants remoued by Hector Boetius ſo farre northward, it is euidentlie prooued by Humfrey Llhoid, and others, that they inhabited countries conteined now within the limits of England. The like ye haue to vnderſtand of the Ordonices where Caratake gouerned as king, and not in Carrike, as to the well aduiſed reader I doubt not but it may ſufficientlie appeare, as well in the deſcription as in the hiſtorie of England aforeſaid.

Icent. Oxfordſhire is aſſailed. Some take the Icent to be the Northfolke men.

But now to returne where we left: the bruit of this late victorie quieted the buſie minds of ſuch other of the Britains, as were readie to haue reuolted. But they of Galloway would not at the firſt giue ouer, but in truſt of aid at the hands of Caratake continued in their rebellion, till Oſtorius came thither, and beate downe ſuch as made reſiſtance, whereby the other were ſone pacified. After this he entred into the confines of Kile and Cantire, ſpoiling and waſting thoſe countries, and brought from thence a great number of captiues. With which iniurie Caratake being not a little kindled, he aſſembled a mightie armie, wherein he had at the leaſt 40 thouſand men, what of his owne ſubiects and other ſuch as came to his aid. For after he was entred into Pictland, there came vnto him out of all parties no ſmall number, of ſuch as deſired either to be reuenged on the Romans, either elſe to loſe life and libertie both at once, for the taſt of bondage was ſo bitter vnto all the inhabitants of Albion in this ſeaſon, that they in maner were wholie conſpired togither to remoue that yoke of thraldome from their ſhoulders which ſo paineſullie pinched them.

They of Galloway are beaten and pacified.

Kile and Cantire waſted and ſpoiled. Caratake aſſembleth an armie.

Caratake thus furniſhed with an armie, choſe forth a ſtrong place to lodge in, ſenſed on the one ſide with the courſe of a déepe ſwdleſſe riuer, and on the other ſides it might not be approched vnto for the

The ſtrength of the place where Caratake was incamped.

Of this matter ye may read more in England.

keepnesse of the crags and such fensing as they had made with great stones, in places where there was any waie to enter. All such women as were somewhat stept in age, and came thither with them, in great numbers, were by Caratake placed on either side his battels, both as well to incourage the men to doo valiantlie with shouting and hallowing vnto them, as also to assails the Romans with stones as they should approch. Other such as were yong and lustie, were appointed to keepe araie amongst the men to fight in the battell.

Women incamped.

Women placed in order of battell.

Caratake and his capteins exhort their men to fight.

Caratake hauing thus ordered his field, and hearing that Ostorius was come to giue battell, exhorted his people to sticke to it like men, and so in semblable wise did all his capteins and sergeants of the bands, going from ranke to ranke to incourage their souldiors, declaring how that this was the armie that must either bring libertie or thraldome to them and their posteritie for euer. On the other part Ostorius minding to trie the matter by battell, set his people in araie after the ancient maner of the Romans, willing them to consider that they were descended of those parents and ancestors which had subdued the whole world: and againe, that those with whome they should now match, were but naked people, fighting more with a certeine maner of a furious rage and disordered violence, than with any politike discretion or constancie.

Ostorius incourageth his Romans.

Herewith vpon commandement giuen on both parts, the battell began right hot, & for a good space verie doubtfull, till the practised knowledge of the Romans vanquished the furious violence of the Scots, Picts, and Britains: who being put to flight fled into the mounteins to escape the enimies hands who pursued them most egerlie. Amongst other of the prisoners there was taken Caratakes wife, with his daughter & brethren. He himselfe fled for succor vnto his stepmother Cartimandua: but as aduersitie findeth few friends, she caused him to be taken and deliuered vnto Ostorius. This was in the ninth yeare after the beginning of the warres. Ostorius vsed him verie honorablie, according to the degree of a king: finallie he sent him vnto Rome, togither with his wife, his daughter, and brethren. His fame was such through all places, that where he passed by, the people came flocking in on each side to see him, of whom they had heard so much report for his stout resistance made so long a time against the Romane puissance.

Caratake ouerthrowne by the Romans.

His queene taken.

Caratake betraied by his stepmother.

Caratake is sent to Rome.

At his comming to Rome he was shewed in triumph, all the people being called to the sight: for the victorie and apprehension of him was iudged equall with anie other atchiued enterprise against whatsoeuer the most puissant enimies of former time. The Emperor Claudius vpon respect as was thought of his princelie behauior and notified valiancie, restored him to libertie, and reteining his daughter and eldest brother at Rome as pledges, vpon his oth receiued to be a true subiect vnto the empire, he sent him home into his countrie againe, assigning vnto him the gouernance of Galloway, with Kile, Carrike, and Coningham. He liued not passing two yeares after his returne into Scotland, studieng most cheeflie (during that time) how to preserue his people in peace and quietnesse. He departed this world one and twentie yeares after the decease of his vncle Metellan, in the yeare of our Lord 54.

He is shewed to the people in triumph.

Caratake departeth this life.

54

Strange sights seene.

A little before his falling into the hands of the Romans, there were sundrie strange sights seene in Albion, as fighting of horsemen abroad in the fields, with great slaughter, as seemed on both parts: and forthwith the same so vanished awaie, that no appearance of them could any where be perceiued. Also a sort of woolues in the night season set vpon such as were keeping of cattell abroad in the fields, and caried awaie one of them to the woods, and in the morning suffred him to escape from amongst them againe. Moreouer, at Carrike there was a child borne, perfect in all his limbs sauing the head, which was like vnto a rauens. These vnkeith signes and monsters put the people in no small feare: but after that Caratake was restored to his libertie & countrie, all was interpreted to the best.

After Caratakes decease, his yongest brother Corbreid was chosen to succeed in his place, in the fiftie and eighth yeare after Christ, for his elder brother was departed at Rome through change of aire not agreeable to his nature. This Corbreid was a stout man of stomach, much resembling his brother Caratake. In the first beginning of his reigne, he did his indeuor to purge his dominion of such as troubled the quiet state thereof, by robbing and spoiling the husbandmen and other the meaner people of the countrie, of the which robbers there was no small number in those daies, speciallie in the westerne Iles, also in Rosse & Cathnes. In the meane time the Picts hauing created there a new king called Conkis, gouernour of Mers and Louthian, they set vpon the Romans being about to make fortresses in those parties. And but that succours came in time from the next townes and castels adioining, they had slaine all the whole number of them, & yet aided as they were, the maister of the campe, and eight other of the capteins, with diuers officers of bands, besides common souldiors, lost their liues there.

Corbreid.

The Picts moue war against the Romans.

Shortlie after also, the same Picts ouerthrew a number of forragers, with such companies of horsemen as came to defend them. Herewith Ostorius being not a little moued, made readie his bands, and fiercelie incountred with the Picts, who defended themselues so vigorouslie, that the fore ward of the Romans was neere hand discomfited. Which danger Ostorius perceiuing, spedilie came to relieue the same, but preasing to farre amongst his enimies, he was sore wounded, and in great danger to haue beene slaine. The night comming vpon parted the fraie, not without huge slaughter on both parts. After this, the warre continued still betwixt them with often incursions and skirmishes. At the length the Picts with such other Britains as were come vnto them out of the Ile of Man and other parties, incountred with the Romans in battell, and vpon the first ioining, of purpose gaue backe, training some of the Romans to pursue them vnto such places, where they had laid their ambushes, and so compassing them about, slue a great number of them, and chased the residue into the streicts of the mounteins, where they were also surprised by such of the Picts as returned from the battell.

The Picts ouerthrow the Romane forragers.

The Romans trained forth into ambushes and so distressed.

Ostorius vnderstanding how the matter went, withdrew with the rest of his people to his campe, and shortlie after sent a pursuant vnto Rome, to informe the emperour in what state things stood in Britaine, by reason of this rebellion of the Picts, who neither by force nor gentle persuasions could be pacified. The emperour determining to prouide remedie therefore, sent word againe that he would not that the Picts should be exilsons receiued vpon their submission, if they were driuen to make suite for pardon, but vtterlie to be destroied and exterminated. For the accomplishment whereof he appointed two legions of such men of warre, as soiourned in France to passe ouer into Britaine. But in the meane while Ostorius departed this world, whether of his hurts (as the Scotish chronicles make mention) or through sickenesse (as should rather seeme by Cornelius Tacitus) it forceth not. After whose Ostorius is wounded.

Ostorius dieth.

Manlius Valens inuadeth the Dicts.

whose deceasse Manlius Valens had the chiefest charge, who bringing his armie forth to incounter the Picts that came to seeke battell, was fiercelie fought withall, notwithstanding the victorie had abidden on his side, if at the verie point there had not come succours to the Picts (that is to wit) 400 horssemen out of the countrie of Kendall, by whose freshe onset the Romans were discomfited and chased vnto their campe, there being slaine aboue 3000 of them at that ouerthrowe, and on the Picts side there wanted 2000 of their number at the least.

The Romans are discomfited by the Picts.

About the same time there arriued in Britaine an other Romane capteine to be generall in place of Ostorius now deceassed, his name was Aulus Didius, with him came the two legions afore remembred. At his first comming ouer he mustered the old crewes of the Romane souldiers first, much blaming them for their negligence, in suffering the enimies so to increase vpon them, to the great danger of losing all that (through sloth and faintnesse of courage) which latelie before in Britaine had been wone and conquered by high prowes and valiant conduct of his predecessours. In the end he exhorted them to put away all feare, and fullie to determine with themselues to recouer againe the honor which they had latelie lost, which he said would easilie be brought to passe, if they would take vnto them manfull stomachs, and obeie him and such other as had the gouernance and leading of them. The Picts being informed that this Aulus Didius was arriued with this new supplie of men, & prepared to come against them, they thought good to send vnto Corbreid king of Scotland, to require his aid against the Romans, reputed as common enimies to all such as loued libertie, and hated to liue in seruile bondage. For which respect Corbreid was the soner moued to condescend vnto the request of the Picts; and thereupon assembling an arme entred into Galloway. Whereof Aulus Didius being certified, sent an herald vnto him with all speed, commanding that he should depart out of those quarters, sith he had no right there, considering that Galloway was assigned vnto Caratake but for tearme of his owne life, by force of the emperours grant, and now by the death of the same Caratake was reuersed againe vnto the empire.

Aulus Didius commeth into Britaine.

The Picts sent to the Scots for aid.

Caesius Nasica entred with an armie into Galloway.

The herald had vnneath done his message, when word came vnto Corbreid how an armie of the Romans vnder the guiding of Caesius Nasica was entred into the marches of Galloway, to the great terror of all the inhabitants, doubting to be spoiled and robbed on ech hand. These newes put the herald in danger of his life, had not Corbreid vpon regard to the law of armes licenced him to depart. The host which Corbreid brought with him into Galloway, he bestowed in castels and fortresses abroad in the countrie for more safegard, but he himselfe rode in all hast vnto Epiake, to haue the aduise and aid of one Venusius that had maried the forenamed Cartimandua that vnkind stepmother of Caratake, as ye haue heard before. This Venusius was of counsell with his wife Cartimandua in the betraieng of king Caratake, and therefore was growne into much hatred of the people for that fact, but through support of the Romans he was for a time defended from all their malices. Notwithstanding in the end being wearied of the proud gouernment of the Romans, he reuolted from them vnto Corbreid. Wherewith his wife being offended, found means to apprehend both him and his brethren with certeine of his kinsfolks, and laied them fast in prison.

Venusius the husband of Cartimandua.

Venusius reuolteth.

Cartimandua is buried quicke.

But now Corbreid at his comming thither, did not onelie set them at libertie, but also toke & caused Cartimandua to be buried quicke. In the meane while a certeine number of Scots distressed a few forragers of the Romans, but following the chase somewhat rashlie, they were inclosed by the enimies and slaine. This mischance put the Scots in great feare, and the Romans in good successe, so that Nasica was in purpose to haue assailed a certeine strong place, wherein a number of the Scotishmen were gotten, and had fortified the entries, had not other newes altered his purpose; for hearing how an other armie of the Scots was ioined with the Picts, and were approched within three miles of him, he brought his host forth into a plaine where he ordered his battels readie to receiue them. Whereof the Scotishmen hauing knowledge, hasted forth towards him, and were no soner come in sight of the Romans, but that with great violence they gaue the onset, most fierclie beginning the battell, which continued till sun-setting with great slaughter on both sides; at what time the Romans were at the point to haue discomfited their enimies, had not those Scotishmen which were left in fortresses (as is said) abroad in the countrie, come at that selse instant to the aid of their fellowes, by whose means the battell was renewed againe, which lasted till the mirke night parted them in sunder. The Romans withdrew to their campe, and the Scots and Picts got vp into the mounteins.

The darke night parted the fraie.

A peace concluded.

Shortlie after a peace was concluded betwixt the parties, with these conditions; that the Romans should content themselues with that which they had in possession before the beginning of these last wars, and suffer Corbreid to inioy all such countries as his brother Caratake held. And likewise the Picts paieng their former tribut for the finding of such garisons of Romans as late at Camelon, they should be no further charged with anie other exactions. Moreouer it was agreed, that neither the Scots nor Picts from thencefoorth should receiue or succour anie rebels of Frenchmen or Britains, nor should aid by anie maner of means the inhabitants of the Ile of Man, who had done manie notable displeasures to the Romans during the last warres. This peace continued a six yeares during the life of Aulus Didius, who at the end of those six yeares, departed this life at London, leauing behind him all things in good quiet.

Aulus Didius departeth this life at London.

After this deceasse the emperour Nero, who succeeded Claudius, appointed one Uerannius to be lieutenant of Britaine, a man verie ambitious and much desirous of honor, by means whereof, in hope to aduance his name, he sought occasions to haue warres with the Scotishmen; and at length hearing that certeine of them being borderers had fetched boties out of Pictland, he did send a great power of Romans to make a rode into the nert marches of the Scots, from whence they brought a great spoile, both of men and of goods. With which iniuries the Scots being moued, sought dailie in semblable sort to be reuenged, so that by such means the warre was renewed. But before anie notable incounter chanced betwixt them, Uerannius died. His last words were full of ambitious boasts, wishing to haue liued but two yeares longer, that he might haue subdued the whole Ile of Albion vnto the Romane empire, as if he might haue had so much time he doubted not to haue done.

Uerannius is made lieutenant of Britaine.

Uerannius departeth this life.

Paulinus Suetonius succeeded in his place, a man of an excellent wit, and verie desirous of peace. He first confirmed the ancient league with Corbreid king of Scotland: a recompense being made in euerie behalfe for all wrongs & iniuries done on euerie part. After this (as Hector Boetius hath gathered) he conquered the Ile of Man; but for somuch as by probable reasons it is apparant inough, that it Paulinus Suetonius.

Angleseie and not Man was thus inuaded by Suetonius.

it was not Man, but the Ile of Angleſeie which the Britains name Mon, and at this time was ſubdued by Suetonius, we haue here omitted to make report thereof, referring you to the place in the Engliſh chronicle, where we haue ſpoken ſufficientlie after what ſort Suetonius both attempted & atchiued this enterprize, which being brought to end, he was ſent for into Gallia, to repreſſe certeine tumults raiſed among the people there. In whoſe abſence the Britains thinking to haue a meet time for their purpoſe, moued a new rebellion. But by the relation of Cornelius Tacitus, this chanced whileſt Suetonius was buſie in requiring the Ile of Angleſeie, as in the Engliſh chronicle it likewiſe appeareth, with the ſtrange ſights and wonders which happened about the ſame time, whereupon the ſouthſaiers (as Hector Boetius ſaith) declared that the Romans ſhould receiue a great ouerthrow. Upon truſt of whoſe words the Picts and other Britains inhabiting Camelon and in the marches thereabouts, ſet vpon ſuch Romans as inhabited there, and ſlue a great manie of them yer they were in doubt of anie rebellion. The reſidue which eſcaped, got them into an old church, where they were ſlaine euerie mothers ſonne.

The Scots and Picts kill the Romans.

Petilius Cerealis his men being ſlaine returned.

Alſo Petilius Cerealis comming with a legion of footmen and a troupe of horſſemen to their ſuccours, was incountred by the Picts, & being put to flight, loſt all his footmen, hardlie eſcaping himſelfe with the horſſmen to the campe. Shortlie after he tooke vp his tents and returned towards Kent, where Catus the procurator or receiuer (as I may call him) of Britaine as then ſoiourned, who vnderſtanding how the whole Ile was on euerie ſide in an vprore, fled ouer into France then called Gallia. This meane while quæne Boada ſent vnto hir brother Corbreid king of Scotland, requiring his aid againſt the Romans, who had ſo vilie vſed hir and hir daughters, to the great diſhonor of hir and all hir linage, and now was the time to be reuenged of ſuch iniuries, the whole nation of the Britains through the couetous dealing of the procurator Catus, being riſen in armes to recouer their ancient liberties.

Catus the procurator of Britaine fled into France.

Quæne Boada deſireth aid of hir brother Corbreid.

Corbreid being highlie diſpleaſed towards the Romans for the euill intreating of his ſiſter, determined either to ſee hir ſatiſfied by worthie recompenſe, or elſe to be reuenged on them that had miſvſed hir: and hereof gaue ſignification vnto Catus the procurator that was as then returned into Britaine with a power of men of warre. Corbreid receiuing but a ſcornefull anſwere from him, found meanes to ioine in league with Charanach king of the Picts, and gathering togither a mightie armie of one & other, purſued the Romans and their aſſociats, ſlaieng downe a wonderfull number of them. He alſo burned and deſtroied diuers townes, ſuch as in keeping their allegiance to the Romans ſtood earneſtlie to their defenſe, as Berwike and Carleill with others. About the ſame ſeaſon there arriued in the frith a number of Dutch ſhips, fraught with people of Herherne or Hozauia, a region in Germanie ſituat betwixt Boheme and Hungarie. They were driuen out of their owne countrie by the Romans, and aſſembling togither vnder a famous capteine named Roderike, came down to the mouth of the Rhene, where making ſhift for veſſels, they tooke the ſeas to ſeeke them ſome new habitations; and thus arriuing in Pictland, were ioifullie receiued of the Picts and Scots, for that they were reputed right valiant men, and glad to reuenge their owne iniuries againſt the Romans. Namelie with the Picts they were much eſteemed, for that they came forth of the ſame countrie from whence their anceſtors were deſcended.

Charanach K. of the Picts.

The Romans ſlaine.

Dutchmen arriue in Scotland.

Their huge bodies and mightie limbs did greatlie commend them in the ſight of all men before whome they muſtered, ſo that comming to the place where the kings of Scots and Picts were incamped with their people readie to march forth towards the enimies, they were highlie welcomed, and vpon their offer receiued into companie, and appointed to go forth in that iournie, in aid of quæne Boada againſt the Romans. With this Boada was aſſembled a mightie hoſt of the Britains, amongeſt whom were fiue thouſand women, wholie bent to reuenge the villanies done to their perſons by the Romans, or to die in the paine. And for this purpoſe were they come well apointed with armour and weapons, to be the firſt that ſhould giue the onſet. Boada hearing of hir brothers approch with the king of Picts and their armies, met them on the waie accompanied with a great number of the nobles of Britaine, and brought them to hir campe with great ioy and triumph.

Werherns were men of goodlie ſtature.

Women come with the quæne in armour.

After taking aduiſe how to behaue themſelues in their enterprize, they thought it good to make haſt to fight with the procurator Catus, yer anie new power of men of warre might come to his aid forth of Gallia now called France. Whereupon marching towards him, they met togither in the field, where betwixt them was ſtriken a right fierce and cruell battell; but in the end the horſſemen of the Romans part being put to flight, the footmen were beaten downe on euerie ſide; Catus himſelfe being wounded, eſcaped verie hardlie by flight, and ſhortlie after got him ouer into France. The Scots and Picts with other the Britains, hauing atchiued this victorie, purſued their enimies from place to place, ſo that there died by the ſword, what in the battell and elſewhere in the chaſe, ſeuentie thouſand Romans and other ſtrangers, which ſerued amongeſt them; and of Scots, Picts, and other Britains, were ſlaine thirtie thouſand.

The Romans are put to flight and ouerthrowne.

Catus was wounded.

70000 Romans ſlaine, and 30000 Britains.

The gouernour Suetonius being then in Gallia, hearing of this ouerthrow, & in what danger things ſtood in Britaine, by reaſon of the ſame, came ouer with two legions of ſouldiers, and ten thouſand of other Brigants as aiders to thoſe legions. Boada the quæne vnderſtanding of his arriuall, aſſembled againe hir people, and ſent vnto the Scots and Picts to come to hir aid: who togither with the Horauians came with all ſpeed vnto hir. When they were thus aſſembled, Britains, Scots, Picts, & Horauians on one part, and Romans with their aids on the other, they marched forth to incounter togither with deliberat minds to trie the matter by dint of ſword, being earneſtlie exhorted thereto by their gouernors on either ſide. So that ioining puiſſance againſt puiſſance, they fought a right cruell battell, manie in the beginning being ſlaine and borne downe on both ſides. But in the end the victorie abode with the Romans, the Britains with other the Albans were chaſed out of the field. There were ſlaine of them at the point of foure ſcore thouſand perſons, as Tacitus writeth. The more part of the Horauians, togither with their capteine Roderike, were in that number. Boada the quæne, doubting to come into the hands of hir enimies, ſlue hir ſelfe. Two of hir daughters were taken priſoners, and brought armed, euen as they were found fighting in the battell, vnto Suetonius.

Boada aſſembled an armie againſt the Romans.

The Romans ouerthrow the Scots and Picts.

The Horauians all ſlaine.

Boada ſlue hir ſelfe.

The eldeſt of them within a few moneths after was maried vnto a noble Romane named Marius, who had defloured hir before time. He was alſo created king of Britaine by the emperours authoritie, that thereby the ſtate of the countrie might be reduced vnto a better quiet. He vſed to lie moſt an end in the parties of Kendale, and named a part thereof (where Marius was made king.

(where he passed the most part of his time altogether in hunting) Westmerland, after his owne name, though afterwards, when the Romans were expelled, a portion of the same adioining next vnto the Scots was called Cumberland. The Morauians which escaped from the discomfiture, had that portion of Scotland assigned forth vnto them to inhabit in, that lieth betwixt the riuers of Tome and Speie, called euen vnto this day Murrey land.

Westmerland.

Humf. Lluid doubteth of this historie of the Morauians.

Murrey land.

Corbreid being thus ouerthrowne, and hauing his power greatlie infeebled thereby, passed the residue of his life in quietnesse. For the Romans being troubled with ciuill warres, medled neither with the Scots nor Picts, but onlie studied to keepe the south parts of Britaine in due obedience. Finallie Corbreid departed this world, after he had reigned 34 yeares, and was buried amongest his elders neere vnto Dunstafage, with mante obelisks set vp about him.

Corbreid dead Anno Christi, 71. H. B.

Dardan.

AFter Corbreid succeeded one Dardan, which for his huge stature was afterward surnamed the great. He was lineally descended frō Metellane, who was his great grandfather. The nobles and commens of the realme chose him to be their king, onelie for the good opinion they had conceiued of him in his predecessors daies, by whome he was had in great estimation, and had atchiued vnder him manie worthie enterprises, so that he was thought most meetest for the rome, considering the sonnes of Corbreid were not as yet come vnto ripe yeares to inioy the same. For the said Corbreid had three sons in all, Corbreid, Tulcane, and Bréke. The eldest had beene brought vp with Voada, quéne of the Britains, whereby he had learned the maners and vsages of the British nation, and thereupon was surnamed Gald; for so do the Scotishmen vse euen vnto this day to name anie of their owne countriemen that hath learned the courtesie and maners of strange countries.

Corbreid Gald his three sonnes.

But to returne to Dardan, in the beginning of his reigne he gouerned the estate by good indifferent iustice, but after he had continued therein by the space of two yeares, he began to fall into all kinds of vices, removing from offices such as were vpright bearers of themselues in the same, and aduancing to their places bribers and extortioners. The nobles he had in suspect, fauoring onelie such as thorough flatterie were by him preferred. And where he was drowned beyond all the terms of honestie in fleshlie and sinfull lust, yet was his couetousnesse so great, that all was to little which he might lay hands vpon. He also put to death diuers honorable personages, such as he perceiued to grudge at his doings. He likewise purposed to haue made away the sonnes of his predecessor Corbreid, but his traitorous practise being disclosed, the most part of the nobles and commons of the realme rebelled against him, and sending for Corbreid Gald the eldest sonne of the former Corbreid, remaining as then in the Ile of Man (where he should haue béene murthered) they chose him to their king. And at length beating downe all such as made resistance, they got that cruell tyrant Dardan into their hands, & bringing him forth before the multitude, they caused his head to be openlie stricken off. This was the 81 yeare after the birth of our Sauiour, being the first of the emperour Domitian, & the fourth complet of his owne reigne ouer the Scotishmen.

Dardan falleth into all kind of vices.

his cosin Cadorus and father.

The commons rebell.

Dardan is beheaded. 75. H. B. 6 of Vespasian. H. B.

Corbreid Gald.

COrbreid Gald being thus chosen (as I haue said) to succéed in the gouernment of Scotland after Dardan, is called by Cornelius Tacitus Galgacus, a prince of comelie personage, and of right noble port. In the first begining of his reigne he punished such as had béene furtherers of his predecessors mis-

Galdus other wise called Galgacus, not a Scot but a Britaine as other thinke.

gouernement, and afterwards he passed ouer into the westerne Iles, where he appeased certeine rebels, which went about to disquiet the state of the common-wealth there. From thence he sailed vnto the Iles of Lewis and Skie, and put to death certeine offendors that would not be obedient vnto their gouernors and iudges. After this he returned by Rosse, and set a stay also in that countrie, touching certeine misdemeanors of the people there. To be short, hée purged the whole realme of all such robbers, théeues, and other the like offendors against the quiet peace of his subiects, as were hugelie increased by the licentious rule of his predecessor Dardan, and hereunto he was mightilie aided by the Morauians, who pursued such offendors most earnestlie, and brought in vnto him no small number of them, euer as they caught them.

See more of him in England.

Gald punisheth such as disturbe the quiet state of his subiects.

The Morauians helpe to apprehend théeues and offendors.

By this meanes was the state of the common-wealth brought into better quiet, and the yeare next insuing, being the third of Gald his reigne, he called a councell at Dunstafage, wherein he laboured much for the abrogating of the wicked lawes instituted by king Ewin, as before is partlie specified: but he could not obteine more, than that poore men from thencefoorth should haue their wiues free vnto themselues, without being abused from time to time indifferentlie by their landlords, as heretofore they had bene. Whilest he was thus busied about the establishing of holsome orders & statuts for the welth of his subiects, word was brought him that Petilius Cerealis a Romane capteine, being sent from Uespasian the emperour to haue the gouernement of Britaine, was landed with a puissant armie in the countrie, and minded shortlie to inuade the borders of his realme, as Annandale and Galloway.

Gald laboreth to abrogate wicked lawes.

Petilius Cerealis a Romane capteine sent by Uespasian into Britaine.

With these newes Gald being somewhat astonished, thought good to vnderstand the certeintie of the enimies doings, before he made anie sturre for the leuieng of his people, and therefore appointed certeine light horsemen to ride forth, and to bring certeine newes of that which they might heare or see: who at their returne declared that the enimies armie was abroad in the fields, vpon the borders of Pictland, and had giuen the Picts alreadie a great ouerthrow; and further, how they were turned westward on the left hand, in purpose to enter into Galloway. Gald being thus certified of the Romans approch towards his countrie, determined to giue them battell, before they entered into the inner parts of his realme, and therefore with all spéed he assembled his people, to the number of fiftie thousand men, all such as were able to beare armor, being readie to repaire vnto him in such present necessitie for defense of their countrie.

The Dridounices and Brigants mistaken by the Scotish writers.

The picts ouerthrowne by the Romans.

The Romans purpose to enter into Galloway.

Gald determineth to fight with the Romans.

It hath béene reported, that as he marched forth towards his enimies, sundrie strange sights appeared by the way. An eagle was séene almost all a whole day, flieng vp and downe ouer the Scotish armie, euen as though she had laboured hir selfe wearie. Also an armed man was séene flieng round about the armie, and suddenlie vanished away. There fell in like maner out of a darke cloud in the fields, through the which the armie should passe, diuerse kinds of birds that were spotted with bloud. These monstruous sights troubled mens minds diuerslie, some construing the same to signifie good successe, and some otherwise. Also the chiefest capteins amongst the Scots were not all of one opinion, for some of them weieng the great force of the Romane armie, being the greatest that euer had béene brought into their countrie before that day, counselled that they should in no wise be fought withall, but rather to suffer them to wearie themselues, till vittels and other prouision should faile them, and then to take the aduantage of them, as occasion serued.

Strange sights appéere to the Scotish armie.

The Scots not all of one mind.

Other were of a contrarie mind, iudging it best (sith the puissance of the whole realme was assembled) to giue battell, least by deferring time, the courage and great desire, which the people had to fight, should wax faint and decaie: so that all things considered, it was generallie in the end agreed vpon to giue battell, and so comming within sight of the enimies host, they made readie to incounter them. At the first the Scots were somewhat amazed with the great multitude of their aduersaries, but through the chéerefull exhortations of their king, and other their capteins, their stomachs began to reuiue, so that they boldlie set vpon the Romans, whereof insued betwixt them a right fierce and cruell battell, howbeit in the end the victorie inclined to the Romans, and the Scots were chased out of the field. Gald himselfe was wounded in the face, yet escaped he out of the battell, but not without great danger in deed, by reason the Romans pursued most egerlie in the chase.

There were slaine of the Scotishmen (as their chronicles report) aboue twelue thousand, and of the Romans about six thousand. This victorie being thus atchiued, the Romans got possession of Epiake with the greatest part of all Galloway, and passed the residue of that yéere without anie other notable exploit: but in the summer following, Petilius the Romane gouernor went about to subdue the rest of the countrie, the Scots oftentimes making diuerse skirmishes with him, but in no wise durst ioine with them, puissance against puissance, least they should haue put their countrie into further danger, if they had chanced eftsoones to haue receiued the ouerthrow.

¶ Here haue we thought good to aduertise the reader, that although the Scotish writers impute all the trauels, which Petilius spent in subduing the Brigants, and Frontinus in conquering the Silures, to be imploied chieflie against Scots & Picts: the opinion of the best learned is wholie contrarie thereunto, affirming the same Brigants & Silures not to be so far north by the distance of manie miles, as Hector Boetius and other his countriemen do place them, which thing in the historie of England we haue also noted, where ye may read more of all the doings of the Romans here in Britaine, as in their writers we find the same recorded. But neuertheless wee haue here followed the course of the Scotish historie, in maner as it is written by the Scots themselues, not binding anie man more in this place than in other to credit them further than by conference of authors it shall séeme to them expedient.

In the meane time then, whilest Petilius was occupied (as before ye haue hard) in the conquest of Galloway, Boadicia the daughter of Aruiragus (whom the Romans had before time misused, as before in this treatise is partlie touched) gathered togither a crew of souldiors within the Ile of Man, partlie of the inhabitants, and partlie of such Scotishmen of Galloway as were fled thither for succor: with these shée tooke the seas, and landing in Galloway, vpon purpose to reuenge hir iniuries in times past receiued at the Romans hands, she set vpon their tents in the night season, when they looked for nothing lesse than to be disquieted, by reason whereof they were brought into such disorder, that if Petilius had not caused such firebrands to be kindled as he had prepared and dressed with pitch, rosen and tallow, for the like purpose, the whole campe had beene in great danger: but these torches or firebrands gaue not onlie light to sée where to make resistance, but also being cast in the faces of the enimies, staied their hardie forwardnesse, whereby the Romans hauing leasure to place themselues in arraie, defended the entries of their campe, till the day was sprung, and then giuing a full onset vpon their enimies, they put them quite to flight.

But Boadicia not herewith discouraged, hasted with all speed vnto Epiake, and taking that citie she set fire on it, and slue such Romans as she found there, whereof Petilius being certified, sent forth a legion against hir to withstand hir attempts. Those that had the charge of them that were thus sent, vsed such diligence, that laieng an ambush for hir in a place fit for that purpose, they so inclosed hir, that slaieng the most part of hir company, she was taken prisoner hir selfe, and being brought aliue vnto Petilius, vpon hir stout answer made vnto him, as he questioned with hir about hir bold enterprises, shée was presentlie slaine by the souldiors.

Anon after Petilius was certified, that the inhabitants of the Ile of Wight, with other southerne Britains, had raised a commotion against king Marius, so that without spéedie succors they were like to driue him out of his kingdome: whereupon he hasted thither with all conuenient spéed, and subduing the rebels, set all things there in good order and state: and so remaining there till the next yeere after, he fell sicke of the flix and died. Immediatlie whereupon the emperour sent one Julius Frontinus to succéed in his place. This Frontinus brought with him two legions of souldiors, and after he had taken order with king Marius for the kéeping of the Britains in due subiection of the empire, he purposed to bring such vnto obedience, as inhabited within and beyond the woods of Caledon, and as yet not vanquished by anie man.

Therefore entring first into Galloway, and visiting such garrisons of the Romans, as Petilius had left there for the kéeping of that quarter, he commended their loialtie and diligence, in that they had looked so well to their charge, that the enimie had gained no aduantage at their hands, whilest the armie was occupied in the south parts about other affaires there. He also sent an herald vnto the king of the Picts with letters, requiring him to renew by confirmation the former league betwixt his people & the Romans, & not by any means to aid the Scots as before they had done to their great losse & hindrance. Hereunto the king of Picts much suspecting the matter, made a direct answer, that he saw no cause why he should in fauor of the Romans suffer his confederats the Scots to be subdued, and brought to destruction without all reason or equitie: and therefore he was determined by the aduise of his péeres & councellors, to aid the Scots against such as sought nothing but the meanes how to bring the whole Ile of Albion into thraldome and seruile bondage.

Frontinus little regarding this vntowardlie answer, set forward to subdue such Scots as were yet disobedient. And so entring into the borders of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, had diuers skirmishes with such as king Gald had assembled to defend his countrie, but forsomuch as he was diseased with sicknesse, he was at length constreined to withdraw himselfe into Argile, leauing his power behind him to resist the enimies attempts: but shortlie after his departure from amongst them, they were fought withall by the Romans, and discomfited, three thousand of them being slaine in the field. By reason of which ouerthrowe those countries submitted themselues to the Romans, perceiuing no hope otherwise how to escape that present danger.

These Scots of Carrike, Kile, and Coningham, being thus brought into subiection, the armie was licenced to withdraw to their lodgings for the winter

The Scots agrée to fight with the Romans.

The Scots are discomfited.

The citie called Epiake is won by the Romans.

The Scots durst not fight any field with the Romans.

Touching all the doings of the Romans in Britaine ye shall find sufficientlie in the historie of England.

Boadicia reneweth wars with the Romans.

The Romane campe assailed in the night by Boadicia.

Epiake is taken & burned by Boadicia.

Boadicia is slaine.

The Britains rebell.

The Britains are appeased.

Petilius the Romane legat dieth.

Julius Frontinus sent into Britaine.

The Silures mistaken for Scotishmen.

Frontinus purposeth to pursue the conquest of the Silures who the Scots mistake for Galloway men.

Frontinus requireth to ioine in amitie with the Picts.

The Pictish king refuseth to be in league with the Romans.

Gald resisteth the Romans.

By reason of sicknesse he withdraweth to Argile.

They submit themselues to the Romans.

Frontinus being vexed with sicknesse returneth to Rome.

ter season, during the which, Frontinus fell sicke of superfluous abundance of flegme, which vexed him in such sort, that the emperor Domitian, who as then gouerned the Romane empire, sent for him home to Rome, and appointed a right valiant personage, one Julius Agricola to succeed as lieutenant of Britaine in his roome. About the time of whose arriuall there, the Scots of Annandale slue a great number of the Romans, with which successe they procured also the Picts with the inhabitants of Galloway, Kile, Cattrike, and Coningham to rebell.

Julius Agricola is sent into Britaine.

The Scots of Annandale beat downe the Romans.

Agricola prepareth to go against the Scots.

Karanach K. of the Picts discomfited by the Romans.

These newes being reported vnto Agricola, he made his prouision with all speed to go against them, and first entring into the borders of Pictland, he reduced such as inhabited about the confines of Berwike to their former subiection, and after marching forwards the citie of Camelon, Karanach king of the Picts incountred him by the waie, but being fiercelie beaten off by the Romans, he fled backe into the citie, and within three daies after hauing reinforced his power, he eftsoones gaue battell againe to his enimies, but then also being vanquished, he lost the most part of all his men, and so immediatlie thereupon was Camelon wone by force, & a great number of the citizens slaine.

Karanach flieth beyond the Firth.

Agricola caused it to be newlie fortified, and further through fame of this victorious beginning, he recouered the most part of all the castels and fortresses of Pictland. The forenamed Karanach escaping out of that present danger, got him beyond the water of Firth, for the more suertie of his owne person. Agricola hauing sped thus in Pictland, marched forth against them of Annandale, who at the first making resistance for a time, at length were constreined to giue backe, and so fled to their houses, where in the night following by their owne wiues they were murthered each mothers sonne: for so the women of that nation vsed to put awaie the shame of their husbands, when they at any time had fled out of the field from their enimies.

The Scots of Annandale slaine by their wiues.

Agricola vnderstanding that by winning him fame in the beginning, it should be no small furtherance vnto him for the atchiuing of other enterprises in time to come, determined to pursue his good fortune, and therevpon prepared to subdue the Ile of Man; but wanting vessels to conuey his armie ouer, he found meanes that such as could swim, and knew the shallow places of that coast, made shift to passe the golfe, and so got on land, to the great wonder and amazing of the inhabitants, who watched the sea coasts, to resist such ships as they looked for to haue arriued vpon their shore: but now despairing to resist such kind of warriors as indangered themselues to passe the seas in that maner of wise, they submitted themselues vnto Agricola.

Here is a manifest error in the Scotish writers, taking Man for Inglesey.

Agricola assaileth the Ile of Inglesey and not Man as Hector Boetius mistaketh it.

Who taking pledges of them, and appointing certeine garisons to keepe diuers holds and places of defense within that Ile, passed ouer with the residue of his people into Galloway, where he soiourned all the winter following: which being passed, and summer once come, he assembled his men of warre againe, and visited a great part of that countrie with Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, the inhabitants whereof he put in such feare with the onelie shew of his warlike armie, disposed in such politike order and wise conduct, that there was none to be found that durst aduance themselues to incounter him, so that he spent that summers season in keeping such of the Scots as had beene aforetime subdued, from attempting any commotion. And when winter was come, he assembled the nobles of the countrie, exhorting them by gentle persuasions, to frame themselues to a ciuill trade of liuing, as well in building of temples, houses, and other edifices after the Romane maner, as also in wearing of comelie and decent apparell; and aboue all things to set their children to schoole, to be brought vp in eloquence and good nurture. By this meanes he thought to traine them from their accustomed fiercenesse, and to win them the sooner to be content with bondage, though he coloured it with neuer so faire a glose of humanitie.

The Ile of Inglesey is subdued by Agricola.

Agricola studieth to bring the Scots vnto ciuilitie.

The third winter being thus spent, and the next summer commen vpon, Agricola inuaded such countries as were yet vndiscouered by the Romans, entring by the nether side of Calidon wood, euen vnto the dolorous mounteine, which afterwards by the Scots was cleped Sterling. It was called the dolorous mounteine, for that in the night season there was heard right lamentable noise & cries, as though the same had beene of some creatures that had bewailed their miserable cases: which vndoubtedlie was the craftie illusions of wicked spirits, to keepe mens minds still oppressed in blind errors and superstitious fantasies.

Kalendar wood.

Agricola commeth to Sterling.

Agricola considering the naturall strength of this mounteine, with the site of an old ruinous castell that stood thereon, he caused the same with all diligence to be repared, and a bridge to be made ouer the Forth there, by the which he passed with his whole armie ouer into Fife: and the daie after, hearing that the king of the Picts was withdrawne into a castell thereby, standing vpon an high mounteine cleped Beenart, he inuironed the same with a strong siege, howbeit his hoped prey was not as then within it, for Karanach king of the Picts, informed of the Romans approch, got him forth abroad into the fields, and assembling his power, purposed by night to haue broken the bridge, which Agricola had made ouer the Forth at Sterling, but being repelled by such as were set there to defend the same, in his returne from thence he was incountred by Agricola himselfe, who being certified of this attempt of his enimies, had leuied his siege, and was comming towards them, so that both the hosts meeting togither in the fields, there was fought a sore battell betwixt them, though in the end the Picts were discomfited, and their king the foresaid Karanach chased vnto the riuer of Tay, where he got a bote, and escaped to the further side of that water. By reason of this ouerthrow, Agricola brought in subiection those countries, which lie betweene the waters of Forth and Tay, as Fife, Fothrike, and Ernedall, and soiourning there all the winter following, he built sundrie fortresses in places most conuenient for the keeping of the inhabitants in their couenanted obedience, after his departure from amongst them.

Agricola buildeth the castle of Sterling with the bridge.

Mount Beenart.

Karanach assaileth Sterling bridge, which the Romans defended.

Karanach is eftsoones chased.

Fife with other countries brought into subiection of the Romans.

In the meane while, the king of the Picts kept him at Dundee, whither resorted vnto him a great number of the Pictish nobilitie, such as had escaped the Romans hands. These comforted their king in all that they might, willing him to be of good cheere, and to hope well of the recouerie of his losses againe by some good fortune and meanes that might happen to come yer ought long, promising to the furtherance thereof all that in them laie, as well for counsell as aid of hand: and herevpon they toke aduise which waie to worke, insomuch that at length it was by great deliberation thought good to seeke for succor at the hands of their ancient confederats the Scots, and so incontinentlie there were certeine messingers dispatched with all speed vnto Gald the Scotish king, requiring him in that common ieopardie to ioine in league with his ancient friends the Picts, against the ambitious and most cruell Romans, who sought nothing else but the vtter subuersion of the whole land of Albion, as manifestlie appeered by their proceedings, hauing alreadie occupied and wrongfullie Karanach comforted by his nobles.

The Picts send for aid to king Gald.

fullie surpʒised a great part not onlie of the Pictish kingdome, but also of the Scotish dominions, minding still to go forward in such vnrighteous conquests, if by timelie resistance they were not staied. Gald vpon this request and motion of the Picts gladlie consented to ioine his power with theirs, in common defense of both the realmes (against such common enimies as the Romans were esteemed) hauing herevnto the assent of all his pæres and chéefest councellors.

Gald pʒomiseth to ioine in league with the Picts against the Romans.

Thus whilest the kings of the Scots and Picts were concluding a league togither for defense of themselues and their countries, certeine Scots entred into the confines of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, and wan diuers fortresses, wherein certeine garrisons of Romane souldiers soiourned, whome they slue downe right without all mercie, spoiling the whole countrie. Agricola hauing knowledge hereof, went streightwaies thither with a power, and pursuing them that had done those iniuries, some he toke amongst the hilles and mounteines, whither they fled; and the residue he chased beyond the riuer of Clide, but the castell of Dunbʒeton he could not by any meanes obteine, though he assaied to win it euen to the vttermost of his power. It was called in those daies Alcluth, that is to meane: All stone. The Scotishmen being thus dʒiuen backe, Agricola repared such castels and fortresses as they had ouerthʒowne and beaten downe.

The Scots slea the Roman souldiers lieng in certeine garisons.

The riuer of Clide, otherwise called Clude.

Agricola repelling the Scots, could not get win the castell of Dunbʒeton, anciently called Alcluith, or Alcluth.

In the yeare following, being the fift after the first comming of Agricola into Bʒitaine, he caused his ships to be bʒought about frō the Ile of Wight into the water of Lochfine in Argile, thereby to put his enimies in vtter despaire of escaping his hands either by water or land: and thereupon passing ouer the riuer of Clide with his armie, and finding his nauie there, he set vpon the countrie of Lennox, in purpose to subdue the same. But after he had made sundʒie skirmishes with the inhabitants, he was certified by letters from the gouernor of Camelon, that the Picts were readie to rebell, by reason whereof he left off this enterpʒise against the Scots, and dʒew backe into Pictland, leauing a part of his armie to kæpe possession of the water of Clide, till his returne againe into those parties. At his comming into Pictland, he apesed the rebels with small adoo, punishing the chéefe authors accoʒding to their demerits. This done, he returned vnto the water of Clide, lieng all that winter beyond the same, taking order for the gouernment of those parties, in due obedience of the Romane empire.

Agricola inuadeth Lennox.

Agricola returneth into Pictland, to appease a rebellion of the people there.

He returneth vnto Clide.

The summer following he appointed his nauie to search alongst by the coast all the hauens and créeks of Argile, and of the Ilands néere to the same. Whilest he by land passing ouer the water of Leuine, went about to conquer townes and castels, though halfe discouraged at the first, by reason of the rough waies, streict passages, high mounteines, craggie rocks, thicke woods, dæpe marishes, fens and mosses, with the great riuers which with his armie he must néeds passe, if he minded to atteine his purpose: but the old souldiers being inured with paines and trauell, ouercame all these difficulties by the wise conduct of their worthie generall and other the capteins, and so inuading the countrie toke townes and castels, of the which some they beat downe and raced, and some they fortified and stuffed with garisons of men of warre.

Agricola pursueth his enterpʒise against the Scots.

About the same time by commandement of king Gald, and other the gouernors of Scotland, all the able men of Cantire, Lorne, Murrey land, Lugemarth, also those of the westerne Iles, & of all other parties belonging to the Scotish dominions, were appointed to assemble and come togither in Atholl, at a place not passing fiue miles distant from the castell of Calidon now cleped Dunkeld, there to abide the comming of Karanach king of the Picts, to the end that ioining togither in one armie, they might worke some high exploit. But he hauing assembled fiftéene thousand of his men of war, as he marched alongst by the mounteine of Granzbene, in times past cleped Pons Grampius, there chanced a mutinie amongest his people, so that falling togither by the eares, Karanach himselfe comming amongst them vnarmed as he was to part the fraie, was slaine pʒesentlie at vnwares, by one that knew not what he was. By reason of which mischance that iournie was broken, for the Picts being vtterlie amazed and discomforted héerewith, skaled and departed asunder.

All the Scots assemble.

Karanach k. of the Picts slaine by misfortune of one of his owne subiects.

Gald with his Scots now being thus disappointed of the Picts his chéefest aid, durst not ieopard to trie the chance of battell with the enimies, but determined with light skirmishes, and by withdʒawing of vittels out of their walke, to stop them from further pʒoceeding in conquest of the countrie, & in the meane time to pʒouide against the next summer new aid and succors to kéepe the field, and so to incounter with them, puissance against puissance, if they remained so long in the countrie. The Scots resting vpon this resolution, thought good to send some honorable ambassage vnto the Picts to moue them vnto mutuall agrément & concord amongst themselues, whereby they might be able to resist the common ruine of their countrie as then in pʒesent danger to be oppʒessed by the Romans.

An ambassage frō the Scots to the Picts.

Those that were sent on this message, did so diligentlie behaue themselues, in bʒinging their purpose to passe, that the Picts in the end agréed to ioine in friendlie amitie one with another, and to chuse one Garnard to their king to succéed in the rome of Karanach. They also confirmed the former leage with the Scots, and by their pʒocurement sent messengers vnto the Norwegians and Danes, requiring them of aid against the Romans the common enimies of all such nations as loued to liue in libertie, whersoeuer the same were inhabiting in anie part on the whole face of the earth. There were also sent ambassadors vnto the Irishmen from the Scots for the same intent, and from both those places there was great aid pʒomised, as frō them that estéemed themselues halfe bound by a naturall respect, to succor such as were descended of the same ancestors and countries that they were of, and now like to be expelled out of the seats which their forefathers had got possession in by iust title of conquest, and left the same vnto their posteritie to enioy for euer.

The Picts bʒought to agrément amongst themselues.

Ambassadors sent vnto the Danes and Irishmen for aid.

Whilest these things were thus in doing, Galdus diuiding his armie into sundʒie parts, did what was possible to resist all the attempts of the Romans. Who standing in doubt of his puissance, rather through fame thereof, than for anie apparant sight or other knowledge had, durst not put themselues in danger to enter into Calidon wood, of all that summer; and the winter following was so extreame, by reason of frost, snow, and colonesse of aire, that they were not able to enterpʒise anie exploit on neither part: howbeit the summer was no soner come (being the seauenth after the comming of Agricola into Bʒitaine) but that they pʒepared to inuade one an other againe with all their forces.

The fame of Gald his puissance putteth the Romans in feare.

Forth of Ireland there came (accoʒding as was pʒomised) a great power of men of warre, and ioined with an armie of Scotishmen in Atholl, being there alreadie assembled in great numbers out of all the quarters of the Scotish dominions. Thither came also Garnard king of the Picts with his power. All which forces being thus assembled togither by common agrément amongest them, Gald king of the

In aid of Irishmen come to the succors of the Scots.

Gald chosen to be generall against the Romans.

the Scots was chosen to be their generall, who hearing that Agricola with with his host was entred into Kalendar wood, diuided the whole armie into three battels, and so marched forth towards the enemies in purpose to incounter them. Agricola being of this aduertised by spials, parted his people also into three wards, doubting to be inclosed within some combersome place by reason of the great multitude of his enimies, that were estéemed to be in number aboue 50000 of one and other.

Gald on the other side vnderstanding by spials this order of the Romans, in the dead of the night setteth vpon one of those legions, which was lodged next vnto him, and finding meanes to slea the watch, was entred into the enimies lodgings, before they had anie knowlege of his comming, so that the fight was right fierce & cruell euen among the Romans tents and lodgings. But Agricola being certified of this enterprise of the Scots, sent forth with all spéed a certeine number of light horsemen and footmen to assaile them on the backs, & so to kéepe them occupied, till he might come with all the residue of his people to the rescue. They that were thus sent, accomplishing their enterprise according to the deuise in that behalfe appointed, gaue a right fierce & stout charge vpon the Scots and Picts, greatlie to the releefe of those that were by them assailed, and withall sore amazed and disordered by reason of the enimies sudden inuasion.

By this meanes the fight continued right fierce and cruell on all sides, till at length the daie beginning to appéere, shewed to the Scots and Picts the plaine view of the whole Romane armie, approaching vnder the conduct of Agricola, to the succour of his people, being thus in danger to be distressed.
Hérewith were the Scots and Picts put in such feare, that immediatlie they fell to running awaie towards the woods and bogs, the accustomed places of their refuge. This ouerthrow did so abash both the Scots and Picts, that they durst attempt no more the fortune of battell, till they had some aid out of Denmarke, but onelie did what they could to defend their townes and countrie, by making sundrie raises vpon their enimies, as occasion and opportunitie serued. But the Romans, supposing nothing to be hard for their vndaunted valiancie, but that they were able to ouercome whatsoeuer should stand at defiance against them, determined at length to find an end of the Ile of Albion, and so passing thorough Kalendar wood, and ouer the riuer of Amond, they pitched their field néere to the riuer of Taie, not far from the castell named Calidon or Kalendar.

The Picts, by reason that their enimies were lodged so néere to the confines of their countrie, doubting what might follow thereof, burned the citie of Tuline, least the same enimies chancing to take it, should furnish it with some garrison of men, to the great danger of the whole Pictish kingdome. This citie stood vpon the banke of Taie, right beautifullie built, with many faire castels and towers, as may appéere euen vnto this daie by the old ruines therof, strong rather by the workemans hands, than by nature. The Scotishmen in our time call the place Inchtuthill. All their wiues and children they remoued vnto the mountains of Granzbene for their more suertie and safegard.

About the same time the Romans were not a little disquieted, by reason of a mutinie which chanced amongst such Germans as were appointed to come ouer to Agricola, as a new supplie to furnish vp such numbers as were decaied in his armie. These slai-eng their capteine, and such other Romans as were appointed to haue the order of them for their training in warlike feats at the beginning, as the maner was, got certeine pinnesses which they happened vpon in the riuer of Thames, and sailing about the east and north coasts of this Ile, arriued in Taie water, offering themselues to the Scots and Picts to serue against the Romans, whose malice they dread for their offense committed if they should returne into their owne countries, which laie about the mouth of the Rhene, and was as then subiect to the Romane empire, the inhabitants in those daies being cleped Usipites, the which (as some suppose) inhabited Cleueland and Gulike.

Their offer was accepted most thankefullie, and places appointed for them to inhabit amongest the Murraies, because they were descended as it were of one nation. Whilest these things were thus a doing, there came also the long wished aid from the Danes and Norwegians, to the number of ten thousand men, vnder the leading of one Gildo. This Gildo with his nauie first arriued in the frith betwixt Fife and Louthian, but for that the Romans kept him off from landing there, he sailed about and came into the riuer of Taie, where he landed all his people, for prouision whereof he had good store both of vittels and armour. Garnard king of the Picts hearing of their arriuall there, forthwith vpon the newes departed from Dundée, accompanied with a great number of his nobles, and comming to the place where Gildo with his armie was lodged, re-ceiued him in most ioifull wise, feasted and ban-keted him and his people, and shewed them all the tokens of most hartie loue and friendship that could be deuised. Gildo himselfe was led by the king vnto Dundée, and lodged with him there in the castell, his people were prouided for abroad in the countrie in places most for their ease, to refresh themselues the better after their painefull iournie by the seas.

Shortlie after there came vnto Dundée the Sco-tish king Gald, who for his part did all the honour that in him lay vnto Gildo, shewing himselfe most ioifull and glad of his comming, yéelding vnto him and his people such thanks and congratulations as serued best to the purpose, and receiued no lesse at his and their hands againe. After they had remained thus certeine daies togither at Dundée, both the kings Gald & Garnard, togither with this Gildo, went vnto the castell of Forfare, there to consult with their capteins and gouernours of their men of warre, how to mainteine themselues in their enterprise against the enimie. At length they resolued not to go forth into the field till the winter season were past, for doubt of the inconuenience that might insue, by reason of the extreame cold intemperancie of the aire, whereto that countrie is greatlie subiect.

In the meane time they tooke order for the furniture of all things necessarie for the wars, to haue the same in a perfect readines against the next spring, and till then they did appoint onelie to kéepe fronter warre, that the Romans should not straie abroad to fetch in vittels and other prouisions to their owne gains, and to the vndoing of the poore inhabitants.
Upon this determination when the counceli was broken vp, Gald withdrew into Atholl, to defend those parties; and Garnard with the Danish generall Gildo, furnished all the castels and holds in Angus ouer against the riuer of Taie, to stop the passages of the same, that the enimies should enter no further on that side. Thus passed the winter for that yeare, without anie great exploit on either part atchiued.

In the beginning of the next summer, Agricola appointed his nauie of ships to saile about the coasts of the furthest parts of Albion, making diligent search of euerie créeke & hauen alongst by the same.
The mariners, executing his commandement, sailed

Gald setteth vpon one part of his enimies in the night.

Agricola com meth to the succors of his men.

Agricola dis-comfiteth his enimies.

The Ro-mans passe thorough Cali-don wood ouer the riuer of Amond.

The Picts burne the citie of Tuline.

The place where Tu-line stood is called by the inhabitants at this daie Inchtuthill.

The Ger-mans cõming to serue the Romans re-bell against their captein and leaders.

These Usipites first inhabited the parties betwixt the mountains of Hessen and the Rhene, now called Hochrug, frõ whence they remoued into the nether countries.

Danes, and Norwegians, come to aid the Scots and Picts.

Gildo is kept off from landing by the Romans.

Gildo arriueth in Taie water.

Cornelius Tacitus maketh no mention of anie forraine aid to come to the succours of his enimies comprehending them all vnder the name of Britains.

Garnard the king of Picts ioifullie recei-ued Gildo.

Gald commeth into Dundée to welcome Gil-do.

Gald Gar-nard and Gil-do assemble a councell at Forfare, where they deuise how to proceed in their warre.

They deter-mine to rest all the winter, and make fronter warre onelie.

Agricola send-deth forth his nauie of ships, to discouer the furthest point of Britaine northward.

ſailed round about the north coaſt, diſcouering manie of the weſterne Iles, and likewiſe thoſe of Orkneie, till at length they found out Pictland firth, being a ſtreict of the ſea of twentie miles in breadth, which ſeparateth the Iles of Orkneie from the point of Cathneſſe, paſſing with ſo ſwift a courſe, that without an expert pilot the ſhips that ſhall paſſe the ſame are oftentimes in great danger, by reaſon of the contrarie courſe of the tides. The Romane mariners therefore, finding certeine huſbandmen in the next Iles, conſtreined them to go a ſhipbord, & to guide them through that ſtreict, promiſing them high rewards for their labour; but they vpon a malicious intent not paſſing for their owne lines, ſo they might be reuenged of their enimies in caſting away ſuch a notable number of them togither with their veſſels, entred the ſtreict at ſuch an inconuenient time, that the ſhips were borne with violence of the ſtreame againſt the rocks and ſhelues, in ſuch wiſe that a number of the ſame were drowned and loſt without recouerie.

The Romane ſhips through want of pilots are loſt in Pictland frith.

Some of them that were not ouer-haſtie to follow the firſt, ſéeing the preſent loſſe of their fellows, returned by the ſame way they came vnto Agricola, who in this meane time had cauſed a bridge to be made ouer the riuer of Tay, by the which he paſſed with his whole armie, and incamped on the further ſide thereof néere to the roots of the mounteine of Granzbene, leauing the bridge garniſhed with a competent number of ſouldiers to defend it againſt the enimies. The Picts being not a little troubled herewith, diſpatched forth a meſſenger with all haſt vnto Gald the Scotiſh king, ſignifieng vnto him the whole matter, and ther vpon required of him aid.

Agricola making a bridge ouer Tay water, paſſeth by the ſame with his hoſt, and incampeth néere to the foot of the mounteine of Granzbene.

Gald hauing muſtered his people aſwell Scotiſh as Iriſh, aſſembled them togither to the number of fortie thouſand perſons, what of one and other, and incontinentlie with all ſpéed marcheth forth to come vnto the aid of the Picts, and ſo within a few daies paſſing ouer the mounteine of Granzbene, he arriueth in a vallie beyond the ſame mounteine, where he findeth the Picts, Danes, and Norwegians incamped togither not far off from the hoſt of the Romans. Here taking aduiſe togither, & in the end determining to giue battell, king Gald (vnto whome as before is expreſſed, the gouernance of the whole was cõmitted) aſſembling togither all the number of the confederats, made vnto them a long and pithie oration, exhorting them in defenſe of libertie (the moſt pretious iewell that man might inioy) to ſhew their manlie ſtomachs againſt them that ſought onelie to depriue them of that ſo great a benefit. And ſith they were driuen to the vttermoſt bounds of their countrie, he perſuaded them to make vertue of neceſſitie, and rather chooſe to die with honor, than to liue in perpetuall ſhame & ignominie, which muſt néeds inſue to their whole nation, if they ſuffered themſelues to be vanquiſhed in that inſtant. With theſe words, or other much what of the ſemblable effect, Gald ſo moued the hearts of his people, that they deſired nothing but to ioine with their enimies, & to trie it by dint of ſword, which they vniuerſallie ſignified according to their accuſtomed vſe with a great noiſe, ſhout, and clamor.

Gald king of the Scotiſh men commeth to the aid of the Picts.

The Scots and Picts determine to giue battell to the Romans.

Gald exhorteth his people to fight manfullie.

On the other part Agricola, though he perceiued a great deſire amongeſt his ſouldiers to fight, yet he was not negligent on his owne behalfe to incourage them with moſt chéerefull words and countenance; ſo that both the armies being thus bent to haue battell, the generals on both parties began to ſet them in araie. Agricola to the end his armie being the leſſer number ſhould not be aſſailed both a front and on the ſides, prouided (by diſpoſing them in a certeine order) a remedie againſt that diſaduantage. On the other ſide, king Gald by reaſon of the aduantage which he had in his great multitude and number, ordered his battels thereafter with a long and large front, placing the ſame vpon the higher ground, of purpoſe to compaſſe in the enimies on ech ſide. At the firſt approch of the one armie towards the other, the battell was begun right fiercelie with ſhot of arrows and hurling of darts, which being once paſt, they ioined togither to trie the matter by hand-ſtrokes, wherein the Scots & Picts had one diſaduantage, for thoſe that were archers, or (as I may call them) kerns, comming once to fight at hand-blowes, had nothing but broad ſwords and certeine ſorte light bucklers to defend themſelues with, ſuch as ſerue to better purpoſe for men to ride with abroad at home, than to be carried forth into the warres, though the ſame haue béene ſo vſed among the Scotiſhmen, euen till theſe our daies.

Gald by reaſon of his multitude, thinketh to incloſe his enimies.

The armies approch togither to fight.

They ioine.

The Scotiſh mens diſaduantage, by reaſon of their vnfit weapons.

The Romans therefore being well appointed with armor and broad targets, ſlue downe right a great number of theſe Scots and Picts thus ſlenderlie furniſhed, without receiuing anie great damage againe at their hands, till king Gald appointed his ſpearemen to ſtep forth before thoſe archers & kerns, to ſuccor them, and therewith alſo the bilmen came forward, and ſtroke on ſo ſtrelilie, that the Romans were beaten downe on heaps, in ſuch wiſe that they were néere at point to haue bene diſcomfited, had not a band of Germans (which ſerued amongſt the Romans) ruſhed forth with great violence vpon the Scotiſhmen, where moſt danger appeared, and ſo reſtored againe the fainting ſtomachs of the Romans, whereby the battell renewed on both ſides againe right fierce and cruell, that great ruth it was to behold that bloudie fight, and moſt vnmercifull murther betwixt them, which continued with more violence on the Scotiſh ſide than anie warlike ſkill, till finallie the night comming on, toke the daies light from them both, and ſo parted the fraie. The Romans withdrew to their campe: and the Scots and Picts with their confederats the Danes, Norwegians, and Iriſhmen, ſuch as were left aliue, got them into the next mounteins, hauing loſt in this cruell conflict the moſt part of their whole numbers.

A cohort of Germans reſtored the Romane ſide néere at point to haue had the worſe.

The night ſeuereth the armies in ſunder & parteth the fray.

The Romans withdraw to their campe, & the Scots to the mounteins.

¶ Cornelius Tacitus agréeth not in all points with the Scotiſh chronicles, in a booke which he wrote of the life of Julius Agricola, where he intreateth of this battell. For he ſpeaketh but of thirtie thouſand men (which he comprehendeth vnder the generall name of Britains) to be aſſembled at that time againſt the Romans, making no mention of anie Scots, Picts, Iriſhmen, Norwegians, or Danes, that ſhould be there in their aid. The number of them that were ſlaine on the Britains ſide (as the ſame Tacitus recounteth) amounted to about ten thouſand men, and of the Romans not paſſing three hundred and fortie. Amongſt whom was one Aulus Atticus, a capteine of one of the cohorts. But as the Scotiſh writers affirme, there died that day of Scots, Picts, and other their confederates at the point of twentie thouſand, and of the Romans and ſuch as ſerued on their ſide, as good as twelue thouſand. Moreouer, the night following, when Galdus with the reſidue of his people which were left aliue was withdrawne to the mounteins, and that the huge loſſe was vnderſtood by the wiues and kinſwomen of the dead, there began a pitifull noiſe among them, lamenting and bewailing their miſerable caſe and loſſes.

See more here of in the hiſtorie of England.

The number of them that were ſlaine at this battell.

But Gald, doubting leaſt the ſame ſhould come to the eares of ſome eſpials, that might lurke neere to the place where he was withdrawne, cauſed an huge ſhout and noiſe to be raiſed by his people, as though it had béene in token of ſome reioiſing, till the women bewaile their friends.

the women bewailing thus the death of their friends, might be remoued out of the way. This done, they fell to take counsell what was best to do in this case: and in the end all things considered, it was determined that somewhat before the dawning of the next morrow, euerie man should dislodge and withdraw himselfe into such a place as he thought most meet for his safegard, saue onelie such as were appointed to attend Galdus and Garnard into Atholl, whither they minded with all spéed to go.

The Scotish men & Picts breake vp their campe.

Thus leauing a great number of fiers to dissemble their departure, they dislodged and made awaie with all spéed possible. In the morning when their departure was once discouered, a great number of the Romans followed as it had bæne in the chase, but some of them vnaduisedlie aduenturing too farre forward, were inclosed by their enimies and slaine. Those that wrought this feat got them to the next hils and so escaped. At length, when all the fields and countries adioining were discouered, and the same appearing to be quite deliuered of all the ambushments of the enimies, Agricola caused the spoile to be gathered, and after marched forth vnto Angus, where (forsomuch as summer was past) he appointed to winter, and so comming thither and subduing the countrie, he tooke pledges of the best amongst the inhabitants, and lodged his people about him in places most conuenient.

The Romans in pursuing vnaduisedlie are distressed.

Agricola subdueth Angus and wintereth there.

About the same time Agricola heard newes from his nauie (as then riding at anchor in Argile) what mishap had chanced to the same in Pictland frith. But herewith being not greatlie discouraged, he gaue order that the ships that had escaped, should be new rigged and furnished with all necessarie prouision, and manned throughlie, both with able mariners and men of war. This done, he appointed them eftsones to attempt fortune, and to take their course againe to come round about by the Orkenies, and so vp alongst by the east coast: which enterprise they luckilie accomplished, and in the water of Taie they burnt the Danish fléet lieng there in harbrough.

Agricola is certified of the mischance of his nauie.

The Romane fléet saileth round about the north point of Albion.

¶ Here is to be noted, that before the fore-remembred ouerthrow of the Scots and their confederats at the foot of Granzbene, there happened manie sundrie vnketh and strange sights in this Ile. Amongst other there appeared flieng in the aire certeine firie visions, much to be wondered at. Also a great pæce of Kalendar wood séemed in the night time as it had bæne on a flaming fire, but in the morning there appeared no such token. There was in like maner séene in the aire the similitude of certeine ships. And in Angus it rained frogs. At Tuline there was a child borne hauing both shapes, so filthie a sight to behold, that forthwith they rid it out of the way for offending others eies. These prodigious things were diuerslie interpreted, according to the variable fansie of man.

Strange visions.

Ships séene in the aire.

It rained frogs.

A mõstruous child borne.

After that the prosperous successe of Agricola was once notified to the emperour Domitian, he tooke such enuie thereat, that shortlie after, vnder a colour to send him into Syria to be lieutenant there, he countermanded him home vnto Rome, appointing one Cneus Trebellius to succéd him in the gouernment of Britaine, but the armie bearing more fauour vnto one Trebellianus being cousine to Agricola, caused no small trouble amongst the souldiors, so that in the end after certeine bickerings betwixt them, Trebellianus tooke a sort of the best souldiors away with him, and went ouer with them into France.

Domitian the emperour enuieth the prosperous successe of Agricola.

Agricola is sent for to Rome, one Cneus Trebellius appointed in his place which causeth the souldiers to make a mutinie.

The Scots vpon occasion of discord amongst the Romans, come forth against them.

The Scots taking occasion hereof, ioined with the Picts, and entred into Angus. Whereof Cneus Trebellianus being informed, assembled his people, who perceiuing no great forwardnesse in their leader, created Caius Silinnius (brother to the forenamed Trebellianus) their captein; but he would in no wise meddle with that charge, though they were verie earnest in hand with him to take it vpon him. In the meane time came the enimies vnder the leading of Galdus readie to giue the onset, wherewith the Romans being sore troubled, by reason of this discord amongst themselues, set forward yet right daliantlie, to giue battell to their enimies: howbeit in the end, because that Silinnius received a mortall wound, and so departed out of the field, they fell at length to running awaie, the Scots and Picts following in the chase right fiercelie.

The Scots set vpon the Romans.

The Romans are discõfited.

This atchiued victorie, after so manie vnluckie enterprises, highlie reioised the appalled harts of the Albions, hauing bæne continuallie in maner now for the space of fiftie yéeres through aduerse fortune grieuouslie oppressed by the Romans, who being not a little discouraged by this ouerthrow, withdrew themselues wholie vnto Tuline, and shortlie after for their more safegard, they got them ouer the riuer of Tay, breaking the bridge which they had made there, to the end that by the same the Scots & Picts should haue no passage in that place. But Galdus hauing got this notable victorie with the spoile of the Romans campe, thought it best with the aduise of his nobles, to pursue the Romans without delaie, not suffering them to haue time to prouide for resistance. And herevpon comming to the castell of Calidon otherwise Kalendar, they got ouer the riuer of Tay, by a bridge of wood laid ouer the same riuer, which in that place is but narrow, by reason of the rocks & cliffes forcing the banks on either side to a streitnesse.

The Romans withdraw vnto Tuline.

They retire backe ouer the water of Tay and breake the bridge after them.

The Romane captens also not ignorant of the passage of the enimies, brought forth their armie, and made themselues readie to incounter them, but for that the forenamed Caius Silinnius was not able to stirre by reason of his wounds receiued in the last battell, they chose one Titus Celius, a valiant gentleman of Rome to be their leader, and so vnder his conduct setting vpon their enimies they fought right fiercelie for a time, but yet in the end they were put to flight, & chased into Calidon. There were slaine of the Romane part in this incounter to the number of fiue thousand, and of the Scots and other the confederats two thousand. After this victorie thus obteined by the Scots, a great number of the Britains reuolted from the Romane obedience, as those that inhabit the countrie which we now call Wales, with the marches, slaieng & chasing awaie such Romans as lay abroad in those parties.

The Scots get ouer the water of Tay nére to Calidon castell.

The Scots eftsones giue battell to the Romans.

The Romans are againe discomfited.

The Britains hearing of the euill aduentures fallen to the Romans, reuolt frõ their obedience.

This done, they sent vnto Galdus king of the Scots, certeine messengers with rich iewels and gifts, in token of their reioising and gladnes for his victories, promising him furthermore such aid as they were able to make against the Romans the common enimies of all the whole Albion nation. Moreouer, in this meane while did the Romans within Calidon castell direct their messengers with letters vnto Marius king of the Britains, signifieng vnto him the present danger wherein things stood in those parties by the cruell rage of the Scotishmen and Picts, whom fortune had aduanced with the gaine of two foughten fields, insomuch that if timelie succours were not the sooner sent, the losse would be irrecouerable. Herevnto Marius answered, that as then a common conspiracie appeared to be in hand amongst his subiects, so far forth that he doubted greatlie the suertie of his owne estate; and as for hope of aid to be sent from Rome, he saw small likelihood; considering the slender prouision there through the misgouernement of cruell Domitian, who by reason of the hatred which the people bare him, regarded nothing but how to keepe them from

The Romans send vnto Marius king of the Britains for aid.

Marius king of the Britains doubteth rebellion of his subiects.

rising

Marius counselleth the Romans to leaue the north parts vnto the enimies, and to draw vnto him into the south parts to keepe the same.

rising vp in armour against him; and therefore he thought it necessarie that leauing the north parts to the enimies, they should all withdraw towards him into the south parts, to keepe yet the more fruitfull portion of the Ile in due obedience, sith their puissance might not suffice to reteine & rule the whole.

These newes greatlie abashed the Romane armie, & so much the more, for that about the same time it was shewed them how king Gald with an huge armie of Scotishmen and Picts, was come within ten miles of them. Whereupon the Romans not knowing at that instant what was best for them to do, in the end they concluded to withdraw into Cantire, where being arriued, and perceiuing themselues as yet to be in no great suertie there, they went awaie from thence with speed into Galloway.

The Romans withdraw into Cantire, & after into Galloway.

Gald pursueth the Romans.

In the meane time king Gald, supposing it best effsones to fight with them yer they might haue anie space to reinforce their power, followed them with all diligence, not forcing though he left behind him diuerse castels and fortresses furnished with sundrie garrisons of his enimies, so that he might discomfit and chase away their maine power, which he thought might as then easilie be done, considering the great multitudes of people which came flocking in on each side, presenting themselues with offering their seruice vnto him, and shewing furthermore great tokens of ioy and gladnesse, for that it had pleased the gods at length yet to declare themselues fauourable in this their relieuing of the oppressed Britains. Herevnto Galdus on the other side, giuing them heartie thanks for their trauell, receiued them verie gentlie, mixing his talke with most comfortable words, therewith to put them in hope of such good and prosperous successe, as that shortlie they should thereby be restored intierlie vnto their former liberties, and perpetuallie deliuered from all forren seruitude and bondage.

But to proceed, at length he did so much by his iournies, that he came into Galloway, where the Romans with all speed (seeing none other remedie) resolued themselues to giue him battell, and thereupon exhorting one another to plaie the men, sith their onelie refuge rested in their weapons points, they fiercelie gaue the onset, and at the first put the left wing of the Scots and Picts wholie vnto the worst. In which wing, according to their maner in those daies vsed, there were a great number of women mingled amongst the men. Gald therefore perceiuing the danger, succoured them with such as were appointed to giue the looking on till need required, and then to go where they should be commanded. By which meanes the battell on that side was renewed afresh, the women shewing no lesse valiancie than the men, and therewith much more cruelties, for they spared none at all, though they offered neuer so much to haue their liues preserued.

The Romans determine againe to fight with the Scots.

The Romans fiercelie assaile the Scots.

Strange dealing in women, and contrarie to their nature

In fine, the Romans being chased in the left wing, their ouerthrow gaue occasion to all the residue to flee backe to their campe, being pursued so egerlie by the Scots and Picts, that they had much adoo to defend the entries of their trenches, where both parties fought right egerlie, till at length the night parted them both in sunder. Being parted, the Scots gaue not themselues to rest, but prouided them of all things necessarie against the next morning to assaile their enimies afresh, and namelie from the next wood they fetched great plentie of fagots and brush to fill the trenches withall. But this their demeanor and purpose being vnderstood of the Romans, they required a communication, the which (though some persuaded Galdus to the contrarie) vpon deepe considerations of fortunes fraile fauor, was at length granted vnto them, and foure ancient Romans clad in right honorable and verie rich apparell came forth and were admitted to the presence of the kings [Gald of the Scots, and Garnard of the Picts] vnto whome with humble submission they acknowledged themselues as vanquished, and that by the iust wrath and reuenge of the equall gods, which against them they had conceiued for the wrongfull inuasion of that which in no wise of right appertained vnto them. Therefore if it might please those kings to bridle and restraine their displeasure against them, in licencing them vnder some reasonable conditions of appointment to depart, it should be a thing resounding so much to their fame and glorie, as nothing could be more; considering so humble sute made to them by the orators of those people, who were reputed as vanquishers of the whole world.

The Romans submit themselues as vanquished.

Herewith falling prostrate at the feet of those kings, they besought them of pardon, in such pitifull wise, that the hearts of the hearers began somewhat to mollifie, and at length Gald toke vpon him to answer in name of all the residue of the Scotish and Pictish nations, and in the end concluded, that they were contented to grant a peace on these conditions: That the Romans should ceasse from that day forward in anie wise to infest or disquiet by way of anie inuasion the Scotish and Pictish borders, and also to depart wholie out of those countries, restoring all such holds and fortresses as they held within the same: and further, to deliuer all prisoners, pledges, and fugitiues whatsoeuer as then remaining in their hands, togither with such goods & spoiles as they had latelie taken.

The conditions of peace prescribed to the Romans by the Scots and Picts.

These conditions being certified to the Romans by their orators, were gladlie accepted, sith they saw no better meane how to deliuer themselues out of that present danger. And so deliuering sufficient hostages for performance of all the articles of agreement, they departed without protracting time, marching southwards to come into Kent, where Marius king of the south Britains soiourned as then. Agricola, as the Scotish chronicles report, left at his departure towards Rome, to the number of three score thousand men in the Romane armie, what of one and other, but now at their departure out of Galloway, there remained vneth twentie thousand, the residue being dispatched by one meane or other. By this conclusion of peace then, the Scots and Picts got againe the whole possession of all such countries as the Romans had before wonne and taken away from them, as the Mers, Louthian, the marches about Berwike, Fife, and Angus, with Kile, Cantire, Conningham, and Galloway: all the Romane garrisons departing out of the fortresses and holds, and leauing the same vnto the former owners.

The Romans depart out of Galloway.

The Romans giue vp all their holds and fortresses which they kept within the Scotish or Pictish dominions.

Galdus hauing thus ended the warres with the Romans, toke order to set good directions amongst his people for the quiet and peaceable gouernement of the common wealth, visiting dailie the countries abroad, the better to vnderstand the state of them, and to reforme the same where it was needfull. Further considering that as warre breedeth good souldiers, so peace by iustice riddeth them out of the way, if they be not the better prouided for. Such as had serued long time in the last wars, and had not anie trade now in time of peace whereby to get their liuing, he placed in garrisons neere to the borders of the Britains for defense of the countrie. After this, hee came to an interuiew with Garnard king of the Picts at Calidon, or Kalendar, to represse certeine troubles raised betwixt their subiects being borderers, concerning the limits of their countrie: where perceiuing a sort of euill disposed persons to Galdus studieth to preserue his subiects in good quiet now after the warres were ended.

Such as sought to trouble the peace were punished be

be wholie in the fault, vpon a naughtie intent to ſteale, and trouble the peace, which they had with ſuch trauell and labour ſought to reſtore, they puniſhed the offendors, and ſet all things in good quiet, and ſo departed in ſunder with great loue and friendſhip.

Thus Galdus applieng all his ſtudie and diligence to aduance the common-wealth and quiet ſtate of his countrie, liued manie yeares ſo highlie in the fauour of all his ſubiects, that the like hath béene but ſeldome heard of: finallie, to their great griefe and diſpleaſure he ended his life, more déere to them than their owne at Epiake, in the 35 yéere of his reigne, which was about the 15 yéere of the empire of Adrian, the 4098 yéere after the worlds creation, and from the birth of our Sauiour 131, and was buried with great lamentation in moſt pompous maner, and laid in a goodlie tombe which was raiſed with mightie huge ſtones, hauing a great number of obeliſks ſet vp round about it according to the maner. Furthermore, to the end his memorie ſhould euer indure, the countrie where he fought laſt with the Romans was called Galdia, after his name, which by addition of a few letters is now called Galloway, and before that time Brigantia, as the Scots do hold: but how that ſéemeth to agrée with a truth, ye may read in the hiſtorie of England.

Galdus departeth this life at Epiake.

3. H.B.
302. H.B.
130. H.B.

Galloway taketh the name of Gald.

Lugthake

AFter this famous prince was thus departed hence, his ſonne Lugthake ſucceéded in rule of the Scotiſh kingdome, no leſſe abhorred of all men for his deteſtable and filthie vices, ioined with all kind of crueltie and couetouſneſſe, than his father was beloued for his noble and excellent vertues. This Lugthake went ſo farre paſt the bounds of all continencie in following his ſenſuall luſts, that hée forced and rauiſhed not onelie aunt, néece, and ſiſter, but euen his owne daughters alſo. Such as were honorable perſonages, and méet to gouerne in the common-wealth he nothing regarded, but committed the adminiſtration of things vnto vile perſons, and ſuch as could beſt deuiſe how to inuent quarels againſt the rich, whereby they might be fléeced of all whatſoeuer they had: and oftentimes vpon ſome forged cauſe cruellie put to death. So little did he prouide to ſée offendors in anie wiſe corrected, that contrarilie he mainteined them in ſuch ſort therein, that iuſtice was quite baniſhed, and nothing but ſpoile and rauine exerciſed.

An vngratious ſon ſucceédeth after his worthie father.

The incontinencie of Lugthake.

His ſmall regard to the nobilitie.

Fauor ſhewed to men of baſe condition.

Offendors maintained.

Iuſtice is baniſhed.

Thus hée continued aboue two yéeres, to the great ruine of the common-wealth. Finallie, when he went about to put vnto death ſuch as in an aſſemble called at Dunſtafage ſpake againſt the miſordered gouernement of the realme, he was there murthered amongſt the people, with a number of thoſe alſo whome he vſed to haue attendant on his perſon for ſafegard of the ſame. His owne bodie was ſolemnelie buried by appointment of the nobles, hauing reſpect to his fathers benefits, but the carcaſſes of his gard were caſt out into the fields, there to bée deuoured of beaſts and birds of rauine.

Lugthake would haue put to death ſuch as ſpake againſt his miſgouernment.

Lugthake is murthered with a number of his men.

AFter Lugthake was thus diſpatched, one Nogall the nephue of Galdus by his daughter was admitted king in his place. His cheefeſt ſtudie was to reforme the decaied ſtate of his countrie, and firſt he cauſed ſuch wicked councellors of his predeceſſors and vncle Lugthake, as had eſcaped with life (when their maiſter was made awaie) to be put to death, according to their iuſt deſeruings. He reſtored alſo the due worſhipping of the gods, in part as then neglected, by the wicked counſell of their former rulers. The Scotiſhmen in like maner conceiuing an aſſured hope of a good redreſſe in all their greéfes and oppreſſions, by the means of ſuch a well diſpoſed prince, began to beare him incredible loue and fauor, euen the like as they had done his grandfather Galdus. In the meane time came certeine ambaſſadors from the Picts, vnto this Nogall, requiring him of aid againſt the Romans and Britains, who by a ſudden inuaſion had don much hurt in Pictland, to the great diſtreſſe of the inhabitants.

Nogall is beloued of his ſubiects.

The Picts deſire aid of the Scots againſt the Romans.

At the ſame time they of Galloway certified him alſo by letters, that the ſame Romans had made a rode into their countrie, and led awaie a great bootie of goods and priſoners. Nogall hauing a mind no leſſe giuen to déeds of chiualrie, than to the ſtudie of ciuill gouernment and religious deuotion, reioiſed that he had iuſt occaſion giuen him to ſhew ſome proofe of his valiant inclination, and ſo herevpon ſent an herald at armes vnto the Romans, requiring to haue reſtitution and amends for the iniuries thus by them committed. The herald doing his meſſage, receiued nothing but ſcornefull words, and diſdainfull menaces, wherby Nogall being throughlie kindled with deſpite, aſſembled his power together forth of all the parties of his dominions, and comming with the ſame into Galloway, viſited his grandfathers ſepulchre, honoring it with great reuerence and ſolemne ſupplications, requiring as it were his aid againſt thoſe enimies, which had violated the league made betwixt him and them, by ſolemne oths and other accuſtomed meanes of ratification. This done, he drew into Annandale, where Antipanus as then king of the Picts abode his comming. There ioining their powers togither, they marched forth into Cumberland, and ſo forward into Weſtmerland, with fire and ſword waſting and ſpoiling thoſe countries, as then belonging to the Romans.

The Romans inuade the Scotiſh borders.

Nogall requireth reſtitution of wrongs done by the Romans.

Nogall prepareth to the wars.

Nogall viſiteth his grandfathers ſepulchre.

The Picts and Scots ioine their powers togither and enter into the lands of their enimies.

Lucius Antenous the Romane lieutenant, lieng at the ſame time at Yorke, being certified hereof by ſuch as fled for feare out of thoſe parties thus inuaded by the Scots, gathered a mightie armie out of all the countries of Britaine, and haſted forth with the ſame towards his enimies; of whoſe approch Nogall hauing notice, he made a long oration vnto his people to incourage them to fight manfullie againſt the Romans, perſuading them effectuallie thereto by manie familiar examples brought in of the valiant enterpriſes atchiued by their elders, in the defenſe of their countrie and libertie of the ſame. In like maner Lucius Antenous for his part exhorted the Romans, and other his ſouldiers, to call to remembrance the victorious exploits of their predeceſſors, and how that as then they ſhould fight but with a rude and barbarous people, running to battell more vpon a furious rage and violent madnes, than with any diſcretion or aduiſed order, ſaieng furthermore, that it laie now in their hands with no great adoo to recouer that which through the negligent ſloth of Cneus Trebellius was before loſt, whereby they ſhould atteine great honor and famous renowme for euermore.

Lucius Antenous lieutenant of Britaine.

Nogall exhorteth his men to do valiantlie.

By this meanes the armies on both ſides being kindled with deſire of battell, in hope of victorie, they drew neere togither, and began the fight right fiercelie at the firſt, with throwing and ſhoting of darts and arrowes ſo thicke that one might vneth ſée another. The place was more for the aduantage of the Scots than of the Romans, becauſe they were compelled to fight as it were by companies and parts, by reaſon of bogs and mariſhes, with ſuch ſideling banks on the ſides that they could kéepe none araie: yet all theſe impediments notwithſtanding, this battell was fought ſo far forth to the vtterance, that in the end, after a wonderfull ſlaughter on both ſides made, when their ſwords and other weapons were ſpent, they buckled togither with ſhort daggers.

The battell beginneth betweene the Romans and Albions.

A cruell fight.

The Romans retire.

Finallie the violent charge of the Scots & Picts was ſuch, that the Romans were conſtreined to retire, which their generall Antenous perceiuing, did what he could to ſtaie them, and to bring them forward againe, but as he was moſt buſie in the forefront to exhort them hervnto, he was wounded with an arrow, and therevpon departed out of the battell, which gaue occaſion to diuers other of his companie to follow him, by meanes whereof all the reſidue fell to running awaie, and made toward the next wood, there to ſaue themſelues as well as they might, though ſome companies perceiuing that they could not reach thither without manifeſt danger, cloſed themſelues togither and departed by another waie, which they toke at aduenture, not knowing towards what parts they drew, ſo that they laie all the night following within two miles of the Scots and Picts, who for that the daie was in maner ſpent (before the Romans were put to flight) incamped themſelues in the ſelfe-ſame place where the battell was fought, and in the morning, hearing that part of their enimies were lodged ſo neere them, & knew not which waie to draw, they ſent a number forth of their campe to fight with them, & to kill them if they reſiſted, or to bring them captiue to the king if they ſhould ſeeme willing to yeeld. Thoſe that were thus ſent, found the Romans in verie good order of battell for ſo ſmall a band, not minding to yeeld themſelues as priſoners. By reaſon of which their obſtinate wilfulneſſe, they were ſlaine in the end euerie mothers ſonne.

Lucius Antenous hauing thus receiued the ouerthrow, diſpatched a poſt vnto Rome with all haſt, ſignifieng vnto the emperor Adrian the whole maner of the diſcomfiture, and how that by reaſon therof things ſtood in great danger here in Britaine, if ſpeedie ſuccors were not the ſooner ſent, for the enimies were neuer more cruell and fierce, than at this preſent, not onelie the men, but alſo the women (as in the laſt battell he ſaw plaine proofe) who cared not for the loſſe of their owne liues, ſo that they might die reuenged.

When Adrian vnderſtood theſe newes, he purpoſed forthwith to go himſelfe into Britaine. Cauſing therefore an armie to be leuied, he paſſed forth with the ſame into France, then called Gallia, and comming to Calice, he tranſported ouer into Britaine, where he learned how the Scots and Picts were neuer more buſie than at this preſent, hauing of late waſted and ſpoiled the countrie euen to the riuer of Tine. Herewith Adrian being ſore offended, ioined the power which he had brought with him frõ Rome, with the other which he had cauſed to be raiſed in France and Britaine. This done, he remoued to Yorke, where ſoiorning certeine daies to refreſh his people, he afterwards drew toward the borders, and cõming to the riuer of Tine, he paſſed ouer the ſame.

The fourth daie after, he came into a countrie wherein was left no kind of earthlie thing ſeruing to mans vſe, and ſo paſſing forward a daie or two, he found neither corne, nor other prouiſion of vittell, nor any kind of liuing creature, all the people being fled into the mounteins and mariſh grounds, where no man might come vnto them, as commonlie in caſe of extreme danger they were accuſtomed to lie abroad in the ſame without houſe or any couerture ouer their heads. Howbeit, for all that he gaue not ouer to purſue them, but finding them out where they lurked in the hilles and woods, he greeuouſlie afflicted them, and that in ſundrie maner. In the end eſpieng the barrennes of the ſoile, the rudenes of the people, and that there was no hope left to come by ſufficient prouiſion for the maintenance of his armie, he determined not to ſpend anie longer time in ſuch a vaine and fruitleſſe trauell, and therefore returned vnto Tine, there to reſtreine the Scots and Picts from inuading ſuch of the Britains as were ſubiect to the Romane empire, he cauſed a great trench to be caſt ouerthwart the land from the mouth of Tine to the riuer of Eſke, and a wall to be made on the inner ſide of the ſame, of turfe and ſods. ¶ The Scotiſh chronicles make mention that it was begun by Adrian, but not finiſhed till the daies of the emperor Seuerus, who made an end of it, and therfore the ſame chronicles name it the wall of Septimius Seuerus.

Adrianus hauing thus diſpatched in the north parts of Britaine, in his returne viſited Wales with the marches of the ſame, ſetting an order amongſt ſuch as had moued a commotion againſt the magiſtrats in thoſe parties, the authors whereof he puniſhed according to their offenſes, & ſo then he came to London, whither at the ſame time a great number of the Britaine nobilitie reſorted to do him honor, according to their duties. And he for his part ſhewed them ſuch friendlie interteinment, that they could not wiſh any better. After this he ſailed into France, taking Lucius Antenous with him, becauſe he could not awaie with the aire of Britaine, in whoſe place he left one Aulus Victorinus lieutenant there, who diſpoſed diuers gariſons of ſouldiers in places neere vnto the fore-remembred wall, for defenſe of the inhabitants againſt the violence of the Scots & Picts. Who ſeeing this demeanour of the Romans, diuided thoſe lands and countries (which they had latelie waſted on the further ſide of Tine) in ſuch ſort betwixt them, that all whatſoeuer laie towards the Iriſh ſea, remained to the Scots, and the reſt coaſting vpon the Almane ſeas, fell vnto the Picts for their portion.

After this Mogall liued manie yeares in good quiet without anie trouble of enimies. But being puffed vp in pride, by ſuch notable victories as he had thus got of the Romans the conquerours of the world, he could not in time of peace maiſter his owne vnrulie appetites; but that drowned in the filthie luſtes of the bodie, he ſpared neither maid, widowe, nor wife. Againe, he was giuen to ſuch vnquenchable couetouſneſſe, that nothing might ſuffice him, finding manie forged matters againſt the rich, whereby to bereue them both of life and ſubſtance. He was the firſt which ordeined that ſuch as were baniſhed or condemned for anie crime, ſhould forfeit all their lands & goods without any conſideration had either of wife or child, which is obſerued at the full euen vnto theſe our daies, where before it was otherwiſe in that countrie. But theſe ſo notable vices in the prince could not long continue vnpuniſhed, for at laſt a conſpiracie was practiſed againſt him, whereof he hauing knowledge (whether by witchcraft or otherwiſe by relation of friends, the certeintie is not knowen) in the dead of the night he armed himſelfe, and with two of his ſeruants onelie fled to the next wood, not giuing notice of his departure to anie other of his houſhold.

The morning being come, and knowledge had how he was thus departed, the conſpiratours purſued after him, who perceiuing them to approch, ſought waies how to haue eſcaped their hands; but ſuch was his hap, that he fell amongeſt other that were as readie as the firſt to wreake their malice vpon him, and ſo by them he was immediatlie murthered in the 36 yeare of his reigne, being the 4136 of the world, and after the birth of our ſauiour 169, Antoninus Pius then gouerning the Romane empire, and Phiatus ſurnamed Albus reigning amongeſt the Picts. His head being ſmitten off, was ſet vpon a poles end, and caried about in deriſion; but afterwards in reſpect of his linage it was buried Lucius Antenous is woun ded.

The Romans are put to flight.

Women as readie to the battell as the men.

Adrian the emperor prepareth to go into Britain.

Adrian tranſporteth into Britaine.

Adrian commeth to Yorke

He paſſeth ouer the riuer of Tine.

Adrian findeth nothing abroad in the countrie of his enimies.

What maner of people he had to do withall.

Adrian beginneth to make a wall for ſafegard of the Britains againſt the Picts and Scots.

The Romane writers do confirme the ſame.

Adrian commeth to London.

Adrian returneth toward Rome.

Aulus Victorinus lieutenant of Britaine.

The Scotiſh men & Picts diuide the countries beyond Tine betwixt them.

Mogall through pride abuſeth himſelfe in ſundrie kinds of vices.

A couetous and cruell ordinance.

A conſpiracie attempted againſt Mogall.

Mogall flieth out of his owne houſe.

Mogall is murthered. 148. H. B.

ried togither with the bodie by appointment of the nobles, notwithſtanding the commons thought it moſt vnworthie of anie ſuch honor.

Conarus.

Conarus the ſonne of Mogall ſucceedeth his father.

MOgall being thus diſpatched, as ye haue heard, his ſonne Conarus was admitted king, who (as is reported) was priuie to the conſpiracie deuiſed againſt his father, and as he came to the gouernment by wicked means, ſo in the end he vſed himſelfe much what accordinglie in the ſame; for after he had for a time diſſembled his naughtie nature, he began at the laſt openlie to ſhew himſelfe in his right colours, committing firſt of all the adminiſtration of publike affaires vnto men of baſe condition and vile nature. His chiefe delight was altogither in banketting and coſtlie fare, not regarding the ancient temperancie in feeding, vſed amongeſt his worthie anceſtors.

Conarus giue to exceſſiue gluttonie.

In waſting therefore his kinglie reuenues vpon ſuch riotous exceſſe, he was nothing abaſhed to require in an open aſſemblie of his nobles, a ſubſidie to be granted, towards the maintenance of ſuch roiall cheere, as he iudged to ſtand with his honor to haue dailie in his houſe. And therefore whereas the rents that belonged to the crowne were not ſufficient to furniſh the charges, he requeſted a generall contribution to be leuied through the realme, of euerie perſon according to their abilities, for the maintenance of ſuch ſuperfluous expenſes as he dailie vſed in exceſſiue banketting. The lords maruelling to heare him moue anie ſuch demand, and conſidering withall the occaſion thereof, they aſked reſpit to make their anſwer till the next day: which being granted, in the night following they commuded ſecretlie togither, and in the end concluded, not onelie to denie his requeſt, but alſo to depoſe him of all kinglie gouernement, ſith his naughtie life required no leſſe.

The lords conſpire againſt Conarus.

The next day therefore when they were againe ſet downe in the councell-chamber, one of them in name of the reſidue toke vpon him to ſpeake, declaring that the lords and commons of the realme maruelled not a little how it ſhould come to paſſe, that the king hauing no warres wherewith to conſume his treaſure, ſhould yet be inforced to demand a tallage for maintenance of his eſtate and charges of his houſhold; but the fault was knowen well inough to reſt in ſuch as he moſt vnworthilie had preferred to rule things vnder him, who being come of naught did nothing but deuiſe means how to cauſe the king to ſpoile his naturall ſubiects of their goods and poſſeſſions, therewith to inrich themſelues, but (ſaith he) as they ſhalbe prouided for well inough yer long, and ſo aduanced as they ſhall not need to thirſt for other mens liuings, that is to wit, euen to a faire paire of gallowes, there to end their liues with ſhame, as a number of ſuch other loſengers had often done before them: ſo it is conuenient that the K. ſith his ſkill is ſo ſmall in the adminiſtration of his office, ſhould be ſhut vp in ſome one chamber or other, and ſuch a one to haue the gouernance of the realme, as may be thought by common aſſent of the lords moſt meet to take it vpon him.

The anſwere of the lords to the demand of Conarus.

The king hearing this tale, ſtarted vp, & with a lowd voice began to call them traitors; adding, that if they went about anie hurt to his perſon, they ſhuld derelie abide the bargaine. But notwithſtanding theſe words, ſuch as were appointed therto, caught him betwixt them, and had him forth to a place aſſigned, where they laid him vp, maugre all his reſiſtance. In like maner, all ſuch as had borne offices vnder him, were attached and had to priſon, where the moſt part of them, vpon examination taken of their offenſes, ſuffered death according to their iuſt demerits.

Conarus is taken and committed to cloſe keeping.

Conarus his miniſters are puniſhed for their offenſes.

Then was the rule of the realme committed vnto one Argadus, a man of noble birth, and ruler of Argile, who vnder the name of a gouernour toke vpon him the publike regiment, vntill other aduiſe might be taken. This mans ſtudie in the beginning was onelie to cleanſe the countrie of all miſdoers, and to ſee the peace kept to the quiet of the people; & finallie in all his doings ſhewed himſelfe a perfect patterne of an vpright iuſticer. But within a few yeares after (as it often happeneth) proſperous ſucceſſe changed his former mind to an euill diſpoſition, whereby he ordered things after his owne ſelfewill more than by reaſon, without the aduiſe of his peeres. And further, to the manifeſt ruine of the common-wealth, he nouriſhed ciuill diſcord and ſedition amongeſt the nobles, ſuppoſing it to make for his welfare, ſo long as they were at ods. He alſo maried a Pictiſh ladie, the better to ſtrengthen himſelfe by this his forren aliance.

Argadus is choſen to gouerne the realme.

Argadus an vpright iuſticer.

Proſperitie changeth conditions.

Herevpon the peeres of the realme, vnderſtanding what miſchiefe might inſue by theſe manifold and ſundrie abuſes of the gouernour, cauſed a parlement to be called, where, in preſence of the whole aſſemblie, they laid vnto his charge, how that (through his miſgouernement and preſumption, not onelie in coupling himſelfe in mariage with a wife of a ſtrange nation, but alſo for attempting manie other things preiudiciall to the eſtate of the realme, without conſent of the nobles or commons of the ſame) he had deſerued grieuous puniſhment; his treſpaſſe being ſo much the greater, in that conſidering the meane how he came to that dignitie, he anſwered not their expectation, nor performed the truſt and credit which was generallie committed vnto him.

Argadus is rebuked.

Argadus confeſſeth his fault.

Argadus hearing himſelfe thus charged, and not able to laie anie likelie excuſe, fell vpon his knees, & partlie confeſſing his fault with teares guſhing from his eies, beſought them of pardon, wholie ſubmitting himſelfe to be ordered at their diſcretion. The lords being moued with this humble ſubmiſſion of Argadus, vpon promiſe he ſhould redreſſe all his former miſdemeanours, were contented that he ſhould continue ſtill in the adminiſtration. But ſuch as had beene his chiefeſt councellors were committed to ward. After this ſharpe admonition and warning thus giuen, Argadus did nothing touching the gouernement of the common-wealth, without aduiſe of his peeres; and ſone after, amongeſt other things, he toke order for the limiting how far the authoritie of inferiour officers, as bailiffes, borroughmaiſters, conſtables, and ſuch other ſhould extend. But eſpeciallie he trauelled moſt diligentlie for the puniſhing of theeues and robbers, of whome none eſcaped with life that fell into his hands. Moreouer, he ordeined by ſtatute, that no man exerciſing anie publike office, ſhould taſte of anie drinke that might make him drunken. He alſo baniſhed all ſuch perſons as vſed with dreſſing of delicat meats, and (as I may call them) deintie diſhes, or banketing cheere, to allure mens appetites from the old rude fare accuſtomed amongeſt their elders, who ſought not to follow their delicious appetites, but onlie prouided to ſuſteine nature, which is ſatiſfied with a little, & that void of coſtlie furniture. Argadus thus being occupied in reforming the ſtate of the common-wealth, brought manie euill doers into good frame and order, and ſuch as were vpright liuers of themſelues, indeuored ſtill to proceed forward to better and better. At length, in the eight yeare of his gouernement, Conarus being conſumed with long impriſonment, departed out of this life, in the fourteenth yeare after the beginning of his reigne.

Argadus amendeth his former miſgouernance, and ruleth himſelfe by better aduiſe.

A notable ſtatute.

Fine cookerie baniſhed.

Conarus departeth out of this world. 162. H.B.

Ethodius.

Ethodius the nephue of Wegall is chosen king.

AFter whose decease, the nobles and other estates of the realme assembling themselues togither, chose one Ethodius, nephue to king Wogall by his sister, to reigne ouer them. But Argadus being highlie rewarded with lands and liuings for his faithfull & diligent paines taken in the aduancement of the publike weale, during the time of his gouernement, was thereto sone after created as it were lord president of the councell, thereby to be chiefest in authoritie next to the king, in ordering and ruling of all publike affaires & causes. Shortlie after Ethodius (as the custome of new kings in those daies was) went ouer into the westerne Iles, there to take order for the administration of iustice, where immediatlie vpon his arriuall, it was shewed him, that not passing two or three daies before, there had beene a great conflict fought betwirt the nobles or clannes of the countrie, by reason of a strife that was stirred amongest their seruants, being a companie of naughtie and vnrulie fellowes, to the great disquiet of the inhabitants. Herevpon was Argadus sent forth incontinentlie with a power to appease that businesse, and to bring in the offendors, that they might receiue reward according to their demerits. Argadus forthwith hasted towards the place where he vnderstood the rebels to be remaining, and apprehending the whole number of them, some by force, and some vpon their humble submission, he returned backe with them to the king, who causing the matter to be throughlie heard, such as were the chiefest beginners and most in fault, were punished by death, and the other fined at the kings pleasure. The Iland people being thus appeased, the king returned into Albion, where as then lieng at Enerlochthé, a towne (as is said) in Louchquhaber, word came vnto him that the Romans had broken downe the wall builded by the emperour Adrian, and made a great rode into the Scotish and Pictish borders, where méeting with the inhabitants assembled togither in defense of their countrie (after a sore conflict) the victorie remained with the Romans; by reason whereof they led a great bootie of cattell and other goods away with them to the places where they sojourned.

Argadus is created lord president of the councell.

Ciuill discord amongest the lords of the Iles.

Argadus is sent forth to apprehend the rebels.

The Iland rebels are punished.

The Romans inuade the Pictish and Scotish borders.

Ethodius being moued herewith, sent forthwith an herald vnto Victorine the Romane lieutenant, requiring that his subiects might haue restitution of their goods wrongfullie taken from them, or else to looke for warres within fiftéene daies after. Victorine answered herevnto, that the Scots and Picts had first begun to breake downe the foresaid wall, and to build a tower vpon the same, fortifieng it with a number of men of warre, who running dailie into the British confines, fetched preies thence from amongest the Romane subiects, and though he had sent diuers times to the Scotish and Pictish wardens for restitution, yet could he neuer haue anie towardlie answer, so that he was constreined to begin the warre in maner and fourme as he had done alreadie.

Ethodius requireth restitution of his subiects goods taken away by the Romans.

Victorines answere to Ethodius request.

Ethodius not a little kindled with this answere, wrote streightwaies to the K. of the Picts, exhorting him in reuenge of such iniuries as his subiects had latelie receiued at the hands of the Romans, to inuade the wall on that side where it diuided his countrie from the Britains, and to breake in vpon the enimies by the same, and for his part he promised shortlie after to come, and to ioine with him in such a necessarie enterprise against the common enimies of both their countries. The Pictish king giuing thanks to the messenger for his pains, promised with all speed to set forward according to the aduise of Ethodius. The Romans in like maner hauing knowledge of the whole intention of the two kings, with all spéed made preparation also for the wars, but the Scots and Picts first breaking in vpon them, did much hurt abroad in the countries next adioining. Which when the Romans perceiued, they passed by the enimies campe in the night season, and entred into the Pictish borders, wasting and spoiling all afore them.

Ethodius exhorteth the king of the Picts to make warre against the Romans.

The Scotishmen and the Picts inuade the British borders.

When the two kings vnderstood this, they hasted forth towards them, and were no sooner come within sight of them, but that they made ech towards other, and so incountring togither, there was fought a sore battell with doubtfull victorie, for the right wings on either side vanquished the left, the breasts of both the battels kéeping their ground, the one not once shrinking backe from the other till night seuered them in sunder, but not without such slaughter made on both sides, that being once parted, they made no great hast to ioine againe togither; for as well the one part as the other being thus disseuered, drew incontinentlie homewards without abiding for the morning. Neither did they attempt anie further exploit of all that yeare following.

The Romans incountred by the Scotishmen and Picts.

Night parted the battell.

In which meane time Victorine sent letters to Rome vnto the emperour Marcus Antonius Aurelius, who as then gouerned the empire, signifieng vnto him in what state things stood in Britaine; further declaring, that if conuenient succors were not sent in time, it would be hard to resist the furious rage of the enimies, by reason of the small trust he perceiued was to be had in the Britains, being no lesse readie vpon occasion to make warres in recouerie of their libertie, than the Scots & Picts were to incroch vpon them. The emperour vpon receit of these letters, thought in his mind that Victorine was not so valiant a capteine as the case required, and that therevpon the Scots and Picts became the more imboldened to resist, therefore he sent for him home, appointing one Agricola Calphurnius to succéed in his rome, who was (as some haue left in writing) the nephue of Julius Agricola, the most famous capteine of the Romans that euer came into Britaine.

Victorine sendeth letters to Rome.

Victorine is sent for to returne vnto Rome, and one Calphurnius sent into Britaine to succéed in his rome.

This Calphurnius comming into Britaine with an armie, ioined to the same the power which he found there, as well of the Britains, as of other seruing vnder the Romane enlignes. Which done, he repaired toward the riuer of Tine, where being arriued, he marched forth into the borders of his enimies, finding all the countrie round about him so clearelie wasted and burned, that there was not a house left standing, nor a graine of corne, nor one hed of cattell to be found therein. Yet notwithstanding all this, forth he passed thorough Northumberland, and entring into Pictland, wasted all that was before him with fire and sword. And for so much as winter came vpon him, when he had done his will in that behalfe, he returned vnto Yorke, where he sojourned vntill the spring.

Calphurnius entreth into the borders of his enimies.

Calphurnius returneth to Yorke.

When summer was once come, hauing made his prouision to warre on the Scots and Picts, word came vnto him that the Welshmen were reuolted, and began to raise warre against the Romans, so that taking order for the reparing of the wall made by Adrian, which the enimies in diuers places had broken downe, and leauing a sufficient number of men of warre for defense of the same against all inuasions that might be attempted, he turned the residue of his power against those Welsh rebels, whom in the end, though not without much adoo, he reduced to obedience. Immediatlie after this, he heard also how the Britains of the Ile of Wight were vp in armour against such Romans as ruled there, sundrie noble men of the maine Ile taking their part, but they also were at length brought againe to

The Welshmen rebell against the Romans.

The Welshmen brought to their former obedience.

The inhabitants of the Ile of Wight reuolting frō the Romans, are constreined againe to be obedient.

to their former subiection, and the authors of that rebellion punished by death.

In the meane time the Scots and Picts determined not to attempt anie further exploit against the Romans, doubting the verie name and linage of Agricola in the lieutenant Calphurnius, by calling to remembrance the noble atchiued conquests of his grandfather Julius Agricola, of whose victorious exploits, besides that which ye haue before heard, the English historie also doth make a long rehearsall. Calphurnius being thus at quiet on that side, intended wholie to reforme all misorders amongest the Britains, which being brought to indifferent good passe, he was sent for home againe vnto Rome by the emperour Antonius Commodus, the sonne and successour of the fore-remembred Marcus Aurelius sending one Publius Trebellius into Britaine, there to supplie his charge.

The name of Agricola dred full to the Scotishmen and Picts.

Calphurnius studieth to reforme the estate of Britaine.

Calphurnius returneth vnto Rome.

Publius Trebellius sent as lieutenant into Britaine.

This Trebellius comming into Britaine, at the first vsed himselfe verie vprightlie in his office, shewing all honor and loue towards the Britains, subiects to the Romane empire, and namelie to Lucius, who reigned as king of the land, vnder the name and authoritie of the Romane empire. But after that he had once wone him a pece of credit amongest them, he changed his maners, or rather discouered his naturall inclination, so wholie giuen to couetousnesse, that his onelie studie was set which way to fill his bags, not caring how vntrulie he forged accusations against the rich, so that either by death or banishment their goods might be confiscat, and so come to his hands. By this wicked gouernement, the Britains began so sore to hate him, that had it not beene for the loue of their king the foresaid Lucius (who holpe to appease them) there had beene some rebellion practised against him in the south part. Now the Scots and Picts hauing knowledge of this misliking in the Britains towards the Romane lieutenant, thought it a time conuenient for them also to be doing, to the end they might reuenge their former iniuries; and hereupon leuieng an armie, they came to the oft remembred wall, and ouerthrowing the same in diuers places, they entred into the British confins with great spoile and crueltie. Trebellius being hereof informed, hasted forth with all the power he could make, to resist their inuasions; but finding the enimies readie in the field, and incountring them sooner than he looked for, he was euen vpon the first ioining abandoned of the most part of his whole armie, which consisted of Britains and Frenchmen, then called Galls, so that the residue being beaten downe, he was glad to saue himselfe as well as he might, by setting the spurs to his horsse and galloping away.

Publius Trebellius giuen to couetousnesse.

He is hated of the Britains.

The Scots and Picts renew the warre against the Romans.

Trebellius fighteth against his enimies, is forsaken of his owne men, and chased out of the field.

After this, gathering togither his people againe as they fled from the discomfiture, he retired backe with them vnto Yorke, hauing lost in this bickering a great number of his best souldiors, and men of warre: for the Scots and Picts, missing no small number of their friends in that battell, were not satisfied with those whome they had likewise slaine in the fight, but also fell vpon their prisoners which they had taken, and slue them also in reuenge of their fellowes whome they had lost. Afterwards they harried the countries of Westmerland and Kendall in most cruell wise, Trebellius not being so hardie to fight with them againe for doubt of some traine that might be practised by the Britains. Neither was his suspicion grounded vpon the credit of any light information, as may appeare by that which followed: for immediatlie after, the commons of the countrie rose against the Romans, in purpose to haue driuen them all out of the land.

Westmerland and Kendall spoiled by the Scotishmen and Picts.

The British commons rise against Trebellius, one Caldorus a Pict being their capteine.

Their capteine was one Caldorus a Pict borne. There were also diuerse of the British nobilitie amongst them not knowne, for they were disguised in strange apparell, counterfeting themselues to be of the vulgar sort. The furie of these people was great, but yet in the end the politike order of the Romans vanquished them, howbeit not without great slaughter on both sides. Caldorus escaping the hands of his enimies, fled into his native countrie of Pictland, not a little reioising that he had procured such slaughter amongst the Romans and Britains, both being enimies to him and his countrie. Such prisoners also of the Britains as fell into the hands of the Romans, were hanged vp vpon sundrie trees and gibets: whereat other of the Britains being offended, in the night season toke down those dead bodies, and hanged vp as manie of the Romans in their places, the truth being neuer knowne who where the doers of that act.

The same commons are vanquished.

Caldorus reioiseth at the slaughter as well of the one part as of the other.

The lieutenant Trebellius perceiuing thus what danger he stood in on euerie part, wrote vnto the emperour Commodus, that without some reformation were had, the Romans were not like to kepe fot anie long season in Britaine, and therefore required to haue some aid sent ouer vnto him in time. But the emperour doubting least the fault rested most in the lieutenant himselfe, appointed that one Pertinax an ancient gentleman, and one for his high and notable vertues greatlie esteemed both amongst the men of warre, and also in the senat, should go into Britaine, to be legat there in place of Trebellius. This Pertinax comming into Britaine, according to the emperors appointment, toke vpon him the office: and first setting a staie among the Britains, by right prudent and well aduised gouernement, he afterwards made a iourneie against the Scots and Picts, driuing them by great slaughter beyond Adrians wall, and so constreined them to remaine within their owne confines, pursuing them no further, for that he was sent for home to Rome, where the emperour Commodus being murthered amongst his owne men, he was against his will preferred to his place.

The spite of the Britains shewed towards the Romans.

Trebellius writeth to the emperor Commodus for aid.

Pertinax sent as lieutenant into Britaine.

Pertinax driueth back both the Scots and Picts.

Pertinax is chosen emperour.

About the same time the state of the Scotish commonwealth was brought into great danger through an other incident, as by reason of a rebellion stirred by them of the western Iles, who not quieted in their stomachs for the death of their friends executed by Argadus (as before ye haue heard) assembled themselues togither, and comming ouer into Argile, spoiled and harried the countrie in pitious wise. For redresse whereof, Argadus was sent thither againe with an armie, and in the meane time Ethodius the king with a great host of Scotishmen and Picts lay in campe neere vnto Adrians wall, to resist the inuasion of the enimies on that side, if happilie they should attempt any new exploit against him in those parts. The Iland-men hearing of Argadus his approch, drew themselues togither to receiue him by battell, if he minded to offer it.

Argile infested by the Ilandmen.

In which meane time two thousand Irishmen were landed in that countrie, in hope of spoile, and hearing that Argadus was comming that waies forth to fight with his enimies, they laid themselues secretlie in ambush by the waie where hee should passe, and when he was passed by them, they brake forth vpon his rereward suddenlie, putting his people in such disorder by their violent impression at the first brunt, that though he did what in him laie to bring them againe into araie of battell, yet in the end he was there slaine with two thousand of his armie, the residue escaping by flight out of the hands of their wild and cruell enimies. Ethodius hauing knowledge hereof, with an armie of twentie thousand men hasted forth towards Argile, to reuenge

The Irish men land in Argile.

The Irish men lay an ambush to intrap Argadus

Argadus is slaine.

the death of his valiant capteine Argadus vpon the rebels. Who hearing of his comming, made towards the sea, and would gladlie haue bene gone, but by reason of a contrarie wind they were forced to stay against their wils, so that he finding them still in the countrie, wrought so warilie by closing them vp among the hils and mounteins, that finallie constreined through famine, they submitted themselues vpon these conditions, that their head capteine with two hundred others of the chiefest, should yeeld themselues simplie to the kings mercie, and the residue to be licenced to depart againe into their countries.

The Iland-men yeeld themselues.

Those that were appointed to be deliuered to the king with their capteine, suffered death by sentence of the nobles and peeres of the realme. Whereat the other taking indignation, though they had alreadie yelded vp their weapons, yet began they to fall vpon the Scots with hurling of stones, and other such things as came to hand, till finallie they were beaten downe by the armed soldiers, and a great number of them slaine: the residue escaping as well as they might, fled into the mounteins. The Iland-men being thus vanquished, and the Romans attempting nothing against the Scotishmen or Picts, Ethodius visited all the parts of his realme, taking order for the due execution of iustice amongest his subiects.

Execution.

Ethodius visiteth his countries, to see iustice maintained.

And for that he would not spend his time in idlenesse, being now at rest from warres, he began to exercise himselfe in hunting, and for the better nourishing of game, he toke order that all such ordinances as had beene deuised by his elders, should streictlie be obserued and kept: as that no man should be so hardie to go about to destroie anie hares with nets, grens or hare-pipes: neither to kill them in their formes by anie meanes: nor after that they had beene once coursed and escaped, to follow the sute, to the intent to start them againe. Also that none should go about to kill anie hart or hind, during all the winter season, at what time they were accustomed for hunger to leaue the mounteins, forrests and woods, and to come downe into the fields and couerts, neere vnto the townes & houses.

He giueth himselfe to hunting, & causeth the lawes for the maintenance of game to be wel kept & loked vnto.

He ordeined moreouer thereunto, that no man should presume to kill anie hind-calues, detesting nothing more than to haue such game destroied, as serued for the exercise and solace of him and his nobles. The other vacant time, whilest he rested from hunting, he spent for the most part in hearing of musike, hauing diuerse cunning plaiers of sundrie kinds of instruments attending in his court. At length setting all his pleasure in hearing of a musician being borne in one of the west Iles, he was murthered by him in the night time within his owne chamber. The murtherer being apprehended, and examined vpon what occasion he did that heinous fact, for the which he had deserued the most extreme kind of punishment that might be deuised, he answered: that in reuenge of the death of such his kinsmen and friends as the king had caused to be executed in Argile, he purposed long before to do that deed, and now that he had accomplished his purpose, he was readie to receiue what kind of death they would adiudge him vnto. For sure I am of this, saith he, that how terrible soeuer my execution shall be, yet can it not bee so painfull, but that I shall reioise euen in the verie instant of my death, for that I haue in such notable sort reuenged the deaths of all my kinsmen & friends. Finallie by commandement of the magistrates he was drawne in peeces with wild horsses in most violent wise.

Ethodius murthered by a musician. 194 H.B.

Ethodius reigned 33 yeeres, vntill the latter daies of Caracalla the emperor. He was buried at Dunstafage, with all such pompous ceremonies as was accustomed about the interrement of kings in that age. In his daies Lucius the king of Britaine receiued the faith with a great part of his people, being the yeere after the birth of our Sauior, as the Scots chronicles haue 187, but after the British 177.

Septimus Seuerus, H.B.

Britaine receiued the christian faith in the yeere 187.

After the death of Ethodius, his brother Satrahell or Serrahell (as some write him) was chosen to succeed by the common consent and voices of all the estates of the realme. For although Ethodius left a sonne behind him; yet bicause he was verie yong in yeeres, he was thought insufficient to haue so great a charge as the rule of a kingdome committed vnto his hands. This Satrahell was subtile of nature, and a great dissembler, whose purpose was to defraud the issue of his brother Ethodius from atteining at anie time vnto the rule of the kingdome, and therefore to bring his purpose the better to passe, he found forged matter against all such as were familiar friends vnto Ethodius, thereby to put them vnto death. Neither dealt hee anie thing more sincerelie with a great number of other of his wealthie subiects, whose lands and goods hee onelie sought to inioy at his owne will. By means whereof such mischeefe insued through the realme, and such ciuill sedition dailie rose amongst the people, that pitie it was to behold it: the king being not so bold all the while, as once to shew his face abroad for redresse thereof, by reason he vnderstood well inough what hatred the people bare towards him, neither did his keeping within doores saue his life anie long time, for in the end his owne seruants found means to strangle him, and that before he had reigned full foure yeeres.

Satrahell.

Satrahell seeketh to destroy such as were in fauor with his predecessor.

Discord ariseth among the people through the kings misgouernment.

Satrahell strangled to death by his owne seruants.

397 HB.

Donald.

In his place succeeded his brother Donald, a prince of a farre contrarie nature and conditions, for he was free, courteous, and without all deceit, more righteous than rigorous, and afore all things desirous that peace and concord might prosper among his subiects. Neither bare he with offendors, but such as were disobedient against the lawes and wholsome ordinances of the realme he caused to be dulie punished: finallie he toke such order for reformation of things, that he reduced his subiects as it had beene from a wild and sauage rudenesse, vnto a perfect ciuill trade of humanitie. About the same time Lucius king of the Britains being dead, the Romans perceiuing that a kings authoritie among the Britains, did nothing else but diminish the maiestie of the imperiall iurisdiction amongst them, determined not to suffer any more of the British nation to inioy that title.

Donald studieth to reduce his subiects vnto all ciuilitie.

Lucius king of Britaine dieth.

This thing moued the Britains to such indignation, that by procurement of one Fulgentius, diuers of them rebelled, and chosing the same Fulgentius to their generall, they directed a messenger with letters vnto Donald king of the Scots, requiring him to ioine with them in league against their ancient enimies the Romans, whose endeuor (as he knew) had euer beene from time to time, how to bring the whole Iland vnder their subiection, and to extinguish all the nobilitie and ancient inhabitors of the same: adding furthermore, that if he would now put to his helping hand, the time neuer serued better for the dispatching of them wholie out of the Ile, considering the sundrie rebellions attempted as well by the people of Germanie and France, as also of the easterlie nations and countries.

The Britains rebell and chose one Fulgentius to their captein who sendeth for aid vnto the Scotishmen.

Donald receiued the messenger most friendlie, and being glad to vnderstand of these newes, he promised to aid Fulgentius with all the power he was able to make, and to meet him at such daie and place as he should afterward apoint. The like answer was made also by the king of Picts, vnto whome in semblable

Donald promiseth to aid Fulgentius.

The Britains come to Adrians wall, and pull it downe to let in the Scots.

The Scotiſh men & Picts come to the aid of the Britains.

The Scots and Picts inuade the Britains.

The Scots helpe the Britains to ſpoile their owne countrie.

Trebellius certifieth the emperor of the ſtate of Britaine.

Fulgentius incourageth the Britains to ſticke vnto their begun enterpriſe.

Seuerus ſetteth forth towards his enimies.

Seuerus commeth to Yorke.

Seuerus is incountred by his enimies.

ſemblable wiſe Fulgentius had directed his letters. Thus the Britains (being confirmed with hope of great aid from the Scots and Picts) aſſembling their hoſt togither, reſorted vnto the wall of Adrian, which they ouerthrew in diuers places, that their friends might haue the more free acceſſe and entrie vnto them by the ſame. Neither were the Scots and Picts ſlow for their part to make forward: ſo that they likewiſe comming thither, holpe to throw down that wall, and to fill vp the trench or ditch that went alongſt the ſame.

This done, ioining their powers togither, they paſſed forth towards Yorke, in hope to haue found the Romane lieutenant Trebellius within that citie and to haue beſieged him therein: but hauing knowledge how he was withdrawne into Kent, there to gather a power, they left their purpoſe of beſieging that citie, and fell to ſpoiling & harrieng of the countrie abroad on euerie ſide, conſtreining the moſt part of the people to come in and yéeld themſelues vnder their obeiſance. Thus they continued in paſſing from one quarter of the countrie to another, till winter inforced them to breake vp their campe, and to licence the ſouldiers to depart home into their countries, till they had new ſummons to aſſemble and meet againe.

In this meane time Trebellius certified the emperor Seuerus of all this trouble and rebellion in Britaine: wherevpon he with all ſpéed leuied an armie, & ſet forward with the ſame himſelfe in perſon toward Britaine, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainlie may appéere. At his comming into Britaine, he lacked no time, but aſſembling his power, prepared to go againſt the enimies. Fulgentius doubting the force of his enimie, ſent ambaſſadors vnto him to treat for peace, but Seuerus would not grant to anie, wherevpon Fulgentius confirmed the minds of the Britains with all comfortable words, in the beſt wiſe he could, exhorting them to ſticke to their neceſſarilie begun enterpriſe, for recouerie of their long wiſhed libertie, which he doubted not, but by vanquiſhing the emperor at that preſent they ſhould aſſuredlie atteine: and as for victorie, he was in no doubt, ſo that they would plucke their harts vnto them, and trie it forth manfullie by dint of ſword, like fellowes and brethren knit in one faithfull band of truſtie concord, conſidering the enimies armie being gathered of ſo manie ſundrie nations & languages that conſent in one opinion, the cheefeſt meane for the obteining of victorie muſt néeds be wanting among them.

The Britains moued herewith, promiſed him to liue and die in the quarrell. Wherevpon he tooke aduiſe with them, which waie to maintaine themſelues againſt Seuerus, of whoſe comming they were alreadie certified. For Seuerus hauing diſpatched the Britiſh ambaſſadors from him, ſet incontinentlie forward towards Yorke, leauing his yongeſt ſonne Geta in the ſouth parts to haue the gouernance of the ſame in his abſence. His eldeſt ſonne Antoninus he tooke with him in his iournie againſt his enimies. At his comming to Yorke, he did ſacrifice to the gods, according to the Ethniſh cuſtome, & alſo tooke aduiſe with his captains how to proceed in his enterpriſe againſt his enimies.

This done he marcheth forth with his armie towards them, who being alreadie ioined with the Scots and Picts, were determined to abide him, inſomuch that thoſe of the one ſide came no ſooner in ſight of the other, but that they haſted forth to ioine togither in battell, whereof inſued great ſlaughter betwixt them, though the Britiſh part (notwithſtanding their aid of Scots and Picts) were not able long to endure againſt the great multitude and practiſed ſkill of the Romane ſouldiers, ſo that in the end they were opened perforce and put to flight with the loſſe of thirtie thouſand, what of Britains, Scotiſhmen and Picts.

Fulgentius put to flight and his armie diſcomfited.

Fulgentius himſelfe, ſeeing the diſcomfiture and huge ſlaughter made of his people, had runne in amongſt the thickeſt preaſe of his enimies, had not thoſe that were about him led him awaie by force, and ſo at length he got him amongſt the troops of the Scotiſhmen and Picts, and togither with them paſſed ouer Tine, and ſo into the borders of his friends where he got togither ſuch ſouldiers as he could, that had eſcaped from the battell, and reteined them with wages ſo well as he might, in hope vpon occaſion to imploie them eftſoones againſt his enimies. The Scots alſo ſent into Ireland for aid, and the Picts into Denmarke and Norwaie. Such of the Britiſh nobilitie as fell into the hands of the Romans, Seuerus puniſhed moſt greeuouſlie, but the commons he vſed more gentlie, as it were making excuſe for them being procured thereto by their captains. After this, when winter was come, he appointed his men of warre to draw vnto places conuenient for them to lodge in, till the next ſpring. He himſelfe wintered at Yorke.

Fulgentius withdraweth into Pictland.

Seuerus wintereth at yorke.

In the next ſummer there was little done worthie to be ſpoken of, but that there were certeine ſkirmiſhes betwixt the Romans lieng on the borders, and the Scots and Picts, euer as occaſion ſerued, either of the parties to worke any exploit for their aduantage. But forſomuch as the Scots had no aid ſent them forth of Ireland, they were not minded to ieopard againe in a foughten field, ſuppoſing it ſufficient if they might defend their owne, though they gained nothing as then, conſidering the puiſſance that was readie bent againſt them. At length Seuerus fell ſicke at Yorke, and his ſon Antoninus lieng on the borders beyond Tine, cauſed the wall afore mentioned, diuiding the Britains from the Scots and Picts, to be repared. This wall was built (as is before recited) firſt by Adrian the emperor, to ſtaie the Scotiſhmen from inuading the lands aperteining to the ſubiects of the Romane empire, & after ouerthrowne in diuers places as well by Scots and Picts, as by the Britains, in ſort as before is partlie mentioned. Antoninus cauſed it to be fortified with baſtilions, one placed ſo néere to another, as trumpets being appointed in each of them, the ſound might be heard betwixt to warne one another vpon the firſt deſcrieng of the enimies approch.

Seuerus ſicketh. The wall is repaired.

Finallie Seuerus dieth, though not ſo ſoone as his ſon Antoninus wiſhed, in hope after him to atteine the imperiall dignitie. Concluding therefore a leage with the Scotiſhmen and Picts, and granting peace to Fulgentius, and other ſuch Britiſh rebels as were fled with him into Pictland, he receiued ſufficient pledges, and then returned towards London, where his mother with his brother Geta as then laie. Shortlie after both the brethren departed forth of the Ile, & went to Rome, as in the hiſtorie of England it appeareth. But now to returne vnto Donald the Scotiſh king, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that being deliuered of forren trouble, he ſtudied cheeflie how to preſerue his people in good peace and perfect tranquillitie. Which mind our Sauiour Chriſt the author of all peace and concord had giuen vnto him, being latelie afore conuerted vnto the true faith from his wicked paganiſme and heatheniſh idolatrie.

Seuerus dieth.

Antoninus in hope to be emperor concludeth a peace with the enimies.

Donald ſtudious to maintaine his ſubiects in peace and concord.

For as we find in Hector Boetius, in the daies of the aboue ſaid emperor Seuerus, he ſent a meſſenger with letters vnto pope Victor (Zepherinus ſaith Harriſon) being the 15 in number, as they ſaie, after ſaint Peter, declaring vnto him that he was fullie minded to receiue the chriſtian religion, and vtterlie to forſake the ſuperſtitious ſeruice of the heathenith gods, gods, and therefore inſtantlie required him to ſend ouer into Scotland ſome godlie learned men, to inſtruct him in the right beléefe. The pope hearing this, and being glad to increaſe the faith of Chriſt through all parts of the world, ſent with all ſpéed into Scotland ſuch well diſpoſed perſons as he thought moſt méet for that purpoſe, who at their arriuall there, did their endeuour in ſuch diligent ſort, that not onelie the king, but alſo through his example a great number of the nobilitie were baptiſed, and clérelie forſoke their former errors and idolatrie. This was in the yeare after the birth of our ſauiour 203, from the creation of the world 4170, & after the firſt erection of the Scotiſh kingdome 330, as W. Hariſon in his chronologie doth manifeſtlie confirme.

Donald conuerted vnto chriſtian beleefe in the daies of the emperor Seuerus.

The Scotiſh men receiued the faith in the yéere of our Sauiour 203. 5399. H.B. 533 H.B.

Moreouer this Donald was the firſt as the Scotiſh chronicles alledge, that cauſed ſiluer and gold to be coined in his realme. The ſtampe which he deuiſed for the ſame, was a croſſe on the one ſide, and his face on the other. Before that time the Scots vſed no coine, but either exchanged and bartered ware for ware, either elſe occupied with Britiſh and Romane monie, as diuers marble cheſts full of the ſame which haue béene found of late yéeres in ſundrie parts of Scotland do verie well witneſſe. Finallie K. Donald in the 21 yeare of his reigne departed out of this life, and was buried according to the maner of our chriſtian religion, without any heatheniſh ceremonies.

Donald departeth out of this world. 216 H.B.

Ethodius.

After him ſucceéded Ethodius the ſecond, and ſonne of the former Ethodius, which prince proued ſo verie a ſole, that the regiment of the realme was quite taken from him, and committed vnto certeine noble men, who being diuided into ſundrie quarters of the realme, toke verie good order for the due gouernment of the parties ſo to them limited, and vſed themſelues verie vprightlie in all their doings. As for cauſe of wars they had none, for Seuerus before his death had giuen ſuch order for the gouernement of the Britains, that they durſt not once ſtir by reaſon of ſuch pledges as were deliuered and conueied to Rome, which were the chéefeſt of all the Britiſh nobilitie. At length Ethodius being apt for nothing but to fill his cofers, as one though doltiſh, yet naturallie giuen to vnquenchable couetouſneſſe, was ſlaine by thoſe that were appointed to the gard of his perſon, in the 16 yeare of his reigne.

The gouernance of the realme committed to ſundrie noble men.

Ethodius being giuen to couetouſneſſe is ſlaine by his owne ſeruants.

Athirco.

Then was his ſonne Athirco elected by the generall voices of all the eſtates, who in the beginning of his reigne ſhewed himſelfe verie ſober, gentle, courteous, and friendlie of behauiour, exerciſing himſelfe in all laudable paſtimes conuenient for his eſtate, and herewith he was ſo frée and liberall towards all men, that he wan him wonderfull much praiſe and loue amongeſt his people. But theſe his noble vertues increaſed not in him togither with his age, but contrarilie decaied, in ſuch ſort, that after he had reigned eight yéeres, he was quite altered: in place of liberalitie, imbracing auarice: for courteſie and amiable countenance, he vſed ſterne and loftie lookes: for commendable exerciſes, he gaue himſelfe wholie to filthie pleaſures and ſenſuall luſts of the bodie: and ſuch as could further his purpoſe moſt in theſe his beaſtlie affections, he cheriſhed and had them moſt in eſtimation, not regarding at all the nobilitie of his realme, but was as readie to wrong them by vilanous iniurie, as he was anie other of the loweſt and meaneſt degrée.

Athirco changed in conditions from good to bad.

Athirco regardeth not his nobles.

It chanced that a noble man in Argile (being one of no ſmall authoritie amongſt the people of that countrie) named Natholocus, had two faire yong gentlewomen to his daughters: now the king being verie deſirous to ſatiſfie his luſt vpon them, forced them both the one after the other, and not ſo content, deliuered them afterwards to be abuſed in ſemblable ſort by his pages and ſeruants. The father vnderſtanding this vilanie done to his daughters, by their owne lamentable complaint, ſent for his friends, and opening vnto them the whole matter, he required their aſſiſtance. They being in a wonderfull furie to heare of ſuch an iniurie done to their bloud, promiſed in reuenge therof to ſpend life, lands & goods, and forthwith departing in ſunder, they prepared themſelues to aſſemble their powers, procuring a great number of other noble men to ioine with them in ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe, as to rid the countrie of ſuch a catiſe wretch, reſpecting nothing but the ſatiſfieng of his filthie carnall luſts, and the accompliſhment of his moſt beaſtlie appetites.

The vilanous act of Athirco in abuſing a noble mans daughters.

The kinſmen and friends of the gentlewomen conſpire againſt Athirco.

When they were once got togither in a companie, they marched forth towards Dunſtafage, where they vnderſtood that the king as then did ſoiourne, a great multitude of people ſtill reſorting vnto them by the waie, after it was once knowne whereabout they went. Athirco hearing of their approch, called togither his power, ſuppoſing at the firſt to haue beaten downe his enimies; but when he had throughlie weied the matter, and conſidered of what force and power they were, & how féeble his part was through want of good wils in his people, he priuilie ſtole awaie from them, and would haue paſſed ouer into Ila, one of the weſterne Iles, to haue procured ſome ſuccor there, but being imbarked and ſet from the ſhore, he was by contrarie winds driuen backe againe to land, where doubting to come into his enimies hands, he choſe rather to ſlea himſelfe, and ſo ended his wretched life in ſuch miſerable extremitie after he had reigned the ſpace of 12 yéeres. His reigne continued till the daies of the emperor Gordian the third, or (as others ſaie) till the time of the emperor Valerian. But as William Hariſon hath gathered, he reigned in the daies of the emperor Aurelius Claudius. Doorus the brother of Athirco vnderſtanding of the death of his brother, diſguiſed himſelfe in beggers weed for doubt of death, and went into Pictland with three of his nephues, ſonnes to the ſame Athirco, whoſe names were Sindocke, Carance, and Donald.

Athirco doubting to be forſaken of his owne men if it came to the triall of battel conueied himſelfe from among them. Athirco ſlaeth himſelfe.

242 H.B.

Doorus the brother of Athirco conueieth himſelf out of the way

Howbeit, Natholocus hauing knowledge whither he was fled, ſent forth certeine of his ſeruants, with commandement to ſearch him out, commanding furthermore verie ſtreitlie, that if they found him, they ſhould diſpatch him out of life, for feare of further miſchéefe. But they that were ſent, finding one in all features and proportion of bodie reſembling Doorus, ſlue the one in ſtead of the other, and ſo returning home to their maiſter, they made him verie ioifull of the newes, although indéed they came not néere to Doorus. Then Natholocus cauſing the eſtates of the realme to aſſemble, he handled the matter in ſuch wiſe, by diſſuading them to chooſe any of Athircos bloud to reigne ouer them (for doubt leaſt they ſhould ſéeke any meanes how to reuenge his death) that in the end this Natholocus was elected himſelfe, more by force than by anie common conſent of the nobles: for diuers of them doubting the craftie nature, which they knew to be in him, wiſhed rather that the iſſue of Athirco (hauing deſerued nothing why to be defrauded of the kingdom, ſaue onlie in reſpect of the fathers offenſes) might haue inioied that which of right they ought to haue had, that is, either one of them to be king, or elſe ſome néere kinſman of theirs to reigne as king, till the eldeſt of them might come to ſufficient yeares to beare the rule himſelfe.

Natholocus ſéeketh the life of Doorus.

Natholocus is choſen to be king.

But Natholocus being once proclamed king by the multitude, and Athircos bloud attainted of treaſon, Natholocus.

Matholocus goeth vnto Dunſtafage to be inthronized.

treaſon, and ſo publiſhed, according the cuſtome he toke the othes of thoſe that were preſent, and then repaired vnto Dunſtafage, there to be inueſted according to the maner. This done, he called ſuch aſide as he ſuſpected, and talking with them alone, he erhorted them to be faithfull, promiſing to be their aſſured good lord and maiſter, and for an earneſt thereof, he gaue vnto diuerſe of them verie great rewards. Generallie vnto all men he ſhewed himſelfe verie gentle and tractable, thereby to win their loues, for the better eſtabliſhment of his new atchiued eſtate: and hereto he imploied ſuch riches as the former kings had heaped togither amongſt the nobles, ſtudieng by all meanes to auoid all ſeditious quarels and ſecret diſcords amongſt them.

Matholocus ſeeketh to procure loue of the nobilitie through dides.

Thus ruling the realme at his will for certeine yéres, at length fortune began to ſhew a change of countenance after hir old accuſtomed guiſe. For Doorus the brother of Athirco (whome, as ye haue heard, Matholocus ſuppoſed to haue béene dead) wrote certeine letters, ſignifieng his owne eſtate with the welfare of his nephues the children of Athirco vnto certeine Scotiſh lords, whom he knew to fauour his cauſe. Which letters he deliuered vnto a Pictiſh woman, appointing hir how and to whome ſhe ſhould deliuer the ſame, but the woman apprehended by the waie, and brought vnto Matholocus, he cauſed hir ſecretlie to be ſacked and throwne into a riuer. Afterwards ſending for ſuch of the nobles as the direction of the forſaid letters had giuen him occaſion to haue in ſome ſuſpicion, he committed them firſt to priſon, and at length cauſed them to be ſecretlie ſtrangled.

Fortune fauoring Matholocus for a time began to change.

Doorus writeth vnto certeine Scotiſh lords to moue them to rebellion.

Matholocus putteth ſuch to death as he ſuſpecteth to fauour Doorus.

Which wicked déed being once notified abroad, ſo moued the harts of their friends and alies, that they procured the people to rebell: and ſo gathering them togither, they raiſed open and cruell warres againſt him. Matholocus informed of their determinations, withdrew himſelfe priuilie into Murrey land, there to get togither an armie to reſiſt his enimies, and for that he was deſirous alſo to vnderſtand ſomwhat of the iſſue of this trouble, he ſent one of his truſtie ſeruants, being a gentleman of that countrie, vnto a woman that dwelt in the Ile of Colmekill (otherwiſe called Iona) eſtéemed verie ſkilfull in foreſhewing of things to come, to learne of hir what fortune ſhould hap of this warre, which was alreadie begun.

Matholocus ſendeth vnto a witch to know the concluſion of his enimies attempts.

The witch conſulting with hir ſpirits, declared in the end how it ſhould come ſhortlie to paſſe, that the king ſhould be murthered, not by his open enimies, but by the hands of one of his moſt familiar friends, in whome he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt. The meſſenger demanding by whoſe hands that ſhould be: Euen by thine faith ſhe, as it ſhall be well knowen within theſe few daies. The gentleman hearing theſe words, railed againſt hir verie bitterlie, bidding hir go like an old witch; for he truſted to ſée hir burnt before he ſhould commit ſo villanous a déed. And departing from hir, he went by and by to ſignifie what anſwere he had receiued; but before he came where the king lay, his mind was altered, ſo that what for doubt on the one ſide, that if he ſhould declare the trueth as it was told him, the king might haplie conceiue ſome great ſuſpicion, that it ſhould follow by his means as ſhe had declared, and thereupon put him to death firſt; and for feare on the other ſide, that if he kéepe it ſecret, it might happen to be reuealed by ſome other, and then he to run in as much danger of life as before; he determined with himſelfe to worke the ſureſt way, and ſo comming to the king, he was led aſide by him into his priuie chamber, where all other being cõmanded to auoid, he declared how he had ſped; and then falling forth-what happened by giuing credit to the words of a witch.

The witches anſwere.

with vpon Matholocus, with his dagger he ſlue him outright, and threw his bodie into a priuie; and afterwards getting out by a backe doore, and taking his horſſe which he had there readie, he fled with all ſpéed vnto the campe of the conſpirators, and was the firſt that brought news vnto them of this act thus by him atchiued. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 280, & in the eleuenth yeare after the firſt entring of Matholocus into the eſtate.

Matholocus murthered.

252. H. B.

After Matholocus was thus diſpatched, the péeres aſſembled togither to ordeine one for gouernement of the realme, where in the end it was amongeſt them concluded, that the ſonnes of Athirco ſhould be ſent for into Pictland, and Findocke receiued for king. The Morauian that ſlue Matholocus was appointed to fetch them, who (according to his commiſſion) comming into Pictland, conueied them right honorablie into Argile, where Findocke being alreadie choſen king, was placed on the ſtone of marble, with all the ceremonies in that caſe aperteining.

The lords of the realme aſſemble togither to chuſe a new king.

The ſonnes of Athirco are ſent for, and the eldeſt of them named Findocke choſen to reigne.

Findócke.

THis Findocke was in the flower of his age, of perſon moſt beautifull, cleane made, & of a goodlie ſtature; wherewith were ioined moſt excellent gifts of the mind, not ſo much deſirous to ſéeme as to be vertuous in déed. He was courteous, méeke, & full of affabilitie, ſtudieng alwaies to win friendſhip and loue, rather by gentleneſſe, than by feare and menacing words. The leagues with the Britains, Picts and Romans he firmelie obſerued. But as peace with forraine enimies breedeth oftentimes ciuill diſcord at home, ſo came it then to paſſe with him at this preſent: for one Donald of the Iles, a noble man borne, came ouer with an armie into Roſſe and Murrey land, fetching from thence a great ſpoile and bootie, not without great ſlaughter of ſuch as inforced themſelues for to reſiſt him. The occaſion as he pretended was to reuenge the death of Matholocus. But Findocke vnderſtanding his doings, prepared an armie with ſhips, and ſailed ouer with the ſame into the Ile of Ila, where incountring with Donald and other his enimies, he vanquiſhed and chaſed them egerlie, without returning once backe, till either the ſword or the ſea had made an end of them all.

Findocke his noble qualities and vertuous diſpoſition.

Findocke obſerueth the leagues confirmed of former times with his neighbors.

Thoſe of the out Iles inuade the countries of Roſſe and Murrey land.

Findocke maketh a iournie into the Iles, to ſubdue the rebels.

Donald himſelfe taking a bote, in hope to haue eſcaped, the preaſe was ſuch at his entring into the ſame, that before they could get it off from the ſhore, it ſunke by means of the ouerlading, and ſo he and all they that were on board were drowned therewithall. The king hauing atchiued this victorie, returned into Albanie; but the Iland-men not fullie quieted with this ſlaughter of their fellows, ſent ouer into Ireland, and got from thence certeine Kerns, who vnder the leading of an other Donald, the ſonne of the former Donald, made ſtarts now and then into Argile and Cantire, doing manie ſhrewd turnes in the ſame, yer they could be ſuppreſſed. But Findocke being ſone informed of theſe tidings, went ouer againe into the Iles, and ſuch of his enimies as he found, he cauſed to be hanged, to giue other example what to looke for when they ſhould rebell, but Donald eſcaped, and got ouer into Ireland, where he remained, till he heard that the king was returned backe into Albanie, and then he came againe. But perceiuing himſelfe not able to worke ſuch feats as he hoped to haue done, he ſent a meſſenger vnto the king, offering to yéeld himſelfe, and to become his true ſubiect if he might get his pardon, and be at his owne libertie. But being anſwered that he ſhould not be receiued, vnleſſe he would come vnto Dunſtafage with other of his chiefeſt complices, and to ſtand fullie at the kings mercie; he refuſed thus to do, deuiſing an other meane

Donald is drowned.

The Iland-men with aid of the Iriſh Kerns, make often inuaſions into Argile, and other of the Scotiſh countries.

Findocke goeth againe to ſubdue the rebels of the Iles.

Donald offereth to yéeld himſelfe vpon certeins conditions, but is not receiued.

Donald deuiseth how to murther king Findocke by two naughtie persons.

meane how to be reuenged.

Therefore to begin withall, he procured two naughtie persons to go ouer into Albaine, and to feine themselues to haue fled from him, where also he willed them to offer their seruice vnto the king, and to disclose vnto him certeine light secrets of the said Donalds, thereby to win credit if it might be, and in the end to espie a time to rid him out of the way. These craftie mates working according to Donalds wicked instructions, at length with much adoo they got credit, and after credit they got place so neere the king by the furtherance of Carantius the kings brother (whome they made priuie also vnto their intent) that finding all things correspondent vnto their purpose (one day as the king hunted) the one began to feed him with a tale of the hatred which the Ilanders bare towards him, whereto he gaue verie good eare, whilest the other smote him to the heart with a taueline, & so leauing the iron sticking in his bodie, he fled away in hast with his traitorous companion and fellow. Those that were neere, seeing what had happened, some of them ran to him, to see if they might relieue him as then strugling with the pangs of death; others followed the murtherers, and ouertaking them, brought them backe to receiue their meed according to that which they had iustlie deserued; being also examined, they confessed how they were procured vnto it, not onelie by Donald of the Iles, but also by Carantius the kings owne brother, who of set purpose being out of the way at that present, and hauing knowledge that he was accused of the kings death, fled out of the countrie as a banished man, first into Britaine, from whence (after he had remained there for a time) he went vnto Rome, and seruing in the wars vnder the emperours, Aurelius Probus, Carus, and Diocletianus, he became a right famous and a verie skilfull captеine.

Findocke is slaine.

The murtherers confesse by whose procurement they did the deed.

A pretie induction (if not forged) to the historie that afterwards followeth of Carausius or Carantius as the Scots write him.

But if this report be true that Carausius (of whom Eutropius maketh mention) were descended of so high parentage, maruell it is, that neither the same Eutropius, nor anie other of the Romane writers, could at no time come to the knowledge thereof, which if they had done, no doubt they would haue spoken somewhat of the same; for although he might happilie vpon the consideration aforesaid counterfeit himselfe to be borne of some base kinred, and so for a time to dissemble what he was, yet afterwards that he atteined vnto so high degree of honour, as to vsurpe the imperiall robes of purpure, and to possesse the dominion of Britaine, it is not like but that to aduance his credit and authoritie rotall, he would haue set forth to the vttermost the nobilitie of his birth, if he had bene come of anie, and that so apparantlie to the world, that aswell his enimies as friends should both haue knowen and spoken of it.

Donald. Findocus being thus slaine in the tenth yeare of his reigne, and buried with great lamentation of the people at Dunstafage, his brother Donald, the third son to Athirco, was admitted to the kingdome, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the estate, prepared to go into the Iles against Donald that common enimie of Scotland. But this Donald himselfe deliuered the king of a great peece of that trauell: for so soone as he heard that the murther by him contriued was executed, he assembled a mightie power of the Iland-men, and transporting with them ouer into Rosse, proclamed himselfe king, persecuting with fire and sword all such as denied him obedience. King Donald being aduertised of that attempt of his aduersarie, spedilie marcheth forth with such power as he had alreadie assembled, sending proclamations abroad, that all other appointed to serue, should follow him with speed.

Donald of the Iles inuadeth Scotland.

Thus comming into Murrey land, he pitched downe his tents, purposing there to abide the comming of the residue of his armie. But Donald of the Iles vnderstanding all his demeanour and whole intention, thought it best to assaile him within his campe, before all his power should come vnto him, and being thus resolued, he set forward in the night time, and was vpon his enimies, before that his comming towards them was once signified in their campe. The king then vnderstanding his aduersaries to be at hand, bringeth forth his men, setteth them in arraie, and exhorteth them with manie pithie words to receiue their enimies with manlie stomachs. But the Iland-men incouraged also by their capteine, gaue the onset so roundlie, that the Scotishmen had not leasure to occupie their shot, but were inforced euen at the first to ioine at hand-blowes, which were bestowed in such furious sort, that in the end the Scots being oppressed with multitude, were constreined to giue backe, some sauing themselues by flight, and some standing at defense till they were beaten downe and killed in the place. There were slaine on the kings part three thousand men, and two thousand taken prisoners; amongest whome were thirtie personages of honorable estate, togither with the king himselfe being wounded so sore, that he died within three daies after the battell, rather through anguish of mind than of his hurts (as some haue written) in the same yeare that he began his reigne. Donald of the Iles hauing thus got the victorie, toke vpon him as king, accordinglie as he had caused himselfe at the first to be proclamed.

Donald of the Iles suddenlie setteth vpon the enimies.

The Scots ouerthrowen

Donald dyeth this world.

Donald of the Iles taketh vpon him as king.

Donald.

But because he came to the estate thus by bloud, he continued still in doubt and feare of new conspiracies, being guiltie in conscience of his wrongfull vsurpation. Those prisoners also, which he had taken in the battell, he kept in perpetuall captiuitie, menacing them present death, if anie of their friends and allies attempted anie stirre against him. Moreouer he nourished priuie factions amongest the nobilitie, supposing thereby that their powers would be the more feeble in anie publike exploit that was to be moued against him; finallie, if anie mischiefe happened amongest them, he caused the matter thoroughlie to be loked vpon, but with such regard that he alwaies inriched his owne cofers with the forfeitures and penalties which he toke vp amongst them. He seldome times went abroad, and when he stirred forth anie whither, he had his gard about him, appointed with weapons in warlike sort for dout of treason. He aduanced diuers of base condition to great wealth and honor, and behaued himselfe so in sundrie sorts with his mistrustfull crueltie, that manie there were which dread him, and but a few that loued him, so that in the end being in a maner run into the deadlie hatred of all men, he was murthered one night at Enuerlochthe (whither he was come to haue passed ouer into the Iles) by certeine that had conspired his death in the twelfth yeare of his reigne.

A guiltie conscience.

Donald of the Iles is murthered. Anno Christi. 273. H.B.

The chiefe of the conspirators was one Crathlint the sonne of king Findocke, who immediatlie after the deed done, conueied himselfe secretlie out of the chamber, and repairing vnto certeine nobles and gentlemen inhabiting neere hand in the countrie, he declared vnto them the whole matter, exhorting them to aid him, in reuenging the iniuries done not onelie to them priuatlie, as he knew verie well; but also to the whole state of the Scotish common welth, by the naughtie suggestion of diuerse of the kings complices, who as yet vnderstood nothing of their maisters death, but were all quiet in their beds, as men suspecting nothing lesse than that which was now

Crathlint chiefe conspirator to the murthering of Donald.

Crathlint procureth the nobles of the countrie to oppresse the seruants of king Donald.

now happened.

The gentlemen hearing the newes, and reioising greatlie thereat, got them to their weapons, and earlie in the verie dawning of the day, comming vpon the kings houshold meanie, they slue aboue two hundred of them in the place where they lodged, the residue escaping forth of the house, and thinking to saue themselues, were beaten downe in the countrie as they passed by the people, who bare so deadlie and mortall hatred vnto the late king, that they not onelie reioised much at his death, but thought themselues sufficientlie reuenged, when they could kill anie that did belong vnto him.

Crathlint

After this, Crathlint being certeinelie knowne to be the sonne of king Findocke, by such euident tokens as were shewed by him that brought him vp, was (partlie in respect of his iust title, and partlie for consideration of his good seruice in deliuering his countrie of so detestable a tyrant) aduanced to the gouernement of the kingdome, by consent of all the estates, and so being confirmed king, he persuaded the people that all the linage of the late tyrant Donald might be plucked vp, euen as it were a tree by the roots, least anie of them happilie remaining aliue, should find meanes afterwards to disturbe the common-wealth. The people consented lightlie herevnto, as they that beside the mortall hate which they bare towards Donald, were now suddenlie in loue with Crathlint, not onelie for his wit and other qualities of the mind, but also by reason of his comelie personage and passing beautie, setting forth all his doings greatlie to his high praise and commendation.

Crathlint is made king.

The kinsmen and friends of Donald of the Iles are persecuted.

The issue therefore with other the kinsmen and allies of Donald were sought for, and those that were found, without anie difference or respect of age or ser, were cruellie put to death. Which done, Crathlint appointed forth iudges and other administrators of iustice to see the lawes executed, and the countries gouerned in good and quiet order, euerie man being assigned to his owne proper circuit. These he chose out of the most ancient peeres and barons of his realme. The yonger sort he reserued to attend vpon his person.

The politike gouernment of Crathlint.

When he had taken direction in this wise for the rule of his kingdome, he went vp into the mounteins of Granzebene, there to passe the time for a while in hunting the hart, and other wild beasts, whither came vnto him ambassadors from Thelargus king of the Picts, declaring the ioy which their maister had conceiued for the slaughter of Donald, and the restoring of the right blod againe vnto the estate, requiring that the ancient league betwixt the Picts and Scotishmen might be once againe renewed. Crathlint receiued these ambassadors most ioifullie, giuing them heartie thanks on the behalfe of their maister for this signification of his good will shewed by their comming, and herewith promised, that during his life he would gladlie obserue the old ancient amitie established betwixt the two nations: according to the tenor of the old league. Moreouer, when the said ambassadors should depart, he toke vnto them to deliuer from him as a present vnto their maister certeine horses, with hounds and greihounds, such as he thought that king Thelargus wanted.

Crathlint goeth to hunt in the mounteins of Granzebene, ancientlie called Grampeus mons.

An ambassage from the Picts.

The Picts require the league to be renewed.

Crathlint promiseth to obserue the ancient amitie betwixt the Scotishmen and Picts.

The present sent by Crathlint vnto the king of the Picts.

And shortlie after the returne of these ambassadors into their countrie, diuerse yong gentlemen of the Pictish nobilitie repaired vnto king Crathlint, to hunt and make merie with him: but when they should depart homewards, perceiuing that the Scotish dogs did farre excell theirs, both in fairnesse, swiftnesse, hardinesse, and also in long standing vp and holding out, they got diuerse both dogs and bitches of the best kinds for breed to be giuen them by the Scotish lords, and yet not so contented, they stale one belonging to the king from his keeper, being more esteemed of him than all the other which he had about him. The maister of the leash being informed hereof, pursued after them which had stolen that dog, thinking in deed to haue taken him from them, but they not willing to depart with him, fell at altercation, and in the end chanced to strike the maister of the leash through with their borespeares that he died presentlie, whereupon a noise and crie being raised in the countrie by his seruants, diuerse of the Scots as they were going home from hunting, returned; and falling vpon the Picts to reuenge the death of their fellow, there insued a shrewd bickering betwixt them, so that of the Scots there died threescore gentlemen, besides a great number of the commons, not one of them vnderstanding (till all was done) what the matter ment. Of the Picts there were about an hundred slaine.

Diuers Pictish lords come to Crathlint to hunt and make merie with him.

A praise of the Scotish dogs.

The Picts steale one of the kings best greihounds.

The Scots & Picts fight for a greihound.

What mischiefe insued vpon so light an occasion as the stealing of a dog.

This chanced about the yere of Christ 288, as Io. Ma. noteth.

The kinsmen and friends of the Scots that were thus slaine, were wonderfullie moued with the iniurie committed, insomuch that without commandement of king or capteine, they assembled in great numbers togither, and entring into the Pictish confines, they began to rob, spoile and kill after the maner of warre, wherewith the Picts being set in a rage, came forth togither into the field, and incountering with the Scots, there was fought a sore battell betwixt them, without capteine, order, or standard, till at length the victorie remained with the Picts, of whom were slaine notwithstanding the day went on their sides, about two thousand men, but of the Scots there died aboue three thousand, or more, as was supposed. Thus vpon a light occasion was the league broken betwixt these two nations, who had continued as friends, the one still readie to aid the other, euer sith the daies of king Reutha, being the 7 in number that reigned after Fergus.

The Scots rob the Pictish borders.

The Scots & Picts incounter in battell.

The Scots discomfited by the Picts.

Of what continuance the league was betwixt the Scots and Picts, & how broken about a small matter as begun about a dog.

These two nations being thus fallen at debate, it was wonder to vnderstand with what cruelti the one sought to destroie the other. No pitie might moue their cruell harts to spare either man, woman or child that fell into their hands: such was their inordinate and like desire which they had to shed each others bloud. At last Thelargus K. of the Picts being a verie aged man, and perceiuing what mischiefe was happened through the follie of a few wilfull persons, appointed certeine of his counsell to go as ambassadors vnto king Crathlint, to find some means to haue the matter taken vp, for the auoiding of the imminent danger that was like to insue to both nations. They according to their instructions comming to the place where Crathlint as then soiourned, had much adoo to get licence to come vnto his presence: but at length being admitted, they vsed such humble persuasions grounded vpon reasonable considerations, that although no peace could be fullie concluded, yet a truce was granted them for three moneths space, which was but fortlie obserued, for deadly hatred and inward desire of reuenge was entred so farre into the breasts of the commons on both sides, that neither commandement nor punishment might stale them from the inuading of one anothers confines, mauger their princes and all their sore restraints.

Cruell wars

Thelargus king of the Picts being an aged man, desireth to haue peace, and therevpon sendeth his ambassadors vnto Crathlint.

A truce granted.

In this meane time was the estate of the Romane empire in Britaine brought into trouble by Carantius, of whome a little before mention hath beene made. Eutropius nameth him Carausius: he would not be acknowne at his comming to Rome of what linage he was descended, and so he was reputed to come of some base stocke, but yet through his worthie seruice in the warres, he attained vnto great great honor, and was appointed by Diocleſian to haue the ſouereigne regard ouer the coaſts of the French ocean, to defend the ſame from pirats of the Saxons and other Germans, that ſore moleſted the ſame in thoſe daies. But for that he vſed to ſuffer thoſe rouers to take ſpoiles and priſes, to the end he might in their returne take the ſame from them againe, and conuert the gaine wholie to his owne vſe, without reſtoring that which was due to the owners, or ſending anie portion thereof to the Romane emperor, he was complained vpon, and ſent for: but for that he doubted to come to his anſwer, as one which knew himſelfe guiltie, he furniſhed his nauie with men, victels and ordinance, and with the ſame toke his courſe about the weſt parts of Britaine, and landed in Weſtmerland, where he eaſilie procured the people there to ſubmit themſelues to be vnder his rule and obeiſance, and promiſed to deliuer them from the grieuous yoke and bondage of the Romans.

Carantius named by Eutropius Carausius, troubleth the estate of Britaine.

The wilie practiſe of Carantius.

Carantius fereth to come to make anſwer to ſuch matters as he was charged with.

Carantius reuolting cõmeth into weſtmerland, & cauſeth the people there to take his part againſt the Romans.

Thus hauing begun the foundation of that which he purpoſed to atchiue, for his further aduancement therein, he ſent ambaſſadors vnto his nephue king Crathlint, both declaring what he was, and alſo excuſing the treſpaſſe ſurmiſed againſt him, for being of counſell touching the murther of his brother Findocke, father to the ſame Crathlint: and therefore if in putting away all miſtruſt of his innocencie in that behalfe, he would aid him againſt the Romans, he doubted not but that he ſhould in ſhort time vtterlie expell them out of all Britaine, and enioy all thoſe prouinces within the ſame (which as then they poſſeſſed) vnto his owne vſe, and this he ſaid ſhould be more honor and gaine both to the Scotiſhmen & Picts, if they could be contented to renew friendſhip, and ioine with them in aid againſt their common enimies, than to ſeeke to deſtroie one another, as he latelie vnderſtood they had done for a dog.

Carantius ſendeth meſſengers vnto king Crathlint, in excuſing his fault for his brother Findocks death.

Carantius requireth to be aided againſt the Romans.

Crathlint hearing the words of theſe ambaſſadors, reioiſed not a little, that his vncle Carantius was not onelie aliue, but alſo had through his valiancie atchiued ſo high renowme as to be accounted one of the worthieſt warriors amongſt all the Romane capteins. And herevpon with good aduiſe he determined to aid him in that his enterpriſe for the conqueſt of Britaine to the vttermoſt of his power. Adding further, that if it were not for the warres which he doubted to haue with the Picts, he would not onlie ſend him aid of men, but alſo come with them himſelfe: and hereof he aſſured the ambaſſadors both by word of mouth and letters. Who returning with ſuch anſwer vnto their maiſter Carantius, he reioiſed not a litle, to vnderſtand how well they had ſped, and ſo much the more, for that he receiued about the ſame time the like anſwer from the king of Picts.

Crathlint reioiſeth to hear that Carantius was aliue.

Crathlint reſolueth to aid Carantius, & certifieth him of the ſame.

The king of the Picts alſo promiſeth to aid Carantius.

Shortlie after he came to an interuiew with the king of Scots at the water of Eſke, where after he had purged himſelfe with manie words of excuſe, touching the murther of his brother Findocke, there was an aſſured friendſhip concluded betwixt them. And at the motion of Carantius, Crathlint was contented to come to a communication with the king of Picts, for the concluſion of a peace, to the intent that both of them might ioine their powers togither, in aid of Carantius againſt the Romans. At this communication both the kings met, and Carantius likewiſe was there, as a man indifferent betwixt them both, to do what he could to linke them both in amitie. And verelie his preſence thereunto ſtood ſo much in ſtead, that chieflie through his perſuaſion grounded vpon great reaſons and weightie conſiderations, they agreed to conclude a peace, and to renew the old league in ſuch maner and forme, and with ſuch conditions, as ſhould be thought requiſite by the aduiſe and diſcreet order of eight ancient perſons: foure to be choſen on the one part, and foure on the other. Which eight perſons taking the matter in hand, did ſo aduiſedlie giue order for the auoiding of all cauſes of grudge and hatred, that both parts held them ſatiſfied with their arbitrement and direction, ſo that a ioifull peace was confirmed, and all variance vtterlie quenched.

Crathlint and the king of the Picts come to a communication by Carantius his meanes, who trauelleth to ſet them at one

Peace confirmed againe betwixt the Scotiſhmen and Picts.

In this meane time Quintus Baſſianus the Romane lieutenant in Britaine, vnderſtanding how Carantius was thus reuolted, and had not onelie cauſed them of Weſtmerland to rebell, but alſo ſlaine and chaſed the Romans out of that countrie, he was not a little diſquieted, and determined with all ſpeed to go againſt him, and to reuenge theſe iniuries. Within a few daies after, hauing his armie readie, he entered into Weſtmerland: but hearing that his enimies were alreadie come to Yorke, and had woone the citie by ſurrender, he turned his force thitherward, in purpoſe to fight with them, though he vnderſtood they were in three great battels, as the Scots in one, the Picts in another, and thoſe of Carantius retinue in the third. He lodged that night within a verie ſtrong place, ſenſed about with mariſhes.

Quintus Baſſianus entreth into weſtmerland, but hearing that his enimies were at Yorke he turneth thitherwards.

But Carantius vnderſtanding all the maner of his enimies by his eſpials, and being in campe within ten miles of them or thereabout, in the ſame night he raiſed his field without anie great brute, and by the leading of certeine guides he marched ſtreight toward the place where Baſſianus was incamped, ſo that anon after the ſpring of the day he came thither: whereof Baſſianus being aduertiſed, and perceiuing he ſhould haue battell, maketh readie for the ſame, giuing the beſt exhortation he could vnto his people to plaie the men: but forſomuch as the moſt part of his armie were Britains, all his words nothing auailed: for they deſirous to ſee the vtter ruine of all the Romane power, euen at the verie point when the battels ſhould haue ioined, withdrew themſelues apart without anie ſtroke ſtriken, and got them vp into the next mounteins, to ſee what would inſue. The reſidue of the Romane armie, ſeeing themſelues thus forſaken of their fellowes, and their ſides left bare and open for the enimie to enter vpon them, fell to plaine running away, but by reaſon of the mariſh ground compaſſing them in on each ſide, ſerving well to purpoſe for the Scots, and other the confederates, a great number of the Romans, and other of their part were ouertaken and ſlaine. Amongſt whome Baſſianus himſelfe was one, and Hircius the emperors procurator an other.

The Britains betray the Romans.

The Romans are diſcõfited

The ſlaughter of the Romans.

The Britains (who as is ſaid refuſed to fight in the beginning of the battell) yeelded themſelues vnto Carantius, and ſware to be his true liege men and ſubiects. In like maner Carantius appointed all ſuch of the nobilitie as were betwixt twentie yeares and threeſcore, to remaine with him in hoſtage: but the ſpoile of the field he diuided amongſt his people equallie, ſo that as well the Scotiſhmen and Picts, as alſo his owne ſouldiers held them well contented and ſatiſfied therewith. After this victorie Carantius cauſed himſelfe to be proclamed king of Britaine, vſurping the gouernment therof wholie to himſelfe, and reteining two thouſand of the Scots and Picts to attend vpon the ſafegard of his perſon, ſent the reſidue home laden with riches of the enimies ſpoile. He ſent alſo with them his ambaſſadors, to render thanks vnto both the kings for their aid in this ſo proſperous a victorie, aſſigning vnto them as a portion of the conqueſt, the countries of Weſtmerland and Cumberland, with all that region which lay betwixt Adrians wall, and the citie of Yorke, to inioy as their owne proper patrimonie for

The Britains yeeld themſelues vnto Carantius.

Carantius or Caraulius, as Eutropius nameth him, vſurpeth the kingdome of Britaine.

Carantius hauing got the victorie, diuideth the gaine in aſſigning to his cõfederats their due portions.

322. H.B.
5490. H.B.
655. H.B.
First of Constantine. H.B.

for euermore. Finallie the ſaid Carantius was ſlaine by his companion Alectus, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie ye may find more at large.

After this, Crathlint king of Scots deliuered from troubles againſt the Romans, deuiſed ſundrie good ordinances for the quiet ſtate of the Scotiſh common-wealth, cauſing the peace to be diligentlie obſerued betwixt him and the Picts. Also in his daies the perſecution of the chriſtians chanced, which the emperour Diocleſian commanded to be executed in moſt furious wiſe, ſo that there were few partes of the world (where anie chriſtians were knowne to inhabit) that taſted not of that his cruell ordinance and ſcourge in that behalfe. In Britaine alſo, as well as in other places, there was no ſmall quantitie of innocent bloud ſhed, with moſt vnmercifull murther committed, to the great triumph of Chriſts croſſe, that glorious enſigne of our religion.

The perſecution of the chriſtians by Diocleſian.

In which time Conſtantius Chlorus father to Conſtantine the great, was reſident in Britaine, who adiudging the Scots to be a people wholie giuen to pillage and ſlaughter, as they were in deed, determined with himſelfe to haue brought them to ſubiection. But yet he could atchiue any notable enterpriſe, he died, leauing behind him the fame of a right gentle and worthie prince, ſauing that in one point he ſore ſtained his honor, for that he was one of the chiefe that perſecuted the chriſtian flocke vnder Diocleſian, forcing no ſmall number of the faithfull amongſt the Britains, to flee vnto the Scots and Picts to auoid his perſecution. Whome Crathlint receiued for his part moſt louinglie, and aſſigned vnto them (as the Scots ſay) the Ile of Man for a place of habitation, deſtroieng all ſuch temples of the heathens religion belonging to the Druides, which had continued there ſince the begining; and vterlie abolished all the ſuperſtitious rites and cuſtomes of the ſame Druides, with their whole order and brotherhod. He erected a temple there, which he dedicated vnto Jeſus Chriſt our ſauiour, wherein the chriſtians might celebrate their diuine ſeruice, according to their profeſſion. This church being richlie indowed, was the firſt biſhops ſee amongſt the Scots, and thereupon was taken for the mother church of the realme. It is now called the church of ſaint Sauiour. Finallie Crathlint departed out of this life, after he had reigned 24 yeres, being much praiſed aſwell for his politike gouernment, as for his great and earneſt zeale which he bare toward the aduancement of the true chriſtian religion.

Conſtantius perſecuteth the chriſtians.

Manie of the Britains flee to the Scots to auoid perſecution.

Crathlint deſtroieth the temples of the falſe gods in Man.

The firſt biſhops ſee in Scotland. Sodorenſis eccleſia.

Crathlint departeth out of this world.

Fincomarke.

FIncomarke that was his vncles ſonne, ſucceeded him in the kingdome, & was placed on the ſtone of marble, to the great reioiſing of all the eſtates, who wiſhed him a proſperous reigne, and long to continue therein. There liued in king Crathlints daies a noble chriſtian called Amphibalus, a Britaine borne, who fleeing from the perſecution then raiſed in his countrie, came vnto the ſame Crathlint, and by him was created the firſt biſhop of ſaint Sauiours church in Man: this Amphibalus did verie much good amongſt the Scots and Britains in ſetting forth the word of life, and roting out of their hearts all ſuperſtitious errors of blind gentilitie. There were other alſo of right famous memorie about the ſame time, that ceaſſed not in preaching, and inſtructing the people in the right beliefe, as Modocus, Priſcus, Calanus, Ferranus, Ambianus, and Carnocus, called by an old ancient name in the Scotiſh tong Culdei, that is to vnderſtand, Cultores Dei, or as you would ſay in Engliſh, the worſhippers of God.

Amphibalus.

The church of S. Sauior, otherwiſe called Sodorenſis eccleſia.

Culdei.

But now to the purpoſe touching Fincomarke, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that he began his reigne in the yere (as W. Hariſon ſaith) after the birth of our Sauiour 325, after the creation of the world 4292, and from the firſt eſtabliſhing of the Scotiſh kingdome 652, and in the 20 yere of Conſtantine the emperour. It chanced that Octauius king of the Britains was vanquiſhed by Traherus a Romane capteine, and forced for his refuge to flee vnto this Fincomarke then king of Scots, who receiued him as a friend. And furthermore though he were required by Traherus to deliuer him into his hands, as a traitor and a rebell vnto the Romane empire, yet Fincomarke refuſed ſo to do, chooſing rather to ſuſteine all Traherus his malice, and to haue warres with the Romane emperor, than to betray his friend who had put his life into his hands vpon an eſpeciall truſt of ſafegard.

Octauius is vanquiſhed, & flieth into Scotland.

Herewith Traherus being not a little moued, aſſembled his power, and entred into Weſtmerland, the which countrie had remained in the Scotiſhmens hands euer ſince Carantius deliuered it ouer vnto them. Fincomarke hearing that the Romans would thus make him wars, had likewiſe raiſed a puiſſant armie to reſiſt them, ſo that he had at the leaſt 60 thouſand perſons togither in one armie, as 30 thouſand of his owne countriemen, 20 thouſand Picts, & ten thouſand of ſuch Britains as followed after Octauius. Fincomarke being thus furniſhed, haſted forth to incounter with his enimies, before they ſhould haue time to do any notable damage vnto his ſubiects, & ſo comming within ſight of them, ſent an herald vnto Traherus, to vnderſtand the cauſe why he thus inuaded his countrie, but receiuing frō him an vntoward anſwer, he brought forth his people into the field in order readie to giue battell, and ſo ioining with the enimie, there was fought a right ſore and cruell conflict, which continued for a time with vnmercifull murther and ſlaughter on both parts.

Traherus inuadeth weſtmerland.

Fincomarke raiſeth his power.

Finallie, when the Romans were at a point to haue got the vpper hand, they were ſuddenlie put in ſuch feare with the ſight of a number of huſbandmen, who had got togither their cattell and were driuing the ſame awaie, that ſuppoſing they had beene ſome new ſuccors comming to aid their enimies, they immediatlie fled vpon the ſame, leauing the victorie to their aduerſaries: howbeit of the Scots ſide were ſlaine (as their chronicles report) fifteene thouſand men, and on the Romane part about ſixteene thouſand. Traherus himſelfe eſcaped vnto Yorke, but hearing that Fincomarke and Octauius purſued after him, he forſooke that citie, and got him into places of more ſuertie, ſo that when the enimies came thither, the citizens yelded themſelues, and receiued Octauius as their prince, offering from thenceforth to be vnder his rule and gouernement. The newes of theſe atchiued victories being bruted throughout the realme, cauſed a great number of the nobles to come in vnto Octauius, who receiued them moſt thankfullie; & to conclude, wrought ſo by their ſupport, that he was ſhortlie after reſtored to the gouernance of the whole realme, and eſtabliſhed therein according to his owne wiſh.

Fincomarke commeth in battell with Traherus.

The Romans flee.

The number of ſlaine.

Yorke is yelded vnto Octauius.

Octauius obteineth the rule of Britaine.

This done Fincomarke returned into his countrie, as well himſelfe as other of his nobles and men of warre, being highlie rewarded for their paines and trauell ſuſtained in that iournie. There was alſo promiſe made and confirmed by ſolemne oth, that the countrie of Weſtmerland, with ſuch other parts as were aſſigned to his predeceſſor king Crathlint, by order of Carantius at the time of their ioining togither in league againſt the Romans, ſhould for euer remaine vnto Fincomarke, & to his ſucceſſors the Scotiſh kings, without anie claime or title to be made to the ſame by any of the Weſtmerland aſſigned to the Scotiſhmen.

What yere Fincomarke began his reigne.

Britains: but this promise was not long kept, for shortlie after that Octauius had once chased all the Romans forth of the British confines, and that Traherus was fled ouer into France, there was a councell called at Yorke, where it was not onelie ordeined, that from thencefoorth there should neuer anie stranger be suffered to reigne ouer the Britains, but also that the bounds of the realme should be extended forth beyond the wall made (as before is recited) by the emperor Adrian, euen vnto the old ancient bounds and limits, expelling forth the inhabitants of forren nations.

A councell kept at Yorke.

Such an immoderate lust of inlarging his dominion inflamed the hart of Octauius, that neither regard of his oth, nor remembrance of benefits receiued, might staie him from seeking to wrong them, whose aid had restored him vnto his former estate and dignitie, as before we haue rehearsed. For hereupon there were ten thousand men of war sent into Westmerland, to the intent to conquer the same out of the Scotishmens hands: but being incountred with a power of Scotishmen & Picts, they were sharpelie repelled & quicklie put to flight. About the same time also, Traherus returned out of France with two legions of Romans and twentie thousand of other aids: and giuing battell vnto Octauius, he vanquished his armie, and constreined him for his refuge to flee vnto the mouth of Humber, where he got certeine vessels, and sailed into Norwaie, there to saue his life, bicause that Scotland was now no sure refuge for him. Thus was Traherus againe in possession of Britaine as lieutenant to Constantine the emperor: but shortlie after he was by certeine conspirators in fauour of Octauius murthered, and then Octauius returned againe: as in the English chronicle is mentioned more at large.

Octauius coueteth to inlarge his dominion.

The Britains inuade Westmerland.

Traherus returneth into Britain. Octauius is vanquished by Traherus.

Traherus by a conspiracie is murthered. Octauius is reconciled with Fincomarke.

Immediatlie vpon his returne, he reconciled himselfe with Fincomarke the Scotish king, and was contented that he should quietlie inioy the countries of Westmerland and Cumberland, with such other territories as Carantius had granted in former time vnto Crathlint. He likewise sent vnto the king of the Picts, and concluded a friendship with him, to the intent he might haue aid from him also, if it chanced the Romans eftsones to inuade his countrie, as shortlie after they did, not ceasing till they had so wearied him with continuall wars, that in the end to be at rest (as his age and other necessities then required) he deliuered into their hands certeine castels and fortresses, and also became tributarie to the emperor, on condition that he might vse the office and name of a king all the residue of his daies. These things being thus quieted in Albion, the Romans, Britains, Scotishmen and Picts, continued in friendlie peace without any notable trouble, till the ninth yeare of the reigne of Valentinian emperor of Rome: & first of Damasus the pope. In the which yeare Fincomarke king of Scots departed this life, after he had gouerned the estate aboue 47 yeares. This was in the yeare of our redemption 172. This Fincomarke left behind him two sonnes, the one named Eugenius, being as then about 18 yeares of age; the other hight Ethodius, and was yonger than his brother by one yeare, so that neither of them might succeed their father, by reason they were not of yeares sufficient to rule, according to the ancient ordinance.

Octauius entreth into amitie with the Pictish king.

Octauius becommeth tributarie vnto the Roman emperor. 17 of Costans & Constantas emperors. H.B Fincomarke deceased. 358. H.B.

Eugenius & Ethodius sons to Fincomarke.

Romacus, Fethelmacus and Angusianus sonnes to three seuerall brethren pretend a right to the estate.

Herevpon a councell was called in Argile, where there was hard hold betwixt the three nephues to king Crathlint, that were begotten by three of his brethren, which of them should gouerne the land: their names were Romacus, Fethelmacus, and Angusianus. Romacus had a Pictish ladie of the blond roiall of that nation to his mother, and for that his father was eldest brother next vnto Crathlint, he looked to be preferred, though he himselfe was yonger in yeares than either Fethelmacus or Angusianus. Fethelmacus gaue his consent with such voices as he had vnto Angusianus, wherewith Romacus being not a little offended, sought meanes to haue destroied them both: but his practise being discouered, caused manie to withdraw their good wils from him, whereby his aduersaries were the more incouraged: and thereupon the councell brake vp, either part deuising how to strengthen themselues against the others practises. But forsomuch as Angusianus vsed plaine meanes without any fraudulent dealing, he got the more friends, so that Romacus was constreined in the end to require aid of the king of Picts, who being neere of kin to him, might not denie his request. Angusianus therefore vnderstanding what danger he was in, if he fell into his aduersaries hands, got togither an armie of such as fauoured his cause, and incountring with him in battell was put flight, and forced to flie into the westerne Iles with his cousine Fethelmacus, where remaining for a while, at length he was aduertised that the inhabitants had conspired against him, for doubt whereof he got him ouer into Ireland.

Romacus seeketh meanes to destroie his cousins.

Angusianus with vpright dealing purchaseth the more friendship.

Romacus vanquisheth Angusianus.

Romacus

Angusianus being thus chased out of the reime, Romacus was receiued by the most part of the nobles and commons for their king. But as the accustomed maner of tyrants, comming thus to the gouernement of a realme through euill meanes, is to rule with crueltie, so did he behaue himselfe, according to that semblable rate, so soone as he thought himselfe to be sure of the estate. Wherefore such as had borne any euill will to Fincomarke, and were out of fauor in his daies, those did Romacus call vnto him, and afterward vsed their counsell aboue all other mens, aduancing them also to most high rule and rich offices. Againe, those which had beene in fauor with Fincomarke, or bare any affection toward his issue, he sought couertlie to bereaue them both of life, lands and goods, so that by such his doings, there was gathered no light suspicion, that he would likewise yer long find meanes to dispatch Ethodius and Eugenius the sons of the same Fincomarke, thereby to be the more assured of the crowne & kingdome it selfe. The two children also fearing as much on their owne behalfe, by the aduise and helpe of their trustie friends, conueied themselues into Westmerland, and after ouer into the Ile of Man, where they remained looking for a date.

Romacus is receiued for king.

Romacus gouerneth tyrannicallie. Ethodius & Eugenius the sonnes of Fincomarke are conueied into the Ile of Man.

Then began banishments, confiscations of goods, and slaughter of such as were thought to be fauorers of Angusianus cause, without respect either of sex or age, till the nobles of the realme being not a little moued with such his cruell doings, and tyrannicall gouernment, conspired togither by secret meanes how to deliuer their countrie of so pernicious a tyrant. And to bring this their purpose the more spedilie to passe, they wrought so closelie, that they had assembled a great armie, and were come with the same within ten miles of the place where he then laie, yer he had any vnderstanding of their enterprise, so that whereas he (being vnprouided of resistance) assaied by flight towards Pictland to haue escaped their hands, it preuailed him nothing, for he was taken by the waie, and receiued such end as his former passed life had verie well deserued, in the fourth yeare of his reigne: his head was set vpon the end of a pole, and carried about to be shewed vnto the people to their great reioising. There were slain at the same time beside him, diuers Scots & Picts, of counsell with him in all his cruell practises.

The Scotish lords conspire against Romacus.

Romacus apprehended and put to death.

After which execution done, they sent for Angusianus, who returned into Scotland, & was proclamed king, Angusianus proclamed king.

king, as well by conſent of the lords, as fauour of the commons. About the ſame time, becauſe the Britains had ſlaine the Romane lieutenant, the emperor Conſtantius ſent one Maximus thither to chaſtiſe the rebels, with whom the ſame Maximus incountring in battell, gaue them a great ouerthrow. And within three daies after Octauius king of the Britains, through greefe, age, and long ſickneſſe, being conſumed to the laſt point, departed this life. He left a ſonne behind him named alſo Octauius, who doubting to fall into the hands of the Romans, fled into the Ile of Man, and remained there certeine yéeres vnknowne with Eugenius and Ethodius, the ſonnes of Finconarke. The Britains alſo perſiſting in their rebellion, were eftſoones diſcomfited in battell by Maximus, and ſore by him perſecuted, till he had brought them againe to their full ſubiection.

Nectanus king of the Picts maketh ſore warres vpon the Scots.

While theſe troubles continued in Britaine, Anguſianus K. of Scots was ſore diſquieted by Nectanus king of Picts, who inforced himſelfe to reuenge the death of his couſine Romacus, making ſundrie rodes & foraies into the Scotiſh confines, and greatlie indamaged the countrie, by ſpoiling of goods, murthering of the inhabitants, and burning of townes with villages; and in the end hauing his power increaſed by the aid of certeine Scotiſhmen, which had borne good will vnto Romacus, he preaſed ſo ſore vpon Anguſianus, that he had no remedie but to trie the hazard of battell in a pitched field; for no friendlie perſuaſions to haue peace or anie agréement could be heard, though Anguſianus made humble ſute to haue purchaſed the ſame. Wherefore perceiuing no hope of attonement, he prepared an armie, and met his enimie in the field, where (after ſore fight and much ſlaughter) the victorie remained with Anguſianus and Nectanus with his Picts were chaſed and forced to ſaue themſelues by flight.

The Picts diſcomfited by Scots.

Nectanus deſirous of reuenge.

Nectanus himſelfe neuer reſted till he came vnto Camelon, where he called a councell of his nobles to haue their aduiſe by what meanes he might be reuenged of the iniuries receiued by the Scots, whereof he was moſt deſirous, not regarding into what danger he brought his owne realme, ſo he might ſomewhat eaſe his rancour and diſpleaſure, which he had thus conceiued againſt his enimies the Scots. Neither wanted there diuers great perſonages in that aſſemblie, which (to content his mind and to win fauour of him) ſet forward the matter in ſuch earneſt wiſe that (notwithſtanding what other could ſay to the contrarie) it was ordeined that with all ſpéed an armie ſhould be leuied, and led forth into the Scotiſh borders. Nectanus hauing thus the conſent of his nobles to inuade the Scots anew, cauſed men of warre to be taken vp through all the parties of his dominion, and that of the choiſeſt men that might be got; the which being once aſſembled, he ſtaied not long but ſet forward with them, and entred into Kalendar wood, ſpoiling and deſtroieng all afore him at his owne will and pleaſure.

Nectanus inuadeth the Scotiſh confines.

Anguſianus vnderſtanding his furie, and doubting leaſt the Britains through ſetting on of the Romans ſhould ſéeke to ioine with the Picts, to the deſtruction of the Scots, thought good to aſſaie if by anie friendlie meanes he might bring Nectanus to fall vnto ſome reaſonable point, rather than by the warres to indanger both the Pictiſh and Scotiſh eſtates, in putting the ſame in aduenture to fall into the hands of their ancient enimies the Romans and the Britains. Herevpon therefore he wrote vnto Nectanus a gentle letter, declaring therein all ſuch dangers and inconueniences as might inſue by this warre thus by him attempted. And againe, how neceſſarie it were for both the nations to haue peace togither as then, conſidering how it was not to be thought that Maximus the Romane legat (hauing now all the Britains at his commandement) would reſt (if occaſion were offered) till that he had fullie ſubdued both the Scots and Picts: for the auoiding of which perill he offered for his part, to accept anie reaſonable conditions of peace, that ſhould by him be preſcribed.

Anguſianus ſueth for peace

But Nectanus in no wiſe would giue eare to anie treatie of peace, ſo that Anguſianus being forced to giue battell for defenſe of his ſubiects, brought his people into the field, and exhorting them to plaie the men with ſundrie comfortable words, he placed them in order of battell. On the other part Nectanus likewiſe incouraged his folkes to doo valiantlie, ſo that the archers on both ſides ſtepped forward, letting their arrowes flie ſcéelie one at an other, vntill at length comming to handblowes they ſtroke on freſhlie, beating downe and killing without ſparing on either ſide, ſo that a good ſpace the victorie was doubtfull. At length Anguſianus perceiuing his people to be put to the worſt, ruſhed forth into the thickeſt of the preaſe amongſt his enimies, where he was quicklie eſpied, oppreſſed with preaſe, and ſlaine out of hand. The moſt part of his people miſſing him, & not vnderſtanding what was become of him, ſuppoſed that he had béene fled, and therefore fell alſo to running away; but the reſidue that ſtood ſtill at their defenſe were ſlaine downe right. Thus the victorie remained with the Picts, but neither part had anie cauſe to reioiſe, for the captains on both ſides were ſlaine, beſides manie thouſands of other; ſo that aſwell the one nation as the other departed from the place right penſife and ſorrowfull, giuing manie a ſore curſſe vnto ſuch as had béene the procurers and nourithers of ſuch deteſtable hatred betwixt thoſe two nations, which had ſo long a time bæne conioined in the faithfull band of amitie, to the great quiet and wealth of both the countries. After this bloudie battell, aſwell the Scots as Picts ſat ſtill for a ſeaſon, not attempting anie enterpriſe of importance the one againſt the other.

Nectanus refuſeth all offers of peace.

Anguſianus and Nectanus ioine in battell with their armies.

Anguſianus is ſlaine.

The Scots are diſcomfited.

Nectanus is alſo ſlaine.

Fethelmacus.

Anguſianus reigned not paſt two yeares before he was ſlaine thus in the field, as before ye haue heard, in whoſe place ſucceeded his couſine Fethelmacus with little better ſucceſſe: for in the ſecond yeare of his reigne, deſirous to be reuenged of the Picts, he aſſembled an armie, and entring into Angus, began to ſpoile & ſlea downe right all that was before him, without regard to impotent, aged, tender infants, or other. The Picts alſo being kindled herewith, gathered their power togither, and incountring with the Scots, there was a ſore battell fought betwixt them: but the Scots firſt putting the wings of their enimies hoſt to flight, at length diſcomfited their maine battell alſo, being left naked on both ſides of all aid or ſuccour, great ſlaughter was made in the chaſe of the Picts as they fled hither and thither to ſaue themſelues. So that among other, their king named Nectanus, brother to the aboue remembred Nectanus, being wounded with an arrow, died within three daies after this cruell conflict was ended. The courage of the Scots now being aduanced with this their proſperous ſucceſſe, they paſſed forthwith ouer the riuer of Taie, to rob, harrie, and ſpoile the countrie of Fife.

The Scots diſcomfit the Picts.

In other Nectanus king of the Picts dieth of harts receiued in the fight with the Scots.

The Picts, perceiuing themſelues not to be ſtrong inough to match with their enimies in plaine field at hand-ſtrokes, determined yet with ſkirmiſhes and light incounterings (if it were poſſible) to keepe them off from the winning of anie of their ſenſed townes, caſtels or ſtrong holds. And to be the more able to mainteine themſelues in this their purpoſed intention, they did chooſe on Heirguſt to their king, a man of ſubtill nature and craftie imagination. This Heirguſt deuiſing how to deliuer his countrie of ſuch an intollerable enimie as Fethelmacus was, procured two ſlie fellowes Picts by nation, to counterfeit themſelues for Scots, and for that they were cunning throwers of the dart, in which kind of exerciſe the ſame Fethelmacus tooke great pleaſure, they were appointed to make ſute to be in ſeruice with him, to the intent that when they might eſpie their time, they ſhould ſlea him, by one kind of meane or other.

Heirguſt is choſen king of the Picts.

A pretended treaſon.

They (according as they were inſtructed, comming into Scotland) found meanes not onelie to haue place in the kings houſe, but alſo to corrupt one of his muſicians an harper, and to bring him to be of counſell with them in this their wicked purpoſe. By reaſon whereof, in one night as he laie at Carrike, where he was buſie to make his proviſion there for the warres againſt the Picts, the ſame muſician (hauing plaid in the kings bed-chamber till he had brought him aſleepe) did let in thoſe two Pictiſh traitors, who forthwith ſlue him euen as he laie ſo ſleeping: but the king groning greeuouſlie at the deadlie ſtroke, ſome of them that watched before the chamber doore perceiuing what was happened, followed after the murtherers, who fled with all ſpeed vnto the next mounteins, where they ſought to defend themſelues with hurling downe ſtones, vpon them that came vp towards them: but in the end, being taken, and confeſſing the deed, with the whole maner of the ſame, they were drawen in peeces with wild horſſes: the muſician alſo being apprehended and convict of the treaſon, ſuffered ſemblablie the like kind of death. Fethelmacus came to his end in the third yeare of his reigne, being the ſecond yeare after the death of the emperour Valentinian.

Fethelmacus is murthered in his bed.

In the fift yeare of the emperour Conſtantius.

In this ſeaſon (as in times paſt hath beene beleeued) certeine bones of the apoſtle ſaint Andrew were brought forth of Achaia, a prouince in Grecia, into Scotland by a Greekiſh monke named Regulus Albatus, commonlie called S. Reule, a man in thoſe daies highlie eſteemed, for the opinion which the world had conceiued of him for his holie and vertuous life, to whome king Heirguſt gaue his palace that ſtood in that part of Fife, where the ſame Regulus firſt landed; at whoſe contemplation alſo, he erected a church in old time called Kirkruill, that is, the church of S. Reule, afterwards named the old church of S. Andrews, ſtanding in the abbie church-yard, where the chanons were wont to be buried. But to leaue this matter to the further report and credit of the Scotiſh chronicles, we will proceed with our purpoſe. After the death of Fethelmacus, the nobles and commons of the Scotiſh nation ſent into the Ile of Man for Eugenius the ſonne of king Fincomarke, where he with his brother Ethodius had remained, during the daies of the three laſt remembred kings, Romacus, Anguſianus, and Fethelmacus.

1569. H.B.

Saint Reule commeth into Fife, then a part of Pictland, and now of Scotland.

The Scots ſend into the Ile of Man, for Fincomarke his ſonnes.

Eugenius.

THis Eugenius at his comming into Albanie was inueſted king of the Scots by common conſent of all the nation. About the ſame ſeaſon, Maximus the Romane lieutenant in Britaine, vnderſtanding of the late diſſention betwixt the Scotiſhmen and Picts, deuiſed which waies he might beſt ſubdue both thoſe nations, thereby not onelie to inlarge the bounds of the Romane empire, and to deliuer the Britains from inuaſions of thoſe ſo cruell enimies, but alſo to haue the ſouth part of the Ile more obedient and loiall vnto the ſame empire than heretofore it had beene. He thought good therefore in the beginning to aſſaie if he might ioine in friendſhip with the one of the nations, till he had deſtroied the other: for he conſidered it would be an hard peece of worke to haue to do with them both at one inſtant. Whereupon directing his letters vnto Heirguſt king of the Picts, he required to renew the old league with him and his people, promiſing to aid him againſt the Scots, common enimies not onelie to the Pictiſh nation, but alſo to all ſuch people as loued reſt and quietneſſe, as might eaſilie be perceiued by their continuall practiſe and vſage, euer ſeeking to diſturbe their neighbors with rodes & foraies, ſo that it ſtood with a generall common-wealth to haue them vtterlie deſtroied and extirped.

Eugenius is inueſted king.

The practiſe of Maximus to deſtroy the Scots.

He ſendeth vnto Heirguſt king of the Picts.

Heirguſt right ioifull of theſe newes, gaue hartie thankes vnto almightie God, that had moued the Romane lieutenant to make ſuch offer vnto him, whereby the furious rage of the Scots might be once repreſſed, and put away from his people; & therefore willing to confirme a friendſhip with the ſame lieutenant, he promiſed to renew the league betwixt the Romans and Picts, vpon anie reaſonable conditions which he ſhould deuiſe, not onelie requiring an aid at this time againſt the ſaid Scots, but alſo at all other, as occaſion ſhould demand. Maximus hauing receiued this anſwere, he found means alſo to come to a communication with Heirguſt neere to Yorke, where the league was confirmed betwixt them, and therein the Scots not onelie adiudged for common enimies, both to the Romans and Britains, but alſo to the Picts. And further therewith were certeine orders appointed how the war ſhould be purſued with all expedition againſt them. Theſe things thus finiſhed, and both the princes returned to their homes, Maximus ſent an herald vnto Eugenius the Scotiſh king, commanding him on the behalfe of the Romane empire, to make reſtitution for all wrongs and iniuries done vnto the Pictiſh nation. And further, to deliuer into the hands of Heirguſt the B. of the Picts, the authors of the ſame wrongs and iniuries to be puniſhed at his diſcretion, or if he would refuſe thus to do, that then he ſhould looke to haue the emperour and the Romane people enimies vnto him and all his nation.

Heirguſt his anſwere vnto Maximus his meſſage.

Maximus and Heirguſt ioine in friendſhip, and the Scots proclaimed enimies to them both.

An herald ſent from Maximus vnto Eugenius.

Eugenius for anſwere herevnto, declared that ſince he entred into the gouernment of the Scotiſh eſtate, he had done nothing that might be thought preiudiciall either to the Romans or to the Britains their ſubiects: and as for the Picts, he would be glad to haue peace with them, if there might be amends made for all diſpleaſures done on either part, according as ſhould be thought to ſtand with equitie and reaſon. Neither did he ſee what cauſe the Romans ſhould haue to make warres for the Picts againſt thoſe that had done them no diſpleaſure: but if it were ſo that he muſt needs haue wars, he would do what in him lay to defend the libertie of the Scotiſh nation, truſting chieflie in the ſuccours of almightie God, who vſed to fauour the cauſe of the iuſt and innocent, againſt ſuch as ſought to wrong them vpon feined quarrels, without occaſion giuen. Maximus receiuing this anſwere from Eugenius, aſſembled with all ſpeed a ſtrong & mightie armie of Romans, Britains, and Frenchmen, with the which entring into Weſtmerland, he ſpoiled that countrie moſt miſerablie, taking diuers caſtels and ſtrong holds by force, the which he furniſhed with garriſons of his people, and then paſſing into Anandale, burned and harried the ſame; from thence he entred into Galloway, omitting no kind of tyrannie that might be ſhewed againſt the inhabitants, ſo that the feare was great throughout all the countrie: for of manie yeares before, ſo great an armie had not beene ſeene in thoſe parties.

The anſwere of Eugenius vnto the herald.

Maximus raiſeth a mightie armie.

He inuadeth the Scotiſh regions.

Cruell warre.

Eugenius notwithſtanding, gathering his power together, determined to trie the fortune of battell, and

Eugenius gathering his power fighteth with his enimies, and is diſcomfited.

and ſo ioining with his enimies nére vnto the water of Cré, his people were quicklie put to flight, and chaſed, by reaſon that they were much inferior in number. But the Romans purſuing the chaſe, happened to light amongeſt them of Argile, which had not béene at the battell, but were comming towards it, and now fiercelie incountring with ſuch as purſued their friends, they cauſed them to retire backe with ſome loſſe, wher vpon the other Scots alſo (which were chaſed) returned, & gaue a freſh onſet, ſo that if night had not come on the ſoner, there had béene a far greater multitude of the Romans ſlaine in that bickering than they themſelues did thinke of. Herevpon the Romans, doubting what their enimies intended to do, they fortified their campe that night verie ſtronglie; but Eugenius vnderſtanding what a multitude of his folks were ſlaine in the battell, ſo that the verie ſtreame of the water of Cré was ſtopped vp with dead carcaſes, he thought beſt (with the aduiſe of the peeres) to licence his people to depart to their homes, and not to fight with his enimies ante more for that time.

The Romans following too forewardlie the chaſe, receiue damage.

Eugenius breaketh vp his armie.

Which being done, he himſelfe repaired the ſame night vnto Carrike, where he remained for a ſeaſon, making prouiſion for defenſe of his realme the beſt he could deuiſe. Maximus hauing knowledge in the morning how the Scots were quite gone their waies, he determined to haue followed them; but béing certified of a rebellion amongeſt the Britains in Kent, he changed his purpoſe, and returned thitherwards, to appeaſe that tumult, leauing in Galloway a good part of his armie to keepe ſuch holds as he had got in that voiage. The yeare following, Maximus was ſo buſied in the ſouth parts of Britaine, that he could not attend vnto the warres againſt the Scots, otherwiſe than in mainteining ſuch garriſons as he had placed in their countries, by reaſon whereof ſundrie bickerings happened betwixt them of the ſame garriſons and the Scots, who laboured not onelie to deliuer their owne countrie out of the hands of all forrainers, but alſo to inuade and deſtroie Pictland, ſo that they harried the countrie of Fiſe, with part of Menteith and Sterling ſhire, burning & waſting townes, caſtels, and houſes moſt cruellie.

A rebellion in Kent.

The Scots indamage the Picts.

Whereof Maximus being certified, made ſemblance as though he were ſore grieued therewith, but inwardlie he could haue reioiſed at nothing more than to heare of the iniuries don by the Scots vnto the Picts, ſuppoſing it to make chieflie for his purpoſe; and herevpon preparing an armie againſt the next ſummer, when he had diſpoſed all things in a quiet order amongeſt the Britains, he ſet forward with the ſame towards Galloway, where being arriued, there was no kind of crueltie ſpared againſt the poore inhabitants. Eugenius in the meane time vnderſtanding the comming of his enimies, muſtered his people, and appointed the aſſemblie to be made in the countrie of Kile, which way he heard that his enimies would trauell. Thither came alſo not onlie all the able men of the Scotiſh dominions, but likewiſe a great number of luſtie & ſtrong women apt to beare armour according to the old accuſtomed guiſe of their nation, ſo that there were numbred in this armie fiftie thouſand perſons right fierce and hardie, deſirous either to vanquiſh the enimie with dint of ſword, or elſe to die preſentlie in the place.

Maximus his feined griefe.

Maximus ariueth in Galloway.

Maximus inuadeth the Scots.

Eugenius prepareth an armie to defend his countrie.

Women vſed to the warres.

The number of the Scotiſh armie.

Maximus hearing that the Scots were thus incamped in Kile, marched towards them, and lodged the ſame night not far off from the riuer of Manda, where knowledge was giuen vnto Eugenius, that Maximus was come within fiue miles of him, with a greater armie than he had at his laſt incountring with him in Galloway. These aduertiſements cauſed no ſmall ſtir to be raiſed in the campe, ſome being ſtricken with preſent feare: where other contrariwiſe moued with high indignation, deſired nothing ſo much as to ioine in battell with the Romans, whoſe cruell tyrannie they much deteſted. Eugenius himſelfe ſhewed no countenance of feare at all, but incouraging his people with comfortable words, he brought them ſtreight in order of battell, diuided into three wards, committing one of them to the leading of his brother Ethodius, the ſecond to Doalus the gouernour of Argile, & reſerning the third to himſelfe. This done, he made vnto them a pithie oration, declaring how neceſſarie it was for them to plaie the men, conſidering that in victorie conſiſted the onelie hope of libertie; and in being vanquiſhed, their countrie was indangered to be brought into perpetuall bondage for euer, for the onelie marke which the Romans ſhot at, was to oppreſſe the libertie of the whole Iland, and to reduce the ſame into the forme of a prouince, to be gouerned at the will of the victorers, to the breach of all their old ancient lawes & long continued cuſtoms.

Eugenius comforteth his people.

With theſe and manie other like reaſons he went about to incourage the minds of his ſubiects, in ſuch wiſe, that in maner the moſt part of them determined rather to die with honor, than to liue in ſuch miſerie as they feared would inſue, if the victorie ſhuld reſt vpon the Romans ſide. And as they were in ſuch talke togither, ſuddenlie commeth in one of their ſcouts with newes, that Maximus with his armie was euen at hand. This was in the morning, anon after the ſunne was vp, where he was not looked for till the euening following, inſomuch that the ſame his ſudden arriuall, chancing ſo farre contrarie to their former expectations, troubled all their heads, and brought them into a great maze, for that hereby they were conſtreined to change the order of their battels to haue the ſunne on their backs, as they had prouided at the firſt it ſhould haue béene, if the enimies had not come vntill the after none. Yet notwithſtanding, they had no ſoner changed their place, and gotten themſelues into arraie of battell againe, but that with great violence they prealled forward to giue the onſet vpon the Romans. Which Maximus perceiuing, made all the ſpéed he could to ſet his men in order of battell, that he might receiue his enimies comming thus to incounter him. So both ſides béeing fullie bent to battell, and approched within danger of ſhot, they let flée the ſame moſt egerlie, albeit that through haſting forth to ioine at hand-ſtrokes, there was litle hurt done with bowes or darts.

The ſudden arriuall of Maximus.

The Scots giue the onſet.

The battels ioine.

The Scots crieng vpon the name of their worthie and famous anceſtor king Gald, did late about them, moſt fiercelie, after they came once to the ioining: and likewiſe the Romans, being incouraged with the chérefull words of the lieutenant Maximus, boldlie incountered them, ſo that it was doubtfull at the firſt whether part ſhould haue the worſe end of the ſtaffe. But ſhortlie there followed variable ſucceſſe, for on the one part, they of Roſſe and Mar, being appointed vnder Ethodius to incounter that wing of the enimies where the Picts were, fought ſo egerlie and with ſuch fierce wils, that they eaſilie put the Picts vnto flight, beating downe a great number of them as they would haue paſſed the water of Dune, but ſtreightwaies after falling to the ſpoile, they were ſlaine downe right, by a legion of ſuch Romans as were ſent by Maximus vnto the ſuccours of the Picts.

Doubtfull fight.

Ethodius ouerthroweth the Picts.

The Scots hauing vanquiſhed the Picts, are ſlaine by the Romans.

On the other ſide, in the left wing thoſe of Argile, Cantire, Kile, and Coningham, who were matched with the Britains, Frenchmen, and Germans, after long and cruell fight were there ſlaine in the place, greatlie to their fame and glorie for euer, ſo that by this meanes the maine battell of the Scotiſhmen, wherein Eugenius himſelfe ſtood amongſt his people, was left bare & naked on both the ſides. Which Maximus perceiuing, he cauſed the ſame to be aſſailed on each part with ſuch violence, that in the end longer reſiſtance preuailed not, but that their maine battell muſt needes be opened perforce, by meanes whereof Eugenius chooſing rather to die in the place, than either to ſaue his life by flight, or by rendering himſelf into his enimies hands to liue in miſerie, &c: was there ſlaine, togither with a great number of his nobles and gentlemen, hauing determined by the example of their maiſter to die rather ſpeedilie with honor, than longer to liue with ſhame and reproch. Thus Eugenius loſt his life with his kingdome, in the third yeare after his firſt entering to the rule, hauing inioied few good daies in reſt during the ſaid time.

The Scotiſh battell is ouerthrowne.

Eugenius is ſlaine.

Such of the Scots alſo as were appointed to keepe the cariage and truſſe of the field, ſeeing their lords and maiſters thus ſlaine, ruſhed forth with ſuch weapons as they had at hand, in purpoſe to ſlea ſome number of their enimies, not paſſing though it ſhould coſt them alſo their owne liues, ſo that they might die reuenged. The ſlaughter was great which at the firſt was made, more through an obſtinate deſire of reuenge, than by anie valiant actiuitie: but this companie being anon broken in ſunder, and driuen backe, they were finallie ſlaine & beaten downe. Moreouer, the Romans that purſued in chaſe after their enimies, when the battell was done, encountered with great numbers of ſuch women and aged perſons as followed a farre off, to vnderſtand the ſucceſſe of the field, doubting what hap might fall to their children and kinſfolks, whoſe ſlaughter when they perceiued, like people enraged they flue vpon ſuch Romans as they met with; but being eaſilie vanquiſhed, and refuſing to flee, they were alſo ſlaine and cut in peeces in a moſt miſerable maner.

The furious rage of the Scotiſh carters.

The Romans hauing thus rid the fields of all kind of enimies, lodged that night abroad here and there at their pleaſure, where they might heare the dolefull gronings, and lamentable complaints of them that lay wounded, and as yet not dead, curſing moſt bitterlie the cruell tyrannie and couetous ambition of the Romans, with that moſt deteſtable diſloialtie of the Picts, procuring this murther and deſtruction of thoſe people that had deſerued farre otherwiſe at their hands. When the morning was come, & the light appeared, Maximus the lieutenant cauſed the ſpoile of the dead bodies to be gathered, & equallie diuided amongſt his men of warre. And ſuch as were found ſore wounded and not dead, to ſhew ſome token of clemencie, according to the old accuſtomed maner of the ancient Romans, he commanded ſurgeans to ſee to the cure of them. The other being dead, he ſuffered to be buried, cauſing the corps of Eugenius himſelfe to be interred in moſt ſolemne and pompous ſort, after the vſage of the Romane princes.

The ſpoile diuided amongſt the ſouldiers.

The buriall of the dead bodies by appointment of Maximus.

His brother Ethodius being found mangled in moſt pitifull wiſe, and in maner halfe dead, was alſo taken vp by commandement of the ſame Maximus, and ſurgeans charged to haue the ordering of him, and to ſhew their diligence for the cure of his hurts in moſt ſpeedie and gentle wiſe. The victorie thus atchiued, Maximus ſurueieth the countries of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, with that alſo of Calidone, and ſeizeth the ſame into his hands, ſuffering the inhabitants to inioy both goods and lands in peace and quietneſſe vpon their othes of allegiance, without anie further moleſtation. Heirguſt king of the Picts with other the nobles of that nation, were nothing contented therwith, deſirous to ſee the vtter deſtruction of all the Scotiſh race. Wherevnto Maximus at the firſt would not agree, alledging the ancient cuſtome of the Romans, who ſought rather to vanquiſh by benefits, than by the ſword, euer vſing to ſpare ſuch as ſubmitted themſelues, and in no wiſe to ſpot the honour or maieſtie of their empire with crueltie.

Ethodius ſore wounded, is committed to the cure of ſurgeans.

Heirguſt deſireth the vtter deſtruction of the Scots.

But the Picts not ſatiſfied herewith, went about earneſtlie to perſuade him in no condition to ſuffer the Scots to haue anie abiding within the confines of Britaine, if he wiſhed anie quietnes in the eſtate thereof, for their delight (ſaid the Picts) was onelie ſet to ſeeke occaſion how to diſturbe the peace, to liue by the pillage and ſpoile of their neighbours, and namelie of the Picts, vnto whoſe confuſion (as the prophecies ſpake) they were begotten and borne. Finallie when all their earneſt ſute miſſed the wiſhed effect, they fell to and aſſaied if they might bring that to paſſe by wicked meed and thorough corrupting bribes, the which they could not do by other meanes. And euen as it oftentimes chanceth in ſuch caſes, where words are but ſpent in waſt, gifts yet preuaile: ſo alſo came it to paſſe euen here, for at length a proclamation came forth by procurement of the Picts, that all ſuch as were naturall Scotiſhmen, ſhould by a certeine daie auoid out of thoſe countries that they poſſeſſed in Britain, vpon paine of loſing life and goods, & to deliuer vp their houſes and lands vnto ſuch Britains and Picts as were appointed by the Romans for to inioy the ſame.

The earneſt ſute of the Picts to haue the Scotiſhmen baniſhed and expelled out of the countrie.

Where words faile, gifts preuaile.

The proclamation for the auoiding of all Scotiſhmen forth of the whole Iland of Britaine.

The Scots perceiuing themſelues not able to make anie reſiſtance, obeied this commandement, ſome of them paſſing ouer into Ireland, ſome into the weſterne Iles, and ſome of them got ouer alſo into Norwaie, and Denmarke, and manie there were that got interteinment amongſt the Romane ſouldiers, and went ouer with them into France, as yet Gallia, to ſerue in the warres there, and in other places vnder the emperors enſigns. The Picts were ſo cruell and diligent to ſee all the Scotiſh linage confined, that they would not conſent that a certeine number of gentlewomen ſhould remaine behind, who had their huſbands ſlaine in the laſt warres, and made interceſſion in moſt lamentable wiſe vnto Maximus, that they might be permitted to abide in their natiue countrie all the reſidue of their liues, though in ſeruile eſtate, to the end that they might be buried after the ſame were once ended in graues with their ſlaine huſbands.

The Scots plagued for their beaſtlie crueltie.

The cruell dealing of the Picts.

Moreouer, where Cartandis queene of the Scots, late wife vnto Eugenius, was brought vnto Maximus, with two gentlewomen and a groome from the towne of hir huſband, where ſhe had remained euer ſith his buriall in continuall mourning, forſomuch as ſhe was a Britain, and deſcended by linage from the princes of Wales; Maximus lamenting hir miſerable caſe, aſſigned the citie of Carrike vnto hir, with certeine other reuenues for the maintenance of hir eſtate. But after ſhe had taken leaue of ſuch as had the conduction of hir, and was come into a village not farre from Carrike aforeſaid, it chanced that a ſort of Pictiſh riders, or (as I may call them) robbers, met with hir, ſmall to hir profit, and leſſe to their owne eaſe, for they did not onelie ſlea hir groome, but alſo beat hir gentlewomen, and ſtripped both them and hir of all that they had, whereof Maximus being informed, cauſed them that had done ſo vile a deed to be apprehended & executed by death, according as they had deſerued. The queene hirſelfe being brought backe vnto Maximus, and honorablie intreated, had all hir ſubſtance reſtored vnto hir againe, ſo neere as it was poſſible.

Cartandis queene of Scots.

The Picts offended with Maximus.

But the Picts being offended herewith, and ſpeciallie for putting to death of their men, ſundrie of their nobilitie came vnto Maximus, and began to make a ſore complaint in that behalfe, declaring that the deſerts of their nation had not bæne ſuch toward the Romane empire, as to haue their people put to execution for a womans ſake, being both an enimie and a priſoner, therefore they required that ſhe might be confined into Britaine, and according to the tenor of the proſcription, ſpoiled of all hir goods. Here Cartandis being preſent hir ſelfe, began to make pitifull lamentation, bewailing hir moſt vnhappie ſtate, in that contrarie to the order of hir wretched caſe and preſent miſerable fortune, ſhe ſhould now be forced to turne againe into hir countrie: wiſhing rather than ſhe ſhould be inforced ſo to do, that ſhe might offer vp hir life as a ſacrifice in the place of hir huſbands buriall: and therefore holding vp hir hands vnto Maximus in moſt pitifull wiſe, ſhe beſought him inſtantlie, that it might pleaſe him, either to ſuffer hir to paſſe the reſidue of hir life after ſuch ſort as ſhe thought beſt agreed with hir widowlike eſtate, or elſe to take the ſame from hir preſentlie by ſome violent meanes of execution.

Cartandis lamenteth hir infortunate eſtate.

There was not a man other than the Picts, that ſaw and heard hir at that inſtant, but lamented hir wofull diſtreſſe, ſo that in the end the requeſt of the Picts was diſallowed, & Cartandis hauing liuing aſſigned hir for the maintenance of hir degree, was licenced to depart into what place ſhe thought expedient, there to liue as ſhe thought beſt without let or diſturbance. The ſame time the Scotiſh biſhops and prieſts, being baniſhed as well as the other ſort of the Scotiſh people, a number of their monks got them into the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, where they erected a monaſterie for their owne habitation, the worthineſſe whereof hath bæne right famous, euen vnto theſe our daies, as that which was afterward indowed with manie faire reuenues by diuers of the Scotiſh kings, who had their burials there after the returne of the Scots into Albanie as ſhall be hereafter expreſſed.

The monaſterie of Iona builded by baniſhed Scotiſh monks.

The yeare in the which the Scotiſhmen were thus vanquiſhed by the Romans and Picts, and finallie confined out of their ſeats, was from the creation of the world 4319, after the birth of our ſauior 352, from the beginning of the Scotiſh kingdome 679, and the third yeare of Magnentius. The ſame yeare before Eugenius gaue battell vnto Maximus, manie ſtrange ſights were ſeene in the furtheſt part of Albion, ſtriking a wonderfull dread in manie mens harts. In the night ſeaſon in the aire were ſeene fierie ſwords and other weapons mouing in a long ranke, after comming togither on a heape, and being changed into an huge flame as it had bæn a firebrand, it then vaniſhed awaie. The waters of the riuer of Dune ran with blod, the banks of the ſame riuer flaſhed oft times as they had bæne all on a fire. There were ſeene alſo a number of ſmall birds fall out of the aire ſo thicke, that it ſeemed it had rained birds, and incontinentlie came a great number of rauens that deuoured vp the ſame.

The time that the Scots were thus confined. 5547. H.B. 379. H.B. 710. H.B.

The ſecond yeare of Julian the Apoſtata. H.B.

Strange viſions.

Swords and weapons ſeen in the aire.

It raineth birds.

Certeine witches and ſothſaiers, declaring that theſe things betokened the deſtruction of the Scotiſh kingdome, were commanded by the prieſts to hold their peace on paine of death, as they that told nothing but lies & fables, though afterwards their tales proued moſt true. But to returne to our hiſtorie, Ethodius the brother of Eugenius being cured (as is ſaid) by commandement of Maximus, was yet baniſhed amongſt the reſidue, and conſtreined to take an oth, that he ſhould immediatlie repaire into Denmarke, and hereafter not to approch nærer vnto the coaſts of Albion, for doubt of ſome new attempt that might be made by the Scots thorough his meanes, thereby to returne into their countrie againe, & to recouer their former ſtate. But this ſtaied not them of the weſterne Iles, but that aſſembling themſelues togither, and choſing one Gillo to their captaine, they paſſed ouer into Argile, where in the end they were incountred by ſuch Picts as were ſet there to defend that countrie, and ſlaine each mothers ſonne. Their veſſels were alſo taken and brought into ſundrie hauens of the countrie, to ſerue for defenſe of the coaſts vpon any new enterpriſe which the Scots ſhould chance to make: but the other Scots, perceiuing they were not able to furniſh forth a new armie in the Iles by any aid they might purchaſe there, ſailed ouer into Ireland, where preſenting themſelues vnto the king of that region, they declared vnto him from point to point all their infortunate chances and lamentable calamities, which were happened vnto them of late through the tyrannicall puiſſance of the Romans, and malicious enuie of the Picts, in ſuch ſort as nothing could be more miſerable than their preſent eſtate, conſidering the ruine of ſo mightie a kingdome, and the finall baniſhment of the inhabitants from their houſes and lands, which had bæne in poſſeſſion of them and their elders, by the ſpace almoſt of ſeuen hundred yeares.

Gillo choſen captaine of the baniſhed Scots in the weſtern Iles comming into Argile is vanquiſhed by the Picts.

The Scots repaire into Ireland.

The Iriſh king with his nobles moued with pitie to heare and vnderſtand ſo dolefull calamities to haue chanced vnto that nation, whoſe good or bad hap could not but touch them verie nære, conſidering they were deſcended both of one progenie, comforted theſe Scotiſhmen to the beſt of their power, and in the end concluded to aid them with ten thouſand men, and to furniſh them forth with ſhips, vittels, and munitions to paſſe into Albanie for recouerie of their countrie. This aid being put in a readines, and the ſhips rigged and decked as was requiſite for ſuch an enterpriſe, they toke the ſea, and landing in Cantire, chanced to meet with Heirdorſtane brother to Heirguſt king of the Picts, accompanied with a great number of Picts and Britains aſſembled to defend the countrie, but being charpelie aſſailed of the Scots and Iriſhmen, they were quicklie put to flight, & ſuch as were ouertaken died on the ſword, to the great terror of all the new inhabitants that were planted on their parts.

The king of Ireland with his nobles lament the Scotiſhmens caſe.

The Iriſhmen conclude to aid the Scotiſhmen.

The Scots and Iriſhmen land in Cantire.

The Picts incounter with the Scots and Iriſhmen and are diſcomfited.

This victorie thus atchiued, there were that gaue counſell not to attempt fortune ouer farre, but to take ſuch booties of goods and priſoners as they had got in the countrie, and to returne therewith into Ireland. Other were of a contrarie opinion, ſuppoſing it beſt to follow the victorie, and either to recouer againe their ancient ſeats, or elſe to die in the valiant attempt thereof. Which aduiſe was followed as the beſt, though it proued otherwiſe: for before they could come to any concluſion of that enterpriſe, the Romans, Picts, and Britains gathered themſelues togither, and gaue battell againe to the Scotiſh and Iriſh companie, wherein they ouerthrew them, to their vtter ruine and deſtruction.

The Scots and Iriſhmen are ouerthrowne.

The newes of this infortunate incounter being brought into Ireland, put the king and his nobles there in ſuch feare of the Romans, that they thought it beſt with all ſpeed to ſend ambaſſadors vnto Maximus to ſue vnto him for peace. They that were ſent at the firſt were ſore blamed and checked by Maximus, for that they had aided the Scotiſhmen in the laſt inuaſion made into Albion: but at length accepting their excuſe, he granted a peace vpon certeine conditions, whereof the moſt principall article was, that in no wiſe they ſhould receiue aid, or ſuccor any enimie to the Romane empire. This Maximus, hauing got a quiet peace on each ſide, vſed all meanes poſſible

The king of Ireland ſeeketh for peace.

Maximus granteth peace to the Iriſhmen.

Maximus ſeeketh by his bountious liberalitie to win the peoples fauour.

Ethodius confined into Denmarke.

poſſible how to procure the loue of his ſouldiors and men of warr, ſhewing himſelfe not onelie gentle, courteous and meeke towards them, but alſo liberall and free, that his bounteous gifts paſſed all vnderſtanding: inſomuch that (as is reported by writers) he beſtowed in one daie neere hand as much in rewards, as the reuenues of Britaine yelded to the empire in a whole yeere.

This franke liberalitie and courteous behauior he vſed not onelie towards the Romans, and his other men of warre, but alſo towards the Britains and Picts, conforming himſelfe ſo neere vnto their maners & faſhions, that at his comming into Picland, he laid awaie his Romane apparell, and araied himſelfe in garments after the Pictiſh guiſe. By this maner of meanes therefore he wan him ſuch loue and fauor, as well amongſt his ſouldiors, as alſo amongſt the Picts and Britains, that in the end by common conſent they choſe him for emperor, in the 383 yeere after Chriſt, proteſting generallie, that they would owe onelie their obeiſance vnto him as to their ſupreme gouernor. ¶ Here the Scotiſh chronicles ſomwhat varie from other writers, who affirme that Maximus was thus aduanced to the imperiall dignitie, rather by conſtraint of his men of warre, than by anie meanes which he of himſelfe vſed to atteine vnto the ſame. Where the ſaid chronicles neuertheleſſe ſhew, that it came chieflie to paſſe by his owne ſeeking, procuring certeine perſons to worke for him as inſtruments to frame other to this his purpoſed intent. He held the dominion of the empire being thus preferred to the imperiall ſtate, the ſpace of fiue yeeres, all the countries and people of Albion being at his commandement without contradiction: which had not chanced vnto anie one man before his time, ſince the Ile was firſt inhabited. At length deſirous of more empire, he paſſed ouer into France with a great armie, in purpoſe to ſubdue all France and Italie, with ſuch other countries as were obedient vnto Gratian as then emperor of Rome. But how proſperouſlie he ſped in the beginning, and how at length he was ſlaine at Aquilia in Italie, ye ſhall find in the hiſtorie of England a great deale more at large.

Maximus is choſen emperor in Britaine.

Maximus ruled the eſtate of Britaine 17 yeeres.

The emperor Gratian is ſlaine by Maximus.

By reaſon of ſuch trouble in the eſtate of the Romane empire, Octauius the ſonne of Octauius late king of the Britains, the which (as before is ſaid) fled into the Ile of Man, & after departing from thence, got ouer into France, returned now into Britaine; and did ſo much there, that the Britains receiued him to their king: but ſhortlie after he was conſtreined to agree with the Romane emperor Theodoſius, ſo that the Britains ſhould pate their wonted tribute, and liue vnder ſuch lawes as by the emperor ſhould be to them preſcribed. In all other reſpects, Octauius ſhould be reputed during his life for king. Immediatlie hereupon two lieutenants were ſent from Theodoſius, of whome the one named Martius ſoiorned at London, and the other called Victorine at Yorke. And with all expedition they began to put the Romane lawes in practiſe, aboliſhing the old Britiſh lawes, to the great offenſe of manie that could not well brooke ſtrange ordinances; & namelie the Picts repined ſore therat, and vſed moſt an end their owne lawes and conſtitutions, greatlie to the contempt of the Romane eſtate. Whereof Victorine, the one of the Romane lieutenants hauing knowledge, gaue ſtreight commandement vnto Heirguſt the Pictiſh king, that in no wiſe he ſhould ſuffer the old lawes and rude ordinances of his countrie, to be vſed anie longer amongſt his ſubiects, vpon paine that might inſue for diſobedience ſhewed towards the maieſtie of the Romane empire.

Heirguſt now perceiuing into what thraldome and miſerie his countrie was brought, by meanes of the warres which he had procured againſt his neighbours the Scotiſhmen, as a man ſore repenting his paſſed follie, and ſeeing no readie meane preſent how to reforme the ſame, being aged and ſore broken with continuall ſickneſſe, he got himſelfe ſecretlie into his priuie chamber, where immediatlie he ſlue himſelfe, to be rid of the ſight of that preſent ſeruile eſtate, into the which he ſaw both him and his whole countrie reduced. Whoſe death being once knowne, Victorine commanded that the Picts ſhould not chooſe anie other from thenceforth to reigne as king ouer them, nor to obeie anie other magiſtrates but onlie ſuch as ſhould be appointed to haue the gouernment of them, by commandement and commiſſion of the Romane emperor. For it was agreed, as he alledged, by the tenor of the league, concluded betwixt Heirguſt and Maximus, that after the deceaſſe of the ſame Heirguſt, all his dominions ſhould be gouerned by Romane officers in forme of a prouince. Howbeit the Picts nothing regarded the words of Victorine, but by common agreement did chooſe one Durſtus the ſecond ſonne of Heirguſt to be their king.

Heirguſt ſlaieth himſelfe.

The Picts are forbidden to create a king.

Durſtus is choſen king of the Picts.

Whereupon Victorine being informed of their doings, raiſed a power, and made ſuch ſpeed towards them, that he was gotten ſo neere vnto the citie of Camelon, yer they had anie knowledge of his approch, that Durſtus with other of the nobles, being as then within the ſame, could not haue ſpace to eſcape their waies, but being forthwith beſieged within it, at length they were taken by force of aſſalt, and the citie ſacked, to the great inriching of the Romane armie, and vtter vndoing of the poore inhabitants. Durſtus with other the chiefeſt priſoners were firſt had vnto London, & from thence conueied to Rome, there to haue iudgement by decree of the ſenat. The reſidue of the nobles that were taken there, ſuffered in the market place at Camelon. Thus was that tumult appeaſed, and the Picts commanded to pate yearlie vnto the emperors procurator the fourth part of all their reuenues growing of their corne and cattell. Beſide this tribute he charged them alſo with diuerſe baſe ſeruices, as to labor in mettall mines, to dig ſtones forth of the quarries, and to make bricke to be ſent into Britaine, or into other places whither it pleaſed him to command it.

Durſtus is beſieged of the Romans.

Durſtus is brought priſoner to London

The Picts become tributaries.

They are put to their baſe ſeruices.

The cauſe why he burdened them in ſuch ſort, was (as he ſaid) to teach them to know themſelues. For they were become ſo loftie, ſince the departure of the Scotiſhmen out of the Ile, that if they were not reſtreined in time by authoritie of the Romane puiſſance, the whole Britiſh nation were like to be ſhortlie diſquieted by their wilfull meanes and inſolent preſumptions. Neither was it thought ſufficient vnto Victorine, to charge the Picts in maner as is before ſpecified; but to their further greeuance he deuiſed an other waie, whereby to bring them in the end vnto vtter deſtruction, which was this: he conſtreined them together with their wiues, children, & whole families, to remoue beyond the water of Forth, and to leaue all the countries on this ſide the ſame water, as well thoſe which they ancientlie had inhabited, as the other which of late apertained to the Scots, and were aſſigned to them by Maximus to poſſeſſe, after that the Scots were expelled.

The Picts are commanded to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

All which countries thus by the Picts now left void, were appointed by Victorine to the Britains, as ſubiects to the empire, to be inhabited. And for a perfect diuiſion betwixt the Picts and the ſame Britains, he commanded a wall to be made, & a trench to be caſt alongſt by the ſame, from Abircorne, through the territorie of Glaſcow vnto Alcluth, or Aldcluch, now called Dunbreton, ſo running from the

A wall made to diuide the Britains from the Picts.

The Picts forbidden to paſſe ouer beyond that wall the eaſt ſea to the weſt. Hereto proclamation was made, that if anie of the Pictiſh nation did enterpriſe to paſſe this wall, and to enter into the Britiſh confines without licence of the magiſtrats, he ſhould die for it. Whileſt the Picts through their owne fault are thus brought into moſt miſerable ſubiection of the Romans, the Scotiſhmen (as is ſaid) being baniſhed the land, liued in other countries by ſhifting out the time ſo well as they might, ſome continuing with their wiues and children, got a poore liuing with their hands, exerciſing ſome ſcience or occupation. Other there were that followed the warres, and ſerued vnder ſundrie worthie capteins here and there, as occaſion ſerued.

The Scots liue in other countries.

Ethodius brother vnto Eugenius, late king of Scotland.

But Ethodius the brother of Eugenius commanded (as is ſaid) to go into Denmarke, was ioifullie receiued of the king there; who alſo gaue him an office, therewith to mainteine his degree, ſo that he liued there certeine yeeres in right honorable eſtate, and begat of his wife whome he brought thither with him forth of Albanie, a ſonne named Erthus, who after his fathers deceaſſe had iſſue by his wife called Rocha (a ladie of high parentage amongſt the nobles of Denmarke, as daughter to one Rothchus, ſecond perſon of the realme) a ſonne named Fergus, whoſe chance was afterwards to reſtore the Scotiſh nation againe to their former eſtate and kingdome. In his yoong yeeres he was appointed to ſerue vnder Alarike the Gottiſh king in that famous voiage which he toke in hand againſt the Romane empire. For ſuch was the hate as then of all the northerne regions & kingdoms towards the Romane name, that by generall agreement they conſpired together to the vtter ruine and finall deſtruction thereof. And ſo ech of them ſent forth a power in aid of the ſaid Alarike, choſen by common conſent as generall of the whole enterpriſe.

Erthus the ſon of Ethodius begot Fergus.

The Gotthes make an expedition againſt the empire of Rome.

Fergus being ſet forth by the king of Denmarke with a power of Danes, and with a choſen number of ſuch Scotiſhmen as were withdrawne into thoſe parties, went with the better will, for that beſide the common quarell, he bare a priuate grudge towards the Romans for the vſing of his anceſtors ſo cruellie in expelling them out of their owne homes and natiue countrie. This Fergus was preſent with the Gotthes at the winning of Rome, in the ſacking whereof, amongſt other ſpoiles, he got (as is reported) a certeine cheſt full of bookes, the which ſome hold opinion he brought afterwards into the weſterne Iles, and cauſed them to be kept in Iona, now Colmekill, within a librarie there builded for the ſame intent. Which bookes (as is to be ſuppoſed) were certeine hiſtories or monuments of old antiquities. But the ſame were ſo defaced in the daies of Hector Boetius (who, as he himſelfe writeth, cauſed them to be brought ouer to him to Aberdine) that it could not be vnderſtood of what matter they intreated.

Fergus was ſent to aid the Gotthes.

Rome ſacked.

It is written moreouer of Fergus, that he continued with Alarike in all his enterpriſes, ſo long as he liued, and afterwards ſerued vnder his ſucceſſor Athaulfus, to his great fame, and in ſuch honorable eſtimation, as few were found comparable vnto him in thoſe daies. At length requiring a ſafe conduct to returne into Denmarke, he was licenced to depart with high and right bountifull rewards, as in part of recompenſe of his good and faithfull ſeruice ſhewed, during the time of the warres, as well in the life time of the ſaid Athaulfus, as alſo in the daies of his predeceſſor the foreſaid Alarike. ¶ About the ſame ſeaſon, the biſhops ſee of Candida caſa, otherwiſe called Quhitterne, was firſt inſtituted by one Ninian a preacher, that toke great paines (as the report hath gone) to inſtruct the Picts and Britains in the chriſtian faith. He was afterwards reputed a ſaint, and the place of his buriall had in ſuch veneration, that manie vſed to reſort thither for deuotion ſake, as the manner in times paſt was when pilgrimage-goings were vſed.

Fergus ſeruing vnder Alarike and Athaulfe kings of the Gotthes.

Fergus with leaue returned againe from Italie into Denmarke.

S. Ninian.

But now to returne where we left touching the Picts, and to ſhew the maner how the Scots returned againe into Albanie; ye ſhall vnderſtand, that the Picts being brought into ſeruile bondage (as before we haue partlie declared) and doubting dailie of worſe to inſue, they ſent ſecret meſſengers vnto ſuch Scots as remained in exile in the weſterne Iles, in Norwaie, and in other parts of the world, promiſing them, if they would giue the attempt for recouerie of their ancient dwelling places in Albanie, they ſhould be ſure of all the aid that in them laie, being readie to ſpend their liues to reuenge the iniuries which they dailie ſuſteined at the Romans hands, whoſe continuall practiſe euer was, how to oppreſſe the ancient liberties of all ſuch nations as came vnder their ſubiection. The experience whereof they now felt to their vnſufferable grieuance, looking for nothing elſe but ſhortlie to be expelled out of their countrie, and driuen to go ſeeke them other places to inhabit in ſtrange countries after the maner of outlawes, as it had chanced alreadie to the Scots by commandement of Maximus, as before is expreſſed.

The Picts ſent into forren countries to call home the Scots.

Fergus, vnto whom amongeſt other this meſſage was chieflie directed, reioiſed greatlie of the newes; and firſt conferring with the king of Denmarke, of whoſe aid he knew himſelfe aſſured, by his aduiſe he ſent letters abroad forthwith into Norwaie, Orkenie, the weſterne Iles, and into Ireland, vnto ſuch of the Scotiſhmen as dwelt in thoſe places, to vnderſtand their minds herein. And being certified that they were vniuerſallie agreed, not onelie to trie their chance for recouerie of their former ſtate and kingdome; but alſo had choſen him to be gouernour and generall capteine in that enterpriſe; he prepared partlie at his owne coſts, and partlie at the charges of the king of Denmarke and other of his friends and alies there, a great multitude both of men of warre and ſhips, in purpoſe to paſſe ouer into Albanie to recouer his grandfathers eſtate, which as it was thought might now be the more eaſilie brought to paſſe, ſith the Picts would aid him thereto, vpon an earneſt deſire which they had to reuenge their owne iniuries receiued at the Romans hands, and to deliuer themſelues from ſuch thraldome as they dailie felt themſelues oppreſſed with, doubting withall ſhortlie to be quite expelled out of their whole countrie, as they had beene forced to forgo a great and the better part thereof alreadie.

Fergus ſent vnto the Scots diſperſed.

Fergus prepared himſelfe to warre.

In this meane time, one Gratian deſcended of the Britiſh bloud, by conſent of the Romane legat Martius (both of them going againſt their allegiance) vſurped the gouernance of Britaine by his owne priuat authoritie; but ſhortlie after, they two falling at variance togither, the one of them ſlue the other. And then the ſouldiers not ſtaieng till they vnderſtood the pleaſure of Honorius the emperour, choſe one Conſtantine to ſucceed in the place of Martius, who paſſing ouer into France, was ſlaine there by Conſtantius one of the capteins of the ſaid Honorius. Victorine the other of the Romane legats hearing of the death both of Martius and Conſtantine, remoued from Yorke vnto London, the better to prouide for the ſafe keeping of the land to the emperour Honorius his vſe; for that he doubted ſundrie dangers which might chance, by reaſon the countrie was as then vnprouided of men of warre, the moſt part of them being tranſported ouer into France with the fornamed Conſtantine, and not againe returned.

Gratian vſurped the gouernance of Britaine.

Martius ſlaine.

Conſtantine ſucceedeth Martius.

Conſtantine is ſlaine.

The lieutenant of the north commeth to London.

The

The Picts informed of these things, sent word with all spéed vnto Fergusc, requiring him to make hast, sith if he should haue wished for a conuenient time, a better could not be deuised; considering the present state of things as well in Britaine, as in other parts of the Romane empire, the people euerie where being readie to moue rebellion. Fergusc vnderstanding the whole, by such messengers as still came one after another vnto him from the Picts, he hasted to depart with all diligence; and when all things were readie, he take the sea with his armie, and within eight daies after, he arriued in safetie within the firth of Murrey land with all his vessels and people; where taking land, & word thereof being brought into Ireland, into Dikenie, and into the westerne Iles, all such of the Scotish linage as liued in those parties in exile, came with their wiues, children, and whole families in most spédie wise vnto him, as though the countrie had béene alreadie recouered out of the enimies hands, without all doubts of further perill or businesse.

The Picts reioising greatlie at the newes of his comming, repaired vnto him, and shewed him all the honor that might be deuised, beseeching him to pardon and forget all iniuries and displeasures by them wrought and contriued in times past against the Scotish nation, sith now they were readie for the aduancement thereof to spend their liues against such as were enimies to the same. Neither was the fault theirs, in that Vetrgust had consented with the Romans to banish the Scotish people, but in their ancestors, who being blinded through the faire words and sweete promises of the Romans, saw not the mischiefe which they brought vpon their owne heads and their posteritie. Therefore they desired him to renew againe the league betwixt the Pictish and Scotish nations, with such conditions of appointment as it should please him to prescribe.

Fergusc by consent of his nobles answered, that he was content to establish the league with them, euen according to the tenor of the ancient agréement, and to ioine his power with theirs to helpe to restore them vnto their former estate and liberties, so that they would be contented to surrender vp into the Scotishmens hands, all such townes and countries, from the which they had béene expelled by great fraud and iniurie. And as for the displeasures done to the Scotishmen in times past by aiding the Romans against them (as he thought) the Picts had felt punishment inough for the same alreadie, being reduced into most seruile & miserable bondage, as iustlie rewarded by almightie God for their great vntruthes, vsed and shewed towards their neighbors, faithfull friends and alies. The Picts were throughlie pleased and satisfied with Fergusc his words; so that within few daies after, their king (whome they had latelie chosen since the time that the Scotishmen were thus returned) came vnto Fergusc, and ratified the league with him, according to the articles of that other which in time past had béene obserued on the behalfe of the Scotish and Pictish nations, with such solemne othes and assurance, as betwixt princes in semblable cases of custome is requisit and necessarie. Then were those countries restored to the Scotishmen againe, out of the which they had béene expelled by the Romane power.

And Fergusc then being conueied with a right honorable companie of lords, gentlemen, and cõmons into Argile, was there placed on the chaire of marble, and proclamed king with all such accustomed pompe and ceremonies as to him appertained. This was in the 45 yeare after the Scots had béene driuen forth of Albanie, and after the birth of our sauiour 424, in the yeare after the death of Honorius the emperour, and from the first erection of the Scotish kingdome 750 yeares complet. All such castels also and fortresses as the Picts held within anie of those countries, which belonged vnto the Scots, were surrendered into their hands in peaceable wise; but the residue which the Romans kept were earnestlie defended for a while, though at length through want of victuals and other necessaries, they likewise were deliuered. ¶ If I should here say what I thinke, and that mine opinion might passe for currant coine, I would not sticke to affirme that either now first (or not long before their late supposed expulsion from hence) the Scots setled themselues to inhabit here within this Ile, and that they had no certeine seats in the same till then: but that comming either forth of Ireland, or from the westerne Iles, where they before inhabited, they vsed to make often inuasions into this land, greatlie molesting as well the Britains, the ancient inhabitants thereof, as the Romans that then held the Ile vnder their subiection. For I can neither persuade my selfe, nor wish others to beléeue, that there was anie such continuance in succession of kings, as their histories do make mention; as we haue here before set downe in following the same histories, because we will not willinglie séeme to offer iniurie to their nation, which peraduenture are otherwise persuaded, and thinke the same succession to be most true, where other perchance may coniecture (and not moued thereto without good reason) that such kings as in their histories are auouched to reigne one after another here in this Ile, either reigned in Ireland, or in the out Iles, and that verelie not successiuelie, but diuerse of them at one season, and in diuerse places. Which mistaking of the course of histories hath bred errors, not onelie amongst the Scotish writers, but euen amongst some of the British and English writers also, as to the learned and well aduised readers may plainelie appeare. And as for Gald, and some other hapilie which they take to be kings of Scots, although they reigned in that part of this Ile which afterwards was possessed by Scots, and after them named Scotland, yet were they méere Britains, and had little to do with Scots; except perchance we may thinke that they held the out Iles in subiection, where the Scots were then inhabiting, far longer time perhaps (before their setling in Britaine) than their histories make mention.

But now to returne where we left. After that Victorine the Romane legat was aduertised of all the fore-remembred doings of the Scotishmen and Picts, he caused an armie to be leuied with all spéed, and hasted forth with the same vnto Yorke, where being arriued, he attempted by an herald at armes to persuade the Picts to forsake their confederacie latelie concluded with the Scots: but perceiuing he could not bring it to passe, he determined to pursue both those nations with open warre: and so thereupon setting forward, he passed forth till he came nére Camelon, where he incamped with his whole armie, hauing therein (as the report went) about fiftie thousand persons at the least. Fergusc being aduertised hereof, & hauing in like maner alreadie assembled a mightie huge host both of Scotishmen and Picts, came therwith ouer the Forth, & marched forth with all spéed in the night season, in purpose to haue set on his enimies verie earlie in the dawning of the next morning. But Victorine hauing knowledge thereof, commanded his men to be arranged and set in order of battell by the third watch of the same night, so that being redie to receiue the Scots vpon their first approch, there was fought a right sore and cruell battell, with such slaughter on both parts, that the riuer of Carron (nére vnto the which

422. H.B.
396. Io.Ma. The 18 yeare of the emperour Honorius. H.B.
755. H.B.

when the Scots first got certeine seats here in this Ile of Britaine as some thinke.

The Picts send spédilie vnto Fergusc.

Fergusc arriued with his ships in Murrey firth.

The Picts ioifullie receiue Fergusc.

The Picts craue pardon excusing themselues.

Fergusc.

The Picts punished for their vntruthes.

The ancient league renued againe betwixt the Scots and Picts.

The Scots restored to their countries.

Fergusc.

Fergusc is conueied into Argile, and there inuested king.

Victorine prepareth an armie to go against the Scots.

Victorine séeketh to persuade the Picts from taking part with the Scots.

Victorine incampeth nére vnto Camelõ with 50000 men.

Fergusc passeth the Forth Fergusc purposeth to assaile his enimies in the dawning of the day.

The riuer of Carron runneth with bloud.

The battell ſeuered by reaſon of a tempeſt.

which their battels ioined) was well neere filled with dead bodies, and the water thereof ſo changed into a ruddie hue, that it ſeemed as though it had run altogither with bloud.

In the end (whileſt as yet it was doubtfull to whether ſide the victorie would incline) there came ſuch a ſudden ſhower of raine, mixed with ſuch great abundance of haileſtones, that neither part was able to haue ſight of other, ſo that by reaſon of the violent rage of that huge ſtorme and tempeſt, either ſide was faine to withdraw from the other. There were ſlaine in this battell ſuch great numbers of men, as well on the one ſide as the other, that they had ſmall luſt to ioine in battell againe for certeine yéeres after. For the Roman lieutenant vnderſtanding what loſſe of people he had ſuſteined, without attempting anie further exploit, appointed certeine of his companies to lie in garriſon within ſundrie fortreſſes in Pictland, & with the reſidue he returned into Kent. In like ſort the Scots with their confederates the Picts, perceiuing themſelues not able as then to make anie further attempt againſt their enimies, brake vp their armie, and deuiſed onelie how they might defend that which they had alreadie in poſſeſſion.

The lieutenant furniſhing diuerſe holds, returneth into Kent.

The Scots & Picts breake vp their campe.

And forſomuch as the Pictiſh nation was increaſed vnto a greater multitude of people, than thoſe countries which they then held were able to find with ſufficient ſuſtenance (conſidering what a great portion of their ancient ſeates the Britains and Romans kept from them) it was agréed by the Scots that they ſhould inioy the countrie of Athole, with other lands bordering néere vnto the ſame, lieng without the compaſſe of the mounteine of Granzeben. The Picts then being placed in Athole, increaſed there wonderfullie, and builded manie faire caſtels and towers in thoſe parties, to the great beautifieng of that countrie. In which meane while, Victorine the Romane lieutenant commanded the Britains to make halt with the wall (whereof ye haue heard) made of turfe, and ſuſteined with certeine poſts of timber paſſing ouerthwart the borders betwirt them and their enimies, begining (as ye haue heard) at Abercorne, and ſo ſtretching forth by Glaſco, and Kirkpatrike, euen vnto Aldcluch, now Dunbriton, 80 miles more northward than the other wall, which the emperor Adrian cauſed (as is ſaid) to be made.

Athole aſſigned to the Picts.

The Britains by the appointment of Victorine make a wall.

Whereof the Scots and Picts being informed, they aſſembled themſelues togither, & vnder the leading of a noble man called Graime, they ſet vpon the Britains, as they were buſie in working about the ſame, and ſlue not onelie a great number of labourers and ſouldiers, which were ſet to labour and defend the worke, but alſo entering into the Britiſh borders, fetched from thence a great botie of cattell and other riches, which they found diſperſed abroad in the countrie. This Graime (who as I ſaid was chiefe in this enterpriſe) was brother vnto the Scotiſh quéene, the wife of king Fergus. He was borne in Denmarke (as ſome hold opinion) in the time of the Scotiſhmens baniſhment, and had a Scotiſhman to his father deſcended of a noble houſe, and a Daniſh ladie to his mother. He himſelfe alſo maried a noble woman of that nation, and had by hir a daughter, whome Fergus by the perſuaſion of the king of Denmarke toke to wife, and had iſſue by hir (afore his comming into Scotland) three ſonnes, Eugenius, Dongarus, and Conſtantius, of whome hereafter in their place mention ſhall be made, as occaſion ſerueth. Other there be, that affirme how this Graime was a Britaine borne, & that through hate which he bare towards the Romans for their cruell gouernement, he fled forth of his native countrie,

The Scotiſh men & Picts interrupt the making of that wall.

Graime, other wiſe called Graham, and his linage.

Fergus maried a daughter of Graime

Diuerſitie of opinions touching the originall beginning of the Graimes.

and continued euer after amongſt the Scots, as firſt in Denmarke, and afterwards in Albion, euer readie to do what diſpleaſures he could deuiſe againſt the Romans & other their friends or ſubiects. Of this Graime thoſe Scots, which vnto this day beare that ſurname, are ſaid to be deſcended.

But now to the purpoſe. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after that it was knowne in forrein countries, how the Scots had got foot againe within thoſe regions in Albion, which their elders in ancient time had poſſeſſed, there came dailie diuerſe companies of that nation out of Spaine, France, Germanie, and Italie (where during the time of their baniſhment they had ſerued vnder ſundrie captains) vnto Fergus to aid him, in recouerie of their countrie and ancient ſeats, out of the which they had béene moſt cruellie expelled. So that Fergus now ſéeing his power thus not a little augmented by their comming, entereth into the borders of Kile, Carike, and Conningham, ſpoiling and harrieng thoſe countries on euerie ſide: but ſhortlie thereupon commeth the armie of the Romans, with whome the Scots incountering in battell, receiued no leſſe damage than they minded to haue done vnto their aduerſaries. Wherupon being forced to leaue that countrie, they drew backe into Argile, where Fergus wintered for that part of the yéere which yet remained.

The Scotiſh men returne into their countrie.

Fergus inuadeth the confines of the Britains.

The Scots put to the worſe.

When ſummer was come, he was counſelled to haue effſoones offered battell vnto Victorine, who as then was entered Galloway: and rather to trie the vttermoſt point of fortunes chance againſt him, than to ſuſteine ſuch diſpleaſures and iniuries at the Romans hands, as by them were dailie done vnto him and his people. But there were other that gaue other aduice, alledging how the danger was great to ieopard againe in battell with the Romans, being men of ſuch ſkill & practiſe in the feats of wars, conſidering what loſſe had chanced in the two former battels. Againe, there was great likelihood, that if he could be contented to forbeare for a time, and ſéeke to defend the borders of his countrie, ſo well as he might without giuing battell, it muſt néeds come to paſſe that ſhortlie the Romane empire ſhould be brought vnto ſuch ruinous decaie, by reaſon of the multitude of enimies, which as then inuaded the ſame on each ſide, that in the end Victorine doubting his owne ſuertie, would conueie himſelfe with his men of warre out of the countrie, and then ſhould it be an eaſie matter for the Scots and Picts to recouer againe all ſuch countries as ancientlie belonged to their elders, and wholie to reſtore the eſtates of their common-wealths vnto their former dignities.

Victorine inuadeth Galloway.

Fergus is diſſuaded to fight with the Romans.

The Romans empire inuaded by barbarous nations.

This aduiſe was followed as the beſt and moſt likelie, ſo that making ſundrie roads into the borders of their enimies countries ſo to kéepe them ſtill occupied, Fergus and the Scots refuſed vtterlie to come to anie foughten field with them. Shortlie after alſe it chanced, that Victorine was accuſed vnto the emperor Honorius of ſome ſecret practiſe againſt his maieſtie, as to be about to vſurpe the crowne of Britaine, whereunto he was compelled in déed by the ſouldiers (whoſe hearts he had wone through his bountious liberalitie ſundrie waies declared towards them) and vnderſtanding at this preſent, that he was minded to haue fled his waies for doubt of the ſaid information made againſt him, they did moue him with ſuch earneſt perſuaſions to take vpon him the imperiall dignitie, promiſing euen to liue and die with him in defenſe thereof, as well againſt Honorius, as all other, that in the end he conſented vnto their deſires, and ſo was proclamed emperor, and clothed in purpure, vſing thereto all the other imperiall ornaments, as if he had bene emperor indéed. But afterwards when one Heracliamus Victorine accuſed vnto Honorius.

Victorine taketh vpon him the name and authoritie of emperor in Britaine.

was

Heraclianus is sent against Victorine.

was sent with an armie by Honorius into Britaine against this Victorine, the most part of the souldiers, with those Britains which had acknowledged him for their supreame gouernor, began to feare the sequele of the matter, and afterward requiring pardon for their offenses, they toke Victorine, and deliuered him prisoner vnto the same Heraclianus, with diuers other of his confederats, and so by this means was the estate of Britaine recouered vnto the behoofe of Honorius, who shortlie after sent for Heraclianus, minding to send him into Affrike against one Athalus, who vsurped there against the Romane empire.

Victorine is deliuered into the hands of Heraclianus.

Heraclianus is sent into Affrike.

Placidus lieutenant of Britaine.

At his departure forth of Britaine, he left one Placidus as lieutenant and generall of the Romane armie in those parties: a man of no great courage, and lesse skill, which being perceiued of the Scots, gaue occasion to Fergus their king to renew the warre. And first he procured Durstus king of the Picts, being the third of that name, to ioine with him in that enterprise, according to the articles of the league. Who consenting therevnto, when their powers were once assembled, they entered into the marches of their enimies, ouerrunning the most part of Kile, Carrike, and Conningham, and after they had taken their pleasure there, they entered into Galloway, destroieng all before them, which way soeuer they passed. Then turning into Pictland, they subdue the whole region, and expell all such Romans and Britains as inhabit the same.

The warre renewd by the Scots.

The Scots and Picts inuade the borders of their enimies.

Placidus being aduertised hereof, gathered a great power, and commeth forward towards them, with whom incountering in battell, after long fight, his horsemen chanced to be put to flight, so that the legions of his footmen being left naked on the sides, were so sore beaten with the shot of arrowes, and hurling of darts, that in the end they were forced to breake their araie, & so being chased left to the Scots and Picts a great and ioifull victorie. Placidus himselfe escapeth vnto Yorke, whither the Scots were minded to haue pursued him, had not the want of such numbers as they had lost at the battell, somewhat abated their couragious intents. In the meane time Placidus not onelie moued with this ouerthrowe, but also weieng with himselfe after what sort the Romane empire was afflicted, with the inuasion of the barbarous nations in Germanie, France, Spaine, Italie, and Affrike, thought it good to conclude some peace with the Scots and Picts, for doubt of further mishaps that might insue. And so by such meanes as he made, shortlie after a league was concluded betwixt the Scots, Picts, and Romans, with these conditions: that the Scots and Picts should inioy and keepe their ancient seates and regions, which they had now recouered, & hereafter not to make anie rodes or forreies into the prouince belonging to the Romans, and that the same Romans contenting themselues with the British confines, should not moue anie warre or hostilitie towards the Scots or Picts.

Placidus gathereth a power.

He incountereth with his enimies.

Placidus receiueth the ouerthrow.

He fleeth to Yorke.

Placidus seeketh to haue peace.

A league concluded betwixt Scots, Picts, and Romans.

This league being thus concluded and ratified, the Scotishmen and Picts indeuoured themselues to reduce the state of their common-wealth into the ancient forme and order. Fergus made partition of lands and grounds throughout all his kingdome, and assigned the same forth vnto his subiects the Scotishmen, and to such other strangers as were come into Albion, to serue him in the wars against his enimies, and were minded now to remaine there. The other that were desirous to depart againe into their countries, he gaue them honorable rewards, with safe conducts to passe their waies at their owne pleasures. At this time also were the names of diuerse countries & people changed in the parties of Scotland, vpon sundrie considerations: as Cornana a part of Scotland, lieng in the furthest end of all the countrie, toke a new name of one Cathus a valiant capteine, and of the promontorie there shooting forth into the sea called Nesse: so that being compound togither, that countrie was cleped Cathnesse. Also of certeine Irishmen called Rossians, the countrie of Rosse toke that name, being afore named Lugia.

Fergus diuideth the land in parts.

The names of diuers places in Scotland changed.

Cathnesse, whereof it is so named.

Rosse.

That part of the countrie anciently called Thessalia, which lieth on the sea coast, began to be called Buthquhane, of the tribute vsed to be paied there for sheepe, of the which kind of cattell there is great store in that prouince. For Quhane in the old Scottish tong signified tribute: and Buth, a flocke of sheepe. The other part of Thessalia, lieng into the landward, was called Bogdale, of the riuer named Bog, which runneth through the middest of it. Louchquhaber toke the name of a great meare or water, into the which the riuer of Quhaber falleth, and passeth through the same, notable by reason of the great plentie of samons taken therein. Some other countries there be, which keepe their ancient names euen vnto this day, as Athole, and Murrey land. And some names remaine a little changed by length of time, as Argile, for Argathile; Mar, for Marthea; and such like.

Buthquhane.

The signification of the name of Buthquhane.

Bogdale.

Louchquhaber.

Athole, Murrey land.

Argile, for Argathile: and Mar, for Marthea.

Fergus also repared such temples and churches as the warres had defaced, and restored againe churchmen vnto their former liuings: and further increased the same where he saw cause, and builded certeine celles and chapels for religious persons to inhabit in, assigning vnto them large reuenues for their finding. He also laid the foundation of that famous abbeie within the Ile of Iona, now Colmekill, appointing the same for the buriall of kings, with certeine ordinances and customes to be vsed about the same. Moreouer, in the time of peace hee was not negligent in prouiding for the defense of his realme. Such castels as were decaied and ouerthrowne by the enimies in the warre time, he repared; and in those which stood towards the borders of the British countries, he placed sundrie garrisons of such souldiers as wanted trades to get their liuing now in the time of peace, assigning them sufficient stipends to liue vpon.

Fergus repareth churches, and prouideth liuings for religious persons.

The first foundation of the abbeie within the Ile of Iona now Colmekill.

Fergus repareth his castels.

In this meane time, Honorius the emperor being dead, and the estate of the Romane empire dailie falling into decaie, it chanced also that Placidus the lieutenant of Britaine departed out of this life, by reason whereof the Scotishmen and Picts toke occasion to renew the warres, making as it were a claime vnto the countries of Westmerland & Cumberland, which their elders in times past had held and possessed. Entering therefore into those countries, they take, spoile, and destroie all such of the British nation as went about to destroie them; neither spared they impotent, aged, or others, but shewed great crueltie against all such as came in their waies. Manie an honest woman they rauished and misused after a most villainous maner. The Romane souldiers, after the decease of Placidus, ordeined one Castius to succeed in his roome, who being aduertised of this enterprise of the Scotishmen and Picts, doubted least (as the truth was) that Dionethus the sonne of Octauius sometime king of the Britains, in hope to atteine the crowne of Britaine, as due to him by inheritance, would now seeke to aid the Scotish king Fergus, whose sister he had in mariage. Castius therefore more desirous of peace than of warres, sent forth a messenger at armes vnto king Fergus, requiring him to remember the league made betwixt him and the Romans, and to withdraw his power forth of the prouinces, which were

Placidus the lieutenant of Britain dieth

The Scots & Picts renew the warre.

The crueltie of the Scots and Picts.

Castius ordeined lieutenant of Britaine.

Dionethus, or Dionotus, as some bookes haue.

Castius sendeth vnto Fergus.

were ſubiect vnto the ſame Romans, without proceeding anie further in that vnlawfull attempt, either elſe he ſhould be ſure to feele the puiſſant force of thoſe people readie bent againſt him, by whom his elders had beene driuen out of their countries, and baniſhed quite forth of all their dwellings and places of habitation in Albion.

The anſwer of king Fergus.

But herevnto was anſwer made with great indignation, that as for the league thus alledged, ceaſ-ſed by the death of Placidus; and as for peace, there was no cauſe why he ſhould looke for anie, vntill the whole prouinces, both of Weſtmerland and Cumberland, were reſtored againe into the hands of the Scotiſhmen and Picts, according as of reaſon they ought to be. The like anſwer alſo was made by Durſtus king of the Picts, vnto whom Caſſius had ſent a like meſſage. Wherewithall the ſaid Caſſius being not a little moued, aſſembleth an armie, and with all ſpeed marcheth forth toward his enimies: but before his entering into Weſtmerland, where they were as then lodged in campe, he had perfect knowledge how Dionethus with his Welſhmen (for his lands laie in Wales) was alreadie ioined with the Scots.

Caſſius raiſeth an armie.

Dionethus ioineth with the Scots againſt the Romans.

Which newes ſore appalled the hearts of the Britains, but yet being incouraged with comfortable words of their capteins to proceed, forward they go togither with the Romans, and within three daies after, they came within ſight of their enimies, being ranged in battell readie to receiue them, ſo that ſtreightwaies buckeling togither, there was a right fierce and cruell battell fought betwixt them, till fi-nallie the multitude of the Scotiſh archers and kernes ſo compaſſed in the battels of the Romans on each ſide, and ſpeciallie on the backes, that in the end, and by reaſon of the loſſe of their generall Caſſius (who was ſlaine there amongſt them) thoſe of the middle ward being diſcomfited, brake their arraie and fled. Whereupon the reſidue likewiſe followed: the Scots, Picts, and Welſhmen purſuing ſo egerlie without all order, that there was no ſmall number of them diſtreſſed by the Romans, the which in their giuing backe, kept themſelues cloſe togither, readie to defend themſelues, and to beat downe ſuch of there enimies as followed more raſhlie than warilie in the chaſe, not once regarding to keepe any order of battell; but yet by other companies that purſued more orderlie togither for their moſt aduantage, there was great ſlaughter made both of Romans and Britains.

The armies ioine in battel.

The Romans giue backe.

The Scots follow in the chaſe too raſhlie.

After this victorie thus atchiued, Dionethus was proclamed king of Britaine, and ſore warres continued in the land by the purſuit of the Welſhmen, Scots, & Picts, to the great hazard of the prouince, and likelie expelling of all the Romans quite out of the ſame. About this time alſo there remained in France, one Etius lieutenant to the emperour Valentinianus, who vnderſtanding all theſe things by letters and meſſengers ſent from the capteins which yet remained aliue in Britaine, appointed one Maximianus being of kin to the emperor, to paſſe with an armie in all haſt ouer into Britaine, to aid and ſuccor the Romans, and ſuch Britains there, as ſtill continued in their allegiance which they had promiſed vnto the Romane empire.

Dionethus proclamed king of Britaine.

Etius lieutenant of the Romans in France or Gallia.

Maximianus ſent ouer into Britaine.

This Maximianus at his arriuall in the Iland was moſt ioifullie receiued by the ſoldiors and ſub-iects of the foreſaid empire. All the lords and nobles of the countrie reſorted alſo vnto him, ſhewing them ſelues moſt glad of his comming, & promiſing with what aid ſoeuer they were able to make, to go with him againſt their enimies. Whereupon, procuring them to aſſemble their powers, and to ioine the ſame with his, which he had brought ouer with him, he paſ-ſed through the countrie vnto Yorke, and ſo from thence marched forth towards the Scots, being alreadie aſſembled in campe to defend the countrie of Weſtmerland againſt him. There were both the kings of Scots and Picts, Ferguſe and Durſtus, with Dionethus, naming himſelfe king of the Britains, who had brought with him, beſide the Welſhmen, a great number of thoſe Britains that inhabited in the countries now accounted the marches of Wales, the which onelie amongſt all other the Britains acknowledged him for king.

Maximianus cauſeth the Britains to ioine with him to go againſt the Scots.

The Scots and Picts aſſembled a-gainſt the Ro-mans.

When both the armies were come neere togither, they camped for that night the one in ſight of the other, and in the morning following they prepared themſelues to battell. Ferguſe firſt making an ear-neſt oration vnto his people, to incourage them the more boldlie to giue the onſet, declared amongſt other things how the right was on their ſides, which alwaies ought to miniſter hope of good ſucceſſe in them that enterpriſe anie thing in defenſe thereof;
where contrarilie all ſuch as attempted to diſquiet other by iniurie and wrong doing, could not but looke for an euill concluſion of their malicious intents and purpoſes. Neither were other of his capteins negligent in their duties, but that both in exhorting their bands, they vſed moſt comfortable words, and in diſpoſing them in good order of battell, they ſhewed moſt readie and earneſt diligence.

The armies prepare to battell.

Ferguſe exhorteth his people to doo valiantlie.

Right miniſtreth hope of good ſucceſſe.

On the other ſide, Maximianus with his capteins and officers of bands were as buſie on their ſide to array their battels moſt for their aduantage, as they ſaw cauſe and occaſion, ſo that both the armies being readie to fight, the onſet was giuen, and that in moſt furious wiſe, the Romans being at the firſt ſore annoied with arrowes and darts, which flue ſo thicke from ech ſide, that their ſight was in manner taken from them, the skie ſeeming as it had been couered ouer with a pentiſe. So that Maximianus perceiuing this diſaduantage, he cauſed a freſh legion of his ſoldiors to aduance forward to the ſuccour of their fellowes; by reaſon whereof the battell was forthwith moſt cruellie renewed, the hindermoſt wings of the Romans ſore preſſing vpon their enimies: ſo that in the end paſſing quite through their battels, they cauſed a great diſorder and feare amongſt thoſe Scots and other their confederats, which were placed in the hindermoſt ranks. But yet calling themſelues in a ring, they made great & ſtout reſiſtance for a ſpace, and at length a great number euen of the moſt valiant perſonages of the whole hoſt, cloſed themſelues togither, and with maine force aſſaied to haue broken through the thickeſt preaſe of their enimies, but being inuironed about on ech part, they were there ſlaine ech mothers ſonne. Whileſt the Romans drew togither to reſiſt on that ſide, other of the Scotiſhmen, Picts, Britains, & Welſhmen, found a waie to get forth through their enimies on the other ſide, and ſo being gotten paſt them, made awaie as faſt as their feet might beare them: but a great number being notwithſtanding ouertaken, were ſlaine and beaten downe right pitifullie.

Maximianus perceiuing the diſaduantage, prouideth to remedie the ſame.

The Scots diſordered.

Ferguſe the Scotiſh king, and Durſtus king of the Picts were ſlaine in this mortall battell togither, with the moſt part of all their nobilitie. Dionethus being ſore wounded eſcaped to the ſea ſide, and there getting a ſhip, paſſed ouer into Wales. This ouer-throw ſore diſmaied both the Scotiſh and Piciſh nations, who looked for nothing more than preſent expulſion out of their countries, for Maximianus purſuing the victorie, burſt into Galloway, moſt cruel-lie walking and ſpoiling the ſame. And when he had made an end there, he entred into Anandale, and into the Piciſh confines, deſtroieng all before him with fire and ſword. Camelon was beſieged, taken by force, and miſerablie put to ſacke and ſpoile, with

The two kings Fergu-ſe and Dur-ſtus are ſlaine. Dionethus eſcapeth.

Maximianus purſueth the victorie.

Camelon ta-ken by force.

diuerſe other notable townes and places, as well belonging to the Picts as Scots. Neither was there anie end of theſe cruell doings, till both the Scots & Picts for their refuge were generallie conſtreined to withdraw themſelues beyond the wall of Abircorne, which (as before is ſaid) a few yeres paſſed was begun by the Britains, and ſtretched from Abircorne aforeſaid, ouerthwart the land vnto Alcluth now Dunbreton.

The Scots and Picts withdraw beyond the wall of Abircorne.

Maximianus hauing thus driuen his enimies beyond this wall, cauſed them to make aſſurance by their oth of couenant, neuer to paſſe the ſame againe by waie of hoſtilitie, either againſt the Britains or Romans. There were that counſelled Maximianus either vtterlie to haue deſtroied both the Scots and Picts, either els to haue driuen them out of the whole Ile. But he being ſatiſfied with that which was alreadie done, thought good to returne vnto Yorke, and there to winter, that in the beginning of the nert ſpring he might go into Wales, to chaſtiſe Dionethus and other of that countrie for their rebellion, in aiding the enimies of the empire. But when the time came that he ſhould haue ſet forward on that iournie, he heard ſuch newes from the parties of beyond the ſeas, into what ruinous decaie the empire was fallen, without anie likelihood of recouerie, that changing his purpoſe, he minded to vſurpe the crowne of Britaine as abſolute king thereof himſelfe. And to haue the more fauor of the Britiſh nation without anie impeachment in the beginning of his reigne, he toke to wife one of the daughters of Dionethus, being the elder of thoſe two, which he onelie had without iſſue male, by the ſiſter of king Fergus. She that was thus coupled in mariage with Maximianus was called Othilia, & the other daughter named Vrſula was profeſſed a nun in an houſe of religion, to the intent that the whole right which Dionethus pretended to the realme, might remaine to the wife of Maximianus. Then was Dionethus made ſecond perſon of the realme, aſwell in degree of honor, as in publike gouerment.

Maximianus taketh vpon him the abſolute gouernance of Britaine, with the imperiall title.

He marrieth Othilia the daughter of Dionethus.

Dionethus reputed for ſecond perſon of the realme.

Eugenius.

Eugenius created king of Scots.

AND whileſt theſe things were thus a doing in Britaine, the Scotiſh lords had created Eugenius the ſonne of Fergus, king of their realme, as due to him by rightfull ſucceſſion from his father, who had gouerned the ſame by the ſpace of 16 yeres yer he was ſlaine (as before is ſpecified) in the laſt mentioned batteil. This Eugenius began his reigne (as we find) in the yere of our Lord 440, after the firſt beginning of the Scotiſh kingdome 767. His fathers corps, which at the firſt was ſecretlie buried, as occaſion ſuffered, whileſt the Romans were yet in the countrie, he cauſed to be taken vp, and conueied ouer into the Ile of Iona, otherwiſe called Colmekill, where, with all ſolemne pompe and ceremonies it was intumulated, according to the ordinance which he himſelfe had deuiſed in his life time, within the abbeie there.

420. H.B.

760. H.B.

The bodie of Fergus is buried in the abbeie of Iona, otherwiſe Colmekill.

In like manner Maximianus, to the intent to eſtabliſh himſelfe the more quietlie in the eſtate of Britaine, and to deliuer his ſubiects the Britains, which bordered vpon the Scotiſh dominions, from all trouble of warres, was contented to make peace with the Scots vpon light ſute made vnto him for the ſame. After this alſo, he being once fullie eſtabliſhed in the eſtate of Britaine, coueted alſo to atteine to the type in gouernment of the whole empire, and therefore aſſembling all the forces of the Britiſh youth, ſailed into Gallia, cauſing himſelfe to be proclamed emperor, and ſo vſurped that title; as in the Engliſh and Italian hiſtorie you maie find more largelie expreſſed. He left behind him in Britaine his father in law Dionethus as chiefe gouernor there, with one legion of Romane ſoldiors. After this did Etius the emperors lieutenant in France, ſend for ſuch Romans as Maximianus had left in Britaine, who reuolting from their othes of allegiance giuen vnto the ſame Maximianus, obeied Etius, as one that ſupplied the rome of their rightfull lord and maiſter the emperor Valentinian. So that in this wiſe was Britaine diſpurueied of all maner of able men for defenſe, whereof the Scots and Picts toke good occaſion to inuade the Britiſh borders, not ſparing to purſue with fire and ſword all ſuch of the Britains as did yet continue in obeiſſance to Maximianus.

Maximianus granteth peace to the Scotiſhmen.

The Scots and Picts inuade the Britains.

They firſt droue thoſe Britains out of all the countries, which had bene taken from them by the ſame Maximianus, and by other of the Romans and Britains, as Pictland, Vile, Carrike, and Coningham, Galloway, the Marches, and Northumberland. This done, they entered into Cumberland, Weſtmerland, and Kendall, not ceaſſing till they had ſpoiled and defaced all thoſe countries, with the moſt part of all Yorkeſhire, in ſuch cruell wiſe, that they made all thoſe quarters barren both of corne and cattell, which waie ſoeuer they paſſed. The Britains perceiuing into what danger they were brought, if ſome good redreſſe were not found in time, ſent ouer with all ſpeed vnto Rome for ſuccor to be had at the emperor Valentinians hands, for Maximianus was otherwiſe occupied. Valentinian deſirous to deliuer the Britains from ſuch cruell enimies as the Scots & Picts ſhewed themſelues to be, leaſt through their meanes all the whole Ile ſhould reuolt from the obedience of the Romans, appointed one Gallio borne in Rauenna, and as then ſoiorning about Paris in France, with a legion of ſoldiors to paſſe ouer into Britaine, to driue backe the Scots and Picts from further moleſting the ſubiects of the empire.

The prоſperous ſucceſſe of the Scotiſhmen.

The Britains require aid of Valentinian the emperor.

Gallio Rauennas is ſent ouer into Britaine.

The Scots and Picts refuſe to giue battell to the Romans.

The Scots and Picts vpon knowledge had of this Gallios arriuall, drew backe into their countries, not minding to fight with the Romans, whoſe force they doubted, and not without cauſe, hauing had in times paſt ſo manie ouerthrowes and ſlaughters at their hands. But Gallio purſued them euen vnto the water of Forth, where in ſundrie ſkirmiſhes he ſlue no ſmall number of them: and for that he knew he ſhould be ſent for ſhortlie to returne againe into France, to helpe to reſiſt ſuch barbarous nations as warred in the ſame, for the better defenſe of the Britains againſt their enimies the Scots and Picts (whome he knew would not be anie while in quiet after he was once gone) he cauſed the wall to be newlie made vp betwixt Abircorne & the mouth of Clude water, thereby to defend the Romane prouince from all ſudden inuaſions of the enimies. This wall was earſt made of turffe, but now repared with ſtone, and ſtrengthened with great poſts or piles of wood, driuen in betwixt in places moſt needfull. It was alſo 8 foot broad, and 12 foot high. And in certeine turrets caſt forth vpon this wall, Gallio appointed watch & ward to be kept, that vpon the enimies approch towards the ſame, warning might be giuen by fire in the night, and by ſmoke in the day, vnto ſuch of the Britains as dwelled neere vpon thoſe borders (commandement being giuen vpon paine of death for being found in the contrarie) that euerie man vpon ſuch knowledge had, ſhould reſort immediatlie to the place appointed, with ſuch armour and weapon as for him was requiſit.

Gallio purſueth the Scots and Picts.

Gallio cauſeth the wall of Abircorne to be repared.

The maner of the building of that wall.

The ordination of Gallio for watch to be kept of the wall.

When Gallio had thus giuen order for the ſuertie of the Britains, and deliuered them at that preſent from the cruell hands of their enimies, he returned into France with the armie that he brought with him, according to the commandement which he had from Etius the emperours lieutenant there. His departure out of Britaine was no ſoner knowne of the Scots and Picts, but that with all their maine force Gallio returneth into France.

The Scots and Picts determined to inuade the Britains againe.

The Britains reſort to the wall of Abircorne to defend it.

The Scots and Picts approoued the wall to aſſault it.

Graim aſſaulteth the wall.

The wall is ouerthrowen.

The Britains leaue Pictland and get themſelues ouer the riuer of Tine.

The wall of Adrian is repared by the Britains.

The countries lieng north from the wall of Adrian diuided amongeſt the Scots and Picts.

The Britains require aid at the hands of Etius.

force they determined to ſet vpon the Britains againe. So that aſſembling their powers togither, the kings of both thoſe nations exhort their men to dw valiantlie. Eugenius the king of the Scotiſhmen incourageth them through hope of high rewards and ſpoile. The Pictiſh king likewiſe for his part promiſeth the lieutenantſhip of Camelon (an office of moſt honor amongeſt them) vnto him that firſt ſhould paſſe the wall of Abircorne. Whereupon the Britains being aduertiſed of their enimies intentions according to the ordinance before appointed, drew in defenſible wiſe vnto that part of the wall, where they vnderſtood the Scots and Picts were minded to aſſault.

At length when the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings were come to the wall, and had their people readie to giue the approch, they themſelues ſtood apart ſomewhat out of danger of ſhot: and ſuch bands as were appointed to aſſaile, aduanced forth of the maine battels vnder the leading of that Graime, the which (as ye haue heard) was chiefe in expelling the Britains when they had firſt made the ſame wall by commandement of Victorine the Romane lieutenant. Neither ſhewed he leſſe proſe of his valiancie at this time than he had don before. For though the Britains made earneſt reſiſtance, ſo farre as their power would extend, yet at the length by great force the wall was vndermined and throwen downe in ſundrie places, ſo that the whole number of the Scots and Picts entered by the ſame into Pictland, beating downe the Britains on ech ſide that went about to make reſiſtance, for none eſcaped their hands, but ſuch as ſaued themſelues by flight.

There came alſo an other power of Scots and Picts by water out of Fife, and landing in Pictland, purſued the Britains with more crueltie than the kings did themſelues. Both houſes and people paſſed by fire and ſword, inſomuch that all ſuch of the Britains as could get away, withdrew forth of the countrie, not ſtaieng till they came beyond the riuer of Tine; by reaſon whereof, all the countrie which lieth betwixt Twéed and Tine was deliuered by appointment of the kings vnto the ſouldiers, to ſpoile and vſe at their pleaſure, whereupon followed manie notorious examples of crueltie, enuie, couetouſneſſe, wrath & malice. In the meane time, whileſt the Scotiſh and Pictiſh men of warre aplied their market, the Britains with all diligence repared and newlie fortified the other wall begun (as is ſaid) by the emperour Adrian, ſhooting ouerthwart the countrie from the riuer of Tine, vnto the riuer of Eſke.

Howbeit the Scots and Picts, becauſe winter approched, made no further attempt againſt the Britains at that time, but diuiding thoſe countries which lie by north from the foreſaid wall of Adrian, among themſelues, according to the order in that behalfe appointed by their kings, they fortified certeine caſtels and holds for defenſe of the ſame countries, as it were to countergarriſon ſuch Britains as continuallie kept watch and ward vpon the foreſaid wall. The Britains therefore miſtruſting leaſt ſo ſone as the ſpring were come, the Scots would inuade their countries which lay on the ſouth part of the ſame wall, breaking in by force through it, as they had done the yere before through the other wall of Abircorne, they ſent ambaſſadors vnto Etius the Romane lieutenant, gouerning Gallia now called France, vnder the emperour Valentinian, requiring to haue ſome aid and ſuccour at his hands, whereby to reſiſt ſuch fierce and cruell enimies, as ſought to deſtroy and expell out of their lands and houſes, all ſuch of the Britains as acknowledged themſelues in anie maner of wiſe ſubiects vnto the empire.

But Etius, whether he would not, or rather becauſe he conuenientlie could not (for that he was otherwiſe occupied in defenſe of Gallia againſt the French men) made a direct anſwere that he had no men of warre in ſtore to ſend ouer into Britaine, and therefore willed them to dw what they could for their owne defenſe, for aid of him they might none haue. The meſſengers returned home with this anſwere, and made report thereof in a publike aſſemblie of all the Britiſh nobilitie, being as then gathered togither at London to conſult there for the eſtate and order of their countrie. Where after long deliberation (notwithſtanding that they perceiued they ſhould haue no more aid from the Romans) it was yet determined, that to reſiſt the enimies, the whole puiſſance of the Britiſh nation ſhould be muſtered, as well men as women, being able to dw anie feat of ſeruice auailable in defenſe of their countrie, & rather to trie the vttermoſt point of fortunes chance, than to ſuffer themſelues to be ouerrun without reſiſtance. But Conanus Camber, a prince of great authoritie amongeſt them, as one that was deſcended of the bloud of Octauius ſometime king of Britaine, went about with earneſt perſuaſions to remoue the reſidue of the nobilitie from this determination, aduiſing them to ſéeke for peace at the Scotiſhmens hands, rather than to trie the doubtfull chance of Mars his iudgement, conſidering the féebleneſſe of their whole force now, euer ſince that the tyrant Maximianus had in manner emptied and diſpeopled the land of all ſuch able men as were apt for ſeruice in the warres. But this aduiſe of Conanus was verie euill taken, & moued the multitude that heard him, to be greatlie offended with his words, not ſparing to ſay that he ſpake like no true man nor louer of his countrie; ſo that the former ordinance (that is to ſay, to ſéeke an end of the wars by dint of ſword) was allowed for the beſt.

Etius refuſeth to aid the Britains.

The Britains forſaken of the Romans, determine yet to make reſiſtance.

Conanus Camber counſelleth the Britains to ſéeke peace at the Scotiſh mens hands.

Britaine diſpeopled of warlie men by Maximianus.

Conanus counſell is receiued.

Herevpon there were muſters taken, armour and weapon prouided, and both day and place appointed, where they ſhould aſſemble togither to march forth towards the enimie. Conanus ſore lamenting their doings, called almightie God to record, that that which he had ſaid, was ſpoken onelie for the loue & zeale which he bare to his countrie, & ſithence his aduiſe might not be followed, he doubted greatlie leaſt the ruine of the Britiſh ſtate by ſome fatall appointment drew faſt vpon them. The people hearing him ſpeake thus, ſome wilfull wicked perſons fell vpon him, and ſlue him there preſentlie amongſt them: wherewith other being ſore moued to indignation, ſet vpon the murtherers, there to haue reuenged his death immediatlie. Whereupon began taking of parts, and togither they went by the eares in ſuch a furious wiſe, that ſundrie amongeſt them being ſlaine, the magiſtrats had much adw to appeaſe the fraie.

The Britains make their appreſts to go againſt the Scots.

Conanus is ſlaine amongeſt the Britains.

In this meane time, whileſt the Britains were thus buſied in ſending of their ambaſſadours to the Romans, & conſulting togither for defenſe of their countrie, the Scots firſt raced downe the wall of Abircorne, not leauing one piece thereof whole, ſo that a few tokens excepted, nothing remaineth to be ſéene at this day of all that huge and wonderfull worke, it is called now in theſe daies Graimſdike, becauſe that Graime was not onelie (as ye haue hard) chiefe in expelling the Britains from the ſame, but alſo at this time in the racing of it to the ground he was the greateſt doer. Which being accompliſhed, the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings aſſembled their powers, and ouerthrew all ſuch fortreſſes as had not béene deſtroied the yeare before, ſtanding on the northſide of Adrians wall, the which wall the Britains

The Scots raſe the wall of Abircorne.

Graimſdike.

The Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings inuade the Britiſh borderers.

tains had newlie fortified, but yet were not able to defend the ſame from the power of the enimie, who now ſet vpon the Britains with maine force, in ſo much that vndermining the foundations of that wall in diuers places; at length ſundrie parts thereof were reuerſed into the ditch, ſo that the ſouldiers breaking in by the ſame, cruellie beate downe the Britains which ſtood at defenſe.

Adrians wall vndermined and ouerthrowen.

The entrie being thus wone, both the kings with their powers marched forth into the ſouth countries, commandement being giuen that no man vpon paine of death ſhould kill anie woman or child, aged perſon, or otherwiſe impotent and not able to beare armour. But this commandement in ſome places was but ſlenderlie obeied; ſuch deſire of reuenge was planted in the Scotiſhmens hearts, by reaſon of the remembrance of old iniuries, that vneath made they anie difference either of age or ſex. To be ſhort, all thoſe countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Tine and Humber, were waſted & ſpoiled, the whole number of the inhabitants (ſuch as could make ſhift to eſcape the enimies hands) got them ouer the foreſaid riuer of Humber, there to remaine as further out of danger. The report of which miſchiefe being brought to London, the lords there (who as ye haue heard were not all of one accord togither) they toke new aduiſe, to redreſſe the preſent miſchiefe in this maner. Firſt they thought it beſt to ſend forth two ambaſſadors, one to the Scots & Picts to require a peace; & an other with letters to Etius the Romane lieutenant in France, for freſh aid and ſuccour. The tenour of which letters as then ſent vnto Etius here inſueth.

Crueltie of Scots.

The lords of Britaine take new aduiſe.

Sée more hereof in England.

The tenour of the letters ſent vnto Etius from the Britains, as is written by Hect. Boetius.

The lamentable complaints of the Britains vnto Etius thrise conſull. At what time our elders became ſubiects vnto the Romans, they vnderſtood by worthie proues and notable examples, that the ſenate was a moſt ſafe refuge and hauen, to be wiſhed of all ſuch as fled to the ſame for ſupport. But we their poſteritie by the pernicious working of the legat Maximianus, tending wholie to our deſtruction, being ſpoiled both of force and ſubſtance, and therefore remaining in great danger of loſing both kingdome and liues, through the fore and terrible inuaſion of our moſt cruell enimies the Scots and Picts, making humble ſute for ſuccours vnto the Romane empire, according to the loiall truſt and moſt aſſured confidence, the which euer like true and faithfull ſubiects we haue repoſed in the ſame, are yet neglected, & nothing regarded, but deliuered as a prey vnto the barbarous nations to be ſpoiled, deſtroied, and ſlaine in moſt pitious wiſe, which can not but be an euident ſigne, that either the Romans haue changed their moſt commendable maners into the worſt that may be deuiſed, either els their moſt large empire, thorough the wrath and high diſpleaſure of almightie God, is now giuen for a prey vnto other forren nations. But if it be ſo, that the fatall force of the time preſent doth require, that without all remedie the land of the Britains being taken awaie from the Romans, muſt needs be brought vnder the ſubiection of ſome barbarous nation, we neither abhorre nor refuſe the gouernement of anie people or nation, the Scots and Picts (the moſt cruell of all other) onelie excepted, whoſe crueltie we hauing long ſince too too much taſted, are at this preſent brought vnto that point by their late increaſed puiſſance, that we know not now after the loſſe of our goods and cattell, which way to ſafe gard our liues, for the turffe walls being pulled downe, and the ditches filled vp with earth, which aforetime did ſomewhat ſtaie them, now breaking in vpon vs without letting paſſe anie one kind of crueltie, they haue deſtroied our fields, burned vp our houſes, townes & villages, beaten downe & raced euen to the ground our caſtels and towers, with ſuch other places of defenſe, not ſparing to put to the ſword as well the poore innocent children, women, and impotent aged, as ſuch other innumerable numbers of men, which they haue ſlaine ſtanding at defenſe with weapon in hand. And as for vs, which are the reſidue of our decaied nation, they haue driuen euen to the ſea ſide, and from thence (becauſe we cannot paſſe ouer) we are put backe vpon our enimies againe. And hereof proceed two kinds of our deſtruction, for either we are drowned in the raging flouds, either elſe ſlaine moſt vnmercifullie by our cruell enimies. Therefore if the honor of the Romane people, if our aſſured loialtie and loue, which we beare to the empire of Rome, now continued for the ſpace of theſe 500 yeares or thereabout, may moue you to rue on our miſeries, we humblie pray and beſeech you, not to ſuffer vs longer to be trodden vnder foot of theſe our moſt beaſtlie and cruell enimies, but ſend vnto vs ſome conuenable ſuccors and that with all ſpeed, leaſt we ſéeme to be more cruellie betraied of the Romans, than brought to deſtruction by theſe barbarous people, and that we be not ſet forth as a notable example for all other to beware, how they put confidence hereafter either in the rule or friendſhip of the Romans.

Paulus Diaconus, Beda, Geffray of Monmouth, Veremound, and others make mention of theſe foreſaid letters. Whereupon Etius anſwering, declared that thoſe calamities, miſfortunes and loſſes ſuſteined by the Britains were right diſpleaſant vnto him, and ſo much the more, for that through the ſundrie inuaſions made, aſwell into France as alſo into Italie it ſelfe, and into other parties of the Romane empire by people of ſundrie nations, he could not as then ſpare anie men of warre to ſend ouer vnto them, & therefore he willed the Britains to make the beſt ſhift they could to defend themſelues for a time, till things were better quieted in other parties, and then ſhould they ſée ſuch redreſſe of their iniuries prouided, as they ſhould thinke themſelues to be verie well reuenged. About the ſame time that the ambaſſadours returned with this anſwere vnto London from Etius, the other alſo came backe forth of the north without hope to ſpéed of that about the which they had bin ſent, for the Scots & Picts would incline to no reaſonable conditions of peace, vnleſſe the Britains would wholie ſubmit themſelues as ſubiects vnto them. The Britains hereat toke ſuch indignation, that by generall conſent they agreed to trie it out with the enimies by maine force; & hereupon made their prouiſion with all diligence. The Scots and Picts hearing of the Britains intents, gathered their people togither with more ſpéed than was thought poſſible for them to haue done, & forthwith ruſhed into the borders of their enimies countries in right puiſſant wiſe and moſt warlike order.

But not ſo largelie as here is expreſſed.

The anſwere of Etius.

The Scots and Picts would agree vpon no reaſonable conditions of peace.

The Scots and Picts prepare againſt the Britains.

In the fore ward went ſuch as came forth of Galloway and Annandale, with thoſe Picts which inhabited about the coaſts of Barwike. Then followed there a mightie battell of thoſe which came forth of Argile, Athole, and other Picts inhabiting nére vnto the parties of Kalendar and Camelone with them of Fife, and Angus. In the midſt of this battell both the kings kept their place with their choiſeſt ſouldiers, and ſtandards borne afore them. Then went the carriage and truſſe of the armie, next whereunto a great number of noble men of both the nations followed in faire order of battell, with their ſeruants and men of warre the beſt they could chooſe forth. And laſt of all (as the maner of thoſe nations hath béene euen from the beginning) there came a great multitude of the cõmons cloſing vp the back of the whole whole aforeſaid armie.

The order of the Scots and Picts entring into the lands of the Britains.

The Britains alſo comming forth into the field with their whole puiſſance to incounter their enimies, when they vnderſtood by eſpials the order and maine force of the Scots and Picts, they were halfe diſcouraged in their minds, and thought good therefore once againe to aſſaie if anie peace might be purchaſed. But ſending forth their ambaſſadours vnto the confederat kings, to that end their anſwere was, that except the Britains would yéeld themſelues, their wiues and children, with all their goods and ſubſtance into the hands of their enimies, ſimplie without all conditions, there would be no peace granted. When this was knowen abroad in the hoſt of the Britains, what thorough kindled ire on the one part, and foule deſpaire on the other, prouoking their minds to diſpleaſure, they generallie vpon change of purpoſe required battell, euen all the whole number of them.

The Britains vpon the Scotiſhmens refuſall to haue peace, require to haue battell.

Hereof inſued a moſt cruell and mortall fight: for the Britains (as it were) reſolued to die in defenſe of their countrie, and to reuenge their owne deaths vpon their enimies, with more fiercenеſſe than is credible to be thought, gaue the onſet, and ouerthrew a great number of their enimies, inſomuch that thoſe of Galloway and the Picts fighting in the fore ward with them of Argile, Athole, and ſuch other as were in the battell with the kings, were in great danger to be put to the worſe: which Graime perceiuing (by whome the moſt part of the armie was ruled, and that by commandement of both the kings) called forth a number of the Iland-men, who were appointed to attend the cariage, and ſent them with all diligence to the fore ward to the ſuccors of them of Galloway, being then at the point to haue ſought refuge by flight. But by the comming of theſe Iland-men to their ſuccors, they toke courage afreſh, ſo that the battell was againe moſt fiercelie renewed, and ſo continued a ſpace with great ſlaughter on both parts, till finallie the Britains being oppreſſed with the multitude of their enimies, and not able longer to indure, fell to running awaie, thinking to ſaue themſelues in certeine bogs, moſſes, and mariſh grounds nære vnto the place of the battell: but ſuch coiſterels, and other as remained with the Scotiſh cariage, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of their aduerſaries, ran forth and purſued them into thoſe mariſhes, killing and taking no ſmall number of them. There were ſlaine in this battell of the Britains, aboue 15 thouſand, and of the Scots and Picts nére hand foure thouſand.

The fierce onſet giuen by the Britains.

Graimes authoritie in ordering of the battels.

Thoſe of the weſterne Iles comming to the ſuccors of the fore ward, reſtored the battell.

The Britains run awaie.

The number of them that were ſlaine on both ſides.

The Britains hauing receiued this ouerthrow, ſaw no helpe which waie to recouer their loſſes, but onelie to ſue for peace at the victors hands. They ſent therefore an orator vnto the Scotiſh & Pictiſh kings, beſeeching them humblie to grant them a peace, euen with what conditions it ſhould pleaſe them to preſcribe. The kings not moued onelie with the preſent fortune of the Britains, but alſo partlie with their owne, hauing loſt no ſmall number of right worthie perſonages in the battell, were contented to grant a peace vpon theſe conditions: That the Britains ſhould in no wiſe receiue anie lieutenant or armie hereafter from Rome, nor ſuffer anie enimie of the Scotiſh and Pictiſh eſtats, of what nation ſoeuer he were, to paſſe through their countrie. They ſhould enter into no league with anie citie or nation, nor be about to make anie warres without conſent of the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings, and further ſhould be readie to ſerue them againſt all maner of enimies whenſoeuer they ſhould be ſent for. Moreouer, they ſhould remoue with their wiues, children, and whole families out of all thoſe countries, lieng betwixt Tine and Humber, reſigning the poſſeſſion of the ſame vnto the Scotiſhmen and Picts.

The Britains make humble ſute for peace.

Peace granted by the Scots with the conditions of the ſame.

Alſo they ſhould giue threeſcore thouſand peeces of gold then current to the Scotiſh & Pictiſh kings, towards the diſpatch of their ſouldiors wages, and further ſhould yéeld as a tribute twentie thouſand peeces of gold, to be paied yeerelie vnto the ſeuerall vſes of the victors. They ſhould likewiſe deliuer one hundred hoſtages of ſuch as the two kings ſhuld appoint, betwixt the age of eightéene and thirtie yeers. Theſe conditions of peace though they ſéemed verie ſtreict & greeuous to the Britiſh nobilitie, yet for that they vnderſtood not how to make a better bargaine, they perſuaded the multitude to accept them, and ſo a league thereupon was concluded amongſt thoſe people, and the publike ſtate of the land brought to a more quiet rule than it had béene before. Thus were the Britains made tributarie to the Scotiſhmen and Picts, about 500 yéeres after Julius Ceſar had brought them in ſubiection to the Romans, being in the yeere after the birth of our Sauiour 446, and of Eugenius his reigne ouer the Scotiſhmen the ſeuenth.

60000 pound ſaith Balantine, after the rate of Scotiſh monie. 20000 pound ſaith the ſame Balantine, ſo that he eſtéemeth thoſe peeces of gold to be of the value of French crownes.

The Britains tributarie to the Scots and Picts. 436. H.B.

In this ſeaſon was the Ile of Albion ſore infected with the hereſie of the Pelagians, and therefore pope Celeſtine ſent one Paladius a learned man vnto the Scots, to preſerue them from that infection, and ordeined him biſhop, the firſt in Scotland that had his inueſture from Rome: for all the other before him were ordeined by the voices or ſuffrages of the people, chooſing them forth among the monks and prieſts called Culdeis, as the Scotiſh chronicles do report. Paladius with right good and wholeſome exhortations purged the Scots and Picts of ſundrie ſuperſtitious rites of their old gentiliſh idolatrie, till thoſe daies vſed amongſt them, whereupon he is named and reputed for the Scotiſhmens apoſtle. He lieth at Fordune, a towne in Mernes, where his reliques remained, and were long after had in great eſtimation.

The hereſie of the Pelagians.

Paladius ſent into Scotland.

Of this Paladius ſpoke more in Ireland.

Paladius accompted the apoſtle of Scotland.

Moreouer he inſtituted one Seruan biſhop of the Orkenies, that he might inſtruct the inhabitants there in the faith of Chriſt, which as yet they had not receiued: and one Teruan, whome he himſelfe had baptiſed, he made archbiſhop of Pictland. In theſe daies alſo manie ſtrange ſights were ſéene in ſundrie parts of Britaine before the laſt mentioned ouerthrow: the moone being in plaine oppoſition to the ſunne, when it ſhould be moſt round, appeared in a quadrant figure. At Yorke it rained bloud: and trées in ſundrie places being blaſted, withered and died. The market place, or rather (if ye will ſo tearme it) Cheapeſide in London opened, ſo that a great hole appeared, and manie houſes were ſwallowed vp. About the ſame ſeaſon alſo (as is ſuppoſed) liued that huge perſonage Finmacoell, a Scotiſhman borne of ſeuen cubites in height. He was a great hunter, and ſore feared of all men by reaſon of his mightie ſtature, and large limbs: manie fables go abroad of him, not ſo agreeable to the likelihood of truth, as ought to be regiſtred in an hiſtorie, and therefore here paſſed ouer with ſilence.

Seruan biſhop of Orkenie, and Teruan archbiſhop of Pictland.

Vnketh ſights and ſtrange wonders appered.

Finmacoell the great hunter.

The Romane empire being brought into irrecouerable ruine by the Vandals, Gothes, Hunnes, Frenchmen, and other barbarous nations, occupieng ſundrie parts and portions thereof, put the Britains out of all hope to haue anie aſſiſtance from the emperors, which cauſed them to remaine in quiet certein yeers without attempting any exploit againſt the Scots or Picts, and ſo duelie paid their couenanted tribute, though ſore againſt their wils, if they might otherwiſe haue remedied it. At the laſt about ten yeers after the concluſion of this laſt peace, it chanced that one Conanus the ſonne of the aboue Conanus a Britaine goeth about to perſuade his countriemen to breake the peace concluded with the Scots and Picts.

mentioned Conanus, deſcended of the bloud of the Octauij, ſometimes kings of the Britains, ſore maligned to ſée his countrie thus brought into thraldome of the Scotiſh nation, and deuiſing how to find ſome redres, called togither the moſt part of the Britiſh nobilitie, by ſecret meſſage home to a manour place which he had within a thicke wood in the countrie of Kent, and there opening vnto them a great péece of his mind, perſuaded them with the weightieſt reaſons he could imagine, to leuie warre againſt the Scots and Picts, hauing at that preſent, meanes now ſince the laſt warres to mainteine it, as well by reaſon of their increaſe both of able men, as alſo of ſubſtance to furniſh them withall.

The Britains hauing reſpect to their ſonnes & kinſmen lieng in hoſtage would not agrée to breake the peace.

Héere the nobles were of ſundrie opinions: for ſome aweried with the note of bondage, would gladlie haue had warres: other hauing regard to their ſons lieng in hoſtage with the enimies, would in no wiſe conſent thereto: by reaſon whereof this councell brake vp without concluſion of anie effect. When ech man was returned to his home, there had béene ſome amongſt them, that gaue knowledge to the confederate kings what motion had béene made, and what was intended againſt them. Whereupon they immediatlie determined, not onelie to cauſe the hoſtages to be executed, but alſo to purſue the rebels with fierce and cruell warres. Yet before they practiſed anie violence, they ſent their ambaſſadors vnto the Britains, to vnderſtand their full meaning, and to declare vnto them further certeine articles which the ſaid kings required to haue performed without all delaies, or elſe to looke for open warre out of hand.

The kings of the Scots & Picts offended with the conſpiracie of the Britains, preſcribe vnto them new articles to be performed.

The chiefeſt points of which articles were theſe. Firſt that the Britains ſhould not aſſemble togither in councell without licence of the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings, notwithſtanding that their ancient lawes they might vſe at their pleaſure, but they ſhould receiue no ſtranger into their countrie being a Romane or a Frenchman, neither merchant nor other. Their old hoſtages they ſhould receiue home againe, and deliuer in exchange of them twiſe ſo manie in number of the like age and degrée, as was couenanted by the former league. The commons of the land vnderſtanding what was demanded by theſe ambaſſadors, were in a wonderfull rage, and would haue made a great ſturre if they had not béene quieted by the lords, who for their paines taken herein, got them an euill report amongſt the inferior ſort of people, as though through their want of ſtomach onlie, the common-wealth was brought in to ſuch a miſerable eſtate, that loke what it pleaſed the enimie to charge the Britiſh nation with, no man durſt once ſpeake againſt it.

Impudent ſeruilitie intruded vpon the Britains by the proud and cruell Scots, if it be true.

The commons of Britaine offended with their gouernors.

This grudge of the commons increaſed ſo farre forth againſt their ſuperiors, that after the Scotiſh and Pictiſh ambaſſadors were returned home, with anſwer agréeable to their demandes, their aroſe incontinentlie a great commotion of the people, conſpiring togither the vtter deſtruction of the whole nobilitie. But their furie was repreſſed, ſo that they were ouerthrowne in battell at two ſeuerall times with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed, whereupon they withdrew into the mounteins, and there kept themſelues, making raiſes vpon the nobilitie, and fetching booties awaie from the heards and flocks of cattell belonging to the lords and gentlemen: but finallie through famine which began to oppreſſe both parties, they perceiued what néed the one had of the others helpe, and ſo they agréed. This ciuill warre ſore decaied the force of the Britains, for beſide the great ſlaughter that was made betwixt them, by the auoiding of the commons out of their houſes, the ground laie vntilled, whereof inſued a maruellous great ſcarſitie and dearth of all things, by reaſon whereof an innumerable ſort of people died. Yet ſhortlie after followed ſuch plentie, that thoſe that were left aliue forgetting the paſſed miſeries, gaue themſelues to all kind of vice, which tooke ſuch root in the hearts of the more part of them, that for anie man to vſe anie maner of vertue amongſt them, was a readie meane to procure great enuie and hatred.

One eſtate of men cannot liue without helpe of another.

Superfluous wealth occaſion of vice.

In the meane time liued the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings in good quiet and reſt, applieng their ſtudies onelie how to inſtruct their people now after the warres were once ended, in laudable exerciſes and neceſſarie occupations, conuenient for the time of peace, whereby their realmes might flouriſh in welth and proſperitie without dread of anie forren power. For they ſaw ſuch tokens of ruine in the Britiſh eſtate, as ſmall likelihood appeared, that the ſame ſhould at anie time be able to recouer againe the former force and dignitie. Finallie the Scotiſh king Eugenius hauing aduanced the eſtate of his countrie vnto more felicitie and wealth than anie of his predeceſſors had euer done before him, after he had reigned thirtie yéeres, he ended his life about the fourth yéere of Leo, that vſurped the empire of Conſtantinople.

The Scots applie themſelues to peace.

The death of Eugenius the Scotiſh king.

Dongard.

But forſomuch as Eugenius left no iſſue behind him, his brother named Dongard ſucceéded in the eſtate. He began his reigne in the yéere 470, and his chéefeſt ſtudie was, according to his brothers example, to prouide for the maintenance of good orders and iuſtice, appointing in euerie quarter men of good fame and report to haue the adminiſtration vnder him, with commandement that they ſhould diligentlie foreſée, that euerie man might inioy his owne. He himſelfe tooke vpon him alſo to ſée to the reparing of ſuch caſtels as were decaied, and to the building vp of new in places where he thought moſt expedient, ſpeciallie néere to the Britiſh borders, for he well conſidered that peace increaſed riches, riches pride and preſumption, with other ſinnes, which could not long indure without the plague of warres. Therefore he doubting the changes of ſcornefull fortune, thought good in time of peace to prouide for the dangers of warre, when the ſame ſhould happen vnto him.

Dongard king of Scots. 461. H.B.

The ſtudie of Dongard for preſeruation of iuſtice and good orders.

The reparing of caſtels by K. Dongard.

These ciuill policies and princelie prouiſions for defenſe of his countrie and ſubiects increaſed the fame of Dongard mightilie, but that which he did towards the aduancement of religion did moſt exceedinglie ſet forth his commendation. Firſt, all ſuch religious men as followed the trade of life taught by Paladius and others, which came with him from Rome, he cauſed them to be highlie reuerenced: and for the maintenance of their liuing, he aſſigned forth lands, houſes, and other kinds of reuenues in diuers places of his realme, and granted not onelie vnto them, but alſo vnto all other, being within anie orders of clergie, ſundrie priuileges, appointing that the churches & abbeies with other holie places ſhould be infranchiſed and taken for ſanctuaries, that all ſuch as fled to the ſame for ſafegard of their liues, ſhould be ſuffered to reſt in peace, ſo long as they kept them within the ſame.

The bountifous liberalitie of Dongard towards churchmen.

Sanctuaries.

About the ſame time alſo, and whileſt theſe things were thus a doing in Scotland, the Britains being aweried of their ſeruile eſtate, through the ſetting on of Conanus, conſpired together, and tooke aduiſe by what meanes they might beſt ſéeke to deliuer themſelues from the thraldome of Scots and Picts, and vpon aduiſe taken they concluded to ſend ouer into Britaine Armorike ſome honorable ambaſſage vnto Andronenus the king of that countrie for aid. Herewith was the archbiſhop of London appointed

The Britains ſend into Britaine Armorike for aid.

ted as chiefe ambaſſador to go on that meſſage, which archbiſhop vſed ſuch diligence in the matter, that Conſtantine the ſonne of the ſaid Andꝛoenus was appointed by his father with a competent power of men to go ouer into great Bꝛitaine to the aid of the Bꝛitiſh inhabitants there. Hereupon, when the men & ſhips with all neceſſarie pꝛouiſion were once ꝛeadie, he imbarked at Saint Malo, where the aſſemblie was made, and taking the ſea, ſailed fꝛoꝛth with pꝛoſperous wind and weather, which bꝛought him ſafelie into great Bꝛitaine, where he landed at Totnes in Deuonſhire, as you ſhall find in the chꝛonicles of England. He was receiued with no ſmall ioy, and fꝛoꝛthwith pꝛoclamed king of Bꝛitaine, whereupon he pꝛomiſed to aſſaie to the vttermoſt of his power to recouer againe their whole lands and liberties, and to maintaine them in the ſame accoꝛding to their wiſhed deſires.

Aid ſent into Bꝛitaine from the Armoꝛike Bꝛitains.

Conſtantine pꝛoclamed king of Bꝛitaine.

Foꝛ the moꝛe ſpeedie accompliſhment hereof, commandement was firſt giuen, that all able men ſhould be in a readineſſe, and come togither at a place appointed neere to the riuer of Humber within foꝛtie daies after. Which oꝛder being taken by the aduiſe of the loꝛds and nobles of the realme, the ſame was put in execution with ſuch diligence, that few oꝛ none being apt to beare aꝛmoꝛ, withdꝛew themſelues, euerie man in manner comming to the appointed place of the aſſemblie, and offering to go againſt the enimies, ſo that it was a wonder to conſider the conſent of the people now ioined in one mind and will to recouer their foꝛmer libertie. When Conſtantine beheld ſuch notable numbers of men, he ſuppoſed the ſame would haue ſufficed not onelie to vanquiſh the Scots and Picts, but alſo vtterlie to deſtroie & race them out of all the confines of Albion.

The aſſemblie of the Bꝛitiſh armie.

The great earneſtnes of the Bꝛitains to recouer their libertie.

When the newes of all this pꝛeparation foꝛ warres which the Bꝛitains made, was once ſignified to the Scots and Picts, they likewiſe made their appꝛeſtes to meet with them in the field, and thereupon raiſing their powers, came fꝛoꝛth with the ſame into Yoꝛkeſhire, and pitched their camps within foure miles where Conſtantine with his people was lodged, and the next day after, vnderſtanding how neere vnto the enimie they were, they raiſed and marched foꝛwards till they came within ſight of him, as then incamped with his people aloft vpon certeine hils, neere to the afoꝛeſaid riuer ſide. Here both the kings of Scots and Picts lodging with their armies foꝛ that night, made readie foꝛ battell againſt the nert day, and in the moꝛning Dongard the Scotiſh king getting him to a little hill, called his men togither, & there exhoꝛted them by ſundꝛie comfoꝛtable meanes of perſuaſion to put awaie all feare, and to fight valiantly, aſſuring them of victoꝛie if they would keepe the oꝛder of battell by him appointed, and not raſhlie bꝛeake fꝛoꝛth of the ſame in following vpon the enimies when they fell to retiring backe.

The Scots and Picts make their appꝛeſts.

The Scots and Picts appꝛoch neere to the Bꝛittains.

Dongard exhoꝛteth his people to fight manfullie.

He had ſcarſe made an end of his woꝛds, but that diuerſe of the ſtanding watch came in, and declared how the Bꝛitains began to auale the hils where they had lodged, and that the Picts were got fꝛoꝛth alreadie in oꝛder of battell, and were marching foꝛwards to incounter them. Dongard ſhewing himſelfe to be right ioifull of theſe newes, commanded incontinentlie, that the ſtandards ſhould aduance fꝛoꝛth, and euerie man to attend the ſame accoꝛding to his appointed oꝛder. Alſo that no man ſhould pꝛeſume to take anie pꝛiſoner befoꝛe the end of the battell, noꝛ to yeeld himſelfe ſo long as life laſted. So that ioining with his enimies, there followed a verie fierce and cruell battell. At length both the wings of the Bꝛitains gaue backe from the Scotiſhmen & Picts, the middle ward abiding the bꝛunt verie ſtoutlie. Where Conſtantine himſelfe ſtood like a valiant chiefteine, doing his endeuour to the vttermoſt of his power, vpon whome Dongard earneſtlie pꝛeaſſing, and entring into the thickeſt thꝛong of his enimies, was there beaten downe amongſt the Armoꝛike Bꝛitains, and being about to get vp againe by helpe of his weapon, was againe felled to the earth, and ſlaine with manie a ſoꝛe wound.

The wings of the Bꝛitiſh armie are put backe.

Dongard is ſlaine.

Diuers of the Scots diſcomfited with this great miſhap, fell to running awaie: other kindled with moꝛe wꝛath laid about them moꝛe egerlie. The Picts alſo, foꝛ their part fought moſt conſtantlie, ſo that the battell continuing vntill none daie with doubtfull ſucceſſe, at length the Bꝛitains were conſtreined ſomething to giue backe, & after taking themſelues to fearfull flight, declared that the victoꝛie remained with their enimies. There died in this moꝛtall battell neere to the point of 16 thouſand of the Bꝛitains, and of the Scots & Picts aboue 14 thouſand, with Dongard and the Scotiſh king. Conſtantine the day nert after the battell, withdꝛew ſouthwards. The Scots carried away with them the coꝛps of their dead king, and conueieng it into the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, there buried it in kinglie wiſe. Dongard was thus ſlaine, in the fift yeere of his reigne, after the birth of our Sauioꝛ 475 yeeres, and about the ſecond yeere of Zeno the emperoꝛ.

The Bꝛitains are put to flight.

465. H.B.

8. of Leo. H.B.

Conſtantine.

Conſtantine the firſt of that name is created king of Scots.

After him ſucceeded in gouerment of the Scotiſh kingdome Conſtantine the bꝛother of the aboue rehearſed Eugenius, a pꝛince vnlike in noble vertues vnto his bꝛother the ſaid Eugenius. Foꝛ though in him there appeered ſome good tokens of commendable towardlineſſe, as he ſeemed outwardlie to ſhew, yet was he giuen moꝛe vnto wanton pleaſure and luſt, than to the regard of the good rule and gouernment of his ſubiects, a deflourer of virgins, a rauiſher of honeſt matrones, and aboue all, a fauourer of backbiters and ſlanderers; neuer ſhewing anie ioifull countenance amongſt his nobles, but amongſt ſcoffing ieſters and other vile perſons he was as pleaſant and merie as the iocundeſt man alive. Thus though he repꝛeſented the Bꝛitiſh king Conſtantine in name, yet in manners he far differed from him: foꝛ the Bꝛitiſh Conſtantine ſtudieng to aduance the commonwealth of his ſubiects, trained them in laudable exerciſes, & reduced them from their foꝛmer euill vſages vnto ciuill oꝛder and good cuſtoms. Contrariwiſe, the Scotiſh Conſtantine did nothing woꝛthie pꝛaiſe at all, after he was once inſtituted king, but followed ſtill his owne inoꝛdinate luſt and ſenſuall appetite.

Conſtantine the Scotiſh king nothing like in nobis conditions vnto Conſtantine king of the Bꝛitains.

He granted peace vnto the Bꝛitains they ſcarſe requiring the ſame, releaſing not onelie the tribute, but alſo deliuering vp into their hands by ſecret meanes diuers caſtels ſtanding vpon the riuer of Humber. Manie other things he was about to haue done to the great pꝛeiudice and hinderance of the Scotiſh eſtate, had not the nobles of the realme the ſooner withſtood his raſh and vnaduiſed attempts. Such malice alſo was ingendꝛed in the harts of the moſt part of the nobilitie towards him, that had it not beene thꝛough the wholeſome admonition & perſuaſion of Dongall of Galloway, a noble man of right reuerend authoꝛitie amongſt them, they had leuied ciuill wars againſt him, but the foꝛeſaid Dongall declaring to them the great danger and inconuenience that might thereof inſue, reſtreined their wꝛathfull minds from enterpꝛiſing anie thing againſt him by foꝛce, ſo that foꝛ certeine yeeres they ſuffered and bare with this his miſoꝛdered gouerment.

Peace granted vnto the Bꝛitains, and diuers caſtels deliuered into their hands.

The good counſell of Dongall.

In the meane while the Picts noting the want of all vertuous qualities thus in the king of Scots, and againe what tokens of valiant courage appeered in the king of the Bꝛitains, doubted leaſt if he ſhould

The Picts ſtand in feare of the king of Bꝛitaine.

ſeeke

ſéke to reuenge old iniuries againſt them, they ſhould be little able to match him without aid of the Scots (whereof they had ſmall truſt now, by reaſon of the inſufficiencie of the Scotiſh king) they deuiſed a meane how to rid the Britiſh king out of the waie, and ſo appointing certeine ſlie fellowes to go into Britaine for the accompliſhment of their deuiſed purpoſe, at length the ſame was brought to paſſe, as in the Engliſh chronicles ye ſhall find more at large, though in the ſame chronicles there is mention made but of one Pict that ſhould worke this feat, where the Scotiſh writers record of diuers, which neuertheleſſe were apprehended, and after bound both hand and foot, were caſt into a mightie great fire, and therein burnt to aſhes in moſt miſerable wiſe, as by the ſaid Scotiſh writers it appéareth. The death of this Conſtantine king of Britains happened in the 15 yeare of Conſtantine king of Scots, neither liued he long after: for hauing raviſhed a noble mans daughter, borne in the weſterne Iles, he was ſlaine by hir father in the night ſeaſon, after he had reigned in great infamie for his reprochfull life, the ſpace of 17 yéares.

Conſtantine the Scotiſh king is ſlaine by one whoſe daughter he had raviſhed. Anno 481.

Dongall.

Dongall the ſonne of Dongard is made king of Scotland.

Then was Dongall his nephue, as ſonne to his brother Dongard, proclamed king, a prince of diſpoſition indifferent either to peace or warre, though in the beginning of his reigne he ſhewed himſelfe more deſirous of peace than of warres, by reaſon the ſtate of the common-wealth ſo required, conſidering how things ſtood not all in the beſt order, through his predeceſſors negligence. Dongall therefore deſirous of a reformation, appointed men of great wiſedome and good fame to be iudges and officers vnder him, who in redreſſing miſorders, in puniſhing tranſgreſſions, & in deciding of all ſtriues and contentions betwixt partie & partie, did ſo well their endeuour, that peace and concord therevpon inſuing, the people recouered peaceable reſt and quietneſſe, to their no ſmall comfort and contentation.

The politike rule of Dongall.

In this meane while that things paſſed thus among the Scots, by the procurement of one Mortigerne, Conſtantius the eldeſt ſonne of the late deceaſſed Conſtantine king of Britains, was taken out of an abbeie, where he was ſhorne a monke, and aduanced to the kingdome: but being not meet of himſelfe to gouerne, Mortigerne had the whole rule committed to his hands, whereupon he firſt cauſed the league to be renewed betwixt the Britains, the Scots, and Picts, and appointed a gard of the ſame Scots and Picts to be attendant on the kings perſon: in the end alſo he procured ſome of them to murther the king, and after put all the ſaid Scots and Picts to death, as well the giltie as the vngiltie, and finallie made himſelfe king, as in the hiſtorie of England you ſhall find more at large expreſſed.

Conſtantius a monke elected king of Britaine.

Mortigerns treaſon. Conſtantius murdered.

The Scots and Picts (for diſpleaſure that their countriemen which had béene appointed to gard the perſon of Conſtantius king of the Britains, were maliciouſlie circumuented, & the more part of them wrongfullie executed) made ſundrie roades and forraies into the Britiſh borders, neither ſparing fire nor ſword where they came. So that the ſaid Mortigerne by a gréeuous report informed héereof, cauſed an armie with all ſpéed to be leuied, and appointed Guitellus the prince of Wales to haue the leading thereof againſt the enimies: whileſt he (doubting leaſt the people would not be ruled by him, for that it was knowen how he would haue made waie Conſtantines children) kept him about London, & durſt not commit himſelfe ſo much to the ſight of a multitude, as to go forth in that iournie in his owne perſon.

Guitellus generall of the Britiſh armie

Guitellus, in reſpect of the loue which he bare to his countrie, purpoſing to ſerue truelie in defenſe thereof, chanced vpon his approch to the borders to take the number of fiue hundred of the enimies, being aduanced from the reſidue to fetch a botie. Theſe Guitellus cauſed to be hanged, as condemned for robbers and pillers of the countrie afore anie ouerture of warre was denounced. Whereupon ſuch other as eſcaped by flight, and had ſéene their fellowes thus executed, declared vnto their gouernors what had happened vnto their fellowes. The confederate kings, being in a great chafe héerewith, gather togither their people, and haſte forward with all ſpéed toward the enimies, who at the firſt ſhewed manifeſt tokens that they were ſore afraid of the Scotiſh and Piciſh power: whereupon Guitellus their generall with comfortable words willed them to be of good courage, and not to doubt of victorie, hauing ſo iuſt a cauſe to fight with truce-breakers, and ſuch as were giuen more vnto pillage and ſpoile, than to anie other commendable exerciſe or practiſe of warre.

Guitellus cauſeth fiue hundred of the enimies to be hanged.

The Scotiſh and Piciſh kings gather their people to reſiſt the Britains.

Guitellus incourageth the aſſailed parts of his men of warre with comfortable words.

With ſuch and ſundrie other the like words the Britains being imboldened, as might well appéere by their change of countenances, Guitellus thereupon remoued his campe more néere vnto his enimies, ſo that at the firſt and for certeine daies togither, there chanced onelie diuers ſkirmiſhes betwixt the parties, as occaſion ſerued. But at length the one being ſore moued againſt the other, they ioine in a pight field. The beginning of which battell was verie fierce and doubtfull. For on that ſide where Dongall the Scotiſh king fought, the Britains ſhortlie began to preuaile, through the faint fighting of his people: which danger Galanus the Piciſh king quicklie perceiuing, forthwith prouided remedie: for taking with him certeine bands out of his owne battell, willing the reſidue to ſtand to it manfullie, and in no wiſe to giue ground to the enimie, he himſelfe with the ſaid bands fetched a compaſſe about, and ſet vpon the backs of them that ſo had ouermatched the Scots.

The Britains ioine in a pight field with the Scots and Picts.

The Scots are put backe. Galane king of Picts ſuccoureth the Scots.

This ſudden chance ſore diſordered the Britains, and immediatlie the Scots incouraged afreſh, aſſailed their enimies with more eger minds than they had done at the firſt, ſo that maintenantlie both the wings of the Britiſh armie were vtterlie diſcomfited. And héerewith a certeine number of the Picts were commanded by their king to make haſte to win the campe of the Britains, that ſuch as ſought to eſcape by flight, ſhould find no refuge in the ſame. Thus the Britains being chaſed and ſlaine on euerie ſide, they knew not whither to flée: ſo that in the end a great number of them throwing awaie their weapons, yéelded themſelues, moſt humblie crauing mercie at their enimies hands. There were ſlaine in this battell aboue twentie thouſand of the Britains, togither with their generall Guitellus, and a great number of other of the nobilitie. There died alſo of the Scots and Picts néere hand foure thouſand. The priſoners with the ſpoile of the field were diuided by appointment of the kings amongſt the ſouldiers. Which done, they marched forth into the countrie to conquere caſtels and townes, ſuch as ſtood in their waie.

The wings of the Britains put to flight.

The campe of the Britains won.

The Britains chaſed, know not whither to flée.

Guitell with twentie thouſand Britains ſlaine.

Foure thouſand Scots and Picts ſlaine.

In the meane time, the Britains being ſore diſcomfited with the ouerthrow, aſſembled a councell at London, there to deuiſe by what meanes they might beſt defend their countrie from the imminent danger in the which it now ſtood. Mortigerne as one giltie in conſcience, doubted leaſt through want of good wils in his commons, he ſhould not be able to withſtand the mightie inuaſion of his enimies, wherupon he was minded to haue auoided the realme, but there were of his councell that aduiſed him to the contrarie, holding, that better it was for him to trie the vttermoſt point of fortunes hap, than with diſho-

A counſell holden at London.

Mortigerne doubting the hatred of his people, would haue fled out of his realme.

diſhonor ſo to yéeld at the firſt blow of hir froward hand, conſidering the abundance of treaſure which he had in ſtore, wherewith he might wage ſouldiers and men of warre out of Germanie & other places, in number ſufficient to match with his enimies. This counſell as the beſt was followed, and meſſengers with commiſſion & ſufficient inſtructions ſent with all ſpéed into Germanie, to reteine a number of Saxons, and to bring them ouer into Britaine, to ſerue againſt the Scots and Picts in wages with Uortigerne.

Uortigerne is counſelled to ſend for aid into Germanie.

At the ſame time there were amongſt thoſe Saxons two brethren, deſcended by rightfull linage of the princes of that nation, who being reputed for valiant capteins, appointed with the Britiſh commiſſaries for a certeine ſumme of monie to take vp their preſcribed number of men, & to receiue charge of them as coronels, aſwell for their conuaie ouer into Britaine, as alſo for their ſeruice there, after their arriual. The one of theſe two brethren was called Hengiſt or Engiſt, and the other Horſus, who hauing their appointed numbers once filled, conteining about ten thouſand ſouldiers in the whole, they beſtowed them abroad in thirtie hulks, boies, and plaits, and in the ſame tranſported them ouer into Britaine, in the 449 yéere after Chriſt, as our hiſtories do affirme: where they were receiued with great ioy and gladneſſe of Uortigerne, who truſted by their aid to ouercome his fierce and dreadfull enimies.

Hengiſt and Horſus reteined in ſeruice with Uortigerne.

Therefore when they had refreſhed themſelues ſomewhat after their trauell by ſea, they were ſent forth with an other armie which Uortigerne had aſſembled of his owne ſubiects the Britains, to the frontiers of the enimies countrie, where at their firſt comming they paſſed ouer the riuer of Humber, before the Scots or Picts had knowledge that anie ſuch people were come in ſupport of the Britains to bid them battell. They being therefore amazed with the ſtrangeneſſe of the thing, ſome of them fled into the inner parts of their countrie, & other that made but ſorie ſhift, fell into the hands of the Saxons, who to begin their enterpriſe with bloud, ſlaie all ſuch as they could laie hands vpon, without anie reſpect of perſon. Great was the ſlaughter by them committed in all thoſe parties where they paſſed, namelie about the riuer of Tine. And when they had made an end there, they entred into Northumberland, and ſo into the dales aboue Berwike, next adioining vnto Pictland, deſtroieng all before them with fire and ſword.

The Saxons together with a power of Britains are ſent to the borders of the enimies countries.

The Saxons in hope of good ſucceſſe begin the wars againſt the Scots with bloud.

The Britiſh king in the meane time had ſent vnto Dongall the king of Scots to come with all ſpéed to ſupport him againſt the dreadfull inuaſion of the enimies, whoſe force being now increaſed with a power of Saxons, would worke much miſchéefe, if the ſame were not the more ſpéedilie in the beginning repreſſed: but hearing that the Saxons and Britains dailie approched, he thought not good to tarie for the comming of the Scots, but haſted forth with his owne power to incounter his aduerſaries, and raſhlie giuing battell, he was ouercome, and thereby loſt no ſmall number of his people. In this conflict the Saxons wan them a great name for their high valiance, where contrarilie the Britains got them no ſmall note of giltie cowardize, fighting ſo faintlie, that their capteins had much adoo to cauſe them to kéepe their ground, being readie ſtill to haue run awaie: which their faintneſſe of ſtomach being noted of Hengiſt, euen then put him in no ſmall confidence that it ſhould be an eaſie matter for him to conquere them at his pleaſure, when time and occaſion might ſerue thereto.

The king of Picts ſendeth for aid vnto the Scotiſh king.

The king of the Picts vanquiſhed.

The Saxons won praiſe, and the Britains noted of cowardize.

The Britiſh nation hauing receiued this grieuous ouerthrow at the hands of their cruell enimies, ſent againe an other ambaſſage vnto the Scotiſh king Congall, to ſignifie to him by way of lamentation, what loſſe had happened to them by that moſt cruell people the Saxons void of all religion and mercie, and what miſchiefe by the ſame people was intended, aſwell againſt Scots as Picts, vnto the great danger of the vtter ruine of both nations, if the enimies in time were not reſiſted. They that were ſent, declared all this matter vnto king Congall, and as they had in commiſſion, beſought him of ſpéedie ſuccors. Congall not onlie moued for the harms and loſſes of the Picts his friends and alies, but alſo much more for the likelihod of the imminent danger and perill towards himſelfe and his owne people, determined ſpéedilie to go with all his power, and to ioine with the Picts, as fullie reſolued to preuent that miſchiefe which was like to follow, if the violent rage of the enimies were not the ſoner reſiſted.

The Picts eftſoones ſolicit the Scots for aid.

He ſent word therefore to the Pictiſh king, that if he might kéepe off the enimies by light ſkirmiſhes and incurſions for a ſmall time, he would come to his aid ſhortlie, with all the whole puiſſance of his realme. And herewithall he commanded by open proclamation, that all thoſe within his dominions, which were able to beare armour ſhould by the twentith day after aſſemble togither at the ſouth ſide of Calidon wood, all and euerie of them bringing then and there with them vittels ſufficient to ſerue them for two moneths. According to the which proclamation, there came togither at the day and place aſſigned, about the number of 40000 able men, fit and méete for the warres. On the morrow after, when Congall had taken the muſters & view of his whole numbers, he ſet forward towards the place where he vnderſtood that the king of the Picts as then lodged, who had likewiſe aſſembled his people, and incampe taried for the comming of the Scotiſh armie. On the fift day after, both the kings met togither, and ſhewed great tokens of intire loue and friendſhip the one towards the other. After this they go to heare diuine ſeruice, where they make their deuout praiers vnto almightie God for their good ſpéed and luckie ſucceſſe in that iournie: which being done, they march forth toward the enimies, as then lieng in campe not paſt ten miles from them. Here at the firſt ſight of the enimies, diuers of the Scots and Picts being ſtriken with feare to behold ſo great a multitude, as the like had not béene ſéene in thoſe parties manie a day before, they ſtale away and ſecretlie hid themſelues in the next woods. But the kings, to giue example to other, cauſed them that were thus ſtolne away, to be ſought out, & brought againe into the campe, where they were hanged in open ſight of all the armie.

Cõgall promiſed to aid the Picts.

Promiſſion made by the Scots to aid the Picts.

The Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings aſſemble togither with their powers.

The Scots and Picts come within ſight of the enimies.

The Saxons & Britains alſo vpon the approch of their enimies gathered their companies togither, & maintenantlie herewith the Saxons incouraged with ſuch comfortable ſpeach as Hengiſt vttered amongeſt them, required to haue battell without delay: whoſe example the Britains following, ſhewed themſelues alſo right willing therevnto. Congall the Scotiſh king perceiuing the enimies to make readie for battell, went likewiſe amongſt his folkes, and exhorted them in beſt wiſe he could, to play the men. The like alſo did Galanus the Pictiſh king amongeſt his people, omitting nothing that might incourage them to fight manfullie. After this, the battell on both ſides comming forward to ſome, the arrowes and darts flue freſhlie betwixt them, but neither part minding to giue place for all the ſhot, at length they ioined at handblowes, firſt the Britains in the right wing with the Scots in the left wing;

The Scots through comfort of Hengiſts exhortation deſire battell.

The Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings exhort their people to fight valiantlie.

The battell is begun.

The Brit-tains flee.

wing; but the Britains not able long to indure against the force of the Scots, gaue backe and fled. In the meane while came a great shower of raine, mixt with such a tempest of haile, that the hardiest there wished himselfe thence, the storme beating so fall vpon them, that one might vnneath see an other, so that the Scotishmen and Picts wist not whether were better to pursue the Britains that fled, or to keepe their places.

A great tempest.

The Saxons close themselues togither.

On the other part, the Saxons according to their maner in time of anie present danger, closed themselues togither and drew neere vnto their chiefetteins standard. Finallie the tempest no sooner began to cease, but the Scots and Picts leauing their order of battell, fell to follow the chase of the Britains, supposing the victorie had beene wholie theirs. Which the Saxons (now after that the element began to cleare vp) plainelie perceiuing, by commandement of Hengist their generall, assailed the Scots and Picts here and there dispersed about the spoile and slaughter of the Britains, and made such murther of them on euerie side where they found them, that pitie it was to behold. Those that escaped by flight, neuer staied till they were gotten into places farre inough out of danger. This was a blacke day with the Scots and Picts. Neither was it verie ioifull to the Britains, of whome no small number died in the place by the enimies sword lamentable to see. Hengist hauing thus gotten the victorie, withdrew to Yorke, leauing those countries betwixt Tine and Tweed in the enimies handes, of purpose ceassing from further indamaging them, that the Britains might haue neighbours whome to feare: for that (as he thought) should make much for his purpose, alreadie hauing determined to make a conquest of this Ile.

The Saxons close themselues togither.

The Scots and Picts pursue the Britains.

The Saxons assaile the Scots and Picts disordered in pursute of the Britains.

Hengist purposed at the first to make conquest of the Britains.

When summer then was well neere passed, he placed his souldiers in harbrough to lodge for the winter season, and went himselfe to London, where he counselled Uortigerne to send of his owne people to the borders of his enimies, to keepe the same from their inuasions till the next spring, against which time he promised to cause such notable numbers of his countriemen to come to his aid, as should suffice not onelie to vanquish the Scotishmen and Picts, but also vtterlie to destroy both the nations, or at least wise to driue them forth of the whole countrie. This offer vnto some of the nobilitie was not greatlie liked, as euer suspecting that which followed, least in time to come Hengist should seeke the dominion of the realme in placing his owne people, and expelling the former inhabitants. But Uortigerne did not onelie giue him most hartie thanks for those his offers, but also shewed by the maner of his interteinement, which he vsed towards him, that he thought he could not do vnto him too much honor for such notable seruice as he had done alreadie, and trusted he should do hereafter. According to Hengists aduise also, there was a crue of men of warre of Britains sent vnto the borders to the number of fiue thousand, who shortlie after their comming thither, were quicklie dispatched and made awaie in sundrie skirmishes and incounters with the Scots and Picts, that assailed those places which they were appointed to defend.

Hengist returneth to London.

Hengist offereth to send for more aid into Germanie.

Hengists offers misliked of some of the nobilitie of Britaine.

The honor shewed vnto Hengist by Uortigerne.

Britains sent to defend the borders, are distressed.

Shortlie after was sent thither also an other companie, double in number to the first, to reuenge the deaths of their fellowes; but they finding fortune as froward vnto them as the former had done before, sped much-what a like, for in sundrie conflicts diuers of them being slaine, and diuers other by treason of the borderers themselues deliuered captiue into the aduersaries hands, the residue that was left, perceiuing in what danger they stood, sithence they might not trust their owne countriemen, returned backe into the inner parts of the land, and so left the borders altogither vnfurnished. In this meane while a new supplie of fiue thousand Saxons, with their wiues and children, came ouer into this land, in eightéene hoies, and amongest other came Hengists wife and his daughter the ladie Rowena. Shortlie after king Uortigerne gaue vnto Hengist & his Saxons a great part of the countrie called Lindsele, with a castell of great strength called Thongcastre. Some haue written that Hengist required of Uortigerne so much ground as he might compas with an ore hide, and hauing that granted, he toke a nightie ore hide, and cut it into small thongs, and so compassing about a right strong plot of ground with those thongs line wise, began there the foundation of a castell, which toke name of those thongs, therewith the plot of ground was first measured, and so was it called Thong-castell. But vpon what consideration so euer it toke that name, certeine it is by record of all the Scotish histories, that there the Saxons first inhabited after their entring into Britaine.

A new power of Saxons commeth ouer into Britaine.

Thwang castell, or Thong castell.

The Saxons first inhabite in Lindsele.

When Hengist had set things in order for the placing of his people there in dwellings (apointed them by Uortigerne) according as seemed best vnto his politike head and craftie forecast, he toke forth the souldiers and men of warre, ordered vnder certeine capteins and officers of bands, and led them forward by slow iournies as it were staieng for the comming of the Britains. Uortigerne had gathered as then an huge host of his subiects, and apointed his generall lieutenant ouer them his sonne Uortigerne, a yong man of great force and valiancie, but so that he should be ordered in all things by the aduise and discretion of Hengist, whose authoritie for the warres he commanded chieflie to be followed.

Uortimer generall of the Britains.

When both the armies of Saxons and Britains were met togither, Hengist led them ouer the riuers of Humber and Tine, marching directlie towards the place where he thought the enimies laie. The Scotish and Pictish kings, hauing knowledge of such preparation made by the Britains, they gathered their powers togither, to the number of 60000 men, furnished with prouision of vittels for a long time. But before their comming to the riuer of Tine, vpon knowledge had that the Saxons and Britains were passed the same, they made streight towards them, in purpose to haue giuen battell without longer protracting of time: howbeit comming to the place where they were lodged, they found them so stronglie incamped, that no aduantage could be perceiued which waie they might be constreined to raise and come forth of their strength to receiue battell vpon some euen ground, which Hengist of purpose for a time seemed to deferre.

The Saxons and Britains against the Scots and Picts.

60000 of Scots and Picts come to met their enimies.

Hengist prolongeth time to giue battell.

Betwixt them also and the armies of the two kings there was a vallie, in the botome full of mires and marish grounds, which the Scotishmen & Picts must needes passe, yer they could find meanes to do anie notable displeasure to the enimies. Wherefore at length they determined with turfe and fagots to make passage ouer those mires. Which being accomplished in the night following, the next morning they passed ouer and got them vnto certeine hilles lieng right ouer against the Saxon and British campes, some of them taking their lodgings vpon the brow or front of an hill so neere to the lodgings of their enimies, that they might throwe a dart into their campe: and hereof they toke no small occasion to worke a feat against their aduersaries, to their great annoiance and vexation.

There was growing in that place, where they were were thus incamped, verie much of that kind of heath or ling, which the Scotiſhmen call hadder. Of which heath or hadder, they gathered a great quantitie togither, and binding it in bundels like vnto fagots, in the night ſeaſon they ſet the ſame on fire, tumbling it downe the hill, on that ſide where the Saxons laie. The wind in that inſtant being ſomewhat aloft, cauſed theſe bundels of ling to blaſe and burne vehementlie, and hereto ſtanding that waies forth, droue the flame ſo ſtreinablie amongeſt the tents and cabins of the Saxons, that the fire catching in the ſtraw and twigs which they had couched togither vnder them in ſtéd of beds, increaſed the feare amongſt the ſouldiors wonderfullie, by reaſon that the blaſing bundels of the ling or hadder, ſtill comming downe the hill vpon them, ſeemed as though the ſame had fallen from aboue, and euen forth of the heauen it ſelfe.

A policie of the Scots.

The tumult and feare raiſed in the campe of the Saxons. Hyperbole.

Great was the tumult and noiſe throughout the whole campe, with ſuch roring of beaſts, and running vp and downe both of them and of the horſſes which were there in the campe, that if heauen and earth had gone togither, there could not haue béene a more terrible noiſe nor clamor. At length, when the ſouldiors had done what they could to quench the fire, and to appeaſe the trouble, not without ſome vprore and diſorder raiſed on each ſide, they got them with their armor and weapons forth into the next field, which Hengiſt himſelfe perceiuing (hauing firſt done what he could to ſtay them) inuironed with a companie of his choiſeſt men of warre, he got him vp vnto a little hill next adioining, and there gaue knowledge by the ſound of a trumpet that all his people ſhould draw thither vnto him. After this, when they were come togither, he diſpoſed them in order of battell with all diligence, abiding for the ſpring of the daie, to vnderſtand more certeinlie the meaning of his enimies.

Hengiſt calleth his people togither.

The Scots and Picts ſuppoſing the enimies to be farre diſordered, by reaſon of the fire deſcended downe from the hilles, fullie determined to aſſaile them in their camps: but vpon their approch to the ſame, perceiuing how the Saxons were gotten forth, and ſtood readie in good order of battell, minding to defend their ground, both the kings thought it beſt to tarie till the morning, yer they made anie exploit, for doubt of perils that might befall thereof. In the breake of the daie Congall came amongſt his people, exhorting them to remember their worthie elders, and by their example to chooſe rather to die in defenſe of their countrie & ancient liberties, than by cowardize to ſaue a diſhoneſted life, which (if their chance was to be vanquiſhed) they ſhould paſſe in great thraldome and miſerie. The Pictiſh king alſo with like words incouraged his men to do valiantlie. Neither was Hengiſt ſlow in perſuading his Saxons to plaie the men, that obteining the victorie they might deliuer themſelues from terror of all enimies from thenceforth in Britaine.

Congals exhortation to the Scots.

Hengiſt exhorteth the Saxons to fight manfullie.

Whileſt he was thus exhorting his people, the Scots and Picts with great force and violence began to giue the charge vpon him, which whileſt the Saxons and Britains went about to defend, they were beaten downe by heaps ſo fiercelie on eth ſide, that the diſcomfiture had light vpon them forthwith, had not Hengiſt by ſound of trumpet called forth about three thouſand freſh men to their ſuccors, which he had placed in an ambuſh a little before the ſpring of the daie within a thicke groue of wood, faſt by his campe, appointing them to remaine there in a readineſſe, to come at his call, vpon what danger ſoeuer happened. Theſe moſt fiercelie ſetting vpon the backes of the Scots, brought them ſtreight out of all order: for they being occupied with the other Saxons before, and now aſſailed of theſe behind, they had vneath rome for anie aduantage to turne their weapons. In the meane time the Picts being matched with the Britains did put them to flight, and chaſed them out of the field, not ceaſſing to purſue them in the chaſe, till they came to a riuer in the which a great number of them were drowned, as they ieoparded to paſſe ouer the ſame, and to ſaue themſelues by ſwimming. On the other ſide, the Scots being ſore handled by the Saxons, both before and behind, were at the length conſtreined to giue ground and breake forth by flight, & ſo to eſcape the cruell hands of the enimies. Manie were ſlaine in the chaſe, and ſome taken priſoners. The reſidue getting away, fled ſtreight to the Picts: but Congall himſelfe, through helpe of his houſhold ſeruants eſcaped to the top of an high hill, and ſaued himſelfe tho wounded as he was.

The Britains put to flight by the Picts.

The Scots forced to flie.

Congall is wounded, but yet eſcapeth through helpe of his houſhold ſeruants.

The Saxons ſtanding how the Scots had giuen the ouerthrow, and that they were now marching forward to incounter alſo with them, determined not to abide their comming at that time. And ſo night approching yer the Saxons had got ſight of them, order was giuen by commandement of their king, that all their carriage, and a great quantitie of logs and fagots, ſhould be placed and piled togither before them, and in the darke of the night to be ſet on fire, which being executed according to the appointment, when the fire was once kindled, the Picts with the Scots which were got vnto them, departed as ſecretlie as they might, and ſtaied not to make awaie, till they were farre inough out of the danger of the Saxons. Hengiſt hauing thus got the victorie, and perceiuing no enimie abroad to bid him battell, muſtered his men, and found that he had loſt in this iournie as good as foure thouſand of one and other. After this, hee withdraweth to Yorke, and leauing his armie there, went himſelfe vnto London, where hee was receiued with ioy inough by king Vortigerne.

The policie of the Picts to eſcape out of danger.

Shortlie after, vpon knowledge that Aurelius Ambroſe, and Vter, the ſonnes of king Conſtantine prepared to come ouer with a mightie armie of Armorike Britains, and other Frenchmen, to claime the crowne of Britaine, as lawfullie deſcended to them from their father: the Saxons were ſent for out of the north parts, and had dwellings appointed vnto them in Kent, to be at hand if néed were to reſiſt anie ſuch attempted inuaſion. But ſhortlie after, for a policie, Hengiſt cauſed it to be bruited abroad, that the Scots and Picts meant eſſoones to inuade the Britiſh confines, & therefore was there an other power of Saxons called into the land, and placed in the north parts, to defend the ſame againſt the Scots and Picts. Octa the ſonne of Hengiſt had the leading of theſe Saxons, who brought them ouer, being ten thouſand men of warre, in fiftie plaits, and fiftie hoies. They brought with them alſo their wiues and children, and ſetled themſelues in the north parts betwixt the riuer of Humber and the borders of the Pictiſh dominions. And euen then it began to take the name of Northumberland, which is as you would ſay, the land by north the riuer of Humber, and ſo it doth continue.

Aurelius Ambroſe & Vter, ſons to king Conſtantine.

The Saxons placed in Kent.

A new power of Saxons came ouer with their captein Octa.

Northumberland when it firſt began to be ſo called.

Shortlie after, Vortigerne forſaking his lawfull wife, maried the ladie Rorena or Rowen, Hengiſts daughter, to the high offenſe of God, and great diſpleaſure of his ſubiects. And in the meane time, Octa not attempting anie exploit againſt the Scots and Picts, rather ſought to get into his hands all the fortreſſes betwixt Tine and Humber, euen from the eaſt ſea to the weſt: which his purpoſed intent he greatlie aduanced, winning caſtels and fortreſſes there Vortigerne marieth Hengiſts daughter.

there in those parties, some by force, and some by surrender: and amongst other places of importance, he first got possession of Yorke, and feigning accusations against manie of the nobles and gentlemen, surmising that they would betraie the countrie vnto the Scots & Picts, hee put diuerse of them to death, some secretlie, and others openlie, as conuict of such offenses as were forged and laid against them.

Yorke in possession of Hengist.

Vortigerne deposed by his subiects.

Herevpon the Britains for the stay of such mischiefe as they saw at hand, deposed Vortigerne from his kinglie seat, and placed his sonne Vortimer in his roome, which being done, ambassadors were sent both vnto the Scots and Picts, to require their aid and support against the cruell oppression of the Saxons, who sought not onelie by craftie meanes and fraudulent waies to atteine the dominion of the whole Ile, but also to extinguish and vtterlie subuert the faith of Christ, and the vse of his religion throughout the same. Therefore they earnestlie desired the Scotish and Pictish kings, to assist them against such common enimies as had beene called into the realme, not by publike consent of the nobles, but onlie by the priuate commandement and ordinance of Vortigerne, to helpe as well toward the subduing of the Scots and Picts, as also to represse all commotions of the Britains, which they might haplie raise against him for his wicked tyrannie vsed amongst them, as his guiltie conscience might put him still in feare of.

Vortimer chosen to gouerne the Britains.

The Britains require aid of the Scots and Picts against the Saxons.

The answer of Congall K. of Scots vnto the British messengers.

The Scotish king Congall (vnto whome first the ambassadors were sent) for answer declared, that he was sorie to vnderstand into what danger the miserable christians of Britaine were thus fallen, and therefore if nothing else might moue him to ioine with the Britains against the Saxons, yet that were sufficient cause to inforce him to do the best he could, to helpe to deliuer the whole Ile from such an ethnike generation, as not onelie vsed the rites and ceremonies of their false religion, and that openlie among the christians, with doing sacrifice in the honor and worship of their hellish gods, to the great horror and terrible offense of the beholders consciences; but also sought by all meanes they could deuise, how to destroie and quench vtterlie the faith of our Sauiour Christ in all places where they might get the vpper hand.

He promised therefore to imploie his whole puissance to recouer out of the enimies hands all such countries as laie betwixt the frontiers of his dominion and the riuer of Humber, and further to aid the Britains to driue them quite out of the Ile, if the Britains would assure him, from thencefoorth neuer to make claime, title nor interest, to any of the countries aforesaid, lieng betwixt the said riuer of Humber and the confines of his realme; but to leaue the same in the hands of the Scotishmen and Picts, to haue hold and inioy for euermore in quiet: which to performe, the ambassadors had (amongest other things) alreadie promised in name of all the British nation, as a recompense or meed to haue the support and succors of the Scots. The like answer the same ambassadors receiued of the Pictish king, and returning therewith vnto Vortimer, declared afore him and his councell how they had sped.

Upon what conditions Congall couenanted to support the Britains.

Shortlie after, for the more and better assurance of all promises, couenants and articles passed betwixt the Scotishmen, Picts, and Britains, there was an amitie and bond of peace now renewed, ratified and established, according to the tenor of the ancient league, which had beene concluded in times past betwixt them, with some new conditions of agreement included in the same: all old iniuries being ended and quieted clearelie betwixt them, so that no cause of grudge or displeasure might bee thought to remaine in remembrance. The first enterprise put in execution after the concluding of this league, was made by the Scots against Occa and his Saxons, which (as partlie ye haue heard) had nestled themselues betwixt the riuers of Tine and Humber.

A league concluded betwixt Scots Picts and Britains.

The Scots inuade the borders of Northumberland.

Against those Scots, as they were verie earnestlie occupied in ouerthrowing castels and towers, with slaughter of such Saxons as stood at defense, Occa commeth into the field with an armie readie to incounter with them, but perceiuing the multitude of his enimies to be such, as he doubted least he should not be well able to match with them, he staied a while from giuing the onset: but in the end perceiuing he could not retire backe but to his great disaduantage, he boldlie gaue signe to his people to set vpon their enimies: which they fiercelie executing, it was hard to tell for a while to whether part the victorie would incline. But at length the Saxons not able to sustaine the force of the Scots, ouerpressing them with multitude, began to giue backe: which Occa perceiuing, did what he could to hem them in from running awaie, but yet notwithstanding all that he could do, feare at length ouercomming regard to their capteins commandement, shame of rebuke was quite set apart, and so they toke them to their feet, and fled awaie so fast as they might, the Scots pursuing after them amaine.

The Saxons incounter with the Scots.

The Saxons banquished by the Scots.

Occa yet escaped with diuerse of his nobles, and comming to the mouth of Humber, got a ship, and sailed forth in the same with great danger, till at length he arriued within the Thames. The slaughter of the Saxons vpon the discomfiture was great, speciallie in the chase, for the Scotishmen calling to remembrance that they had to do with infidels, and with the enimies of the christian faith, were so eger vpon them, that they saued few or none that fell into their hands. About the same time was Vortimer entered into Kent against Hengist and his Saxons there, and incountring with them in battell, slue ten thousand of them, and chased the residue forth of that countrie. Thus Kent returned vnto the Britains, and the countries beyond Humber northwards vnto the Scots and Picts, according to the tenour of the league before mentioned.

Occa fleeth by sea into Kent.

The Saxons banquished by Britains and expelled out of Kent.

Hengist and his sonne Occa (who a little before this battell in Kent was come vnto his father) with the residue of them that escaped, hasted with all speed toward Northumberland, in purpose to remaine in that countrie till they had recouered their strength by some power to be sent ouer vnto them out of their owne countrie: but being repelled with no small slaughter from thence by the Scots and Picts, they withdrew vnto the mouth of Humber, where getting certeine vessels, they passed ouer into Saxonie, leauing a great sort of their nation behind them, dispersed abroad here and there in this Ile, as fortune then best serued. Vortimer hauing got the victorie, as before is mentioned, vsed not the same verie cruellie, for taking onelie from the Saxons which were taken prisoners their armor and weapon, he suffered them to depart into their countrie: other of the same nation being but husbandmen, and as it were poore labourers of the ground, he permitted to tarie in the countrie with their wiues & children, as seruants vnto the Britains.

The Saxons banquished by Britains and expelled out of Kent.

The Saxons flie out of Britaine.

Vortimer vseth the victorie modestlie.

After this, Vortimer gaue order for the reparing of churches, and restoring of the christian religion into the state of the former puritie thereof, as then sore decaied, partlie through the euill example taken by dailie conuersation amongst the Saxons, and partlie also by the infectiue heresie of the Pelagians, as then mightilie spred ouer the most part of Britaine. At length the said Vortimer through treason of his stepmother stepmother Rorena was poisoned, and died. Then was Uortigerne againe restored to the rule of the kingdome, first forced by oth to promise neuer to aid the Saxons, nor to receiue by way of aid anie forreine people into the realme. Uortigerne then restored thus vnto the crowne, shewed such diligence in causing due administration of iustice without rigor to be executed, and prouision made for the resisting of all inuasions that might be attempted by anie forreine power, that his praise was great amongst all his subiects, who to shew their good willes likewise towards him as to their naturall prince, were not slacke in honoring him aswell by gifts and presents, as by all other maner of waies. He found meanes also to renew the league with the Scots and Picts, with like conditions and articles, as it was concluded lastlie betwixt them and his sonne Uortimer. But notwithstanding his politike proceeding, thus to auoid all inconuenience that might happen; shortlie after Hengist returned, and what by force and subtill shifts, at length got possession of the more part of Britaine, so that the Britains were constreined to flie into Wales, whither also Uortigerne fled, and remained there a certeine time, till at length Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter, the sonnes of king Constantine came ouer out of little Britaine, and besieging Uortigerne in a castell, burnt him with the house and all, when they could not otherwise come by him, according to that which Merline the British sothsaier had prophesied before. It is foolishlie supposed that this Merline was got by a spirit of that kind which are called Incubi, that is to vnderstand, such as conueieng mans seed from him (and therewith by illusion taking vpon them the shape and figure of man) do lie with women, and vse them after the maner of carnall copulation.

The heresie of the Pelagians.

The league renewed betwixt Britains, Scots and Picts.

Hengist returneth.

Uortigerne burnt.

¶ In this place Hector Boetius by the way reciteth a like tale or two, of such illusions of spirits, wrought not long before his time in Scotland, which somwhat abridging the same we haue here inserted. In the yeere 1480, saith he, it chanced as a Scotish ship departed out of the Forth towards Flanders, there rose a wonderfull great tempest of wind and weather, so outragious, that the maister of the ship with other the mariners wondered not a little what the matter ment, to see such weather at that time of the yeere, for it was about the middest of summer. At length when the furious pirrie & rage of winds still increased, in such wise that all those within the ship looked for present death, there was a woman vnderneath the hatches, called vnto them aboue, and willed them to throw hir into the sea, that all the residue by Gods grace might yet be saued: and therevpon told them, how she had bene hanted a long time with a spirit, dailie comming vnto hir in mans likenesse, and that euen as then he was with hir, vsing his filthie pleasure after the maner of carnall copulation. In the ship there chanced also to be a priest, who by the maisters appointment going downe to this woman, and finding hir like a most wretched and desperate person, lamenting hir great misfortune and miserable estate, vsed such wholsome admonitions and comfortable aduertisements, willing hir to repent and hope for mercie at the hands of God, that at length she seeming right penitent for hir greeuous offenses committed, and fetching sundrie sighes euen from the bottome of hir heart, being witnesse (as should appeare) of the same, there issued forth of the pumpe of the ship a foule and euill fauored blacke cloud, with a mightie terrible noise, flame, smoke and stinke, which presentlie fell into the sea. And suddenlie therevpon the tempest ceassed, and the ship passing in great quiet the residue of hir iournie, arriued in safetie at the place whither she was bound.

Illusions of spirits.

A tale of a woman abused with a spirit.

About saint Barnabés day.

Not long before the hap hereof, there was in like manner a yong man dwelling in Bareoth, within a village there, not passing 14 miles from Aberdine, verie faire & comelie of shape, who declared by waie of complaint vnto the bishop of that diocesse, how there was a spirit which haunted him in shape of a woman, so faire and beautifull a thing, that he neuer saw the like, the which would come into his chamber at nights, and with pleasant intisements allure him to haue to do with hir, & that by no maner of meanes he could be rid of hir. The bishop like a wise man aduised him to remoue into some other countrie, and to giue himselfe to fasting and praier, so to auoid his hands of that wicked spirit. The yong man following the bishops counsell, within a few daies was deliuered from further temptation.

A yong man haunted with a spirit.

About the same time also, there was in the countrie of Mar, a yong gentlewoman of excellent beautie, and daughter vnto a noble man there, refusing sundrie wealthie mariages offered to hir by hir father, and other friends. At length she prooued with child, and being rigorouslie compelled by hir parents to tell who was the father, she confessed that a certeine yong man vsed nightlie to come vnto hir, and kept hir companie, and sometimes in the day also, but how or from whence he came, or by what meanes he went awaie, she was not able to declare. Hir parents not greatlie crediting hir words, laid diligent watch, to vnderstand what he was that had defiled their house: and within three daies after, vpon signification giuen by one of the maidens, that the fornicator was at that verie instant with their daughter, incontinentlie therevpon, making fast the doores, they enter the chamber with a great manie of torches and lights, where they find in their daughters armes a foule monstrous thing, verie horrible to behold. Heere a number comming hastilie in, to behold this euill fauored sight, amongst other there was a priest of verie honest life, not ignorant (as was thought) in knowledge of holie scripture.

This priest (all other being afraid) and some of them running their waies, began to recite the beginning of Saint Johns gospell, and comming to these words, Verbum caro factum est, suddenlie the wicked spirit making a verie sore and terrible roaring noise, flue his waies, taking the roofe of the chamber awaie with him, the hangings and couerings of the bed being also burnt therewith. The gentlewoman was yet preserued, and within three or foure daies after was deliuered of such a misshapen thing, as the like before had not beene seene, which the midwiues and women, such as were present at hir labor, to auoid the dishonor of hir house, immediatlie burnt in a great fire, made in the chamber for the same intent. ¶ Thus much out of Hector Boetius, which, with more, he hath written to proue that all is not feined which is written of the illusions of diuels and euill spirits, the credit whereof I leaue with the author.

Now to returne where I left touching Aurelius Ambrose. Ye shall vnderstand, that he hauing once subdued and dispatched his aduersarie Uortigerne, determined to make warres against Hengist and his Saxons, to proue if his chance might be to recouer the realme out of their hands, and so to restore againe the christian religion. But first yer he attempted anie exploit against the enimies, he sent ambassadors both vnto Congall the Scotish king, and also vnto one Loth a towardlie yong gentleman, and of verie comelie personage, as then reigning among the Picts, requiring them both to aid him in so necessarie an enterprise as he had in hand against the enimies of Christ and his religion. Wherevpon both these kings, weieng with themselues the dutie of all christian princes, in respect of the aduancement of Aurelius Ambrose purposeth to make warres against the Saxons.

Ambassadors sent vnto the Scots and Picts to require their aid against the Saxons.

the cauſe of faith, and ſuppreſſing of ethnike idolatrie, promiſed their helpe to the vttermoſt of their powers againſt the Saxons, who had in ſuch tyrannike ſort ſubuerted and aboliſhed the chriſtian profeſſion within the Britiſh confines. And therefore the old league, according to the articles and couenants afore time concluded betwixt the three nations, was once againe renewed, and an armie prepared by euerie of them, to meet at a place and day appointed, for the better expedition of this their attempted voiage.

The Scots and Picts promiſe to aid the Britains againſt the Saxons.

The league renewed betwixt Britains, Picts, and Scots.

First Aurelius Ambroſe, with ſuch power as he brought with him forth of France, & ioining thereunto a great multitude of thoſe Britains which had eſcaped the Saxons hands, either by withdrawing themſelues into Wales, or elſe by conueieng themſelues into the countries of the Scots and Picts, ſetteth forward toward the Scotiſh armie. But firſt calling together thoſe Britains that he had about him, and going vp to a little hill, where he might be heard of them all, he made a long oration by waie of complaint, of the great iniuries and cruell practiſes vſed by Hengiſt, againſt the linage of king Conſtantine, and the whole eſtate of the Britiſh common-wealth: alſo of the horrible perſecution made by him and his people the Saxons, againſt the profeſſors of the chriſtian religion. All which matter he handled in words ſo pithilie, his talke yet ſauoring of the Romane eloquence, that the minds of the ſouldiers being kindled therewith, required nothing but battell, as men not doubting but by his wiſe and politike conduct to atchiue ſome glorious victorie. And to the end all thing might be done in better order, according to his appointment, immediatlie they proclamed him king. Which was by account of the Scotiſh chronicles, in the yéere 498, after that Uortigerne with his ſonne Uortimer had reigned 17 yéeres in the whole.

Aurelius Ambroſe maketh an oration.

Aurelius Ambroſe proclamed king of Britaine.

Aurelius in this wiſe being eſtabliſhed king of Britaine paſſeth forth with his people, and within ſix daies after met with the armies of the Scots and Picts. Generall of the Scots at that time was one Conranus brother to king Congall, who was troubled with the gout, ſo that he could not come himſelfe in perſon. Loth the Pictiſh king was there himſelfe amongſt his people, verie deſirous to ſhew ſome proofe of his manlie prowelle and manhood. Aurelius Ambroſe ſhewed all the honor that might be deuiſed, as well to the one as to the other of thoſe two nations, promiſing to requite them with as much friendſhip when time and occaſion ſhould craue the like aſſiſtance. Theſe three mightie armies therefore being thus aſſembled, marched forth towards a place called Mahelbell, where they vnderſtood that Hengiſt with his power as then did ſoiorne. Where when both the camps were pitched, and one lieng not farre from the other: at the firſt certeine light ſkirmiſhes were procured by both parts betwixt the light horſſemen, wherewith at length being the more prouoked to diſpleaſure, they come into the field with their whole maine battels, verie fiercelie incountring ech other, ſo that (as it appéered) their force was not ſo great, but their mortall hate was euen as much, or rather more, if the hiſtories faie right.

Conranus generall of the Scots.

Loth king of the Picts.

Mahelbell.

The Albions and Saxons incounter in battell.

The Armorike Britains with a new kind of order in their fight, ſore troubled the Saxons, in perſing their battels, with their men arraied in certeine wards, broad behind and narrow before, wedgewiſe. The Scots alſo & Picts bare downe both the wings of the Saxons, in ſuch manner, that the ſtandards of all the three nations, Scots, Picts, and Britains, were at point almoſt to méet, hauing made waie thereunto through the middeſt of their enimies. Wherewith the Saxons (being ſore diſcouraged) began to giue backe; and finallie, notwithſtanding all that Hengiſt could ſaie or do to haue ſtaied them, they fell to running awaie, and fled amaine, which when he throughlie ſaw, & perceiued that there was no recouerie, he himſelfe (in manner the laſt man that abode) fled likewiſe his waies out of the field, with an ambuſhment of horſſemen about him, but being purſued by Aurelius verie fiercelie, he was run through the bodie by him with a ſpeare, and ſo was there ſlaine out of hand, in the 488 yéere of Chriſt, and 40 after his comming into this Ile. Howbeit the other of the Saxons conueied his ſonne Oeca (being alſo ſore wounded) awaie with them vp into the next mountains, whither they fled for their refuge, leauing the dead bodie of his father Hengiſt in the field, to their high reproch, there to be ſpoiled and abuſed of his enimies.

The Saxons diſcomfited.

Sée more hereof in England

Hengiſt is ſlaine by Aurelius, as the Scotiſh chronicles ſay.

Aurelius Ambroſe hauing thus got the vpper hand of his enimies, haſted forth with all ſpéed vnto London, where hauing both the citie and tower deliuered into his hands, he recouered the whole Iland from the poſſeſſion of the Saxons: and ſuch of them as were apt men, able to beare armor, and to ſerue in the warres, he commanded to depart forth of the land. The other that were minded to tarrie behind their fellowes that were thus forced to depart, became ſubiects to the Britains, and couenanted to become chriſtians. ¶ Thus much haue I written touching Aurelius Ambroſe, according to the report of the Scotiſh writers, but more héereof ye may read in the hiſtorie of England, where ye ſhall find this matter ſet forth more at large. For that which we write héere, is but to ſhew in what ſort the Scotiſh writers make relation of the warres which their nation had with the Saxons, when they began firſt to ſet foot héere in this land.

Aurelius haſteth forth to London.

To our purpoſe then. In the meane time Aurelius hauing thus recouered the land out of the Saxons hands, and now remaining at London, did all the honor he could imagine, both vnto Loth the Pictiſh king, and alſo vnto Conranus generall of the Scotiſhmen, acknowledging how that by their aid chieflie he had got the vpper hand of his enimies, and ſo he willed to haue it notified amongſt his ſubiects. Héereto he cauſed the league to be renewed betwixt the Scots, Picts, & Britains, the ancient ordinance for the countries beyond Humber, being appointed to remaine vnto the Scotiſhmen and Picts: alſo that the Saxons ſhould be reputed common enimies to all the three nations, and that vpon inuaſion made by anie forren power, the Scots, Picts, and Britains, ſhould aid one another as occaſion ſerued.

By ſupport of Scots and Picts Aurelius confeſſeth he got the victorie of the Saxons.

The league betwixt Scots, Picts, and Britains is renewed.

This league being concluded with theſe articles of couenants, was the more ſtronglie confirmed, by reaſon of ſuch affinitie and aliance as then alſo inſued. For whereas Aurelius had two ſiſters, the one named Anne, and the other Ada, virgins both; Anne being the elder, was giuen in mariage vnto king Loth, by whome certeine yeares after he had iſſue two ſonnes, Mordred, and Walwan or Calwan, with a daughter called Thametes: Ada being the yonger ſiſter was maried vnto Conranus, generall (as is ſaid) of the Scotiſh armie. Howbeit ſhe liued not paſt two yeares after, but died in trauell of child, which alſo died with the mother: and ſo ended the aliance of Aurelius and Conranus. The Britains being deliuered through the victorie and means afore rehearſed from the cruell hands of the Saxons, inioied ſoifull peace certeine yeares after, but in the meane time diuers of thoſe Saxons which were licenced to remaine in Britaine, counterfeiting to become chriſtians, vſed neuertheleſſe to make ſacrifice vnto idols, according to the maner of the gentiles, whereof their prieſts being accuſed and condemned, ſuffered death by fire for that offenſe.

Anne the daughter of Aurelius giuen in mariage vnto Loth king of Picts.

Ida maried vnto Conranus.

Diuers Saxons idolaters are burned.

ſenſe, accoꝛdinglie as the law did then apoint them. Whileſt theſe things were thus in hand, Congall king of the Scots being woꝛne with long ſickneſſe, departed this life, and was buried in the Ile of Jona, otherwiſe called Colmekill, with all kinglie pompe and accuſtomed ceremonies. He reigned oꝛ uer the Scotiſhmen about 20 yeares in great fame and gloꝛie.

The death of Congall.

Conranus.

Conranus created king of Scotland. 501. H.B.

AFter his deceaſſe, his bꝛother Conranus with great reioiſing of all the Scotiſh nation was admitted K. in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 512, and the 22 of the reigne of the emperour Anaſtaſius. This Conranus otherwiſe called Goranus, being eſtabliſhed king, firſt toke oꝛder that the ſonnes of his bꝛother Congall being within age, ſhould be bꝛought vp in the Ile of Man, vnder the gouernance of certeine wiſe inſtructoꝛs & ſchoolmaiſters, to be trained in learning and vertuous diſcipline, accoꝛding to an ancient oꝛdinance thereof made and enacted. Alſo doubting leaſt peace and quietneſſe, now after long warres, ſhould miniſter matter to his people of raiſing ſome commotion, to the diſturbance of all ciuill oꝛder & politike gouernement within his realme, he rode as it had bẽene in circuit round about the ſame, making inquirie of all maner offendoꝛs, on whome he cauſed due puniſhment to be executed, without reſpect either of kith oꝛ kin.

The earneſt diligence of Conranus foꝛ maintenance of good oꝛders among his ſubiects.

And amongeſt other enoꝛmities which he vnderſtood to be vſed in maner thꝛough all his countries, this (as he thought) was moſt grieuous, that the huſbandmen and other commons of the countrie, being euill intreated and miſuſed at the gentlemens hands, durſt not complaine, noꝛ pꝛocure anie redꝛes; by reaſon whereof, when they were oppꝛeſſed, oꝛ ſuffered anie maner of woꝛong oꝛ iniurie, they were without remedie to haue the ſame reforꝛmed; he oꝛdeined therefoꝛe, that the names of all ſuch offendoꝛs, with the maner of their offenſes, ſhould be ſecretlie regiſtred in a booke euerie yeare, by certeine inquiſitours thereto choſen and appointed. And if it chanced that thoſe which were thus accuſed, might afterwards be found guiltie before the kings iuſtices by matter plainelie pꝛoued againſt them; they ſhould then be ſure to be puniſhed accoꝛding to the meaſure of their offenſes.

A godlie oꝛdinance deuiſed by Conranus foꝛ reliefe of his commons.

This cuſtome of accuſations, commonlie called inditements, continueth euen vnto theſe our daies.

The king pꝛeſent at aſſiſes.

Conranus himſelfe (as is repoꝛted) vſed much to be pꝛeſent at aſſiſes and ſeſſions to ſée the lawes duelie miniſtred, either elſe to paſſe the time in hunting within ſome foꝛreſt oꝛ chaſe, néere to the place where the iuſtices ſat. Now whileſt Conranus king of Scots thus ſtudied foꝛ the good gouernement of his people, Aurelius Ambꝛoſe the king of Bꝛitaine fell ſicke of a conſumption, which bꝛought him to ſuch weakeneſſe, that all recouerie of health in him was deſpaired; whereof Occa and Paſcentius ſonnes to Hengiſt being aduertiſed, returned with a mightie power of Sarons into Bꝛitaine, which (as Hector Boetius ſaith) they named at that pꝛeſent Hengiſts land.

Aurelius Ambꝛoſe fell ſicke of a conſumption.

Occa and Paſcentius returne into Bꝛitaine.

Uter the bꝛother of Aurelius late alſo at the ſame time ſoꝛe ſicke of a flix in the parties of Wales, ſo that to auoid diſſention that was raiſed among the Bꝛitains, about the appointing of a generall to go againſt the enimies, Aurelius euen ſicke as he was, cauſed himſelfe to be caried foꝛth in a litter; with whoſe pꝛeſence his people were ſo incouraged, that incountring with the Sarons they wan the victoꝛie, although with ſuch loſſe on their ſide, that Aurelius was glad to take truce foꝛ the ſpace of foure moneths, and therewith bꝛeaking vp his campe, went into Wincheſter, and ſent ambaſſadours vnto the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings foꝛ aid againſt the time when the truce ſhould expire, which was granted, and ſo he pꝛouided foꝛ all things readie foꝛ the warres againſt the appointed time of their aſſemblie. Occa alſo ſent his bꝛother Paſcentius into Germanie foꝛ moꝛe aid, but as ſome wꝛite, he was dꝛiuen by contrarie winds into Ireland, & getting a great power of men togither there, he came backe to his bꝛother with the ſame. But whether he had thoſe men out of Ireland oꝛ Germanie, ſure it is that the power of the Sarons was greatlie increaſed therewith.

In the meane time died Aurelius Ambꝛoſe, who was poiſoned by a miſchæfous monke, a Saron boꝛne, named Eopa oꝛ Copa (as ſome bookes haue) that toke vpon him to be ſkilfull in phyſicke, and a monke by pꝛofeſſion. His death was ſoꝛe lamented of the Bꝛitains: but contrariwiſe, the Sarons reioiſed greatlie thereof, ſo that immediatlie after, Occa with his power inuadeth the Bꝛitains, vſing great crueltie in all places whereſoeuer he came.

Aurelius Ambꝛoſe departeth this life.

In the meane time the Scotiſh and Pictiſh armies were come foꝛward towards Aurelius, accoꝛding to pꝛomiſe made vnto his ambaſſadours; but when his death was certeinelie knowen amongeſt them, the capteins and leaders of both thoſe armies, reſolued to returne home againe, and ſo they did, foꝛ that they doubted in what ſtate and oꝛder things ſhould ſtand amongeſt the Bꝛitains now after the deceaſſe of their late king. After the death of Aurelius Ambꝛoſe, his bꝛother Uter was made king of Bꝛitaine, and falling in loue with the wife of Gothlois duke of Coꝛnewall, he did not onelie foꝛce hir to lie with him; but alſo to the end he might inioy hir the moꝛe fꝛælie, he ceaſſed not to purſue hir huſband to rid him out of the waie, whome at length he toke within a caſtell into the which he was fled, & foꝛthwith cauſed him to be executed, ſurmiſing mater againſt him, foꝛ that he had foꝛſaken one of the capteins called Nathaliod, in battell againſt the Sarons. By the wife of this Gothlois, Uter had iſſue the great Arthur, and becauſe he had no legitimat ſonne, he appointed that Arthur ſhould ſuccæd him in gouernement of the realme. Herewith Loth the Pictiſh king was not a little mꝛoued, diſdaining that Arthur being a baſtard, and begot of another mans wife in adulterie, ſhould be pꝛeferred beſoꝛe his ſons the rightfull heires of the Bꝛitiſh kingdome: and therefoꝛe by ambaſſadours he did what he could to diſſuade Uter from making anie ſuch oꝛdinance. But when he ſaw that he could not remoue him from his opinion, he thought beſt to content himſelfe with ſilence, till the time ſerued better foꝛ his purpoſe. At length when the wars were againe renewed betwixt Uter and Occa the Saron king, Loth in reuenge of the iniurie done to him and his childꝛen, ioined himſelfe to the Sarons, and was with them at the battell, in which the Bꝛitains got the victoꝛie by the pꝛeſence of ſaint Germane that holie biſhop of Auxer, as the Scotiſh wꝛiters make mention. Which battell as the ſame is ſet foꝛth by Hector Boetius, becauſe it touched the ſtate of the Picts, we haue thought good here to expꝛeſſe.

The Scotiſh armie returne home againe.

Uter begat Arthur.

It was therefoꝛe about the feaſt of Eaſter, when the armies came into the field, the Sarons with the Picts on the one ſide, & the Bꝛitains on the other, of whom no ſmall number (being either growen to be idolaters thꝛough conuerſation with the Sarons, either els infected with the hereſie of the Pelagians) euen there in campe, by hearing ſuch good ſermons as ſaint Germane pꝛeached amongeſt them, were conuerted to the true beliefe, receiuing at the ſame time the ſacrament of the Lords bodie, togither in companie with other of the faithfull chꝛiſtians. Finallie when both parties were readie to giue battell,

S. Germane pꝛeacheth vnto the campe.

S. Germane leadeth the foze ward. Their crie was Alleluia.

saint Germane toke vpon him to haue the leading of the foze ward, wherein he had all the pzéests and ecclesiasticall ministers, giuing commandement, that when he should crie Alleluia, they should all answere him with one intire voice.

S. Germane beareth the kings standard.

Thus pzocéed they foꝛth to the battell, saint Germane bearing the kings standard in the foze front, & vpon the appzoch to the enimies, he with the rest of the pzéests crieng with a lowd voice thzice togither Alleluia, was answered by all the whole host, vttering and crieng the same crie so wholie togither, that the verie sound thereof caused such an eccho on each side by reason of the hollow mounteines and cliffes hard by them, that the Sarons amazed at this doubled noise, and doubting not onelie another power of their enimies to be hidden pziuilie among the hilles which they saw on ech side of them, but also least the verie rocks & mounteins would haue fallen downe vpon their heads togither with the frame of the element, readie (as it séemed to them) to breake in sunder, they toke them to their féet in such dzeadfull hast, that their breath was not able to suffice halfe the desire they had to continue their course. Manie of them made such hast, that running to the next riuer in hope to passe the same, were dzowned therein. To conclude, all of them generallie thzew away both weapon and armour, the mozе lightlie to make away. Thus thzough the policie of that blessed man saint Germane, the victozie remained with king Uter and his Bzitains, without anie bloudshed.

The Sarons miraculouslie discomfited.

Hyperbole.

Saint Beda making mention of this battell, assigneth the time to be at the first comming of S. Germane into this land, where as Hector Boetius following Veremond, supposeth it to be at the second time of his comming hither, which was in the daies of king Uter. But at what time soeuer this victozie thus chanced, certeine it is, the Bzitains waxing pzoud thereof, nothing regarded the power of the Sarons, noꝛ toke anie héed foꝛ pzouision of further defense; but after that those holie bishops Germane and Seuerus were returned into their countrie, they fell to all kinds of gluttonie and excesse, in following onelie their sensuall lusts and fleshlie concupiscence: which abuses, the bishops and other godlie men lamenting, ceassed not most earnestlie to repzoue, menacing destruction to the whole countrie, if the people leauing their wicked liuing and most heinous offenses towards God, did not amend and repent in due time and space.

Beda dissenteth from Hector Boetius and his authour Veremond.

Ths Bzitains giue themselues vnto all kinds of vice and abhominations.

The thzeatning of vengeance to succéed vicious liuing.

Neither were they deceiued herein: foꝛ within few yeares after, Occa eftsones began to make warres vpon the Bzitains againe, and gaue them a notable ouerthzow, sleaing of them to the number of fiftéene thousand, with their generall Mathaliod. But yet this victozie was not greatlie pleasant to the Sarons, foꝛ in the chase they lost their king the fozesaid Occa, being aduanced a good way off from the residue of his armie, with fiue hundzed hoꝛsemen and a few footmen, in pursute of his enimies, which was the onelie cause that as then the Sarons attempted no further exploit against the Bzitains. and yet foꝛ that they would not be without a gouernour, they created an other Occa to be their K. the nephue of the foꝛmer Occa by his bzother Oiscus. And then turned all their foꝛce to make warres against the Picts, foꝛ that Loth king of the Picts, contrarie to his oth of credence, had aided the Bzitains in the last battell, as by certeine pzisoners taken in the same they had perfect vnderstanding.

The Bzitains receiue a great ouerthzow.

King Occa slaine.

The yonger Occa nephue to the foꝛmer Occa by his bzother Oiscus.

Loth contrarie to his oth of credence aided the Bzitains against the Saxons.

Occa therfoꝛe being fierce of nature to the end to indamage his enimies the mozе, sent into Germanie foꝛ one Colgerme oꝛ Colgerne, a man of great estimation and birth amongest the Sarons, to come ouer with a power vnto him into England, pzomising foꝛ recompense of his trauell and aid against the Picts, to deliuer vnto him all such lands as lay beyond the water of Humber, which might be recouered out of the hands of the Picts, to inioy vnto him and his foꝛ euer. Colgerne accepting the offer, landed shoꝛtlie after in Noꝛthumberland, putting the whole countrie vnto fire and swoꝛd. Which cruell dealing caused a great number of Scots & Picts, which held diuerse castels in that quarter, to come foꝛth into the field to defend the countrie, and ioining battell with their enimies were discomfited, their slaughter being much increased by the coming of Occa at vnwares vpon them. Foꝛ he first taking truce with Uter king of the Bzitains, hasted with all spæd to ioine his power with Colgerne, after he heard once that he was come on land.

Colgerne landeth in Noꝛthumberland.

These newes being bzought by such as fled away into Gallowaie and Pictland, caused both the kings, Loth and Conranus in most spædie wise to assemble their foꝛces, and with the same to march foꝛthwith towards the Sarons: but being come within sight of them readie to giue battell, great was the feare and teꝛꝛoꝛ of both their hosts, to ioine in fight with such a number of fierce people, as they saw there befoꝛe their faces. Which feare arose first thzough the Bzitains, of whome no small number was there, in aid of the Scots and Picts against the Sarons, declaring manie things of the great value, strength of bodie, and huge foꝛme of lims of the same Sarons, being so fierce and cruell in fight, as they alledged, that they were able to put their enimies to flight euen with their grim lokes and terrible countenances. Whereof such feare and teꝛꝛoꝛ was spzead thzough both the whole armies, that if shame had not partlie wzought amongest the men of warre, manie of them would haue fled their waies befoꝛe anie battell had béene attempted at all.

The king of Scots and Picts raise their powers to resist the Sarons.

The Scots and Picts are put in feare of the Sarons valiancie.

The kings perceiuing such discomfiture amongst their men, caused them to assemble togither, and appointed one such as was thought méet foꝛ the purpose, to declare vnto them on their behalfes, how they could not but maruell to vnderstand such feare & lacke of courage, as appeared generallie thzough both the armies, considering there was no cause thereof, they being such a number of able warriours thzoughlie appointed, and therewithall led by such gouernours and capteins, as there was no reason why to be doubtfull of victozie, befoꝛe they had séene some triall and iust occasion of disaduantage. Foꝛ as touching the Sarons, they were no such men but that they might be ouercome well inough, as it might sufficientlie appeare, both by pzoꝛe of such victozies as Uoꝛtimer the Bzitish king had obteined against them; and also Aurelius Ambzose, who had vanquished them in such soꝛt, that when they durst not eftsones incounter with him in battell, they found means by poison to make him awaie.

The kings cause one to make an oꝛation vnto their people to remoue all feare out of their hearts.

Then sith the Bzitains (whome the Scots & Picts so often had subdued) had at sundzie times vanquished the Sarons, why should they feare in such wise to fight with them in common defense of their countrie, and reuenge of such iniuries as they had latelie receiued at their hands, sith the righteous God (as all good men ought to trust) is euer readie to aduance a righteous quarrell. And where it was bzuted amongest them, that the Sarons were so huge of stature, and mightie of lims, that no foꝛce was able to withstand them, it was certeinelie knowen, that the Scots & Picts were indued with no lesse mightinesse and strength of bodie than the Sarons; so that if they were not of like stomachs, that rested in their owne slouthfull cowardize, & not in natures wozke, hauing done hir part in bestowing hir gifts vpon them touching bodilie foꝛce, in such plentious manner, ner, as no other nation did lightlie anie waies ſurmount them.

Manie other arguments were alledged and laid forth to remoue feare out of their hearts, and to incourage them to fight, inſomuch that in the end it appeared the ſame wrought the wiſhed effect, in ſuch wiſe, that they generallie required battell, offering to liue and die at their capteins feet, and to follow them whither ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe their kings and liege lords to appoint them. Herewith the kings being ſatisfied, forth they march towards their enimies, whome they found readie to receiue them, and that with ſuch rigorous violence, that in the end, after great ſlaughter made on both parts, the Scots and Picts were put to flight, the Sarons purſuing in the chaſe till the darke night cauſed them to withdraw & returne into their campe. The next day following, the Scotiſh king with the reſidue of his armie haſted away with all ſpéed towards Galloway, and the Pictiſh king withdrew into Pictland. The Sarons vſing the victorie moſt cruellie, ſlue all ſuch of the Pictiſh and Scotiſh nations as they met with, in all places betwixt Tine and Tweed. Then did Occa create the forenamed Colgerme duke of Northumberland, who reparing all ſuch caſtels and ſtrong houſes, as he thought expedient to haue kept, placed garriſons of ſouldiers in the ſame to defend the countrie againſt all maner of enimies. After this, Occa turned his power againſt the Britains, which in the laſt battell had aided the Scots and Picts, as before is partlie touched. The Britains receiuing a great ouerthrow in battell, Uter the Britiſh king was glad with ſuch as might eſcape the enimies hands, to withdraw into Wales, leauing the reſidue of his countries vnto the Sarons, who thereupon recouered not onelie the citie of London, péelding it ſelfe vnto them for doubt of ſome long ſiege, but alſo all thoſe countries and prouinces which Hengiſt the firſt of the Sarons that reigned as king within the bounds of Albion at anie time, had holden or inioied, and ceaſſed not after recouerie of the ſame, to vexe and diſquiet the Scots, Britains, and Picts, with continuall incurſions, hoping by ſuch meanes to keepe them ſtill occupied. In the midſt of this trouble Uter K. of the Britains departed this world, poiſoned (as ſome haue written) by drinking water taken out of a fonteine which the Sarons had inuenomed. He died in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 521, and in the eightéenth of his owne reigne. After his deceaſſe, Loth king of the Picts ſent his ambaſſadours vnto the lords, and other the ſtates of the Britiſh dominions, requiring them, according to the accuſtomed lawes and ancient ordinances of the realme, to receiue him as king, ſith he had maried the ſiſter and heire of the two brethren Aurelius Ambroſe, and Uter, their two laſt kings, being as then both deceaſſed, without leauing behind them anie lawfull iſſue, by reaſon whereof their eſtate was fallen vnto him, to inioy the ſame during his life, hauing maried (as is ſaid) their owne naturall and lawfull borne ſiſter, and after the deceaſſe of him and his wife the ſaid ſiſter, then it ought by courſe of the lawes of all realmes and countries to deſcend vnto ſuch iſſue as he had begot of hir, which was two ſonnes, the one named Mordred, and the other Ualuan, or Gawan, as ſome do call him.

The Britains diſdainfullie vſing the Pictiſh ambaſſadours that came with this meſſage, refuſed not onelie to come vnder ſubiection of Loth, but alſo denied that his ſonnes begot of his lawfull wife, the ſiſter of Aurelius and Uter, ſhould haue anie rule or gouernement amongeſt them, as thoſe that were no Britains borne, but ſtrangers vnto them, being both borne and vpbread in a forren countrie. Thoſe ambaſſadours then hauing their anſwere, and being ſent home with reproch, the Britains contrarie to the lawes of all nations, proclamed Arthur, being a baſtard borne, king of their realme, and forthwith aſſembling their powers vnder his leading, marched on againſt the Sarons, in purpoſe to abate ſome part of their ſtrength, before the Picts (which was doubted would ſhortlie come to paſſe) ſhould ioine with them.

Therfore hauing procured aid of the Armorike Britains forth of France, they fought with their enimies within ten miles of London at the firſt, where the Sarons being at two ſeuerall times vanquiſhed, were conſtreined not only to paie tribute, but alſo to receiue magiſtrates to gouerne them by the ſaid Arthurs appointment, with other grieuous articles of agréement, to the great reioiſing of the Britains, for theſe ſo luckie beginings in the firſt exploits of their late elected king. Afterwards was London eaſilie won by the Britains, wherin Arthur remaining for a ſeaſon, toke aduiſe with his nobles how to proceed in his warres againſt the reſt of the Sarons. Finallie hauing prepared a mightie armie, he determineth to go againſt thoſe which inhabited beyond Humber northwards, with whome (as he had certeine knowledge) the Picts were ioined: for Loth comming to agréement with Colgerme, concluded a leage with him, whereby they were bound to aid one another againſt the Britains, as common enimies and aduerſaries to them both.

The Britains at their comming into Yorkeſhire pitched their campe not farre off from their enimies, who were alreadie ioined togither and incamped abroad in the field. The next day after, knowledge being had that they ſhould haue battell, Arthur appointed Howell leader of the Armorike Britains to incounter with the battell of the Picts, and he himſelfe to match with the Sarons. Thus they met togither on both parts verie fiercelie, and a ſore battell was fought there betwixt them, ſo that for a good ſpace it was doubtfull whether part ſhould haue the aduantage of the day, but at length the Picts were put to flight, which aduanced the Britains to the gaine of the whole field. For the Sarons, after they perceiued how the Picts were diſcomfited, dreading to abide the whole brunt by themſelues, betooke them alſo to their héeles, and made their race towards Yorke, as faſt as their feet might beare them.

Arthur purſuing them thither, beſieged the citie almoſt three moneths togither, but the Sarons defended the walles ſo ſtoutlie, making often iſſues forth vpon the Britains, that till hunger began to conſtreine them, they cared little for the ſiege. In the end, when they were determined to haue yélded vp the citie, they had knowledge, how there was an huge armie of Picts and Sarons newlie aſſembled, and readie to come forward to their ſuccors; alſo that king Occa (eſcaping from the battell wherein he had receiued the ouerthrow at Arthurs hands, and flée-ing afterward into Germanie) was now returned with a new power, and arriued within the mouth of Humber. Which newes cauſed them to deferre all communication, in hope that if they might abide the ſiege but for a ſmall time, the Britains ſhould ſhortlie be compaſſed in on each ſide, and oppreſſed on the ſudden.

Arthur heard of the comming of their ſuccours in like maner, and iudging it no wiſedome to tarie the comming of his ſo puiſſant enimies, conſidering what a number of diſeaſed and ſicke perſons he had alreadie in his hoſt, by reaſon of their lieng abroad in the field, raiſed his ſiege, and withdrew himſelfe ſo ſpédilie as was poſſible with his whole armie into Arthur proclaimed king of Britaine.

Arthur goeth forth againſt the Sarons.

The Armorike Britains in aid of Arthur.

The Sarons vanquiſhed, are conſtreined to pay tribute to the Britains.

London is won by the Britains.

Arthur raiſeth a power againſt the Picts.

A league concluded betwixt Loth & Colgerme.

Howell leader of the Armorike Britains

The Picts put to flight.

The Sarons chaſed, make their race towards Yorke.

Yorke beſieged.

Occa returneth out of Germanie with a new power.

Arthur raiſeth his ſiege.

The Scots through comfortable words of an oration recouer new courages.

The Scots and Picts are put to flight.

Colgerme created duke of Northumberland.

The Britains ouerthrowen in battell by the Sarons.

Uter withdraweth into Wales.

London recouered by the Sarons.

The death of Uter poiſoned by drinking water of a well.

521

Loth requireth the kingdome of Britaine.

Mordred and Gawan.

The Britains refuſe to receiue either Loth or anie of his ſonnes to reigne ouer them.

Wales, where he appointed the Armorike Britains to soiorne for that winter, with other of the meaner sort of his owne souldiers: whilest he toke the residue of his chosen bands, and went to London, there to prouide that no rebellion should be raised among the Saxons of Kent, or other of the countries nere about. In the beginning of the nert spring, he gathered his host togither againe, and with the same went forth against Colgerme and Occa, who being issued forth of Northumberland, were entered into the British confines, spoiling and wasting the countrie with their accustomed crueltie.

Arthur returneth to London.

Arthur discōfiteth the Saxons twise in battel & then againe laieth siege to Yorke and winneth it.

Whereupon incountering them twise in battell, he obteined the victorie, and then besieging Yorke, at length he entered into that citie, by meanes of a Britaine, who dwelling amongst the Saxons there, in the night season conueied a sort of Britains into the citie, the which breaking open the gates in the dead of the night, did let in all the whole host. Where Arthur would not suffer his men to make any great murther of the enimies, which were content to yeld themselues, but vsed them very gently, therby to win more praise amongst all those that heard of his worthie victories. The Britains hauing thus conquered the citie of Yorke, manie feats of armes were dailie practised betwixt them and the Saxons, which held possession still of the countrie thereabouts. But the Britains lieng in that citie all the summer and winter following, at length began to take their ease, namelie in the depth of winter, and therewith gaue themselues to banketting, drinking, plaie, and other kinds of voluptuous pleasures, so that it seemed they trusted more to their passed victories, than to their present force, not fearing such dangers as was like to follow.

Arthur vseth the victorie with gentlenesse.

The Britains soiourning for the winter time within Yorke, giue themselues vnto banketting & voluptuousnesse.

It is thought of some, that about the same time, Arthur first instituted, that the feast of Christmasse should be kept with such excesse of meats and drinks, in all kinds of inordinate banketting and reuell for the space of thirtene daies togither, according to the custome vsed still through both the realmes of England and Scotland euen vnto this day, resembling the feasts which the gentiles vsed to kéepe in the honor of their drunken god Bacchus, called in Latin Bacchanalia: wherein all kinds of beastlie lust and sensuall voluptuousnes was put in vre. But whence soeuer, or by whome soeuer this insatiable gourmandise came vp amongst vs, suerlie a great abuse it is, to see the people at such a solemne feast, where they ought to be occupied in thanks giuing to almightie God, for the sending downe of his onelie begotten sonne amongst vs, to giue themselues in manner wholie to gluttonie, and excessiue filling of their bellies, with such maner of lewd and wanton pastimes, as though they should rather celebrate the same feasts of Bacchanalia, and those other which the gentiles also kept, called Floralia, and Priapalia, than the remembrance of Christs natiuitie, who abhorreth all maner of such excesse.

Christmasse bankets resembling the feasts Bacchanalia.

But now to my purpose. When the next summer was once come, Arthur led forth his Britains against their enimies, but by reason of such ease and pleasure as they had taken whilest they soiourned in Yorke, being now come into the field, they were able to abide no paines, so that no good was done of certeine yéers after, till finallie Arthur ioined in league with Loth king of the Picts. The conditions of which league were these. That Arthur during his naturall life should reigne as king of the Britains, and after his decease, the kingdome to remaine vnto Mordred and his issue, if he chanced to haue anie. That the Picts should aid the Britains against the Saxons, and haue all such land as might be recouered of them beyond Humber. Also the league which was betwixt them and the Scots, they should dulie obserue. Mordred should marrie the daughter of Gawolan a noble man amongst the Britains, and of highest authoritie next vnto Arthur himselfe: the children of this marriage to be brought vp with their grandfather in Britaine, till they came to yeares of discretion. Gawan the brother of the foresaid Mordred, should serue king Arthur, and receiue at his hands large interteinment, and great possessions to mainteine therewith his estate.

The Britains throughout rest and ease became vnapt to susteine the paines of warres.

A league concluded betwixt Arthur king of Britains, & Loth king of Picts.

Mordred marrieth the daughter of one Gawolan a Britaine.

Gawan or Gawen in seruice with K. Arthur.

Other articles there were comprised in this league, according as was thought requisite for the maintenance of stable friendship betwixt these kings and their nations. So that Arthur hauing concluded this league, and still being desirous to purge the whole Ile of all miscreants and enimies of the christian faith, he sent vnto the Scotish and Pictish kings, requiring them on the behalfe of that dutie which they owght vnto the aduancement of Christs religion, to assemble their powers, & to mét him at Tinmouth, whither he would repaire to ioine with them, at such day as they would appoint, from thence to march forth against the Saxons.

Arthur sendeth ambassadors vnto the kings of Scots and Picts.

Loth king of the Picts, and Conranus king of the Scotishmen, failed not in this so necessarie an enterprise, but agréeable to Arthurs request, within few daies after they came forward, and ioining with the Britains, forth they went against the Saxons, whom they vnderstood to be alreadie in campe, vnder the conduct of their king Occa, in purpose to stop their passage. When both the armies were approched nére togither, they prepared to the battell, and first Colgerme duke of Northumberland mounting vpon a light gelding, rode almost euen hard to the face of the Picts, where they stood in their order of battell right stoutlie, and there vttering manie reprochfull words vnto Loth, and other of his nobles, for breach of their promised friendship to him and his Saxons, declared that he trusted shortlie to see iust punishment light vpon them for this falshood and vntruths sake, in thus ioining with their former enimies against their most trustie friends and stedfast allies.

Scots, Picts and Britains ioine togither against the Saxons.

The Pictish king not greatlie moued herewith, commanded his standards to aduance forward, and the Saxons likewise hasted apace towards them, so that the one being come within danger of shot of the other, the Picts let flie their arrowes verie freshlie. Arthur in the meane time hauing set his people in araie, exhorted them to fight manfullie: and so soone as he perceiued that the fraie was begun by the Picts, he in semblable wise cōmandeth the Britains to giue the onset, so that immediatlie there insued a sore conflict, the Scots being in the right wing, & sleaing Cheldrike one of the chiefest capteins amongst the Saxons, quicklie discomfited that wing with the which they were first matched. Colgerme with his Saxons incountring (as is said) with the Picts, placed in the left wing, rushed in amongst his enimies (vpon an earnest desire to be reuenged of his aduersarie king Loth) with such violence, that at their first incounter he ouerthrew the same Loth: but immediatlie therevpon two Pictish horsemen running at Colgerme sideling wise, bare him quite through.

Colgerme is run through by his aduersaries.

In the meane time, Loth by meane of his strong habergion escaping without hurt, was relieued by such as stood about him, and restored againe to his companie: but Colgerme being dead before he could be recouered from amongst the throng of his enimies, his men were so discomforted therewith, that streightwaies therevpon they fell to running away. The maine battell of the Saxons being thus left bare on both sides, began to giue backe, which Arthur perceiuing, the more earnestlie prealled forth vpon them, so that in the end Occa being constreined to flée,

Colgerme reproueth Loth

The Saxons are put to flight.

Occa constreined to flée.

flee, and receiuing a sore wound, had much adoo to be conueied awaie by some of his horssemen, the Britains pursued so fiercelie vpon him. At length being brought vnto the sea side, he got vessels, and escaped ouer into Germanie. This victorie being thus atchiued, constreined the Saxons to yéeld vnto king Arthur, simplie submitting themselues vnto his mercie, who of his clemencie was contented to pardon them of life and goods, vpon condition they would become christians, and from thenceforth neuer after to make anie warres vpon their neighbors the Britains, Scots, or Picts. But if they would not agrée hereunto, then leauing their goods, armor, and weapon behind them, they should auoid the land, & that within 13 daies next insuing.

Vpon what condition Arthur receiueth the Saxons vpon their submission.

Manie of the Saxons that could get passage, sailed ouer into Germanie. Other feining themselues to become christians, remained in the land, loking one day for better hap & fortune. Diuerse that were not able by meanes of pouertie to get awaie within the time appointed, and yet refusing to be christened, were put to death, according to the proclamation set forth for the same purpose, so that in comparison verie few amongst them receiued the christian faith sincerelie, and with a true meaning mind. Things being thus quieted in Northumberland, Arthur toke order for the reparing of churches abroad in the countrie, which the Saxons had ouerthrowne or defaced; & namelie in the citie of Yorke he bestowed great cost, where the cruell infidels had done much hurt vpon churches, and other religious houses.

Arthur caused churches to be repared.

In the yéere following, Arthur had newes how the Saxons which held the Ile of Wight, ioining with the Kentish Saxons, had done great displeasures vnto the Britains, on that side of the Thames, killing & sleaing an huge number of them with great crueltie, wherewith being sore moued, he drew towards London with his armie, purposing vtterlie to Arthur purposeth to destroie the whole race of the Saxons in Albion.

destroie all the east & south Saxons, since otherwise he could not prouide for the suertie of his subiects, being still in danger to be murthered and robbed, so long as anie of that wicked generation of the Saxons remained heere amongst them.

By meanes also of the league, he had with him in this iournie ten thousand Picts, & as manie Scots: Eugenius nephue to king Conran by his brother Congall being generall ouer the Scots, and Mordred the sonne of king Loth by his wife Anne, gouerning the Picts, a luskie yong gentleman, verie

The opinion which men had conceiued of Mordred for his wit & towardlinesse.

wittie and towardlie in all his doings. Furthermore, Arthur vnderstanding what hurt rest and ease had done amongst his men of warre, caused them to keepe the field in all this iournie, and passing by London, lodged them a little beside the riuer of Thames. But he himselfe with some of his nobles, entred into the citie, causing supplications to be made vnto almightie God three daies together, for good successe to follow against the Saxons. On the fourth day hearing diuine seruice celebrated by the bishop of London, and causing a sermon to be made in the market place, he committed himselfe and his whole armie vnto the tuition of Christ, and his mother the virgine, whose image in steed of a badge he bare in Arthurs badge.

his shield continuallie from that day forward, as diuerse heeretofore haue written. After this, issuing forth of the citie, he willed all his men to be of good comfort, as they that fought in a iust quarell against Pagans, and enimies of the faith. Mordred and his father in law Gawolane passed on before the battels with fiue thousand horssemen, and being come within fiue miles of the Saxons, who likewise were assembled in campe, there came from them vnto Arthur ambassadors, requiring him to staie his iour-

Arthurs exhortation to his people.

An offer made by the Saxons vnto king Arthur.

nie, for they were readie (if they might haue libertie so to do) to depart out of the land with their goods and substance, without further molesting the Britains, either by one meanes or other.

Arthur would neither consent heerevnto, nor yet grant a truce for three daies, for the which they made earnest sute, but bad them depart for that time, onelie assuring them that he would not come passing two miles forwards for that day, so that if they thought good, they might returne to him in the morning, and haue answer what the chiefest gouernors of his host thought touching their request, by whome he would haue the matter more throughlie debated. In the meane time, whilest the Britains were busied with hearing of these ambassadors, and taking aduise what was best to do touching their demand, the Saxons marched forth with all spéed, and comming vpon Mordred and Gawolan at vnwares, they gaue the onset freshlie vpon them, and that verie much to the disaduantage of the Britains and Picts, who notwithstanding, through the earnest exhortation of their capteins, receiued their enimies verie fiercelie, in doing that which was possible for so small a number to do, howbeit in the end oppressed with multitude, they were forced to flée, and so did, not resting till they came in sight of the whole armie. In which fight, Mordred and Gawolan by helpe of their souldiers, being mounted vpon their horsses, escaped without hurt, though they lost no small number of their companie, as well in the fight as in the chase.

The Saxons comming vpon Mordred and Gawolan put them with their people to the worse.

The Saxons ambassadors being not yet departed out of the British campe, were hereupon staied till the next morning, and then had answer giuen them, that from thenceforth the Britains were not minded to heare anie messengers of the Saxons comming to intreat of peace, since it was manifest enough, they ment nothing but falshod, as well appeared in that they had against the law of armes, whilest their ambassadors were in communication, distressed part of the British armie, and therefore they should assure themselues, to haue at Arthurs hands nothing but cruell war to the vttermost of his power, in reuenge of such their great vntruths and cloked dealings. They had scarse receiued their answer, but that there came from the Saxons fortie other ambassadors, being men of great authoritie amongst them, to excuse that which had happened ouer night, in laieng the fault vpon a sort of vndiscreet persons, nothing priuie vnto that which the gouernors of the armie had done, touching the sending of their ambassadors, and therevpon had without their aduise made that skirmish.

what answer the Saxons ambassadors had at Arthurs hands.

The excuse of the Saxons.

But Arthur iudging that there was some new subtill practise in hand, vnder pretense of this new ambassage, commanded as well these that came last, as the other which came first, to be kept in the marshals tent, that in no wise they should escape, whilest he himselfe in the second watch of the night departed out of his campe, with all his puissance, which he diuided into three battels, and hauing marched three miles forward, he was vpon his enimies yer they vnderstood anie thing of his comming, insomuch that the Britains had slaine and chased the watch of the Saxons campe, before it was certeinlie knowne what the matter ment. Hereof also insued such a tumult and noise amongst the Saxons, running vp and downe, calling and crieng one to another, as it

The sudden inuasion made by the Britains vpon the Saxons.

The great tumult in the Saxons campe.

happeneth in such cases of extreme feare, that the best aduised amongest them wist not well what to do. Wherevpon Mordred desirous to reuenge his last ouerthrowe, brake in also vpon his enimies verie fiercelie.

Mordred desirous to be reuenged.

But some of them hauing gotten them into their armor, stood at their defense awhile amongst their carts and carriages, and so resisted the Britains on that that ſide for a ſeaſon: other of the Saxons hauing no leaſure to arme themſelues, nor to draw into anie order of battell, by reaſon of the ſudden impreſſion of the Britains, brake forth of the campe on the contrarie ſide, & fled ſo faſt as their feet might beare them. But being purſued by the Britiſh horſſemen, and beaten downe, a great number of them ran into the next riuer, and there were drowned, chooſing rather that kind of death, than ſo cruellie to be murthered by the aduerſaries hands: verelie the Britains ſhewed no mercie that day, for ſo manie as came within their danger, died without redemption. And this bloudie battell made an end of ſuch an huge number of Saxons, that it was thought they ſhould neuer haue recouered againe anie puiſſance able to haue indamaged the Britains in anie manner of wiſe.

The Saxons are put to the flight.

The crueltie of the Britains in ſleating the Saxons.

Arthur hauing thus vanquiſhed his enimies, gaue licence vnto thoſe nobles which he had deteined (as is ſaid) in his campe, being ſent vnto him as ambaſſadors, to depart ouer into Germanie, appointing the reſidue of ſuch Saxons as were men of no defenſe, to remaine ſtill in the land, yéelding a yéerelie tribute vnto the Britains, and alſo with condition that they ſhould become chriſtians. The Scotiſhmen and Picts which had aided the Britains in this iournie, ſoiorned a while after at London, where Arthur feaſted & banketted them in moſt roiall wiſe, ſhewing them all the honor that might be deuiſed, and afterwards ſent them home verie princelie rewarded with manie great gifts and rich preſents. Whileſt ſuch buſineſſe as ye haue heard was thus in hand betwixt the Saxons & Britains, the eſtate of the Scotiſh common-wealth was gouerned by great wiſedome and policie, without anie notable trouble or diſorder. But finallie, when king Conrane began to waxe aged, and that ſuch as had the chiefe doings vnder him, ſought not the execution of iuſtice, but their owne commodities, to the hinderance of a multitude, the people began to repine thereat, and to practiſe a conſpiracie with diuerſe of the nobles againſt Conrane, and thoſe which ruled by his appointment.

Arthurs munificence.

A conſpiracie practiſed againſt Conrane.

It chanced that there was one Concet, a man of baſe birth, aſſigned by the kings commiſſion to be chiefe iuſtice, or as it were chancelor for the adminiſtration of the lawes in Murrey land, a perſon paſſing full of rigorous crueltie, eſpeciallie in iudgements of life and death, and in gathering vp of all manner of forfeitures of penall lawes, which he did onelie to purchaſe fauor of the king, by the inriching of his coffers, in reſpect whereof he had ſmall regard either of right or wrong, ſo that there were hope of ſomewhat to be gotten. Amongeſt other the violent doings of this Concet, he cauſed diuerſe merchantmen of the towne of Fores in Murrey land (as then the chiefeſt towne of all that countrie) to be accuſed of treaſon by a light information, and in the end executed without anie apparant matter, onelie vpon a couetous deſire to haue their goods and riches, becauſe they were men of great wealth and ſubſtance. Diuerſe noble men of the countrie there abouts, and namelie of the towne of Fores, being partlie of kin vnto thoſe merchants, were ſore offended with this act, and héere vpon they firſt came vnto Concet, and reuiled him with manie high reprochfull words, and afterwards fell vpon him in the place of open iudgement where he ſat as then in his iudgement ſeate, & there murthered him, getting them forthwith vp into the mounteins, to auoid the danger which they knew vnpoſſible for them to eſcape, if they ſhould happen to be taken while Conrane ſhould be liuing.

In euill officer.

A preſumptuous act.

After this, they deuiſed how they might increaſe their heinous déed and bold enterpriſe with an other farre more horrible and notable, which was to ſlea the king himſelfe, as the originall cauſe of all ſuch miſchiefe that then reigned in the realme through the vnworthie gouernment of his vniuſt miniſters and couetous magiſtrats, hoping withall to obteine the fauor of ſome of the noble men, whome they knew to maligne the king and his councell moſt extremelie, and thereby in ſhort time to be aſſured of their pardon. Shortlie after it chanced that one Donald alſo gouernor of Atholl, a man in great fauor and truſt with the king, had vnderſtanding what theſe outlawes intended, and thereupon practiſed with them by priuie meſſengers, that they ſhould come in ſecret manner vnto Enuerlochtée, where the king ſoiorned, promiſing them by moſt aſſured meanes of oths and vowes, that they ſhould haue all the furtherance he could deuiſe towards the atchiuing of their enterpriſe.

The cauſe of the kings death.

Donald gouernor of Athol conſpireth with the outlawes to murther the king.

Hereupon theſe outlawes, according to their inſtructions, came in ſecret wiſe vnto Enuerlochtée, and were cloſelie conueied into Conrans bedchamber by Donalds meanes, who as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, got himſelfe quickelie out of the waie when he ſaw them once entered within the doore of the chamber. Conrane the king perceiuing how he was betraied, and that his enimies were got into his chamber readie to murther him, ſkept forth of his bed, and falling downe vpon his knées beſought them to take pitie of his age, and not to defile their hands in the bloud of their naturall lord and king, conſidering the fault was not his, if they had béene anie waies wronged. Howbeit they doubting nothing but leaſt he ſhould eſcape their hands, ſtreightwaies diſpatched him out of life, and withall made haſte awaie. This was the end of king Conranus, in the 20 yéere of his reigne, being the 16 of Arthurs dominion ouer the Britains, the firſt of the emperor Juſtinianus, and in the yeare after the birth of our Sauior 531. But his corps was buried in the abbeie of Iona, otherwiſe called Colmekill, with ſuch funerall pompe and exequies, as in thoſe daies were vſed.

The outlawes enter into the kings bedchamber.

Conrane is murthered within his bedchamber by traitorous meanes.

35. H.B.

20. H.B.

535. H.B.

Eugenius.

After him ſucceeded his nephue Eugenius, the ſonne of his brother Congall, the which Eugenius (as aboue is ſaid) was with Arthur in the laſt mentioned iournie againſt the Saxons. There were that counſelled him in the beginning of his reigne (which he began in Argile, being placed there vpon the chaire of marble) that he ſhould ſée in anie wiſe the authors of his vncles death dulie puniſhed, to the example of others, that they ſhould not attempt the like héereafter againſt their liege lord and crowned king: but he contrariwiſe did not onelie forgiue the offenſe, but alſo receiued the forenamed Donald with other the murtherers into his ſeruice, and made them of his priuie councell, which cauſed manie men to ſuſpect, leaſt he himſelfe had béene of councell with them in committing that murther. The talke whereof was ſo common in all mens mouths, namelie amongſt the common people, that the quéene Dowager late wife to king Conrane, doubting not onelie the ſuertie of hir owne life, but alſo of hir two ſons (which ſhe had by the ſaid Conrane, the one named Reginan, and the other Aidan) fled with them ouer into Ireland, where within few yeares after, ſhe died with the one of hir ſonnes, that is to ſay, Reginan: the other Aidan was honorablie brought vp by the king of that countrie, according to his birth and degrée.

Eugenius is inueſted king of Scotland.

Regicides or kingquellers ought chieflie aboue all other to be puniſhed.

Eugenius is ſuſpected of his predeceſſors death.

The queene Dowager fled with hir two ſonnes into Ireland.

Eugenius in the beginning of his reigne, to win thereby the peoples fauor, demeaned himſelfe moſt gentlie in all his proceédings, doing nothing that taſted in anie part of crueltie. He would oftentimes ſit amongſt the iudges himſelfe, and if he ſuſpected leaſt anie man had wrong, he would licence them to plead

The murtherers to

The detectation of the murtherers to

The humanitie and fauourable friendſdispatch the king also.

plead their case anew. And such as he perceiued were not of abilitie to follow their suite in anie cause of right, he would helpe them with monie of the common treasurie. He ordeined also, that no orphane should be compelled to answer anie action, or otherwise be vered by suit of law. Moreouer, that no widow should be constreined to come past a mile forth of hir owne dores for anie matter in controuersie betwixt hir and anie other person, to be heard afore anie iudges or publike officers. Robbers, theeues, and their receiuers he caused to be dulie punished, to restraine other from attempting the like offenses. And also he had a speciall regard for the obseruing of the league betwixt his subiects and the Picts, with the Britains, according to the tenor of the same.

About this season should it be also that Arthur did atchiue all those worthie victories, which are ascribed vnto him against the Scots, Irishmen, Danes, Norwegians, and other northerne people. Moreouer it is written by some authors, that he should subdue the most part of Germanie with the low countries, Britaine, Normandie, France, and the Romans, with the people of the east: but the credit hereof resteth with the same authors. Onelie it is certeine (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) that Arthur liued in the daies of Iustinianus the emperor, about which time the Gotthes, Vandals, Burgonions, & Frenchmen did inuade sundrie parts of the Romane empire, pitifullie walking and spoiling the same, where yet such writers as haue set forth those warres, make no mention of Arthur at all. ¶ Therefore letting all doubtfull things passe, I will proceed with mine author, and declare what he hath found written in such Scotish chronicles as he followeth touching the British Arthur, which for that it partlie varieth from the other our common chronicles, namelie Geffrey of Monmouth, I thinke it worthie to be noted here, to the end that euerie man maie iudge thereof as to him seemeth best.

To the purpose then. After that the Britains were deliuered from the terror of the Saxons, and that with quietnesse they began to wax wealthie, they repented them of the league, which they had concluded afore with Loth king of the Picts, speciallie for that they could not in anie wise be contented to haue anie stranger to reigne amongst them, and heere vpon comming vnto Arthur, required of him, sith he himselfe had no issue to succeed him, that it might please him yet, to name one of his owne nation to gouerne them after his decease. Arthur not gainsaieng their request, willed them (sith their pleasure was such, in no wise to haue a stranger to reigne ouer them) to name one themselues, being descended of the bloud roiall, and such a one as in whome they had perceiued some towardlie proofe of wisedome and valiancie: and he for his part promised to ratifie their election. The nobles with great reioising of the people drawing together to consult for the choise of such a one, as might be acceptable to all the British nation, at length agreed vpon Constantinus, the sonne of Cador duke of Cornwall, a godlie yong gentleman, both for his person and other his worthie qualities much to be commended. Who being brought by the peeres of the realme into the councell chamber, and there presented vnto king Arthur, as one most meet to succeed him; Arthur accepted their election verie gladlie, and caused the same Constantine forthwith to be proclamed heire apparant to the crowne, by the name of prince of Britaine, which notified him to be successor to the king in gouernement of the realme. Constantine being in such wise preferred, behaued himselfe so honorablie, and with such a shew of gentle demeanor, that he wan him much praise, with an opinion of high worthinesse amongst all the British nation.

In this meane time was Loth the king of the Picts deceased, leauing his name as a perpetuall memorie vnto his countrie of Pictland, the which euer since as a remembrance of his worthinesse, hath beene called Lothian, or Louthian; but his sonne Mordred, succeeding him in gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, and hearing that Constantine was proclamed heire apparant of Britaine, was sore moued therewith, and immediatlie sending his ambassadours vnto king Arthur, complained, for that contrarie to the honor of his kinglie estate, he had broken the league concluded betwixt him and his father late of famous memorie king Loth, wherein it was agreed amongest other things, that there should none succeed in the kingdome of Britaine, after Arthurs decease, but the children begot betwixt K. Loth and his wife queene Anne, or such as descended of them; where contrariwise it was notified vnto the Pictish people, that Constantine the sonne of Cador was elected prince, and thereby inabled as heire apparant to the crowne.

They required him therefore to call himselfe to remembrance, and not so lightlie to agree vnto the flattering persuasions of the Britains, aduising him vnto that thing which was meerelie repugnant to reason, and against both gods lawes and mans, admonishing him withall to obserue the league, according to the oth, which he had solemnelie taken vpon him, and to moue his subiects to do the like, least for the contrarie, they should prouoke the wrath of almightie God against them, who is the iust reuenger of all such as go about to breake leagues and couenanted pactions. Herevnto answere was made by consent of the nobles of Britaine, that the league which was concluded betwixt Arthur and Loth, indured but for the life times of them two onelie, and to ceasse by either of their deaths: therefore Arthur had done nothing contrarie to anie pact or promise made, but according to the duetie of a prince that tendered the weale of his subiects, had prouided them one to succeed him of their owne nation, for doubt least the realme after his decease should fall into the hands of strangers, which in no wise ought of right to be suffered. Therefore if the Picts loued the suertie of their owne estate, it should be good for them to hold themselues contented with their owne bounds, least if they sought for other mens liuings, they might hapilie within short time perceiue, what doth insue oftentimes vpon such rash and vnaduised attempts.

The Pictish ambassadors returning home with this answer, caused the whole nation to take such disdaine therewith, that immediatlie they resolued to reuenge their wrongs by open warres; but first they thought good to trie if they might procure the Scotishmen to take part with them, in reuenge of such iniuries as they had in like maner latelie receiued at the Britains hands. Moreouer, repenting themselues, that they had in times past aided the Britains against the Saxons, they purpose to trie if they might now moue the same Saxons eftsones to make warres vpon the Britains, thereby to be the better able to mainteine their owne quarrell against them. First, such ambassadours as were sent from Mordred vnto Eugenius king of the Scots, found him verie agreeable vnto their requests, and the sooner, for that such Scotish rebels as fled vnto Arthur, were not onelie receiued by him, but also mainteined to make rodes and incursions into the Scotish borders.

Arthur hauing knowledge of the deuises of his enimies (the warres being first proclamed) he furnished all the sea-coasts with notable numbers of men, ship of king Eugenius towards his people.

Commendable ordinances.

The victorious conquests ascribed to Arthur.

This causeth no small doubt to arise of the great victories ascribed vnto Arthur.

Geffrey of Monmouth.

The Britains repent themselues of the league concluded with the Picts.

The request of the Britains to haue one of their owne nation appointed to succeed king Arthur.

Constantine proclamed heire apparant & prince of Britaine.

Lothian taketh the name of Loth the Pictish king.

Mordred succedeth Loth in the kingdome of Pictland.

Mordred complaineth vnto king Arthur, for that Constantine was created his heire apparant.

The Picts purpose to be reuenged on the Britains by open war.

The Picts solicit both Scots and Saxons to make warre vpon the Britains.

Eugenius the Scotish king agreeable to the request of the Picts.

The answere made to the Pictish ambassadours.

Arthur setteth forward toward the Scots and Picts.

men, to withstand the landing of the Saxons, if they should fortune to attempt anie invasion. That done, he passed forth with the residue of his people towards the Scots & Picts, who were alreadie assembled in campe, and were come as farre as the riuer of Humber, neere to the bankes whereof they had pitched their tents, as in a place fatall for the Britains to be vanquished in. Both the armies being brought here into order of battell, the one in sight of the other, there were certeine bishops of those three nations that toke great pains to ride to and fro betwixt them, to exhort the kings vnto peace and concord, considering what mischiefe and great bloudshed should insue, if vpon wilfullnesse they would seeke to trie that by dint of sword, which they might make an end of by means of amiable treatie and friendlie agreement. Againe, they could not do the thing that might more content the Saxons, common enimies to christian religion, than if by their incountring togither in battell, they should so infeeble their whole powers, whereby the Saxons might haue readie means and occasion offered to execute their greedie desires to conquere the whole Ile. Mordred and Eugenius were persuaded by this earnest trauell of the bishops, to put their matter in compromise, and to lay away their armour and weapon, if they might haue assurance that the league made with king Loth should in euerie point be obserued. Arthur likewise at the sute of the same bishops, would haue beene contented for his part to haue agreed hereunto; but other of the Britains, namelie those that were of kin and alliance vnto Constantine their prince, could in no wise be persuaded hereunto; but rather with manie reprochfull words rebuked the bishops for their vntimelie sute, seeing the enimies readie ranged in battell at point to giue the onset, so that (as they alledged) it might be doubted what they meant by their motion, vnlesse they went about to betraie the armie, vnder pretense of a cloked treatie for an vnprofitable agreement. These or such like words were vnneth ended, when suddenlie the noise being raised on both sides, the battels rushed togither right fiercelie. The Britains had the disaduantage of the place, being so incumbred with mires, bogs, and mosses, that they could not well aid themselues, nor handle their weapons to anie purpose. Yet did the battell continue a long time, to the destruction of such numbers of men; that the riuer Humber (neere vnto the which this field was fought) was so mingled with bloud, that the water thereof being all coloured red, caried no small number of dead bodies downe into the sea. In the middest of the fight, there was one with lowd voice in the British tong cried out to the Britains (of purpose prompted thereunto) that Arthur with other of the nobles on his side were slaine, and therefore it were but follie to trust anie longer vpon victorie, but rather were it wisdome for euerie man by flight to prouide for his owne safetie.

Bishops trauell betwixt the parties to bring them to communication for a peace.

Mordred and Eugenius were persuaded vnto peace.

The Britains would not consent to haue anie peace talked vpon.

The battell is begun.

A cruell battell.

A craftie policie.

This was one of the Picts.

The Britains put to flight.

This voice wonderfullie incouraged the Scotishmen and Picts, but the Britains were put in such feare therewith, that the most part of them immediatlie hereupon fell to running away. Others of them iudging this to be but some craftie and subtill practise of the enimies deuised of purpose, as it was in deed, to discomfort them with, abode by it still: manfullie continuing in fight, till they were beaten downe and slaine in maner euerie mothers sonne. This victorie being thus hardlie got, cost more mens liues than anie other had done of manie yeares before; for of the Scots and Picts being vanquishers, there died in that mortall battell aboue 20000 men, togither with Mordred, and a great number of the nobilitie of both the nations. Of the Britains and such other as were with them in aid, there were slaine, what in battell and what in chase, at the point of 30000, among whome was Arthur himselfe, with Gawan or Galuan (as some bookes haue) brother vnto Mordred, who bare such good will and intire loue vnto his lord and maister the said Arthur, that he fought that day most earnestlie on his side against his owne naturall brother the said Mordred. Also there were killed Caime and Gawolan, with the most part of all the residue of the British nobilitie, and manie prisoners taken, by reason that Humber kept them in from flieng anie way forth on the one side, which prisoners also were afterwards slaine, the gentlemen onelie excepted.

Twentie thousand of Scots and Picts slaine.

Mordred is slaine.

Arthur with 30000 Britains slaine.

Gawan is slaine.

Caime and Gawolan are slaine.

The day next after the battell, the campe of the Britains was rifled, and amongst other rich spoiles there was found queene Guainore Arthurs wife, with a great number of other ladies and gentlewomen. The whole spoile of the campe and field being equallie diuided by lots betwixt them, the Scots had for their parts certeine faire charets laden with rich stuffe and iewels, also horsses and armours, beside sundrie noble men, whom they had to their prisoners. Vnto the Picts fell for their portion queene Guainore, with the ladies and gentlewomen, and diuers other of the noble men, besides a great quantitie of other rich prete and boties. These prisoners, which the Picts had, were conueied into a castell in Angus, called Dunbarre, a place of great strength in those daies, though at this present there remaineth nothing but the name with the ruines therof. In which castell they were deteined vnder sure ward, during the residue of their naturall liues. In witnesse wherof there be remaining vnto this day, the graues and monuments where manie of these captiue Britains were buried, in the fields of a towne in that countrie called Pegill, not past 10 miles from Dundee: but amongest the residue, that of Guainore is most famous.

Queene Guainore taken.

The spoile of the Britains camp diuided.

Dunbarre in Angus, not that in Louthian.

There goeth a plaine tale ouer all that countrie, told for an assured trueth, that if anie woman chance to tread vpon that graue, they shall remaine barren without bringing forth anie issue more than the said Guainore did. But whether this be true or not, certeine it is (as Boetius writeth) that there dare no woman come neere that graue, not onelie eschuing it themselues, but also commanding their daughters to beware thereof. This bloudie battell weakened so much the forces both of the Scots, Picts, and Britains, that manie a day after they were not able to recouer againe their former states and dignities. The yeare also that these three nations incountred thus cruellie togither, was after the birth of our Sauiour 542, the 26 of Arthurs reigne ouer the Britains, and the 11 of Eugenius his gouernement ouer the Scotishmen.

The fable of queene Guainores graue buried in Angus.

542.
8. H.B.

In the same yere before the battell, were seene manie strange sights in Albion. Grasse and hearbs in Yorkeshire appeared to bee all stained with bloud. Neere vnto Camelon, a cow brought forth a calfe with two heads. Also an ewe brought forth a lambe that was both male and female. The sunne appeared about none daies all wholie of a bloudie colour. The element appeared full of bright starres to euerie mans sight continuallie for the space of two daies togither. In Wales there was a battell betweene crowes and pies on the one side, and rauens on the other, with such a slaughter of them, as before that time had not beene heard of.

Strange and vnketh wonders.

But to proceed. Eugenius king of the Scots at his returne from the battell, gaue to those that had escaped with life, and abid by him in the chiefe danger of the fight, manie bounteous & large rewards. The sonnes and neerest kinsfolke of such as were slaine

Eugenius rewardeth his souldiers.

ſlaine, he alſo aduanced to ſundrie preferments of lands & liuings, that they inioieng the ſame, might be a witneſſe in time to come of the good ſeruice of their anceſtors, ſhewed in defenſe of their king and countrie, and alſo of his princelie liberalitie, in rewarding the ſame vpon their iſſue and progenie. By which noble beneuolence, he wan him ſuch loue amongſt his people, that afterwards it ſéemed how he gouerned the ſtate of his kingdome more by clemencie, than by anie rigour of lawes. The Britains immediatlie vpon knowledge had that Arthur was ſlaine, crowned Conſtantine his ſucceſſor in the Britiſh kingdome, and for that there ſhould remaine none amongſt them aliue to make anie claime to the ſame kingdome, other than he with his iſſue, or ſuch as he ſhould appoint to ſucceed him, they cruellie murthered Mordreds children, in moſt pitifull wiſe running vnto their mothers lap, beſéeching hir to ſaue their liues, according to hir motherlie dutie. They were brought vp in Gawolane their fathers grandfathers houſe, and being thus made awaie, the familie and linage of their father the foreſaid Mordred was vtterlie thereby extinguiſhed.

Eugenius gouerneth his people with clemencie.

Conſtantine crowned king of Britaine.

The crueltie of the Britains in murthering the innocent children of Mordred.

The linage of Mordred clearlie extinct.

The Saxons at the ſame time hauing aduertiſement what loſſe the Britains had ſuſteined, not onlie by the death of their moſt valiant king and chieftaine Arthur, but alſo for the ſlaughter of ſuch a multitude of their nation as died in the battell, they prepare a mightie nauie of ſhips, and paſſe ouer the ſame into England, where being landed, they eaſilie beat downe the Britains, and driue them with their K. Conſtantine into Wales, ſo recouering all that part of the land which Hengiſt ſometimes held, & after his name was afterwards called England. ¶ Some haue written, how that after king Conſtantine had reigned certeine yéeres in Wales, his wife and children died, wherupon waxing wearie of this world, he forſooke his earthlie kingdome, in hope of that other aboue, and ſecretlie departed into Ireland, where applieng himſelfe for a time in miniſtring to the poore, at length being knowne, by the perſuaſion of a monke he became one of his cote and profeſſion.

The Saxons returne into England, and driue the Britains into wales.

Conſtantine forſaketh his earthlie kingdome in hope of the heauenlie kingdome.

Conſtantine entereth into religion.

Afterwards being ſent by the biſhop of the diceſſe ouer into Scotland, to inſtruct the people of that countrie in the true faith and articles of the chriſtian religion, he there ſuffered martyrdome by the hands of moſt wicked and godleſſe perſons, and was at length (but manie yéeres after his death) canonized a ſaint, and ſundrie churches (as are to be ſéene euen vnto this day) built and dedicated vnto him in Scotland by authoritie of the biſhops there. At the ſame time that the ſaid Conſtantine was driuen into Wales, there reigned among the Engliſhmen one Iurmirike the fift (as Beda ſaith) from Hengiſt. The ſame Iurmirike though he were not chriſtened himſelfe, yet he permitted the chriſtian faith to be preached amongſt his people, and concluding a league with the Scotiſhmen and Picts, kept the ſame inuiolate during his life time moſt ſincerlie. The Scotiſh king Eugenius alſo liued in peace the reſidue of his life, without anie trouble either by forren enimies, or inteſtine ſedition, & at length died in the 38 yeare of his reigne, after the birth of our Sauiour 569.

Conſtantine ſent forth of Ireland into Scotland is there murthered.

Iurmirike or Iurmirike king of the Engliſhmen.

Iurmirike concludeth a peace with the Scotiſhmen and Picts.

Eugenius the Scotiſh king dieth. 568. H.B.

Conuall.

Conuall elected king of Scotland.

After his funerall obſequies finiſhed in Colmekill, where he lieth buried amongſt his anceſtors, his brother Conuall was choſen to ſucceed him in adminiſtration of the kingdome, a prince of ſuch inclination to vertue and godlines, as all men may iuſtlie wonder thereat. He bare ſuch zealous deuotion towards the worſhipping of the croſſe (a thing to put men in remembrance of Chriſts paſſion as he tooke it) that which way ſoeuer he rode (as it is reported) hée had the ſame borne before him, and at his getting vp and lighting downe from his horſſe, he with all the multitude of people ſtanding about him, would worſhip it, knéeling downe, & reuerentlie kiſſing it. This croſſe was of ſiluer with a crucifix thereon, and letters grauen in a plate faſtened to the ſtaffe, conteining theſe two words: Chriſtianorum gloria. He commanded alſo that the ſigne of the croſſe ſhould be ſet vpon the tops of ſteeples, and on the higheſt towers of the gates of caſtels & townes. Moreouer he forbad the croſſe to be grauen or painted vpon anie pauement, leaſt anie man ſhould vnreuerentlie tread vpon it. Furthermore he had prieſts and other religious men in ſuch honor, as nothing could be more, appointing them to haue the tenths of all thoſe fruits which the earth yéelded. Sundrie ordinances he made alſo, for the grieuous puniſhment of all ſuch as in anie wiſe miſuſed a prieſt, or other religious perſon: as he that gaue any of them a blow, ſhould loſe his hand for it: and hée that ſlue one of them, ſhould forfeit his goods, and bée burned quicke. Againe, he beſtowed manie rich iewels, and gaue diuers great gifts vnto churches, prouiding the miniſters of ſufficient liuings, and appointed that they ſhould haue their houſes néere vnto their churches, to be readie to execute that which apperteined vnto their offices, when anie néed required.

Crоſſes ſet vpon the tops of ſteeples.

Conuals deuotion towards church men.

Conuals liberalitie toward churches.

The king being thus vertuouſlie diſpoſed, cauſed the whole number of his ſubiects by his example to be the better affectioned towards the aduancement of religion. The report and fame hereof moued that holie man ſaint Colme or Colombe, to come ouer forth of Ireland (where he had the gouernance of ſundrie houſes of monks) with twelue other vertuous perſons into Albion, and there gathering together a great number of monks, being here and there diſperſed abroad in the countrie, he placed them orderlie in ſuch houſes, as king Conuall had builded and founded for that purpoſe, appointing amongſt them rulers & miniſters, ſuch as he thought moſt conuenient. But ſaint Colme himſelfe, and the other twelue, which he brought ouer with him from Ireland, placing themſelues to inhabit in the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, tooke great paines to inſtruct the Scots and Picts in the true articles of the faith.

Saint Colme commeth ouer forth of Ireland into Scotland.

Amongſt the Picts at the ſame time the hereſie of Pelagius had infected the minds of many, by meane that diuerſe of that nation hauing dwelled a long time in Britaine, returning into their countrie, brought that peſtilent doctrine home with them, and taught it vnto other. Saint Colme therefore informed hereof, paſſed into Louthian vnto Brudeus as then king of the Picts, earneſtlie trauelling to inſtruct both him and his people in the right beliefe, and to extirpe out of their hearts all erronious opinions of that damnable ſect of the Pelagians lore. At the ſame time, that bleſſed man Kentigerne, otherwiſe called Mungo, gouerned the church of Glaſcow, as biſhop of the ſame, who reſorting into the companie of this ſaint Colme, had much conference with him, to both their comforts, concerning the true articles of our faith.

The hereſie of Pelagius in Pictland.

Kentigerne biſhop of Glaſcow, otherwiſe called Mungo biſhop of Glaſco.

This Kentigerne was deſcended of the bloud roiall of the Pictiſh kings, as ſon vnto that vertuous woman Thametes or Thamew, daughter vnto Loth king of the Picts, whome a yong luſtie gentleman, or (as ſome haue written) the laſt mentioned Eugenius the Scotiſh king rauiſhed by force, and begot of hir the ſaid Kentigerne. He was greatlie in fauour with the foreſaid Brudeus the Pictiſh king, as one that was néere of his bloud. For the ſame Brudeus was nephue vnto the foreſaid Loth by his brother called Pelethon, and therefore ſucceeded in the kingdome of the Picts, after that Mordred was ſlaine, Thamew or Thametes rauiſhed by Eugenius king of Scotland, of which rauiſhment ſhe bare the foreſaid Kentigerne.

slaine, as before is expressed. Kentigerne went with saint Colme vnto the castell of Calidon, otherwise called Dounkeld, where they remained six moneths in a monasterie there, builded by king Conuall, teaching and preaching vnto the people of Athole, Calidon, and Angus, that in great numbers came vnto them, to heare their godlie instructions. There is in the same place, where the said castell sometimes stood, a church dedicated vnto saint Colme, built of faire square stone, being at this day a bishops see, commonlie called Dounkeld, indowed with manie faire reuenues and great possessions, for the maintenance of the bishop and his canons.

The castell of Calidon now Dounkeld.

The bishops see of Dounkeld.

At the six moneths end, those two vertuous persons taking their leaue each of other, not without shedding of teares, departed in sunder, Kentigerne returning into Glascow, and saint Colme into Ireland, where reporting manie things, touching the great vertue and holines of king Conuall, and with what deuotion he had béene receiued both of him and his people, he moued manie to wonder greatlie thereat, to heare that a king in the midst of all his allurements to pleasure, should yet be so mindfull of diuine meditations and godlie exercises. In the yere following, saint Colme prepared to returne into Scotland, taking Aidan ouer with him thither, by commandement of king Conuall, which Aidan (as ye haue heard) to auoid the traines of Eugenius, fled ouer into Ireland with his mother, for doubt to bée made away by the same Eugenius. Saint Colme taking the sea with this Aidan, and comming on land on the coasts of Scotland, was no sooner there arriued, but that presentlie he had knowledge how the king was dead, being the yeere of his reigne the 10, and after the birth of our Sauiour 579.

Saint Colme returneth into Ireland.

Saint Colme cõmeth againe into Scotland, bringing with him Aidan sonne to king Conran.

The death of Conuall.

578. H.B.

Saint Colme then being throughlie certified of his death, and that the corps was forward on the way towards Colmekill, there to be buried, hée thought it a péece of his dutie to go thither to be at the funerall, and so doing, was as one of the chiefest there in executing of the obsequies. Which being ended, and hearing that Kinnatill the brother of Conuall was inthronized king in Argile, by the frée election of all the estates, he neuertheless kept on his former purposed iournie, and came vnto Kinnatill, bringing Aidan with him (appointed by Conuall to haue receiued the gouernement of the kingdome if he had liued) they were both receiued with all beneuolence of the said Kinnatill cõtrarie to most mens expectation: insomuch that imbracing Aidan, he bad him be of good cheere, for it should shortlie come to passe, that he should atteine to the possession of his grandfathers dominions, and haue issue that should succeed him, to the great releefe of the Scotish common-wealth.

Saint Colme present at the buriall of king Conuall.

Kinnatil elected king of Scotland.

Saint Colme and Aidan receiued by Kinnatill.

The prophesy of Kinnatill.

By what spirit of prophesie he vttred these words, it is vncerteine, but sure it is that his purpose was to haue giuen ouer the gouernement of the kingdome (as he confessed himselfe lieng vpon his death bed) and to haue restored it vnto Aidan who had a right therevnto. Howbeit being preuented by death, he could not haue time to accomplish his desire, for within twentie daies after his coronation, being surprised with a grieuous disease of a catarrhike rheume, and the squinancie, he was constreined to kéepe his chamber, committing the publike administration of the realme vnto Aidan. Herevpon followed a feuer through increasing of a flegmatike humor bred by long rest, that after 14 moneths space vnbodied his ghost, which by instruction of saint Colme, being present with him at the houre of his death, he rendred in most deuout wise into the hands of his redéemer; appointing his kingdome as it were by deliuerie of seisin, euen there vpon his death bed vnto the foresaid Aidan.

The death of Kinnatill. Kinnatill lieng vpon his death bed, surrendereth his kingdome into Aidans hands.

Aidan.

After that the bodie of this Kinnatill was interred, according to the maner, in Colmekill, Aidan receiued the crowne, sitting vpon the marble stone, after the custome in those daies vsed, by the hands of that holie father saint Colme. Who willing that silence might be kept, laid his right hand vpon the kings head, and in his left hand holding his crosier staffe, made a briefe exhortation, as well to the king as to his people, admonishing them of their duties each towards other, but especiallie he exhorted them vnto peace and concord, and before all things to remember to walke in the waies of the Lord, for in so doing they might hope for wealth and prosperitie in the state of their commonwealth, with all other good graces, whereas otherwise, if either the people forgot their duties towards God, or that the king regarded not dulie to execute or fulfill his office, in giuing God thanks for his bountious liberalitie and high benefits bestowed vpon him, it should come to passe, that intestine seditions, conspiracies, and other mischiefes should rise among them, to the irrecouerable losse of the realme, by bringing the same into danger to be ouerrun with some forrein power, if they did not repent in time, and call to God for his fauour, that it might please him to reduce them againe into the right path of his lawes & ordinances, whensoeuer they should so fall from the same. When saint Colme had made an end of these or the like his wholsome aduertisements, all the people reioising thereat, promised with one voice, and therewith vowed to follow the same, and to be euer readie to obeie the commandement of their prince, and the holie instructions of their bishops and other the ecclesiasticall ministers. The assemble being once dissolued, the king departed into Galloway, and there deliuered the countrie of certeine British robbers that had inuaded it. After this, studieng to mainteine good orders and quiet rule through his dominions, he appointed an assemblie of the chiefest péeres of his realme, to be holden yéerelie in three seuerall parties thereof, as in Galloway, Louchquhaber, and Cathnesse, there to heare and determine all suites and quarels of his subiects, & to giue order for the administration of the lawes and all publike affaires, as they should sée cause and occasion. He required also S. Colme to be present euer with them, that matters touching religion might be the better prouided for, and that the people might take all things done in those publike sessions in right good part, bicause such an holie and vertuous father of the church was amongst them, and hauing the chiefest authoritie.

Aidan receiueth his inuesture of the kingdome at the hands of saint Colme.

S. Colmes exhortation to the king and the people.

The promis of the people.

The kings iournie into Galloway.

Aidan appointeth sessions to bée kept yéerlie in three parts of his realme.

Saint Colme present at assises and sessions.

Thus continued the realme in quiet state for certeine yeres togither, till it chanced that diuers of the nobles being togither on hunting, fell at variance, and thereupon making a fraie, sundrie of them were slaine. The beginners and such as were most culpable were sought for by the kings officers, to haue béene had to ward, but they in disobeieng the arrest, stroke and beat the officers verie sore, and immediatlie therewith fled vnto Brudeus king of the Picts, so by wilfull exile to safe gard their liues. King Aidan according to the maner in such cases accustomed, required to haue those outlawes deliuered vnto him, that he might do iustice vpon them accordinglie as they had deserued. Brudeus taking pitie of the yong gentlemen, alledged manie things in their excuse, still deferring to deliuer them, till at length hee procured warre to himselfe and his countrie. For Aidan the Scotish king, offended in that hée might not haue those rebels and publike offendors restored vnto him, caused a number of his people, first to fetch a great bootie of cattell and prisoners out

A fray among the nobles being a hunting

King Aidan requireth to haue certeine Scotish outlawes deliuered at the hands of Brudeus king of Picts.

Brudeus by denieng to deliuer the Scotish outlawes procureth warres to his selfe and his countrie.

out of Angus.

Wherewith the Picts being kindled, made a like rode into Galloway. Finallie the matter grew vnto a field, which was foughten in Mentieth, not farre from Calidon caſtell otherwiſe called Dounkeld, with great ſlaughter on both ſides, though in the end the victorie yet remained with the Scots; but loſing Arthurnus the ſonne of Aidan their king, they reioiſed not greatlie at the gaine. That holie man ſaint Colme troubled with ſuch newes, came vnto Aidan, and declaring vnto him how grieuouſlie he had offended almightie God, in procuring ſuch miſchiefe as had inſued of this warre, and reciting in particular the branches thereof, he moued the king vnto ſuch repentance for his treſpaſſe, that he wholie ſubmitted himſelfe vnto ſaint Colmes chaſtiſement, who being about to depart in ſemblance ſore offended, the king got him by the ſleeue, and would in no wiſe ſuffer him to go from him, till he had declared vnto him ſome comfortable meanes how to redreſſe the matter, for the quieting of his conſcience. At length ſaint Colme lamenting the kings caſe, ſuffered himſelfe to be intreated, and thereupon repaired vnto Brudeus the Pictiſh king, moving him by way of diuerſe godlie aduertiſements to incline his affection vnto peace. At length he did ſo much by trauelling ſundrie times to and fro betwixt the two kings, that he brought them vnto agreement, for all matters depending in controuerſie betwixt them and their ſubiects.

Thus ſaint Colme hauing accompliſhed that which he came for, returned againe into the weſterne Iles vnto his wonted home, where he did by wholeſome documents and vertuous examples inſtruct the ſeruants of God in the way of his lawes and commandements. In this meane time the Saxons hauing driuen and put backe the Britains into Wales, and occupieng all the reſidue of their lands and countries, they diuided the ſame into ſeuen parts, ordeining ſeuen ſeuerall kings to gouerne the ſame as kingdomes. Ouer that of Northumberland, adioining next vnto the Picts, one Edelfred reigned, a man of exceeding deſire to inlarge his dominion. He went by all means he could deuiſe, to perſuade Brudeus the Pictiſh king to renew the warres with the Scots, promiſing him all the aid he could make againſt them, not onelie for that he knew the Scots to haue béene euer enimies vnto the Saxons, but alſo for that he himſelfe was deſcended of the nation called Agathyrſes, of the which the Picts (as was thought) were alſo come. But the cauſe why he wiſhed that there might be warres raiſed betwixt the Scots and Picts, was not for anie good will he bare to the Picts, but onelie to the end that their power being weakened through the ſame, he might haue a more eaſie preie of their countrie, the which he purpoſed vpon occaſion to inuade, and ioine vnto his owne kingdome of Northumberland.

Brudeus at the firſt gaue no eare vnto his earneſt motions and large offers, but at length through the counſell and procurement of ſome of his nobles, corrupted by bribes receiued at Edelfreds hands, and ſtill putting into the kings head ſundrie forged informations of the Scotiſhmens dailie attempts againſt the Pictiſh nation; he determined to ioine with the Saxons againſt them, and cauſed thervpon warre to be proclamed againſt the Scots, as thoſe that had ſpoiled and robbed his ſubiects, contrarie to the league and all bonds of old friendſhip and former amitie betwixt them. The Scotiſh king Aidan perceiuing the practiſe of the Saxons, and togither therwith the vntruth of the Picts, the better to be able to reſiſt their malice, ioineth in league with the Britains: this article being the chiefeſt in the whole coueſnant: that if the enimies firſt inuaded the Britains, then an armie of Scots ſhould be ſent with all ſpeed into Britaine, to helpe to defend the countrie againſt ſuch inuaſions: but if the Scots were firſt inuaded, then ſhould the Britains in ſemblable maner come ouer to their aid.

The Saxons hauing knowledge of this appointment betwixt Scots & Britains; to draw the Scots forth of their countrie, and ſo to haue them at more aduantage, procured the Picts to ioine with them: and ſo both their powers being vnited together, entred into the Britiſh confines. Aidan according to the couenant came ſtreight vnto the aid of the Britains. Edelfred and Brudeus refuſed to fight for certeine dates, as it were of purpoſe, therby to wearie the Scots with watch and trauell, being as then far from home. Alſo they loked dailie to haue Ceuline king of the Weſtſaxons to come vnto their aid: but the Scots and Britains hauing knowledge therof, firſt thought it beſt to incounter with him, before he ſhould ioine with the other, and thus vnderſtanding that their onelie refuge remained in their armor and weapons, gaue the onſet ſo fiercelie vpon thoſe Saxons, that at the firſt, ſleaing Cutha Ceulines ſonne, with a great number of other, they eaſilie diſtreſſed and put the reſidue to flight.

Aidan would not ſuffer his men to purſue too far in the chaſe, but called them backe by the ſound of a trumpet, who being aſſembled herewith about their ſtandards, made ſuch ioy and triumph, as greater could not be deuiſed, what with danſing, ſinging, and plaieng on pipes and other inſtruments, according to the manner in thoſe dates. But as they were thus in the middeſt of their chiefeſt mirth, ſuddenlie appeered the Saxons and Picts, which were with Edelfred and Brudeus, approching towards them in good order of battell, with whome were alſo the reſidue of the Weſtſaxons, that had eſcaped from the late bickering. Whervpon the Scots and Britains amazed with the ſight hereof, were ſuddenlie ſtriken out of countenance, inſomuch that Aidan went amongſt them, and with a bold countenance exhorted them to remember how valiantlie they had alreadie put to flight the other of their enimies, ſo that there was great hope for aſſured victorie of theſe likewiſe, if they would now ſhew the like manlie courage againſt them, as they had ſhewed before in aſſailing the other. Manie other words he vſed in admoniſhing them to fight manfullie, till the onſet giuen by the enimies cauſed him to make an end.

The Saxons laid about them ſo ſtoutlie in the beginning, that they forced their aduerſaries, with whome they were matched, to giue backe. Neither did Edelfred faile in that occaſion to incourage them to follow the aduantage now thus gotten. Brudeus with his Picts likewiſe made great ſlaughter in that wing of the Scots, with the which he incountred; ſo that finallie the ſame Scots perceiuing the Britains beaten downe and ſore diſtreſſed on their ſide, fell through diſcomfort thereof to running awaie. There were ſlaine in this battell on the Scotiſhmens ſide, Brennius lieutenant or (as they termed him) thane of the Ile of Man, with Dungar the kings third ſonne, and no ſmall number of other gentlemen beſide. The king himſelfe ſcaped by helps of his ſonne, who ſtaieng to get his father out of the preaſſe, was ſlaine (as is ſaid) amongſt the reſidue. On the Saxons ſide, there was ſlaine Theobald Edelfreds brother, and Cutha the king of Weſtſaxons his ſonne, as before ye haue heard, with a great number of other. Edelfred himſelfe loſt one of his eies. Brudeus the Pictiſh king was hurt in the thigh, and beſides this, he loſt a great multitude of his people.

Thus Edelfred hauing got ſuch a notable victorie

The breach of peace betwixt the Scots & Picts.

Field fought betwixt Scots and Picts.

Saint Colme prouideth K. Aidan.

The repentance of king Aidan.

Saint Colme goeth vnto the king of the Picts.

Agréement betwixt the Scotiſh and Pictiſh kings by the late of ſaint Colme.

Saint Colme returned vnto the weſterne Iles.

England diuided into ſeuen ſeuerall kingdoms.

Edelfred K. of Northumberland.

Edelfreds purpoſe.

A league concluded betwixt the Scots & Britains, with the articles of the ſame.

The Picts & Saxons enter into the land of the Britains.

Ceuline or Ceolin.

The Scots and Britains put the Saxons to flight, and ſlae Cutha the ſonne of Ceuline king of the weſtſaxons.

The triumphant ioy made by the Scots and Britains vpon their new victorie.

The Saxons and Picts.

The ſudden feare of the Scots and Picts, after all their great ioy & triumphing.

Aidan exhorted his men to manfulneſſe.

The Saxons fight ſtoutlie.

Edelfred.

Brudeus K. of the Picts maketh ſlaughter of the Scots.

The Scots run awaie.

Edelfred loſt one of his eies.

Brudeus hurt in the thigh.

Deglaſtone the place wher this battell was ſought.

at Deglaſtone in Britaine, he could not be ſo contented, but eſtſones aſſembling his people, and ioining againe with Brudeus and his Picts, the nert ſummer after inuaded Galloway, and began to rob and ſpoile that countrie, to the end he might either inforce the inhabitants, with other the countries nert thereunto adioining, to yeld vnto him; either els to bring them into extreme pouertie in waſting all afore him. But Aidan being aduertiſed hereof, ſent to the Britains for their couenanted aid, and comming forward with his owne people which he had aſſembled together, ouerthrew certeine companies of his enimies, as he found them diſperſed abroad in ſeeking for preies: then paſſing by their maine armie, he commeth into Anandale, where he ioineth with the Britains, being come ſo farre forward on their waie to meet him. The Saxons and Picts hauing knowledge of their enimies doings, wan ſuch a place of aduantage, as they thought it an eaſie matter for them in keeping the ſame, to diſtreſſe both the Scots and Britains through ſtopping vp the paſſages, by the which they muſt of force paſſe, if they minded to come forth on that day. Theſe paſſages laie through certeine quickſands, and by a riuer which had but few fords paſſable.

Galloway inuaded by Edelfred.

Certeine companies of Saxons ouerthrowne.

Paſſages thorough Sulleway ſands.

The Scots and Britains, perceiuing how they were thus incloſed, with all ſpeed trenched their campe about, raiſing certeine bulworks and turrets in places where they thought expedient, as though they had ment ſtill there to haue continued. Aidan himſelfe toke ſuch pains in ſeeing euerie thing done in due order, that his people moued more through his example than by anie exhortation, were moſt diligent in their duties, deſirous of nothing ſo much as to haue occaſion miniſtred, to ſhew ſome proofe of their worthie valiancies. At length, when the enimies were moſt at quiet, and (as was ſuppoſed) nothing in doubt of anie attempt to be made by the Scots and Britains in the night ſeaſon, leauing a great number of fires in their campe, they ſuddenlie diſlodged, and paſſing the water by ſecret fords, they entred into Cumberland, and ſo after paſſing into Northumberland, they waſted and deſtroied with fire and ſword all that came within their reach: the report of which their doings brought Edelfred and Brudeus backe into that countrie to reſiſt their inuaſion, neither reſting day nor night, till they had got ſight of their enimies.

The diligence of king Aidan in prouiding to reſiſt his enimies.

The Scots and Britains diſlodge.

The Scots and Britains enter into Northumberland.

The nert day, the ſouldiers on both ſides requiring battell, together they go with great noiſe and din both of men and inſtruments. Too much hardineſſe in the Saxons cauſed no ſmall number of them to be ſlaine, rather chooſing to die with reputation of manhood, than to giue backe neuer ſo little ground to the enimie. Thus the battell continued for a ſpace, verie doubtfull which waie the victorie would incline. On the Britains and Scotiſhmens ſide, there were foure chiefe rulers amongſt them, beſide Aidan himſelfe, as Conſtantius and Alencrinus Britains, Callan and Mordacke Scotiſhmen. Ech of theſe taking a ſeuerall charge vpon him, did earneſtlie aplie their vttermoſt indeuors therin, incouraging their bands to put awaie all cowardlie feare, and manfullie to ſticke to their tackle, ſince by victorie there was hope of eternall fame, beſide ſuertie of life, and aduancement to the common-wealth of their countrie; where otherwiſe they might looke for nothing, but the contrarie miſhaps, as ſhame, rebuke, and importable ſeruitude. So that the Scotiſhmen and Britains incouraged herewith, preaſſed vpon the enimies ſo fiercelie, that at length as well the Saxons as Picts were compelled to breake their arraie, & fall to plaine running awaie: the Scots following ſo egerlie in the chaſe, that more of their enimies were thought to die in the flight, than before there had done in the battell.

The ſight betwixt Scots and Britains on the one ſide, and Saxons and Picts on the other.

The Saxons and Picts diſcomfited and chaſed.

S. Colme as yet being aliue, and within his monaſterie in the Ile of Iona, had knowledge by diuine inſpiration (as the Scotiſh chronicles make mention) of all theſe matters how they went: and at the verie time that the battels were in fight together, he had aſſembled a companie of verie vertuous and godlie diſpoſed perſons, making interceſſion for the proſperous ſpeed of their king the foreſaid Aidan: and at the verie inſtant (as it was knowne after) that the Saxons began to flee (as they which had the ouerthrow) that holie old father ſhewed great token of ioy and gladneſſe, declaring vnto his brethren by the ſpirit of ſecret knowledge or propheſie, how Aidan had the better, and that his enimies were diſcomfited, willing them thereupon to giue vnto God thanks for the ſame. There was an huge multitude ſlaine in this conflict, but namelie the death of Ceuline king of the Weſtſaxons, with other two worthie capteins of that nation, made the ſlaughter more ſorowfull on that ſide, the one of them was called Ctaline, and the other Quhitelline.

S. Colme indued with the ſpirit of ſecret knowledge.

Ceuline king of weſtſaxons ſlaine.

Quhitelline or whiteline.

The day nert after the battell, the ſpoile of the field being gathered together, all that which was knowne to haue beene taken out of Galloway, and other countries of the Scots, was reſtored by the kings authoritie vnto the owners againe. The reſidue which remained was diuided amongſt the ſouldiers, the tenth part onelie excepted, which was diſtributed vnto prieſts & curats, to beſtow the ſame vpon ornaments for their churches. The banners and ſtandards of the Saxons and Picts, with manie other rich offerings, king Aidan ſent vnto the abbeie of Colmekill, there to remaine as perpetuall monuments and tokens of ſo notable a victorie. The yeere nert inſuing, that holie father S. Colme now almoſt waſted through age, and hereto alſo ſore troubled with a rheumatike humor, fell ſicke and died. Some ſaie he ended his life in his houſe amongſt his brethren, within the Ile of Iona, otherwiſe called Colmekill; but S. Beda writeth, how he died in an Iland called Heu; where againe the Iriſh writers affirme, that he deceaſſed in a towne in Ireland called Dune, & that his tome is there in verie great veneration of the people: vpon the which are theſe Latine verſes ingrauen for the lookers on to read, if they liſt:

The diuiſion of the ſpoile.

S. Colme departed out of this life.

Hitres in Duno, tumulo tumulantur in vno,
Brigida, Patricius, atque Columba pius.

Saint Colme, Saint Patrike, and Brigitta pure,
Thir three in Dune lies in ane ſepulture.

which verſe Bellenden tranſlateth.

Neither did Aidan the Scotiſh king liue long time after, for hearing (as is ſaid) that ſaint Colme was dead, ſhortlie thereupon, more through griefe than by force of ſickeneſſe, he departed this world, after he had reigned 37 yeares in gouernement ouer the Scotiſhmen, he died about the yeare of our Lord 606. In the daies of this Aidan there was ſent into Albion from Gregorie the pope of Rome, diuers learned men (amongeſt whome were Auguſtinus and Mellitus) to inſtruct the Engliſh people in the faith of Chriſt, which as yet they had not receiued. By the earneſt trauell and exhortation of theſe inſtructors, Ethelbert king of the Kentiſh Saxons was baptiſed with all his people. The Britiſh prieſts nor their doctrine the Saxons could in no wiſe abide, becauſe (as is ſuppoſed) the one nation through a naturall hatred, ſtill ſought the deſtruction of the other. The South and Eaſtſaxons moued with the example of the Kentiſh Saxons, ſhortlie after alſo renounced their old ſuperſtitious idolatrie, and likewiſe receiued the chriſtian faith. Edelfred king of Northumberland moued vnto diſpleaſure herewith, ſent word vnto theſe Saxons of the ſouth parts (as then Aidan king of the Scotiſhmen, departeth this world.

606.

Auguſtinus and Mellitus ſent into Albion.

Ethelbert is baptiſed.

The Saxons hatred toward the Britiſh prieſtes.

Suſſex and Eſſex receiue the chriſtian faith.

Edelfred his diſpleaſure.

then all of them generallie knowen by the name of Engliſhmen) that ſith they had forſaken the old inſtitutions & ancient religion of their forefathers, he would ſuerlie from thencefoorth be no leſſe enimie vnto them than vnto the Scots and Britains.

Waldred other wiſe called Baldred doctor of the Picts.

There liued in theſe daies that holie man Waldred a Scotiſh man borne, but dwelling amongeſt the Picts, whome he inſtructed in the right faith, and therefore was named the doctor of the Picts. He departed out of this life within the Iland called the Baſſe, lieng about two miles off from the maine land within the ſea, where the Forth hath entrie betwixt the ſame Ile, and an other called the Maie. There were three pariſhes fell at contention for his bodie, as Aldham, Tiningham, and Preſton, ſo far forth, that they were at point to haue fought about it; but that by counſell of ſome diſcreet perſons amongeſt them, it was ordeined that they ſhould continue in praier for that night, and in the next morning ſtand to th'order of the biſhop of the dioces, who was come thither the ſame time to be preſent at the buriall. The next day in the morning there was found three beires with three bodies decentlie couered with clothes, ſo like in all reſemblance, that no man might perceiue anie difference. Then by commandement of the biſhop, and with great ioy of all the people, the ſaid ſeuerall bodies were caried ſeuerallie vnto the ſaid three ſeuerall churches, and in the ſame buried in moſt ſolemne wiſe, where they remaine vnto this day, in much honor with the common people of the countries nere adioining.

A miracle if it be true.

Kenethus Keir.

Kenethus Keir crowned king of Scots

AFter that the corps of king Aidan was buried in Colmekill, the nobles of the realme aſſembled togither in Argile, about the election of a new king. Where, by the generall voices of them all, Kenethus Keir the ſonne of Conwall (ſometime king of the Scotiſhmen, as before is mentioned) was now proclamed king, and crowned according to the maner; but he liued not paſt foure moneths after, but died of a catarrhike rheume falling down into the windpipe, and ſo ſtopping vp his lights and lungs. He deliuered as it were the poſſeſſion of his kingdome, by way of ſurrendring the ſame, into the hands of Eugenius ſonne to king Aidan, by conſent of all the nobles, a little before he died, for that it was knowen he had a right therevnto after the deceaſſe of Kenethus.

Kenethus Keir dieth of the cough of the lungs.

Eugenius the fourth of that name.

THis Eugenius was the fourth of that name, which had ruled ouer the Scotiſhmen. As it is ſaid, ſaint Colme proſpheſied that he ſhould be king long before his fathers death, for when all the ſonnes of king Aidan were brought before him, and that Aidan demanded of him which of them ſhould reigne after him, he ouerpaſſing the reſidue (which he vnderſtood by ſecret knowledge ſhould die in the wars) appointed fourth this Eugenius, called by ſome alſo Brudus, declaring that it ſhould be onelie he. This Eugenius then being placed in the kinglie ſeat, forgot not ſuch holſome leſſons and vertuous precepts, as the foreſaid ſaint Colme had taught him in his youth, ſo that ſtudieng how to defend rather that which was his owne in peace and quietneſſe, than to ſeeke anie waies or means how to inlarge it, by wrongfull incroching vpon other mens poſſeſſions, he grew into ſuch fauour with all good men, as greater could not be deuiſed. Vnto all offendors he was a ſharpe iuſticer, not ſparing anie tranſgreſſour of his lawes, neither in reſpect of nobilitie or otherwiſe; but rather thoſe gentlemen which miſuſed themſelues in breach of good orders, he chiefelie gaue order to ſee them puniſhed; where if they behaued themſelues worthilie, and according to their calling, there was no prince more glad than he to aduance them vnto honor.

Eugenius the ſeuenth.

Eugenius.

S Colmes proſpheſie of Eugenius the fourth.

A louer of peace and quietneſſe.

A ſharpe iuſticer.

By theſe and the like his princelie doings, he was both beloued of his people and alſo feared. He neither fauoured the Picts nor Saxons of Northumberland, for that the one nation being ethniks, perſiſted in their infidelitie, and the other called not by all maner of means to ſupport them; but yet taking a truce with them both, he firmlie cauſed the ſame to be obſerued. In the tenth yeare of his reigne Ciningell king of Weſtſaxons & Elfred king of Northumberland, with aid of the Picts, vanquiſhed Cadwallo king of Britains, and chaſed him into Scotland, where he remained not long, ſailing from thence into Britaine in France, and purchaſing aid of the king there named Cadoall, returned into Wales, where vanquiſhing his enimies the Saxons, and ſlaieng manie thouſands of them, he was reſtored againe vnto his kingdome. About the ſame time was Edelfred king of Northumberland ſlaine in battell, at a place called Wintringham, not far from the riuer of Humber, by Redwald and Ethelbreth, the one being king of the eaſt Angles, and the other of the middle Angles; in reuenge of ſuch iniuries as the ſame Edelfred had done vnto the Saxons of the countrie called Mercia, conteining (as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainelie may appeare) all thoſe ſhires from the riuer of Thames vnto the riuer of Merſe in Lancaſhire. Then was one Edwine a right chriſtian prince appointed to reigne in his place, by the aſſignement of the two foreſaid kings Redwald and Ethelbreth.

Cadwall vanquiſhed.

Cadwall is reſtored vnto his kingdome.

See more hereof in England.

King Edelfred ſlaine.

Edwine.

Whileſt theſe things were a doing, there were ſeuen ſonnes of the aforeſaid Edelfred, that deteſting the vntrue dealing of the Picts, which refuſed to aid their father in his neceſſitie, and doubting to fall into the hands of Edwine, got them to Eugenius the Scotiſh king for more ſuertie of their liues. Their names were Eafreid, Oſwald, Oſlaws, Oſwin, Offas, Oſmond, and Oſlike. Ebba the onelie daughter of Edelfred being taken amongeſt other priſoners, and eſcaping from hir taker, miraculouſlie got a bote in the riuer of Humber, and with the ſame taking the ſea alone, without all humane helpe (as hath beene reported) ſhe ſailed forth, & at length ſafelie arriued at the point of land which ſtretched forth into the ſea, in the mouth of the Forth, called euen vnto this day after hir name, ſaint Ebbes head, where being receiued by the biſhop of that dioceſſe, ſhe was profeſſed a nun, and after continuing in great perfectneſſe of obſeruing that profeſſion, ſhe was inſtituted abbeſſe of hir houſe, ſhewing ſtill in trade of life an orderlie example for hir flocke to follow.

S. Ebbes head.

Eugenius the Scotiſh king did louinglie receiue the ſonnes of Edelfred, though their father had euer beene a cruell enimie againſt the Scotiſh nation; and within a while after their comming into Scotland, hearing oftentimes the godlie ſermons and preachings of the biſhops and monks (who in thoſe daies continuallie gaue themſelues vnto that exerciſe) they finallie abhorred their ſuperſtitious idolatrie, and receiued baptiſme, that ſalutiferous ſigne and ſacrament of our chriſtian religion. Thoſe churches alſo, which the Saxons in time of the warres had ouerthrowen and deſtroied in Galloway and other countries thereabouts, Eugenius cauſed to be repared; moreouer alſo he reedified ſundrie caſtels in thoſe marches, and placed in them gariſons of ſouldiers, to defend them againſt all inuaſions that might happen. Thus continuing his reigne the ſpace of fifteene yeares or thereabouts in honorable peace, to the great aduancement of the commonwealth of his ſubiects, he laſtlie died in the yeare 620, and was buried amongeſt his elders in the Ile of Iona, within the monaſterie of Colmekill.

620

Bonifacius a godlie preacher.

About this time, that reuerend father and bishop Bonifacius Quirinus came forth of Italie into Scotland, to instruct the people in the faith of Christ there. Whether he were pope, and resigning vp the papalitie came thus into Scotland (as some haue supposed) or whether he was sent from the pope called Bonifacius that succeeded Sauinianus, it is not certeinlie knowne; but certeine it is, as the Scotish writers affirme, that vpon his first comming into Scotland he arriued in the water of Taie, comming on land at the mouth of a little riuer, which diuideth the countrie of Gowrie from Angus. His name is yet famous amongest the Scots euen vnto this day, for that he trauelled through the most part of the land, in preaching and instructing the people to their confirmation in the faith, and erecting diuers churches in the honor of almightie God, which he dedicated to the name of saint Peter. And amongst other he built one at the place where he came on land, an other at a village called Tulline, not passing three miles from Dundee, and the third at Restennoth, where afterwards an house of chanons of saint Augustines order was builded. At length he came into Rosse, continuing there the residue of his life, and is buried at Rossemarken.

Molocke a preacher.

There was also at the same time amongest the Scots an ancient godlie man named Molocke, who following such rules & doctrine as in his youth he had learned of Bzandon that reuerend abbat, he ceassed not to exhort the people of Mar and Argile (in which countries he was most resident) to flee and forsake their vicious liuing, and to indeuour themselues to imbrace vertue, to the comfort and health of their soules. This Molocke kept continuall companie with the forenamed Bonifacius after his comming into Scotland: and finallie died also in Rosse, being about 94 yeares of age, and was buried in the church where Bonifacius lieth, though they of Argile say that his relikes rest among them in the church of Lismore, which is dedicated to his name.

Monks were preachers in those daies.

Ferquhard.

AFter the decease of Eugenius, his son Ferquhard succeeded in his place, for Eugenius had three sonnes, Ferquhard, Fiacre, and Donald. These being appointed by their father to be brought vp with Connane bishop of Sodore (that is, the bishop of Man) in vertuous discipline, did not altogither follow his godlie precepts and lessons. Ferquhard and Donald gladlie gaue eare to him, but they thought his instructions did not much apperteine vnto their birth and degree: but Fiacre printing his diuine documents depelie in his heart, determined to forsake all worldlie pompe and dignitie, and to get him some whither farre from home, where he might serue God more freelie without let or interruption of his friends or kinsfolke. Thus being disposed, he got vpon him simple apparell, and went ouer into France, where seeking a solitarie place, Pharao the bishop of Meaux gaue vnto him a peece of ground, in the which at this day he is worshipped with great deuotion.

Ferquhard king of Scotland.

Fiacre giueth himselfe for to liue a solitarie life in France

There hath gone a tale in that countrie, that no woman might enter into the chapell where he lieth buried; for if anie do, she hath some mischap that falleth vnto hir, as either the losse of sight, priuation of wits, or some such like. As touching the state of the Scotish commonwealth, vnder the gouernement of Ferquhard, the same was quiet inough, & without trouble of outward enimies; but his subiects among themselues fell at such diuision, that euerie part of the realme was full of murther, burning, and other destructions of men and houses, with such spoiling, robbing, reuing, and all kinds of other mischiefs, that no where was any suertie either of life or goods: all the which misorders sprong, were nourished and maintained through the kings owne diligence: for he mistaking his office and dutie, was of this opinion, that so long as the nobles and states of his realme were thus readie one to kill an other, there was no likelihood they should haue time to practise anie rebellion against him; and herevpon he rather holpe to further such discord amongest them, than take order for to appease it. But it came to passe by this means, that he was nothing regarded within a while amongest them, so that by meanes of other arbitrators which they chose by common agreement, all matters in controuersie were taken vp & ended betwixt them, the king not once made priuie therevnto.

Ferquhard maintained civill discord.

At the same time it was noised abroad in the realme, that Ferquhard, besides other his wicked behauiours, was also infected with the erronious opinions of the Pelagian heresie. Which suspicion was the more increased, for that he vsed to haue sundrie British priests in his companie: the which nation had beene euer noted with the spot of that damnable infection. The nobilitie of the realme moued herewith, summoned him by an herald to come to a councell, which they had appointed to hold of all the states, that they might there vnderstand, if it were true or not which was commonlie reported of him. But he refusing to come at such summons, they assembled togither, and besieged him in the castell wherein he had inclosed himselfe, and winning the place, got him into their hands, and immediatlie therevpon committed him to safe keeping. This done, they consult togither for the administration of the realme, whether they should quite depose Ferquhard, or restore him to his place. In fine they rest vpon this agreement, to send an honorable ambassage into France vnto Fiacre, to require him to returne home into his countrie, and there to receiue the gouernement of the realme.

King Ferquhard infected with the Pelagian error.

The king is summoned by an herald.

He is taken prisoner.

Ambassadors sent into France to Fiacre.

Fiacre (as the report goeth) hearing that there were diuers of the Scotish nobilitie comming towards him vpon this message, in his praiers desired feruentlie of almightie God, that it might please him so to worke for him, that he might continue in his contemplatiue life still, and not be occasioned to resort vnto the troubles of the world, which all contemplatiue godlie men ought to abhorre. And euen as he had wished, it came to passe. For when those that were sent vnto him, came to the heremitage wherein he had his lodging, they found him (as appeared vnto them) so disfigured with the leprosie, that vpon his earnest refusall to forsake his solitarie life (which he professed to lead as an heremite) for anie worldlie preferment of kinglie gouernement, they were content to returne with that answere, sith his infirmitie (as they supposed) was such, as was not conuenient for him that should haue anie publike gouernement. This Fiacre had a sister named Sira, which hearing of hir brothers vertuous trade of life, came vnto him with a companie of godlie virgins, and being of him confirmed in hir purposed intent of chastitie, she repaired into Champaigne in France, where she with hir fellowes remained in great holinesse of life, leauing in those parties a worthie memorie not forgotten amongest them there till this day.

Fiacre his praier.

The foresaid ambassadours returning forth of France, declared in what plight of deformitie they had seene Fiacre, and how earnestlie he had refused the offer which they had made vnto him in name of all the states of Scotland. The Scotish nobilitie herevpon assembling togither, chose forth foure of the ancientest peeres amongest them, to haue the rule and gouernement of the kingdome, till it were otherwise prouided. These were named by that age,

age, wardens, and had full authoritie to order things as ſeemed them good in all points. In the meane time Ferquhard remaining ſtill in priſon, and vexed with ſundrie diſeaſes, to rid himſelfe out of ſuch miſeries, ſlue himſelfe in the 13 yeare of his reigne; and ſo nothing ſpared his owne life in the end, which had béene the occaſion of the loſſe of ſo manie other mens liues in time of the ciuill diſcord, that he had euer nouriſhed. After this wretched end of Ferquhard, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 632, the lords of the land aſſembled themſelues togither in Argile, about the chooſing of a new king, where by common conſent, Donwald the third ſonne of Eugenius, being called thither with biſhop Conan out of the Ile of Man, was inueſted king with great ioy and triumph.

The deſperat end of king Ferquhard.

632

Donwald.

Donwald K. of Scotland.

THis Donwald hauing taken on him the roiall adminiſtration, tranſformed himſelfe into his fathers maners, reſtored againe into the former eſtate ſuch things as apperteined vnto the common wealth, and had béene ante wiſe decaied and miſgouerned by the ſlouthfull negligence of his predeceſſor Ferquhard, by means whereof he quicklie grew into great fauor of his ſubiects. In the meane time Cadwallo king of the Britains, and Penda king of thoſe Engliſhmen which inhabited that part of England ancientlie called Mercia, ioining their powers togither againſt Edwin king of Northumberland, depriued him both of life and kingdome. After this, paſſing through the whole countrie, and entring into the confines of Pictland, they tooke a great part of the ſame by force of armes from Brudeus king of the Picts, who in vaine had ſued for aid vnto Donwald king of Scotland, for that his vntruth had béene notified more than inough in times paſt. But Donwald being certified of Edwins death, made means vnto Cadwallo king of the Britains by his ambaſſadours, that Enfred the ſon of Edelfred might be reſtored vnto his fathers kingdome, which Edwin had wrongfullie vſurped.

King Edwin is ſlaine.

This being granted, Eufred leauing his brethren ſtill in Scotland, came into Northumberland, where by authoritie of Cadwallo and Penda he was inueſted king of Bernicia, that is, of the countrie which is now called the marches. For at the ſame time they had diuided the kingdome of Northumberland into two kingdomes, appointing Eufred (as is ſaid) to reigne ouer the one called Bernicia, and one Oſtrike ouer the other called Deira, a man of great wickednеſſe, as by his works moſt plainelie appeared. For certeine yeares after his aduancement to that dignitie, he found means to marie one of his daughters vnto the foreſaid Eufred, perſuading the ſame Eufred to conſent with him in reſtoring againe the hethenith religion throughout their whole dominion, vtterlie to renounce the chriſtian faith, which they had latelie before receiued by the inſtructions of the two biſhops Conan & Pauline. But they inioied not long felicitie after ſo wicked and moſt diueliſh a purpoſe, for the princes of Albion vnder the leading of Cadwallo K. of the Britains, and Penda king of Mercia, with a great armie aſſembled of Saxons, Britains, and Picts, entring into Northumberland, and incountring in battell with Oſtrike and Eufred, diſcomfited their power, and tooke them priſoners, who being put into a common priſon, ſlue each other to auoid ſharper tortures, which by due execution they daillie looked for.

Eufred.

Oſtrike an inſidell.

Then was the kingdome of Northumberland giuen vnto Oſwald brother to Eufred, both in reſpect of the right which he had thereto, and alſo of the zeale which he bare to the aduancement of Chriſtes religion, ſhewing himſelfe in conſideration thereof, an earneſt enimie to his brother Eufred, and all his partakers, in ſo much that in the day of the battell, he was one of the forwardeſt capteins againſt them. Vnto this Oſwald was ſent a Scotiſhman called Corman, to inſtruct the Northumberland men in faith, and after him Aidan, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie ye may read more at large: finallie he was ſlaine by Penda king of Mercia, as in the ſame hiſtorie appeareth. His death chanced in the third yeare of Donwald the Scotiſh king, who ſore lamented the ſame, as of that prince whome he loued right intirelie. Neither liued the ſaid king Donwald anie long time after the death of his déere friend; for that in the fiftéenth yeare of his reigne, being got into a bote to fiſh in the water called Lochtaie for his recreation, his chance was to be drowned, by reaſon the bote ſanke vnder him. Certeine daies after, his bodie being found and taken vp, was buried amongſt his anceſtors in Colmekill, in the yeare of our Lord 647.

12. H.B.

Donwald the Scotiſh king drowned 645. H.B.

About the ſame time there liued in France three brethren of great holineſſe of life, being ſonnes vnto Piltan king of Ireland, the which he begot of his wife Galghetes, deſcended of the linage of the kings in Scotland. The names of which three brethren were as followeth, Furſeus, Foilanus, and Ultanus. Furſeus profeſſing himſelfe a monke of ſaint Benets order, paſſed ouer into France, there to ſet forth and inlarge that profeſſion, and being receiued of king Clowis, began the foundation of a monaſterie there called Latinie, in the which he placed monks of that order, and began to ſow in thoſe parties the ſeeds of the goſpell, but not without the darnell of mens traditions, as Iohn Bale ſaith in the 14 centurie of the Britiſh writers. His two brethren Foilan and Ultan followed him ouer into France, and both by word and example inſtructed the Frenchmen to imbrace the faith of Chriſt, and to renounce the religion of the gentiles.

So that it ſéemeth as yet, ſuch as profeſſed themſelues to be monks, and men of religion (as they were called) had not left off to labour in the Lords vineyard, ſpending their time in reading the ſcriptures, to inſtruct and teach others, and to exerciſe prayer and thankſgiuing: ſo as no ſmall number by their wholeſome doctrine and good example were conuerted to the chriſtian faith. Foilan at length was martyred in a monaſterie which he had founded in France called Foſſe. About the ſame time there was alſo a contention amongſt them in Albion for kéeping of the Eaſter day, the Scotiſh biſhops and ſome of the Britains varieng in their account from all other prelats of the weſt: but at length through perſuaſion of the pope they confeſſed their error (if it ought ſo to be taken) and conſented to celebrate that feaſt according to the account of other nations. Theſe things chanced in the daies of king Donwald.

Anno 854. Sigebertus. Foſſenſe monaſterium.

Strife about the celebrating of the feaſt of Eaſter

Ferquhard.

After the deceaſſe of Donwald, his nephue Ferquhard the ſonne of his brother, the other Ferquhard, ſucceeded in gouernement of the realme, a man of quicke and liuelie ſpirit, but inclined neuertheleſſe rather vnto euill than vnto good, ſpeciallie after he had atteined the crowne, inſomuch as it was commonlie ſpoken of him, that from a liberall and moſt gentle humane perſon, he was ſuddenlie changed into an inſatiable and moſt cruell monſter. Before he came to the crowne he was liberall beyond meaſure. There was no gentleman that wanted monie, either to redéeme his lands ingaged, or to beſtow in dower for the mariage of his daughter, but if he had wherewith to helpe him, he might account himſelfe ſure thereof. Prieſts and other deuout perſons, ſpeciallie ſuch as were poore and in any neceſſitie, he oftentimes moſt bountifullie relieued

Ferquhard the ſecond of that name created king of Scotland.

Ferquhard being king was couetous before he was king, he ſhewed liberalitie.

to their great ease and comfort. To be briefe, such a readinesse was in him to helpe all men, that (as was thought) he could better be contented to want himselfe, than to see other men haue need of anie thing that was in his possession, so that all men iudged him most worthie of all princelie authoritie. But after he was once placed in the kinglie seat, he so altered his conditions, that men could not but wonder much therat. Where before he was knowne to be liberall, well disposed, righteous, sober, and a reformer of offenses, he was now forthwith become couetous, wicked towards God, a tormentor of the iust and righteous people, and insatiable in all vnlawfull affections. That which before time he had giuen vnto anie of the nobilitie, he now without all shame most vncourteouslie demanded to be to him restored, alledging that he did but lend it for the time. And such as went about to delay restitution, pretending anie excuse, he caused their goods to be confiscate, and also their bodies to be committed to prison. Now & then he found means without cause or matter to put some of them to cruell death. Such of the prelates as hée vnderstood to be wealthie, he rested not till he had picked one matter or other vnto them, whereby they were sure to forfeit all their treasure vnto his coffers, that neuer might be filled.

Gifts are required as a loane.

Lo, what a pretense couetousnes hath.

For their goods sake prelats are troubled.

The bishops of the realme, namelie those two reuerend fathers, Colman and Finnan, perceiuing such wickednesse in the prince, blamed him sharpelie sundrie times for the same: and at length bicause they saw he regarded not their admonishments, he was by them excommunicated: whereof he so little passed, that when other went vnto the church to heare diuine seruice, he would get him to the woods and forrests to hunt the hart, or some other game. Neither were such wanting as were willing to keepe him companie: so readie is the nature of man at all times to follow licentious libertie. He vsed also, contrarie to the custome of his countrie, to eat three meales a day, hauing such number of dishes and abundance of delicate fare, as the like had not béene vsed at anie time before those daies in that realme: and all to serue his grédie appetite, togither with theirs that followed his companie.

The king is excommunicated.

The king is hunting.

He was a glutton.

Of wines & other strong drinks he would participate abundantlie at all times and places, without regard of health or honor, being exceedinglie giuen vnto most beastlie drunkennesse. He customablie vsed to sit at supper till it were verie late in the night, hauing his banketting dishes and cuppes to come in one after another, till he were so mistempered, that being laid to sleepe, he would streight vomit out such heauie gorges, as he had in such most gluttonous wise receiued. Herevnto he was so drowned in the filthie lust of the flesh, that he defiled his owne daughters: and for that his wife was about to dissuade him from such villanie, he slue hir with his owne hands. Thus continuing in his wickednesse certeine yeeres, at length the nobles began to conspire against him, so that they would haue deuised a meane how to haue rid him out of the way, if bishop Colman had not forbidden them that practise, prophesieng as it were by diuine inspiration, that Ferquhard sore detesting his owne wicked doings, should shortlie be punished by the hands of almightie God, according to his deseruings.

A drunkard he was also.

A prophesie.

And sure his words proued true: for within a moneth after, as the same Ferquhard followed in chase of a woolfe, the beast being all inraged by the pursute of the hounds, flue backe vpon the king, and snatching at him, did wound and bite him right sore in one of his sides, immediatlie whereupon, whether through anguish of his hurt, or by some other occasion, he fell into a most filthie disease: for a venemous humor with a soft consuming heat, did so eat and waste his members and limbs, that a lothsome sight it was to behold the same: for out of his legs, feet, and priuie parts, there issued filthie corruption and matter, with so vile a sauour, that vneth might any creature abide it. His belie was swollen, as though he had bene infected with the dropsie, and therto was it verie hard withall. Finallie lice bred so abundantlie in his secret parts, that he might in no wise be rid of cleansed of them.

The king is sicke.

At length, when he had béene vexed in this sort for the space of two yéeres togither, or thereabouts, he began to call himselfe to remembrance, and to consider how this punishment was worthilie fallen vpon him for his sinnes, and therevpon causing bishop Colman to be fetched vnto him, being as then about 20 miles off, he confessed vnto him the whole summe of his offenses, declaring himselfe right penitent for the same. Colman reioising hereat, did not onelie release him of the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against him; but also willed him to be of comfort, and to put his confidence in the mercie of almightie God, who was readie to receiue all such sinners as turned vnto him with repentant hearts: so that being put in hope by these & the like words of Colman to haue forgiuenesse of his sinnes, with bitter teares he besought God to haue mercie vpon him: and humblie receiuing the sacrament, got him into simple clothing of heare and sackecloth. Then causing himselfe to be borne into the next fields, hée there yelded vp the ghost in the presence of Colman, who (according to the dutie of a good ghostlie father) was still about him, in exhorting him to commit himselfe wholie to the mercie of God, & not to doubt but he should be sure to atteine the same. Thus Ferquhard ended his life, in the 18 yéere after he began his reigne ouer the Scottishmen, and in the yéere of Grace 664.

He sent for his confessor.

The king being excommunicated is released.

Ferquhard yéeldeth vp the ghost.

664

In this Ferquhards daies bishop Aidan departed this world, and then was Finnan sent for forth of Scotland, to take vpon him the gouernement of the church of Lindesferne, where the bishops of Northumberland as then had their see. This Finnan was well learned, and no lesse renowmed for his vertuous life than his predecessor Aidan. He died anon after the decease of Ferquhard, and then was Colman remoued vnto that see of Lindesferne, who with his vertuous instructions and examples of holie life conuerted a great multitude of Saxons vnto the true worshipping of the liuing God. And amongst other was Penda sonne to the former Penda, king of Mercia. There be that write how Penda the father also was baptised by this Colman: and that the same Colman trauelled through the most part of all the English prouinces, setting forth the word of life amongest the people, purchasing him great fame for his worthie merits. He came to the church of Lindesferne in the daies of Maldwin that succéeded the last mentioned Ferquhard.

Finnan bishop.

Holie Iland.

Bishop Colman cõuerted the Saxons.

Penda king of Mercia.

Maldwin

THis Maldwin was the sonne of king Donewald: and after that Ferquhard was dead and buried in Colmekill, he was inuested king: which function he right sufficientlie discharged, studieng to maintaine peace with his neighbors the Picts, Saxons and Britains: giuing thereby a good example to be followed of his subiects. Hereto he had a speciall care for the administration of the lawes in due forme and order, causing offendors to be punished, that other harmelesse persons might liue in quiet, so that by this meanes all things in the beginning of his reigne had prosperous successe. Afterwards there fell no small discord betwixt them of Lennox and Argile: for first through brawling among the heardmen, their maisters made a fraie, whereof rose such deadlie Maldwin inuested king of Scots.

A louer of peace & iustice

Lennox and Argile are at variance.

deadlie enimitie betwixt the parties, by reason that the inhabitants of the westerne Iles aided them of Argile, and the people of Galloway the other of Lennox: that if the king had not come into those parties to appease the businesse, and to haue punished the offendors, there had insued much manslaughter, vnto the great danger of the vtter ruine of those countries.

The westerne Iles take part with Argile, Galoway with Lennox.

The king at his arriuall amongst them minded not to pursue the people that followed their capteins, but rather the capteins and authors of this tumult themselues. Whereof they hauing knowledge, made an attonement togither, being inforced thereto of necessitie, so to auoid the prepared punishment deuised by the king against them. And forthwith they fled ouer into the Iles, but the inhabitants doubting the kings displeasure, would not consent to succour them, but contrariwise toke them and deliuered them to the kings officers, whereupon they were safelie conueied to the places where they were borne, and there suffered their deserued execution. Thus that commotion vnaduisedlie begun, was spedilie appeased, and the name of Maldwin by reason hereof so feared amongst his subiects, that during his reigne no such trouble chanced in ante part of all his dominions.

Maldwin went about for to punish the author of this commotion.

The capteins becam friends togither, and fled into the Iles.

The Ilandmen apprehend the capteins of the rebels.

After this he went ouer into Iona or Colmekill, where perceiuing the abbeie church, wherein his ancestors had their sepultures, to be in decaie, he caused it to be pulled quite downe, and workemen forthwith set in hand to build it vp againe, at his owne proper costes and charges. Such spéd also was vsed about this worke, that before he departed out of this life, the same was finished, and dedicated vnto our Sauior Christ, and saint Colme. About the same time there reigned throughout the most part of the world a sore and grieuous pestilence, consuming a greater number of men (before it ceassed) than there were left aliue: for it continued the whole space of three yeeres togither. At length, through common praier, fastings, giuing of almes, & other vertuous workes, the wrath of almightie God was pacified, so that such great mortalitie by his mercifull appointment did staie and giue ouer.

He buildeth the church of the abbeie of Colmekill.

A great pestilience & death vpon earth.

The Scotishmen were free from that infection as well at that time, as also for manie yéeres after. Neither were they in manner troubled with ante sharpe feuers, or agues, till time that omitting the ancient and wholesome sparenesse of diet, which their fathers in times past had vsed, they fell vnto riotous banketting and excessiue feeding, whereby they became subiect vnto all kinds of diseases, through malicious humors growing thervpon. Colman bishop of Lindesferne seeing wonderfull numbers of Englishmen perish dailie of that contagious sickenesse, by licence of the king, to auoid the present danger of death, which by tarieng there he saw no meanes how to escape, returned into Scotland with his disciples, and after getting him ouer into one of the westerne Iles, he erected a monasterie there, wherein he remained during the residue of his life.

Scotland was free of the pestilence and plague.

Riotousnesse the mother of sicknesses.

Colman erected a monasterie.

After the departure of Colman forth of Northumberland, the people of that countrie ioining with the Picts, made sundrie roads into the Scotish borders: which iniurie when Maldwine reuenged with more displeasure done to them of Northumberland, than the Scotishmen had receiued, it caused the Picts and Northumbers to prepare themselues with all spéd to haue made sharpe warres against the Scots: but in the meane time Maldwin died, being strangled in his bed one night by his owne wife, vpon suspicion of gelousie, for his vnlawfull companie keeping with an other woman. The next day after she was apprehended with those that were priuie to the déed, and burnt openlie vpon an hill, according as she had most iustlie deserued. Maldwin was thus murthered in the yeere after the birth of our Sauior 684, and in the 20 yeere of his owne reigne.

Maldwin the Scotish king strangled in his bed.

After him succéeded Eugenius the fift of that name, nephue to Maldwin, as sonne to his brother Dongard. About the same time Eugenius king of Scots sent with all diligence his ambassadors vnto Egfred king of Northumberland, to moue him vnto peace. Egfred hauing heard the ambassadors which were thus sent, feined as though he had béene willing to haue had peace, where he minded nothing more than to haue warres with the Scots, so soone as his prouision should be once readie, and héere vpon granted to them a truce for the space of 11 moneths, in which meane time he might make his preparation. Eugenius hauing some secret knowledge of Egfreds purpose, prouided likewise for the warres on his part: but for that he would not séeme to giue the occasion, he streictlie commanded that none of his subiects should be so hardie, as to attempt anie thing sounding to the breach of the truce.

Eugenius.

Eugenius the fift.

Egfred king of Northumberland.

A truce granted.

Eugenius his commandement.

In the tenth moneth Egfred hauing all his preparation readie, sent a companie of his men of war into the Scotish borders, to fetch some botie, whereby the peace might be broken. Those that were thus sent, fetched not onelie from thence a great number of cattell, but also slue diuers of the borderers that went about to rescue their beasts and cattell. Immediatlie herevpon were sent ambassadors from Eugenius to demand restitution: but they not without much adoo, after certeine daies attendance, got audience, and boldlie declaring vnto Egfred their message, receiued for answer a plaine publication of warre. For he alledging how the Scots, since the truce was granted, had sundrie times fetched couties out of the confines of his dominions, and therefore had well deserued farre more damage than as yet they had receiued, whereupon he minded not to continue friendship with them that knew not how to kéepe their hands from robbing and stealing from their neighbours: so that he commanded them to declare vnto their king, that within eight daies after, he should looke for open warre at the hands of him and other his alies.

The truce broken.

Ambassadors sent by Eugenius vnto Egfred for restitution.

Egfreds answer.

Eugenius receiuing this answer from Egfred, besought God, sith the other onelie sought to violate the peace, that the vengeance might light vpon his owne head, that had thus giuen the occasion. Herewith gathering his power togither, he repaired into Galloway, into the which he had knowledge that his enimies would first enter. But before he could get thither, a great armie of Englishmen were come alreadie into that countrie, and had besieged a strong castell called Downske, the chiefest fortresse in those daies of all Galloway. And yet Egfred might winne the same, he was constreined to raise his siege, and to march forth to incounter with Eugenius, who hasted fast towards him. They met néere to the banks of the water of Lewis, as then being verie déepe, by reason it was raised with abundance of raine which latelie before had fallen, where they fought a verie sore and bloudie battell: for the Scots had vowed neuer to giue ground to the enimies, so long as anie life remained in their breasts.

Eugenius gathereth an armie.

The castell of Downske besieged.

At the first there was no great aduantage perceiued on either side, the kings, according to the duties of valiant capteins, exhorting their people to sticke to it manfullie: but in the meane time, certeine bands of Egfreds part getting themselues to the side of an hill, gaue the looking on, without comming downe at all to aid their friends: which manner the residue of his people perceiuing, doubted of some ſome treaſon deuiſed againſt them, and therevpon began to ſhrinke backe. Egfred aduiſed therof, came amongſt the foremoſt ranks of his battell, deſiring the Engliſhmen in no wiſe to giue place to their enimies: and for that daies ſeruice he promiſed them high rewards, and all the pleaſure that afterward he might be anie waies able to ſhew or do them. But whileſt he was thus buſilie occupied in comforting & exhorting his men to fight ſtoutlie, he himſelf chanced to be wounded in the face with an arrow ſo ſore, that immediatlie he fell downe and died in the place. The Engliſhmen diſcouraged with this miſchance, were quicklie therevpon put to flight and chaſed, a great number of them tooke the riuer ſo to eſcape the enimies hands, of whome the more part being preſſed downe by weight of their armor, were drowned in the raging waues of the floud, the reſidue by caſting from them their armors and clothes, eſcaped by ſwimming ouer to the other ſide, but thoſe that made their courſe by land, being cumbred in mires and molles, alſo amongſt ſtreicts, rocks, mounteins and cliffes, were ouertaken by the Scots and ſlaine. Few of that number eſcaped awaie in ſafetie, ſo that there died in the fight and chaſe at the point of twentie thouſand Saxons with their king the forenamed Egfred: of the Scots were ſlaine, beſides thoſe that were hurt and wounded, not manie aboue fiue thouſand. By this ouerthrow the force of thoſe Saxons or Engliſhmen of Northumberland was not onelie ſore diminiſhed, but alſo of ſuch other Saxons, the which in no ſmall number were come vnto Egfred, to aid him againſt the Scots in that iournie.

King Egfred ſlaine.

See more hereof in England.

Twentie thouſand Saxons ſlaine.

Bruders the Piciſh king hauing knowledge of this ſlaughter, which had chanced betwixt the Engliſhmen and Scots, was nothing ſorie, as one that was friend to neither part, and now perceiuing that the Northumberland men were ſo weakened, that they were not able to reſiſt an inuaſion, he entred with his whole power which he had raiſed, into Northumberland, ſore afflicting th' inhabitants, inſomuch that he had vndoubtedlie either ſubdued that countrie wholie vnto his dominion, either els vtterlie deſtroied it, had not the deuout praiers of S. Cutbert (who then held the ſee of Lindeſterne) preſerued the people from that preſent deſolation. For at length after the Picts had raged a while through the countrie, they chanced to fall at variance amongſt themſelues for parting of the ſpoile, and buckling togither by the eares, there was an huge ſlaughter made amongſt them. And this was the cauſe, that contenting themſelues with thoſe countries about Berwike, ancientlie called Deira, out of the which they expelled the Saxons, they abſteined from all the reſidue, as not willing to deale withall. Neither were the Saxons of Northumberland, being thus ſcourged, able to recouer their former forces againe, of manie yeres after inſuing.

Bruders king of the Picts.

Inuaſion into Northumberland.

Cutbert biſhop.

A ſlaughter amongſt the Picts.

Yere is to be noted, that whereas the Scotiſh writers aſcribe the victorie of that battell, wherein Egfred was ſlaine, vnto their king Eugenius, Beda which then liued, declareth that the Picts were thoſe that fought with him and ſlue him. Finallie, Eugenius departed this life in the 4 yere of his reigne, and after the incarnation 688. After Eugenius the firſt, ſucceeded Eugenius the ſirt, who was the ſonne of Ferquhard, and by perſuaſion of biſhop Adamnan (with whome he was brought vp) & of S. Cutbert, he entered into league with the Northumberland men: but he would at no hand ioine in amitie with the Picts, notwithſtanding he was contented to take truce with them. But when he ſaw the ſame oftentimes by them violated & broken, to the great perill, damage, and hinderance of his ſubiects, he cauſed the warre to be proclamed, and ſent them his defiance by an herald. Howbeit, through the earneſt praiers (as is ſuppoſed) of the two biſhops, Cutbert and Adamnan (who had laboured earneſtlie to haue brought thoſe people to a quietneſſe) this warre continued without anie notable incounter, ſaue onelie by light incurſions (wherein no great bloudſhed chanced) euen vnto the death of Eugenius, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 697, and in the tenth yeere of his owne reigne. He was buried togither with the other Eugenius, that laſtlie reigned afore him, in the Ile of Colmekill, amongſt their predeceſſors.

Egfred ſlaine by Picts and not by Scots.

Eugenius the firſt died.

688

Eugenius the ſirt ſucceedeth Eugenius the firſt.

A league betweene the Scots and Northumberland men.

Truce taken with the Picts.

Warre without anie notable incounter.

The death of Eugenius the firſt.

697

Manie wonderfull viſions were ſeene that yeere in Albion, as the Scotiſh chronicles make mention. In the riuer of Humber there appeered in the ſight of a great multitude of men, a number of ſhips vnder ſaile, as though they had beene furniſhed forth for the warres. In the church at Camelon there was heard a noiſe, as it had beene the clattering of armor. Milke was turned into bloud in diuers places in Pictland, and cheeſe conuerted into a bloudie maſſe or cake. Corne as it was gathered in the harueſt time appeered bloudie. In the furthermoſt parts of Scotland, it rained bloud. Theſe ſights being ſeene of ſome, & declared to other, cauſed a wonderfull feare in the peoples harts, imagining ſome great alteration to inſue.

Wonderfull viſions ſeene.

Ambirkeleth the nephue, or (as ſome ſay) the ſon of Eugenius the firſt, ſucceeded Eugenius the ſirt in the gouernment of the realme; who after his atteining to the crowne, ſhortlie changed therewith his manners and good diſpoſition: for where before he ſhewed himſelfe to be an earneſt defendor of the poore and ſimple, that all men iudged that he would haue proued a patrone of all vertue, he contrarie to that expectation, became ſuddenlie a paterne of all vices and couetouſneſſe, delighting in nothing but in following his ſenſuall luſts, as in taking exceſſe of meats and drinks, and wallowing in fleſhlie concupiſcence of lecherous luſt. To be briefe, when he tooke nothing in hand worthie of his eſtate and degree, it was thought that of neceſſitie the forme of the publike gouernement muſt needes thorough his negligent ſlouthfulneſſe fall into decaie and ruine: whereupon Garnard king of the Picts, ſuppoſing he had conuenient time to reuenge all former iniuries receiued at the Scotiſhmens hands, gathered a great hoſt of men, and with the ſame entring into the Scotiſh confines, made verie pitifull ſlaughter of the inhabitants.

Ambirkeleth.

Ambirkeleth ſucceedeth Eugenius the firſt.

The king turned from vertue vnto all licentiouſneſſe.

Garnard king of the Picts inuadeth Scotland.

At length Ambirkeleth (being ſore blamed of his his nobles for his negligence, in ſuffering his ſubiects thus to be deſtroied) gathered an armie togither, & with no ſmall feare to ſhew his head amongſt his people (as thoſe princes which through their owne default haue their people in miſtruſt, do euer ſtand in doubt of their owne ſafeties, and namelie when anie preſent danger beginneth to appeere) forth he goeth without anie great good order (God wot) for what might be looked for at his hands, which was ſo ouerwhelmed with all kind of exceſſiue gluttonie, immoderate ſurfeting, inſatiable lecherie, and deliting altogither in ſlouthfull eaſe, and ſluggiſh idleneſſe, the root from whence all ſuch filthie vices taking their beginnings, are nouriſhed & maintained.

Ambirkeleth gathered an armie againſt the Picts.

Idleneſſe the breeder and nouriſher of ſenſuall luſts.

To conclude, he liued as one that tooke no maner of regard to that which chieflie apperteined to his calling: whereby now when he ſhould come into the field, he was neither able through lacke of practiſe to take paines to ſee things done as was behouefull, of himſelfe, neither yet to giue order to others how the ſame ought to be done. Neuertheleſſe marching forward with his armie, he came to the water of Tay, and neere to the banks thereof, he pitched downe his tents, where after he had ſupped, he was occaſioned to

to go forth of his lodging to doo the necessities of nature, and being onelie accompanied with two of his seruants that were gromes of his chamber, he was suddenlie shot through the head with an arrow, but from whence it came, or who shot it, there was neuer anie knowne that could tell. Howbeit, the king immediatlie died of the hurt, after he had reigned not fullie two yeeres. He was buried in Colmekill amongst his noble ancestors.

The death of Ambirkeleth.

Eugenius.

THe lords and peeres of the land not greatlie lamenting the death of such a monstrous person, because the annie for want of a gouernor should not fall into anie danger, they elected Eugenius the seuenth, being the brother of the late foresaid Ambirkeleth, to succeed as king in the gouernment of the realme; a prince of verie comelie port & personage, neither destitute of honorable qualities and good disposition of mind. Being once proclamed king, he caused generall musters to be taken of the whole armie, and perceiuing by surueie thereof, that he was not able to match with his enimies, he found means to conclude a peace with the Pictish king, pledges being deliuered on either side, for redresse to be had of all wrongs and iniuries that had beene committed betwixt them. The Picts returning home, and the Scotish armie dissolued, Eugenius with the most part of the nobilitie went into Argile, where he receiued his inuesture of the kingdome, sitting vpon the stone of marble, according to the custome and maner.

Eugenius the seuenth is elected king of Scots.

A peace concluded.

The king is crowned.

The bond of peace begun betwixt the kings, was the more stronglie confirmed by meanes of aliance, Spontana the daughter of king Garnard being coupled in mariage with Eugenius: she in the yeere following being great with child, was murthered one night within the kings bed-chamber, in steed of the king himselfe, by two brethren of the countrie of Athole, who moued to displeasure for their fathers death, had conspired to murther the king, and had slaine him in deed, had he not through his good hap laien forth of his owne chamber the same night. Eugenius being suspected of the murther, and euill spoken of for the same amongst his subiects, was at length with great danger of life and honor inforced to make answer by waie of arrainment for clearing of himselfe, before the nobles of his realme, appointed as competent iudges in that case: so greatlie beloued was Spontana amongst all the degrees of the Scotish nation. But in the end being found guiltlesse of the crime (for at the time that iudgement should haue passed, the offendors were apprehended and brought in) he was acquit, to the great reioising of all honest men. Those that had done the deed, were condemned and hanged vp naked on gibbets by the heeles, togither with certeine cruell mastiue dogs, the which might so deuoure them.

The quéne slaine in steed of hir husband

The king is suspected of the murther.

The murtherers are hanged.

But Eugenius being thus cleared of all former suspicion, minded to haue beene reuenged on those that had falslie accused him. Howbeit through the godlie admonishments of that reuerend father Adamnan, he qualified his displeasure. After this, giuing his mind to the aduancement of religion and politike gouernement of his subiects, he ordeined that the histories of his ancestors should be written in bookes and volumes, that posteritie might haue to read the same for example sake. These monuments he also appointed to be kept and reserued in the abbeie of Iona, now called Colmekill, for a perpetuall memorie: and such as should write the same, to remaine and haue liuings there in the abbeie. Moreouer, such spirituall promotions as he perceiued to be too meane and slender for the maintenance of the minister that should serue the cure, he caused to be augmented in such wise as was thought sufficient. He concluded a league with the Saxons and Picts, and obserued the same during his life, which he ended at Abernethie, when he had reigned about 17 yeeres, whereof the last fell in the yeere after the incarnation of our Sauior 717, the 15 indiction. His death was greatlie lamented, both of his lords and commons, as they that inwardlie loued him for his noble and most princelie qualities.

An example of a good prince.

The king causeth his ancestors histories to be written.

Eugenius the seuenth departeth out of this life. 716. H.B.

Mordack.

ALittle before his death, he betooke the possession of his kingdome vnto Mordacke that succeeded him. This Mordacke was the nephue of Eugenius the seuenth, by his brother Ambirkeleth: who as he was knowne to be of a gentle, meeke, and liberall nature, before his aduancement to the crowne; so he shewed himselfe to be the verie same man during the whole course of all his naturall life, after he had attained to the same. Aboue all things he wished a generall peace to continue amongst all the princes of Albion, and therevpon for his part establishing a peace with the Picts, Britains, and all the English kings, he firmelie kept euerie article therein conteined. In those daies (as S. Beda doth testifie) foure seuerall people liued in peace and quietnesse within the bounds of Albion, though differing in manners, language, lawes, and ordinances: Saxons whome he called Englishmen, Britains, Scots, and Picts. His words are these that follow.

Mordack. Mordacke succeedeth Eugenius the seuenth.

A louer of peace.

Peace thorough out all the land of Albion.

The nation of the Picts at this time is in league with the Englishmen, and gladlie is partaker of the vniuersall peace and veritie with the catholike church. Those Scots which inhabit Britaine, contenting themselues with their owne bounds, go about to practise no deceitfull traines, nor fraudulent deuises against the Englishmen. The Britains, though for the most part through a familiar hatred do impugne the English nation, and the state of the whole catholike church, obseruing not rightlie the feast of Easter, besides other naughtie vsages, yet both the diuine power and humane force vtterlie resisting them, they are not able in neither behalfe to attaine vnto their purposed intentions; as they which though partlie free, yet in some behalfe are thrall and mancipat to the subiection of the Englishmen: which Englishmen now in acceptable peace and quietnesse of time, manie amongest them of Northumberland, as well of the nobilitie as other, laieng away armour and weapon, aplie themselues to the reading of holie scripture, more desirous to be in houses of vertuous conuersation, than to exercise feats of warre. What will come thereof, the age that followeth shall perceiue and behold. ¶ With these words doth Beda end his historie, continued till the yeare 734, in the which yeare Mordacke the Scotish king ended his life.

The testimonie of Beda.

734. Mordack ended his life the same yeare that saint Beda made an end of his storie.

He repared sundrie churches and religious howses, which being defaced with violence of the enimies inuasions in time of warre, had not beene redified by his ancestors. But amongest other, he bestowed much cost vpon the church where the bodie of S. Ninian lieth, in the towne ancientlie called Candida Casa, & now Whitterne or Quhitterne. Saint Beda calleth that place Pictiminia, and the bishop which at the same time held the church there, he nameth Acta, auouching how he was the first that was bishop thereof after the daies of saint Ninian. Which if it be true, it must néeds be that afterwards some vacation happened in that see for a time, sith it is notified in the Scotish histories, that the westerne Iles, Galloway, and other regions nére adioining, were subiect vnto the bishop of Sodor (whose sée is in the Ile of Man) vnto the daies of Malcolme the third, who restored rather than ordeined the bishops sée in Candida Casa againe, after such vacation as before is specified.

Candida Casa now called Whitterne.

But

Ethfine.

Ethfine succeedeth Mordake.

A peaceable prince.

BUt now to returne touching the gouernement of the Scotish kingdome, I find that after the decease of Mordake last remembred, his nephue named Ethfine, the sonne of the seuenth Eugenius, succeeded in the state; a man naturallie inclined vnto peace and maintenance of iustice. The league which his predecessors Eugenius and Mordake had kept with their neighbors the Britains, Englishmen and Picts, he duelie likewise obserued. His chiefe studie was to purge his realme of all such as were knowen to be open barrettors and offendors in anie wise, against the peace and common quiet of his subiects; so that causing sundrie notable examples of iustice to be executed vpon such euill doers, he was had in such reuerend dread amongest his subiects, that none of them durst once whisper anie euill of him. Neither had they verelie anie cause so to do, while he looked to the administration himselfe.

Foure gouernors vnder the king.

But after he was once fallen into age, he appointed foure peeres in his realme to haue the chiefe gouernance vnder him; as Donald the treasuror of Argile, Collane of Athole, and Mordake of Galloway his lieutenants, and Conrath the thane of Murrey land. These hauing the procuration of all things touching the gouernement of the realme, vsed not themselues so vprightlie in manie points as they ought to haue done; but winked now and then at faults & trespasses committed by their kinsfolks and alies, permitting the nobilitie to liue according to their old accustomed maner of licentious libertie, to the small ease or commoditie of the other inferiour states. Donald of the westerne Iles, a man of goodlie personage, but of disposition inclined to all naughtinesse, mainteined a great number of robbers and spoilers of the countrie, liuing onelie vpon rapine. For loke what they wanted, they would not faile to catch it, if it were in anie place abroad where they might laie hands on it: so that all the husbandmen and commons of Galloway, in which countrie they most haunted, were brought into wonderfull thraldome and miserie.

Vntrust gouernement.

Donald of the Iles maintaineth robbers.

The oppression of the commons of Galloway.

Neither did Mordake the kings lieutenant there, go about to chastise such insolent misdemenors, either for that he was of Donalds aliance, either else priuie to his doings, and partaker of the spoile. The people hereby vexed with continuall iniuries, brought manie pitifull complaints before Mordake, who nothing regarded their lamentable suites and supplications, but the more they complained, the worse they were handled. Neither was there anie hope of redresse or amendment, till Eugenius the eight was admitted to the kinglie administration after the death of king Ethfine, who in the latter end of his daies continuallie being sicke and diseased, could not attend to take order for the publike gouernement, by reason whereof such wilfull misorders insued. He died in the yeare of our Lord 764, after he had continued his reigne ouer the Scotishmen the space of thirtie yeares, his bodie being buried in Colmekill with all funerall obsequies.

Mordake the kings lieutenant beareth with offendors.

The decease of Ethfine, 762. H.B.

HIs successor, the foresaid Eugenius the eight that was the sonne of king Mordake, was inuested king in Argile with such pompe and ceremonies as in that case apperteined, and immediatlie therevpon he hasted forth to catch Donald of the Iles, not resting till at length he had caught him, though that came not to passe without some losse of his people. After he had taken both him and his chiefest complices, he put them openlie to death; neither so satisfied, he caused Mordake to be arraigned, who confessing himselfe partlie guiltie of such things as were laid to his charge for mainteining of the foresaid Donald, he likewise suffered death, and his goods being valued and diuided into parts, were bestowed amongest the commons of Galloway, in recompense of such losses, as through his contriued falshood they had sustained. Also he did put Donald, Collan, and Conrath to their fines, for that they did suffer Donald to rob & spoile without chastisement.

Eugenius.

Eugenius the eight inuested king of Scots.

Donald of the Iles apprehended.

Donald and his complices put to death.

Through which causing of iustice thus to be executed, in releefe of his commons, he wan him wonderfull loue, not onlie in Galloway, but also through out all his realme; and therewith were offendors put in such feare, that they durst in no place commit anie such misorders against the simple and meaker people. And for the more increase of his subiects wealth, he also continued the league with the Picts, Britains, and Englishmen, accordinglie as his late predecessor had done. But yet, as the nature of man through licentious libertie is euer readie to offend in one point or other, so it came to passe by this worthie prince Eugenius, who in such wise as is before expressed, reigning in peace and quietnesse amongest his louing subiects, yet fell into most vile lust to accomplish his vnsatiable fleshlie concupiscence, seeking all means he could deuise to defloure yong virgins and honest matrons, and that as well those of the nobilitie as other. And such companions as could best further his purpose in that behalfe, and deuise new means and waies of fleshlie companie, those he set by, and greatlie made of, deliting altogither to haue them in his companie.

Mordake lieutenant of Galloway is put to death.

The commons recompensed.

A righteous king.

Offendors put in feare.

Eugenius is peruerted with sensuall lust and concupiscence.

Thus being drowned in lecherous lust, and filthie concupiscence, he fell dailie in more greeuous vices, as into excessiue couetousnesse and beastlie crueltie, consenting to make awaie his wealthie subiects, to the end he might inioy their goods. This wickednes remained not long vnpunished, for the lords and peeres of his realme, perceiuing how he proceeded dailie in his abhominable and tyrannicall doings, not once giuing eare to the wholesome aduertisements either of God or man, they slue him one day amongest them as he sat in iudgement about to haue condemned a great rich man, though not guiltie in the crime whereof he was accused. They caused also a great companie of those mates to be apprehended, which had beene of his councell, and prouokers vnto all his wicked and vile doings. Which to the great contentation of the people were hanged, as they had well deserued. And such was the end of Eugenius, after he had gouerned the kingdome about three yeares: his bodie was buried in Colmekill amongest his ancestors, though the people thought it little worthie of that honor, which had misused it selfe so inordinatlie in this present life.

A filthie delight.

Couetousnesse linked with crueltie.

Eugenius is murthered.

The end of Eugenius the eight.

Fergus. 767.

AFter him came th'administration of the realme vnto Fergus the third, the sonne of king Ethfine, in the yeare 767, who being established in the same, began freelie to practise all kinds of vices, which most abundantlie reigned in him, howbeit till that day wonderfullie dissembled and kept couert. He seemed to striue how to passe his predecessor in all points of wickednesse. He toke no regard at all to the gouernement of his realme, but gaue himselfe to excessiue gluttonie, in deuouring of delicate meats and drinks, and therewith kept such a number of vile strumpets in house with him, whome hee vsed as concubines, that his wife was no better esteemed than as an handmaid, or rather a kitchenmaid. Who being a woman of great modestie, and sober aduisednesse, could not yet but take sore greefe and indignation hereat: and therefore sundrie times assaied by way of wholesome persuasions, to turne his mind from such sinfull vsages and filthie trade of liuing.

Fergus the third created king.

Wicked princes.

Finallie, when she saw there was no hope to conuert his depraued mind, nor by anie meanes to reforme him, but that the more she laboured to do good

vpon

K. Fergus the third ſtrangled by his wife.

vpon him, the woꝛſe he was, throughe verie diſpleaſure of ſuch iniuries as ſhe dailie ſuſteined at the hands of his concubines, ſhée found meanes to ſtrangle him ſecretlie one night as he lay in bed, chooſing rather to be without a huſband, than to haue one that ſhould deceiue hir of the right and dutie of mariage; and that in ſuch ſoꝛt, as ſhe muſt be faine to ſuffer the repꝛoch dailie beforе hir face, being miſvſed of them whom he kept as paramours in moſt deſpitefull maner. The day after ſhe wꝛought this feat, the bodie being found dead, was apparelled in funerall wiſe, and bꝛought foꝛth vnto the place of iudgement, where inquiſition was ſtreictlie made what they were that had done ſo heinous a déed. Foꝛ though there were but few that lamented his death, yet ſome of his friends were verie earneſt to haue the matter tried foꝛth, that ſuch as had committed the murther might ſuffer due puniſhment.

Suſpicious perſons are racked.

Manie were apꝛehended and had to the racke, but yet could none be found that would confeſſe it. The quéene was void of all ſuſpicion, as ſhe that had béene taken foꝛ a woman at all times of great temperancie. But yet, when ſhe heard that a number of innocent perſons were toꝛmented without deſert, ſoꝛe lamenting (as ſhould appeare) their miſerable caſe, ſhe came haſtilie into the iudgement hall, and getting hir aloft vpon the bench, there, in the pꝛeſence of all the companie, ſhe had theſe oꝛ the like

The quéene confeſſed the murther.

“ woꝛds vnto the whole aſſemblie. I know not (good “ people) I know not what god moueth me, oꝛ what “ diuine reuengement vereth mée with ſundꝛie “ thoughts and cogitations; that of all this day and “ moꝛning pꝛeceding, I haue had neither reſt in bo“ die noꝛ mind. And verelie when I heard that cer-“ teine guiltleſſe perſons were cruellie toꝛmented
“ here in your pꝛeſence; had not wꝛath giuen place, “ partlie vnto modeſtie, whereof I muſt confeſſe there
“ is left but a ſmall poꝛtion in me, I had ſoꝛthwith “ rid my ſelfe out of the way. The kings death was “ mine act. Conſcience conſtreineth me (ſetting apart “ mine owne ſafegard) to confeſſe the truth, leaſt the “ guiltleſſe ſhould wꝛongfullie periſh: therfoꝛe vnder“ ſtand ye foꝛ truth, that none of them whom ye haue “ eramined are pꝛiuie to the offenſe. I verelie am ſhe,
“ that with theſe wicked hands haue ſtrangled this “ night laſt paſt Fergus, about whoſe death I ſée you
“ in trouble, moued ſo to doo with two as ſharpe pꝛicks
“ as may reſt in a woman, to wit, impatient foꝛbea“ ring of carnall luſt, & irefull wꝛath. Fergus by his “ continuall vſing of concubines, kept from me the due “ debt that the huſband oweth to the wife: wherevpon
“ when there was no hope to reconcile him with often “ aduertiſements, vehement foꝛce of anger riſing in “ my hart, dꝛoue me to doo ſo wicked a déed. I thought “ rather therefoꝛe to diſpatch the adulterer, than (being “ deſtitute of my huſband, & defrauded of all quéenelie “ honoꝛ) to liue ſtill ſubiect to the perpetuall iniuries
“ of ſuch lewd women as he kept & vſed in my ſtead.

She giueth hir owne ſentence.

“ Looſe yée therefoꝛe thoſe that be accuſed of the kings “ death, & as foꝛ me ye ſhall not néed to pꝛoceed againſt “ me as guiltie of the crime by oꝛder of law: foꝛ I that
“ was ſo bold to commit ſo heinous an act, will accoꝛ“ dingly doo execution vpon my ſelfe euen here incon-“ tinentlie in pꝛeſence of you all: what honoꝛ is due to “ the dead, looke you to that. ¶ Hauing thus made an

The quéene taketh execution of hir ſelf.

end of hir tale, ſhe plucked foꝛth a knife which ſhe had hid vnder hir goowne, and ſtroke hirſelfe to the heart with the ſame, falling dead vpon it downe to the ground. All ſuch as were pꝛeſent wondered greatlie at hir ſtout and hardie ſtomach, ſpeaking diuerſlie thereof, as ſome in pꝛaiſe, and ſome in diſpꝛaiſe of theſe hir monſtruous doings. The bodie of Fergus was caried foꝛth to the Ile of Colmekill, and there buried in the third yéere after his entring into the gouernement, and in the yéere of our Lord 769. The quéens coꝛps was not buried in ſacred ground, foꝛ that ſhe ſlue hirſelfe.

Soluathius.

SOluathius the ſonne of Eugenius the eight, was admitted to the rule of the Scotiſh eſtate next after the death of Fergus: a pꝛince ſuerlie boꝛne to the accompliſhment of high enterpꝛiſes, if throughe hap of frowaꝛd deſtinie he had not béene hindered. Foꝛ in the third yéere of his reigne he began to bée vered extréemelie with the gout, which ingendered by cold in lieng abꝛoad in hunting; and ſo continuing with him during his life, ſtaied him from manie woꝛthie exerciſes, as well in peace at home, as abꝛoad in time of warres. Thus he being in maner impotent & lame of his limbs, there were ſome commotions and miſoꝛders the moꝛe boldly attempted: and firſt amongſt them of the out Iles. Foꝛ Bane Makedonald, gouernoꝛ by the kings appointment of the Iland called Tire, got all the caſtels and foꝛtreſſes of the Iles into his owne hands, & ſtrengthened with a rout of vnrulie and miſchéfous youthfull perſons, toke poſſeſſion of all the ſaid Iles, cauſing himſelfe to be pꝛoclamed king of the ſame.

Soluathius admitted king of Scotland.

Soluathius an impotent man.

A rebellion.

Makedonald pꝛoclamed king of the Iles.

Not contented herewith, he gathered a number of ſhips togither, wherein tranſpoꝛting himſelfe with a great armie ouer into Loꝛne and Cantire, made great waſte and ſpoile of thoſe countries, till Duthquhall gouernoꝛ of Athole, and Culane of Argile, being ſent with a choſen power from the king to defend the countrie, chanced to incounter with him, and putting him with his people vnto flight, chaſed them to ſuch a ſtreict, as where there was no way to get foꝛth, ſaue onlie that by which they entered. This place is in Loꝛne, with a ſtreict paſſage to enter into it: but when ye are within it, the ſame is verie large and bꝛoad, inuironed about with craggie mounteins, chained togither with a continuall ridge, a déepe riuer compaſſing them in beneath in the bottome, with ſuch ſteepe & ſlodelong banks, that there is no way to paſſe foꝛth of the ſame, but by that throughe which ye muſt enter into it. The ſaid Bane with his folks being entred at vnwares into ſuch a ſtreict, and perceiuing there was no way to iſſue foꝛth, but by the ſame where he entred, he returned backe thither, and finding the paſſage cloſed from him by his enimies, he was in a woonderfull maze, not knowing what ſhift to make to eſcape. Finallie, falling to counſell with the chiefeſt of his armie vpon the danger pꝛeſent, and ſo continuing foꝛ the ſpace of two daies without anie concluſion auailable, on the third day dꝛiuen of neceſſitie throughe hunger, they requꝛed of their enimies to be receiued as yélded men vpon what conditions they would pꝛeſcribe, onelie hauing their liues aſſured. But when this would not be granted, in the euening tide they ruſhed foꝛth vpon their enimies, to trie if by foꝛce they might haue paſſed throughe them. But ſuch was their hap, that there they died euerie mothers ſon: foꝛ ſo had Duthquhall & Culane commanded, to the end that other rebels might take eꝛample by ſuch their wilfull and rebellious outrage.

He inuadeth Loꝛne and Cantire.

A power from the king is ſent againſt him.

The kings capteins after this paſſing ouer into the Iles, bꝛought all things there into the foꝛmer ſtate of quietneſſe. Yet after the apeaſing of this tumult, there chanced a new buſineſſe in Galloway: foꝛ Gillequhalme, ſonne to that Donald, which (as ye haue heard) was executed by commandement of Eugenius the eight, gathered togither a great number of vngrattous ſcape-thrifts, & did much hurt and miſchéefe in the countrie. But ſhoꝛtlie after, being vanquiſhed by the ſame capteins that had ſuppꝛeſſed the other rebels of the Iles, the countrie was rid of that trouble, and the ring-leaders puniſhed by death foꝛ their offenſes. In this meane while, the Engliſh-

The kings power paſſeth ouer into the Iles.

Gillequhalme the ſonne of Donald.

men

men & Welsh Britains through multitude of kings and rulers warring each against other, had no leasure to attempt anie enterprise against strangers. Neither were the Picts free of some secret displeasures, which one part of them had conceiued against another, so that the Scotishmen were not troubled at all by anie forreine enimies. And so Soluathius hauing continued his reigne the space of 20 yéers, about the end of that tearme departed this life, in the yéere of our saluation 788.

Soluathius departeth this life.

788.

Achaius.

Achaius created king of Scotland.

When after Soluathius was once buried in Colmekill amongst his ancestors, Achaius the son of king Ethfine (a man highlie renowmed for his earnest zeale to iustice and vpright dealing) was aduanced to the gouernance of the realme: who for that by his former conuersation amongst the nobilitie, he perfectlie vnderstood what grudge and secret hatred remained in their harts, one wishing anothers destruction; he foresaw what danger the commonwealth stood in, if the same were not by some good meanes qualified: and thervpon calling them togither, he handled the matter with such wisedome and dexteritie, that before their departure from him, all the roots of former displeasures being vtterlie extirped and auoided, they were made frends on ech side, and promised in his presence so to continue. Thus hauing laid the foundation of a quiet state amongst his subiects, now in the beginning of his reigne, hée was at point to haue had no small warres with the Irishmen: for a number of them being arriued in Cantire, were there slaine by them of the westerne Iles, which vpon request of the inhabitants of that countrie were come to aid them against those Irishmen.

He maketh the nobilitie to agrée.

This losse the rulers of the Irish nation purposed in all hast to reuenge vpon them of the Iles. But Achaius hearing thereof, sent ouer an ambassage vnto them, to haue the matter taken vp before anie further force were vsed: alledging how there was no cause wherfore warres should be moued for such a matter, where the occasion had béene giuen but by a sort of roners on either side, without commandement or warrant obteined from anie of their superiors. Howbeit the nobles of Ireland (for there was no king amongest them at that time as it chanced) moued altogither with indignation for the slaughter of their countrimen, made a direct answer, that they would suerlie be reuenged of the reproch which they had receiued, before they would common of anie peace. And therefore whilest the Scotish ambassadors returned out of Ireland with this answer, a great number of them in ships and craiers passed ouer into Ila, where getting togither a great preie, and fraughting their vessels therewith, as they were returning homewards, they were sonke by force of tempest, so that neither ship nor man returned to bring tidings home how they had sped in Scotland.

The Irishmen will reuenge.

Irishmen take a preie in Ila.

The stout stomachs of the Irish lords and rulers being well qualified with this mischance, they were glad to séeke for peace shortlie after vnto Achaius. Those also that were sent ouer to treat of the same, found him at Enuerlochthée; where hauing declared there message, & confessed how iustlie they had béene punished by the righteous iudgement of almightie God, for the wrongfull attempting of the warres against them that had not deserued it: Achaius answered, how the Irish nation was so stubborne, that they knew not how to vse reason, except they were thoroughlie scourged; and therefore had the righteous God taken iust reuenge vpon them, to the example of other, for their contumacie, in moouing warres against them that had so earnestlie sought for peace. Neuertheless, setting apart all iniuries past, as well new as old, to shew himselfe to be the follower of Christ, who in so manie passages had praised, commended, and set forth vnto vs peace and tranquillitie, he was contented to grant them peace, which now they sued for. Thus was the peace renewed betwixt the Scotish and Irish nations, to the no lesse comfort of the Scots themselues, than of the Irishmen, as those that had learned now by experience and triall (hauing inioied peace a good season) how much the same was to be preferred before cruell warres.

Irishmen doo séeke peace.

In this meane time, Charles surnamed the great, as then reigning in France, and vnderstanding how the Englishmen did not onelie by dailie rouing disquiet the seas, to the great danger of all such merchants and other as trauelled alongst the coasts of France and Germanie; but also now and then comming on land vpon the French dominions, did manie notable displeasures to his subiects: he thought good by the aduise of his péeres, to conclude a league (if it were possible) with the Scots and Picts, with this article amongst the residue: That so oft as the Englishmen should attempt any enterprise or inuasion into France, the Scots and Picts should be readie streightwaies to inuade them here at home; and when they should make anie warres against the Scots or Picts, then the Frenchmen should take vpon them to inuade the west parts of England.

Carolus Magnus in league with the Scots.

There were sent therefore from Charles vnto Achaius certeine ambassadors to bring this matter to passe, who arriuing in Scotland, and comming to the kings presence, declared effectuallie the summe of their message, shewing that the conclusion of such a league should bæ no lesse to the wealth of the Frenchmen, than of the Scots (considering Englishmen to be a people most desirous of all other to get into their hands other mens goods and possessions) for thereby they might be somewhat restreined from such bold and iniurious enterprises, as they dailie toke in hand against their christian neighbors: but it should make most of all (say they) for the aduancement of the whole christian common-wealth, whereas otherwise through their insolent doings, such force as was alreadie prepared against the Saracens (the common enimies of the christians) should be called backe, therewith to kéepe off the said Englishmen, to the great danger of those parts of christendome, vpon which the Saracens then bordered as neighbors.

Ambassadors sent into Scotland.

This message being heard with good deliberation by such as were present, the ambassadors themselues being honorable personages, and graue of countenance, were receiued most louinglie of the king, and lodged in his owne palace, hauing all the cheere and honorable interteinment that might be deuised: but touching their message, there were sundrie disputations amongst the nobles, whether the concluding of such a league as they required, were expedient for the Scotish common-wealth or not. And for that the matter séemed to be doutfull, the king thought it necessarie to haue the aduise of his councell: and thervpon calling them togither, and appointing diuerse of them to go with the ambassadors on hunting, to shew them some sport, whilest he consulted with the residue (because he would not haue them present) he commanded one Colman, gouernor of Mar (a man of great authoritie amongst the Scotishmen for his approued wisedome) to say first his mind touching the request of those French ambassadors, who thervpon standing forth, began as followeth.

The ambassadors are honorablie interteined.

No man ought to maruell, I perceiue, king Achaius, if manie of this our nation be desirous to haue this league concluded with the Frenchmen, as they that are persuaded how nothing can be better, nothing more profitable, more honorable, or more pleasant

cc pleaſant to almightie God, than to ſoine in league and friendſhip with a nation of greateſt power and cc wealth in theſe daies, of all other within the bounds of Europe: for by that meanes ſhould the Scotiſh One conſide- rations. name be highlie renowmed and ſpoken of through cc the whole world. But trulie theſe conſiderations contenting ſo well at the firſt, are not ſo much to be re- cc garded as the euils which hereafter may grow there- cc vpon: for ſuerlie a naughtie and pernicious end of cc this determination ſhall euidentlie teach vs (though cc too late) how farre we haue gone beſide the way of cc reaſon in eſtabliſhing this league, if we once con- cc ſent to conclude the ſame. Is it anie other thing (I beſeech you) to make a league, and to ſoine in ſocie- In enimie at hand. Friends arre off. tie with the Frenchmen againſt our neighbors the Engliſhmen (whoſe friendſhip might be moſt expe- dient for vs) than euen to haue from henceforth a nære and in maner a domeſticall enimie at hand, cc whereas our ſuppoſed friends ſhall be farre off from vs, and ſeparated from our countrie by a great and cc large ſea, at whoſe pleſure alſo we muſt make wars againſt our neighbors, and fight for other mens ſafe- cc gards, putting our bodies in hazard of death and cc wounding for their cauſe, which dwell nothing nære vs; yea & in their quarell to commit our kingdome, cc goods and liues vnto extreme perill of vtter deſtruc- tion. I would thinke it good therefore to take better Good counſell of Colman. aduiſement and deliberation herein, leaſt whileſt we cc ſeke for vaine glorie and counterfeit honor, we do cc not, through prouoking the Engliſhmen our nert cc neighbors, loſe our owne liberties got with much trauell by our elders, for the which they ſo often cc fought with the Britains, Romans, Picts, and finallie with the Saxons. Can there be anie thing more cc pernicious vnto a frée nation, and people borne in li- bertie, than to meaſure lawes of peace, chances of cc warre, and in fine libertie it ſelfe, by the luſt and plea- cc ſure of another nation, and ſo to enter (as it were) cc into bondage? For the auoiding whereof, not onelie cc men, but alſo all other liuing things are readie to fight, euen to the vttermoſt. If the Frenchmen in cc the chiefeſt heat and moſt earneſt brunt of the warre (which we ſhall take in hand for their ſake, according cc to the articles of the league) ſhall chance to forſake cc vs, and conclude ſome manner of peace or league with our enimies, leauing vs in all the whole dan- cc ger; ſhall we haue anie iudge afore whome we maie bring them to anſwer for their default, and by whoſe cc authoritie they may be conſtreined to ſæ vs ſatiſfied for ſuch loſſe and iniuries as we ſhall happily ſuſteine cc at the Engliſhmens hands? Are we of that force cc and power to reuenge our wrongs vpon them, after we are vanquiſhed and in maner brought to vtter cc confuſion by thoſe warres which we ſhall enter into for their cauſe? If euer we be brought vnto that cc point (as God forbid we ſhould) that through want of ſubſtance, and decaie of force, the Frenchmen cc ſhall alſo vtterlie forſake vs, & that thereby we ſhall not bée able to reſiſt the Engliſh puiſſance: afore cc whome (I beſeech you) ſhall we accuſe them for breaking of this league? We ſhall dailie haue to do cc with our enimies after the concluſion of the league (if it be concluded at all) and but ſeldome times with cc our friends. In the midſt of our enimies we ſhall be ſtill occaſioned to practiſe for our defenſe, where we cc haue a long way both by ſea and land to paſſe ouer to our friends, in caſe anie néd ſhall inforce vs there- cc vnto: commodities are brought vs out of Spaine, France, and Germanie, not ſuch as we deſire, but cc onelie ſuch as the Engliſhmen do permit. Againe, when our merchants ſhall paſſe into France, what cc hauens ſhall we leaue them to reſort vnto in time of cc dangerous tempeſts, which often chance to all ſuch as vſe ſailing? Either muſt they periſh and be caſt a- way through rage of ſeas, either elſe fall into the hands of our enimies togither, with all their goods » and fraught. What diſcommodities hereof ſhall riſe, » your grace (moſt prudent prince) and you right cir- » cumſpect councellors, do well inough perceiue. I » therefore would thinke it expedient, that we ſhould » continue in the former peace concluded with the » Britains, Saxons, and Picts, according to the cu- » ſtome of our late predeceſſors, who ſaw well inough » what was moſt beneficiall for the wealth of the Sco- » tiſh nation, and not to couet a new amitie with an » vnknowne people, hauing deſerued little or nothing » as yet at our hands (whoſe intent I cannot but haue » in ſuſpicion, ſith they ſéke for amitie ſo farre off) er- » cept we ſhall manifeſtlie reſolue with our ſelues to » imploie and ieopard both life and libertie for the ſafe- » gard of the French, without regard of our owne. » ¶ Manie in that aſſemblie ſhewed themſelues ſore Colmans counſell is miſliked. offended with Colmans words, ſuppoſing the league with the Frenchmen to be both honorable and neceſſarie.

Then one Albian, a man of great nobilitie (whome the king had latelie before inſtituted his lieutenant in the Iles) ſpake in this manner. If it were poſſi- Albian his o- ration. ble that there might be one ſure and inuiolable con- » ſent amongſt thoſe foure people, which at this daie » haue their habitations within the bounds of Albion, » or that the Engliſhmen knew what it were to ſtand » and abide by faith and promiſes made and giuen, we » would not denie but that thoſe conſiderations and » aduiſes which Colman hath héere vttered ought to be » followed; becauſe that then there ſhould be no occaſi- » on at all, why we ſhould conclude anie league with a- » nie forren nation. But forſomuch as there was ne- » uer man that found more vntruth and breach of pro- The Engliſh Saxons breé- kers of pro- miſe. miſe in anie nation, than hath béene found in theſe Saxons (the which hauing got the rule in Albion, are now called Engliſhmen) as the Scots, Picts, and Britains haue by triall ſufficientlie proued; I ſup- » poſe it is euidentlie knowne vnto you, that either we » muſt of neceſſitie fight and ſtand at defenſe againſt » the Engliſhmen, readie to aſſaile vs both with open » force and ſecret craft, either els linke our ſelues with » ſuch alies and confederats, as by their ſupport we » maie be the better able to withſtand the malice of » ſuch vnfaithfull people. Call ye this faith, or treaſon, I » praie you? The Saxons in times paſt being reque- » ſted of the Britains to aid them againſt their ene- » mies, were moſt louinglie receiued, and highlie re- » warded for their ſeruice: but they contrarilie in re- » compenſe of ſuch kindneſſe, ſhewed themſelues in » ſtéed of aiders, enimies; in ſtéed of defenders, deſtroi- » ers: turning their weapons points againſt the Bri- » tains, by whome they had béene ſo ſent for to their » aid; and now haue not onelie deſtroied a great num- » ber of them by fire and ſword, but alſo they haue ſpoi- » led them of their kingdome & libertie. What league » or truce haue they at anie time kept (you your ſelues » are not ignorant of this which I ſpeake) where either » they ſaw occaſion to ver their neighbors, or hoped to » gaine anie thing by falſifieng their faiths, as they » that haue neuer béene aſhamed ſo to do, where hope » to haue commoditie (if I may ſo call it) hath at anie » hand béene offered. Into what ſundrie and moſt mi- » ſerable calamities hath the trecherie of the Saxons » brought the ſillie Britains? How oftentimes haue » they broken the peace eſtabliſhed with vs, and alſo » with the Picts; euen when we leaſt thought vpon » anie ſuch thing? Yea and that more is, amongſt them » ſelues at this ſeaſon the Engliſhmen warre one a- » gainſt another, more with craftie traines than with » open force, in ſuch wiſe that in Northumberland ſo » manie kings, and ſo manie noble men haue béene » traitorouſlie murthered and made awaie, that ſcarſe »

To inducе o-thers to his purpoſe, he ta-keth the ad-uantage of ca-ſuall haps, charging the whole nation with the fault of a few parti-cular perſons.

"may there be anie found that will take vpon him the ſupreme gouernement of that countrie. It is not manie yéres ago, ſince Oſwin king of that coun-trie was rid out of the waie through treaſon of Oſ-wie that ſucceeded him in the kingdome, and was after depriued both of life and kingdome by Oſtike, whome Egbert deſirous to reigne in his place, found meanes by traitorous practiſe to diſpatch. Egbert was ſlaine by Wollo, and Wollo by Alfred, which Al-fred was after ſlaine by the guilefull craft of Ethel-bert. Neither had Ethelbert anie better ſucceſſe in the end, for now of late betraied by his owne ſub-iects, he was by them ſhamefullie ſlaine and murthe-red. Neither with leſſe traitorous ſhifts and deuiſes do the Engliſhmen mainteine their warres in all places where they are inhabiting within Albion. The reuerend fathers of the ſpiritualtie, and other godlie men addicted to vertue, vnto whom the ſetting forth of Gods word hath béene committed, wearie of and abhorring this wood madneſſe, rage and wicked miſ-demeanor of that nation, haue left their biſhoprikes, abbeies, monaſteries, and cels, and from thence haue remoued into forren regions. Therefore where the Engliſhmen do abſteine at this preſent from ma-king vs warres, it is not to be imputed to anie reue-rence they haue vnto faith, equitie, or reſpect of the league, which they haue made with vs, but onelie vn-to ſuch ciuill ſedition and diſcord, as now doth reigne amongſt them. Neither ought anie of vs of right to doubt, but that when the ſame once ceaſſeth, they will immediatlie take weapon in hand againſt vs, not-withſtanding all leagues or couenants of peace con-firmed to the contrarie. To repreſſe therefore and a-bate their ſubtill practiſes, I can find no readier meane than to enter into friendſhip, and conclude a league with that people, which being ioined with vs, may chaſtiſe ſuch outragious furie of this wicked nation, as cauſe and opportunitie ſhall require. For-tune hath offred vnto vs a conuenient meane and oc-caſion herevnto. For here be at this preſent the French kings ambaſſadors, offering that vnto vs, which (being ſo great a benefit) we might ſcarſe wiſh for. That is, they require to haue vs to ioine in league againſt the Engliſhmen, with their king, whome France, Spaine, and no ſmall part of Ger-manie do acknowledge for their ſouereigne. Ought this to be deſpiſed of men that haue their perfect ſen-ſes? Ought the ſocietie of the French nation to be refuſed of vs, inhabiting here in the vttermoſt parts of the earth, the ſame being freelie offered by them, vnto whom for their ſincere faith both towards God and man, the large empire of the world is granted? So that if we ſhall thankfullie receiue this moſt no-table benefit, the ſame ſhall purchaſe vnto vs the friendſhip of the Spaniards, Frenchmen, Ger-mans, and all thoſe nations which acknowledge king Charles for their head and ſouereigne lord. Here vp-on alſo free paſſage for merchants ſhall be open, to paſſe to and fro vnto vs, with all kind of merchan-dize and wares of traffike. I truſt therefore that eue-rie one of you (ſo that he weie the thing with him-ſelfe throughlie) will eaſilie iudge that the friendſhip and ſocietie of the Frenchmen (verie puiſſant both by ſea and land) and thereto of approued faith and ſtedfaſtneſſe in promiſe, ought more to be eſteemed, and is more beneficiall to the Scotiſh common-wealth, than the vnſtedfaſt promiſes and great diſloi-altie of the Saxons. To which of you is it vnknowne that the Engliſh nation ſtudieth no leſſe to bring vs vnder the yoke of ſeruitude, than they do the Welſh-men, if their force might anſwer directlie to their wils? Therefore if we deſire to auoid the violent power of moſt cruell enimies, if we meane to a-uoid their craftie practiſes, if we regard the chriſtian religion, for the which the Frenchmen are continu-allie in armor, if we ſet more by vertue and conſtan-cie than by vnfaithfulneſſe and breach of couenants and promiſes, if we labor for the glorie and honor of our nation, if we couet to aduance our countrie, our owne reſt, and quietneſſe, and to be briefe, if we paſſe vpon life and libertie, the moſt déereſt things that may happen to man, let vs with ioifull harts eſta-bliſh this league with the Frenchmen, and firmelie continue in the ſame, vpon aſſured truſt and confi-dence that it ſhall bring perpetuall commoditie and renowme to vs, both for the ſafegard of our realme, & reſtreint of the Engliſhmens vnlawfull attempts and wrongfull iniuries, which héereafter they either ſhall or may at any time enterprize againſt vs. By this oration Albian drew the multitude eaſilie vnto his purpoſe.

Then Achaius vnderſtanding how the minds of all his ſubiects were in manner wholie inclined to the league, commanded all the companie to be there in the ſame place againe the next day. And ſo breaking vp their aſſemblie for that time, the king made the French ambaſſadors that night a coſtlie ſupper with a banket, and after hauing conference with his nobles and lords of the councell, it was agréed by ge-nerall conſent amongſt them, that for the ſolemne ratifieng of this league with king Charles, accor-ding as he had required, there ſhould go with his am-baſſadors at their returne the lord William the brother of king Achaius, with foure other honorable and learned perſonages, being men of perfect know-ledge and ſkill, and ſuch as were eſtéemed moſt meet for ſuch a purpoſe. Alſo, that they ſhould take foure thouſand men ouer with them to ſerue againſt the infidels and enimies of the chriſtian religion, where and in ſuch ſort as king Charles ſhould appoint them.

The league with the Frenchmen agréed vpon.

Here vpon the next day going firſt to church, and there making their common ſupplications vnto al-mightie God, according to the rites and ancient cu-ſtomes, they after reſorted vnto the councell cham-ber, where Achaius opened and declared vnto the French ambaſſadors all that was concluded by him, and other the eſtates of his realme, touching the meſ-ſage which they had brought from king Charles. Who reioiſing (as ſhould appéere) greatlie héereat, gaue moſt hartie thanks vnto him, and to all the reſidue for their beneuolent wils herein ſhewed towards king Charles their maiſter, and all the French nati-on. After this, remaining certeine daies with Achai-us, who made them all the chére that might be ima-gined, they departed towards Hungus king of the Picts, vnto whome at their comming to his preſence they made the like requeſt on their maiſters behalfe, which they had made before vnto Achaius.

The league is concluded.

Hungus king of the Picts.

It is ſaid that Hungus gaue the Frenchmen moſt hartie thanks for their good wils, but yet he would not grant to conclude anie league with them at that time, for that (as he alledged) the matter being weightie and of great importance, required no ſmall time to deliberate and take aduiſe for a full reſolution therein. The ambaſſadors héerevpon returned vnto Achaius without ſpéed of their purpoſe with Hun-gus, and the ſecond moneth after, all things being readie for their returne, and the paſſage of thoſe that ſhould go with them, the lord William the kings brother, togither with the ſame ambaſſadors, & ſuch foure perſons as the king had choſen forth amongſt all the learned clergie of his realme (whoſe names were Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine) and alſo hauing with him thoſe foure thouſand men of war, which were at the firſt appointed to go with him, paſ-ſed forth towards France, where he with all the whole companie landed within few daies after in ſafetie, according to their owne wiſhed deſires. At Hangus re-fuſeth to con-clude anie league with the Frenchmen.

The French ambaſſadors returne home

Claudius, Clement, John Mareſbell, Raban, Alcuine.

The Frenchmen in thoſe daies poſſeſſed not onelie that part of Gallia, which we now call France, but alſo the moſt part of the countries now inhabited by the Dutchmen or Germans, namelie on this ſide the riuer Rhene.

their

The Scotiſhmen are honorablie receiued of Carolus the French king.

their comming into France Charles the emperor receiued them in moſt gladſome wiſe, doing them all the honor that might be deuiſed, and the ſouldiers which were come to ſerue him vnder the leading of the foreſaid William, he reteined in wages, vſing them after the ſame ſort and rate as he did his owne naturall people the Frenchmen.

The league is publiſhed by heralds.

Shortlie after alſo at the requeſt of the Scotiſh orators, according to the charter ſigned by Achaius, and confirmed by conſent of king Charles, the league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots was ſolemnelie publiſhed by heralds at armes, according to the maner in thoſe daies vſed, the ſame to indure betwixt thoſe two nations and their poſterities for euer. The chiefeſt articles comprized in this league were as followeth. [The amitie and confederation betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots to be perpetuall and firme, to indure betwixt them and the poſterities of both nations for euer. The iniuries and warres which the Engliſhmen ſhould attempt againſt either nation, ſhould be accounted as common to them both. The Frenchmen being aſſailed by warres of the Engliſhmen, the Scots ſhould ſend their aid of ſouldiers, hauing their charges borne by the Frenchmen as well for furniture, as wages, and all other things neceſſarie. The Frenchmen ſhould contrariwiſe aid the Scots in time of wars againſt the Engliſhmen at their owne proper coſts and charges. Whatſoeuer he were, priuat perſon or publike of theſe two confederat nations, that againſt either of them ſhould aid the Engliſhmen with armour, counſell, vittels, or in anie other maner of wiſe; the ſame ſhould be reputed for a traitor vnto both their princes and countries. Neither might either of them conclude a peace, or take anie truce without the conſent of the other. Theſe were the principall articles of the league, as then confirmed betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen, indited in Latine, and faire ingroſſed in parchment, and reſerued as a monument in both realmes, for a witneſſe vnto ſuch as ſhould come after of this friendſhip thus begun, as the Scotiſh chronicles affirme.] And for further memorie of the thing, Achaius did augment his armes, being a red lion in a field of gold, with a double trace ſeamed with floure delices, ſignifieng thereby, that the lion from thence forth ſhould be defended by the aid of the Frenchmen; & that the Scotiſh kings ſhould valiantlie fight in defenſe of their countrie, liberties, religion, and innocencie, which are repreſented by the lilles, or floure delices, as heralds do interpret it. The lord William, the ſaid Clement, and John, remained ſtill with king Charles, but Rabane & Alcuine returned into their countrie. In all ſuch warres and iournies as Charles afterwards made againſt anie of his enimies, the ſaid lord William was a chiefe doer in the ſame, ſo that his fame and authoritie daſlie grew in all places where he came. His ſeruice ſtood king Charles in notable ſtead in his expeditions againſt the Sarons, Hungarians, and other; but namelie his eſtimation in Italie was moſt highlie aduanced, at what time the ſaid Charles reedified the citie of Florence, appointing this William to be his lieutenant in Tuſcan, and to haue the chiefe charge for the reſtoring of the ſaid citie, which he with ſuch diligence applied, that within ſhort time the ſame was not onelie fortified with new wals, repared and repleniſhed with great numbers of houſes, churches, and other beautifull buildings, but alſo peopled and furniſhed with citizens, a great companie of nobles and gentlemen being called thither out of euerie citie and towne thereabouts for that purpoſe.

The armes of Scotland.

The valiantnes of William.

Florence is reedified.

William lieutenant of Tuſcane.

The citie being thus reſtored to hir former eſtate and dignitie, through the bounteous benefit of king Charles, and the diligent adminiſtration of his lieutenant the foreſaid William, the citizens to ſhew themſelues thankefull, deuiſed for a perpetuall memorie to beare in their armes a red lillie, reſembling one of thoſe which the kings of France giue, ſaue that it differed in colour, to teſtifie thereby, that their citie (after the deſtruction therof by the Goths) was reedified and reſtored to the former dignitie, by the benefit of the Frenchmen. And to acknowledge the diligence herein of the lieutenant, they did inſtitute publike plaies to be vſed and celebrated euerie yeare, wherein with manie pompous ceremonies they crowne a lion. And further that there ſhould be kept vpon the charges of the treaſurie within the citie certeine lions (for the foreſaid lord William gaue a lion for his cogniſance) and thereupon as the Scotiſh chronicles affirme, thoſe beaſts grew to be had in ſuch honor amongeſt the Florentines. Thus this valiant capteine, the foreſaid lord William, paſſing his time in notable exerciſes, and worthie feats of chiualrie vnder king Charles, is accounted in the number of thoſe twelue martiall warriours, which are called commonlie by the Scotiſhmen, Scotesgilmore.

The armes of Florence.

A lion crowned.

Lions kept at Florence.

Scotesgilmore.

And for that he was continuallie occupied in warres, he was neuer maried, whereupon growing in age, and purpoſing to make Chriſt his heire, he builded diuers abbies and monaſteries both in Italie and Germanie, richlie indowing the ſame with lands and rents, ſufficient for the finding of ſuch number of monks, as he appointed to be in the ſaid abbies, wherein none might be admitted, according to the ancient ordinance by him deuiſed, except he were a Scotiſhman borne. In witneſſe of which ordinance, there are ſundrie of theſe houſes remaining in Almaine euen vnto this day, nothing changed from the firſt order or inſtitution. Before the accompliſhment of theſe things, by the foreſaid lord William, brother (as is ſaid) to the Scotiſh king Achaius, I find that the vniuerſities of Paris and Pauia were inſtituted by king Charles, chiefelie by the helpe and means of theſe two fore-remembred Scotiſhmen, John and Clement, inſomuch that Clement was appointed chiefe preſident of all the ſtudents at Paris, and John of the other at Pauia.

William vnmaried maketh Chriſt his heire.

Monaſteries of Scotiſhmen in Germanie.

The vniuerſitie of Paris and Pauia.

But now to returne to the other doings of Achaius, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that about the ſame time, or not much differing from the ſame, Adelſtane the ſonne of Ethelwolfe king of Weſtſaxons, taking vpon him the dominion of Kent, Eaſtſaxon, Mercia, and Northumberland (which Egbert his grandfather had receiued into his gouernement) deſirous now to inlarge his kingdome, entred into that part of the Pictiſh dominion, which ancientlie hight Deira, and conteined the marches about Berwike, alledging how the ſame apperteined to his kingdome of Northumberland, and had béene fraudulentlie taken from his anceſtors by the Picts: but forſomuch as there was a commotion raiſed the ſame time in Mercia, he was called backe to appeaſe it, and hereupon putting all to the fire and ſword in Deira, ſauing ſuch priſoners as he brought away with him, he returned. Hungus the Pictiſh king ſore ſtomaching this iniurious enterpriſe of the Engliſhmen, determined to reuenge the ſame in all poſſible haſt, and therefore made inſtant ſute vnto Achaius (who had maried his ſiſter) to haue his aid againſt them.

Adelſtane entereth into Deira.

Deira waſted by fire and ſword.

Hungus aided with Scotiſhmen inuadeth Northumberland.

Achaius of his owne accord minding to do the Engliſhmen a diſpleaſure, ſent forthwith vnto Hungus to the number of ten thouſand men. With which, and with his owne power, king Hungus inuaded the borders of Northumberland, fetching from thence a great bootie of goods and priſoners; but yet he forbare ſlaughter of men, and burning of houses, for a reuerence which he had, as is supposed, towards the christian religion. Athelstane being certified hereof, omitting his iournie into Mercia, turned all his power against the Picts: and hearing that they were withdrawen into their countrie, he followed them so nere at the heles, that verie earlie in one morning he was vpon their backs where they lodged by a broke side, not passing two miles from Haddington, before they had anie knowledge of his approch. Athelstane vpon a fierce courage, hauing thus found his enimies according to his wished desire, and herewith comming vpon them in such order of battell, as they had no waie forth to escape without fight, he commanded a proclamation to be made by one of his heralds, that all the whole number of the Picts should passe by the edge of the sword.

He warred without ſlaughter and burning.

Athelstane pursueth Hungus.

Athelstane his cruell proclamation.

The Picts thus seeing their enimies at hand, and hearing this cruell commandement, were wonderfullie amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, and oppressed so with feare, that they wist not what might be best for them to do. At length by commandement of Hungus their king, they fell vnto fortifieng of their campe; but yet they quicklie perceiued how that it would not long preuaile them, considering that their enimies had gotten into their hands not onelie the spoile which they had brought with them out of Northumberland, but also all other their prouision, trusse, and baggage, which they had left in a field there adioining vnto the side of their campe. Herevpon manie reasons were put forth amongest them, which way they might escape out of that present danger. In which meane time Athelstane hauing brought his people into good order of battell, prouoked the Picts to come forth of their strength into the plaine field, there to trie their forces. But for that day no notable thing was done; the Picts keping themselues still within their campe.

The Picts are amazed.

The Picts enter the campe.

Athelstane doth chalenge his enimies.

In the night following, after sundrie consultations had amongest them, it was agreed by generall consent, that the nert day they should giue battell to the Englishmen. And so herevpon preparing themselues for the purpose, euen vpon the breake of the day, forward they make towards their enimies with fierce willes, speciallie incouraged thereto by the comfortable words of Hungus. The Englishmen halfe amazed at the hardie approch and onset of the Picts, were not long able to susteine their fore impression; so that beginning somewhat to swarue, at length they were forced to flee vnto the place, where ye heard how they toke the baggage and spoile of the Pictish campe: where they were beaten downe in greater numbers than before, insomuch that such prisoners as they had before taken of them that kept the said spoile, greatlie now to aduance the victorie of their fellowes, shewed more crueltie towards the Englishmen than anie of the rest, now that they saw once how the victorie was inclined to the Pictish side.

The Picts prepare themselues vnto battell.

The Englishmen are put to flight.

In fine, such slaughter was made, that of the whole English host which was there assembled, there vneth escaped fiue hundred. Athelstane himselfe at the first was run through the bodie with a speare, and so died, giuing name to the place of the battell, which continueth euen vnto this daie, being called Athelstans ford. This victorie fell to the Picts by miracle: for in the night season, as Hungus was laid downe to sleepe (after it was agreed that they should giue battell) there appeared vnto him the apostle saint Andrew (as the tale goeth) promising him and his people victorie against their enimies on the day nert following; and for an assured token thereof, he told him that there should appeare ouer the Pictish host in the element such a fashioned crosse, as he sometime suffered vpon. Hungus awakened, and beholding the skie, saw the crosse, as the apostle had told him: wherevpon calling his people together, he not onelie shewed them the same sight, but also declared vnto them what vision had appeared vnto him in his sleepe; willing them therefore to be of good comfort, sith there was cause of such assured hope to haue assistance from aboue against their cruell enimies.

Athelstane is slaine.

Killstone ford.

A dreame.

The crosse of saint Andrew.

